And truly (replied I) this adventure ſeems to me ſo pleaſant, that I condemn you to her good ſport for the reſt of this day. I muſt indeed needs do ſo (replied Ceſonia) or be offended in good earneſt with two men, for whom of all the World I have the greateſt eſteem. Alaſs Madam, I beſeech you be not offended, and not to examine things too ſtrictly; be pleaſed ſince Turnus hath ſpoke ſo much to you, to allow me the ſame liberty. That you may not deceive your ſelf (replied Turnus) I have only mentioned your affection to make way for my own. However it be (ſaies Ceſonia) I ſhall believe nothing but what I think fit, and ſhall not think but what I ought; for it were little leſs then madneſs for me to imagine, that I ſhould in one day make two Lovers quit, the one his fidelity, the other his inconſtancy. But though it were not true (replied I) it may be ſuppoſed, were it only to raiſe ſome pleaſant diſcourſe. Conditionally it laſt no longer then this evening (replied Ceſonia) and that my two pretended Lovers, will to morrow content themſelves to be only my friends, it ſhall be ſo. We ſhall be to morrow what we can be (replied Perſander) but in the mean time, give me the liberty to tell you, what I thought not to have told you this day. Say what you pleaſe (replied ſhe) ſo I be not obliged to believe you. For my part (replied Turnus laughing) I defie your incredulity, as to what I ſhall ſay. Be it as it will (replied I) only ſay what you have a mind, and leave the ſequel to the Conduct of Fortune. I ſay then (replied Turnus) that if the fair Ceſonia be not the moſt unjuſt woman in the World, ſhe will acknowledge her beauty never ceaſed any affection could more expreſs its power, then by ſubduing the heart of an unconſtant man. And I ſay (on the contrary, replied Perſander) that there is no beauty ſo mean, which might not pretend to the Conqueſt of an inconſtant man, and that the greateſt acknowledgement which Ceſonia ever received for the force of her Charms, is to have forced me to a change of apprehenſions. But (replied Turnus) you conſider not what you ſay: The truth is, Madam (continued he, directing his ſpeech to Ceſonia) there is no compariſon betwixt theſe two. For before I began to love you, I led a moſt happy life; all places were equally delightful to me; I either loved, or thought I loved a many excellent Beauties; I was happy in their eſteem and I might haply, have without vanity pretended to their affections, could I but have reſolved to fix mine on any one of them. The injoyments of my life knew not the leaſt diſturbance; I had no acquaintance with jealouſie, or my thoughts with diſorder; I only deſired thoſe things which were eaſily obtained; and in a word, ſuch a ſerenity was there in the Conduct of my life, that I could not be in any impatience to change my condition. But notwithſtanding all this indulgence of Fortune and that natural inconſtancy, I have quitted all theſe undiſturbed pleaſures, and forſaken three or four Miſtreſſes by whom I was eſteemed, to confine my love to one; by whom I ſhall haply be ſlighted. But for Perſander (added he) I do not much wonder at his change of life; for being firſt blinded by love, he muſt needs be perpetually unfortunate. So that to ſpeak rationally, his change is ſo much advantagious to himſelf, that I ſuppoſe you are not much obliged to him for it.

To anſwer what you object againſt me (replied Perſander) I muſt alſo ſpeak ſomething againſt you which is not very hard to find. For as I have already ſaid, Madam (added he, ſpeaking to Ceſonia) change of affection is ſo natural to an inconſtant man that it is much more to be wondred that Turnus ſhould have known you ſo long before he loved you, then that he loves you now. And for thoſe undiſturbed pleaſures he ſpeaks ſo much of, ſince it is certain there never proceed any ſuch from love, and that what he felt may be called only a paſſionate enjoyment of himſelf, if I may ſo expreſs it, he ſhould be aſhamed to quote them. It is not therefore very ſtrange, Madam, that a perſon accuſtomed to court divers Beauties at the ſame time, ſhould at length take you in his turn, ſince you are alone furniſhed with greater Charms, then all he hath ever loved. But for my part, Madam, I do a thing much more extraordinary. I confeſs (added he) my love was blinded, and that I have loved that which was not amiable, and what I ought not to have loved, but as I doubt not but you have heard, errours of this nature are more excuſable then any other; for the judgement upon the firſt admiſſion of love, loſing its liberty, it were unjuſt, to expect a Lover ſhould judge as truly of his Miſtreſs as others do. However, I was never ſo far blinded, but that I was convinced you were a thouſand degrees above what I loved, even when I loved you not. But in fine, I confeſs my love was greater than it ought to have been, nay, I know I was not loved, and yet I ſuffered all the afflictions of love: Notwithſtanding all which, I maintain that a Lover who is unfortunate, yet conſtant, is the hardeſt to be lured into a new love of any man in the World: For certainly, it is no eaſie matter for him to croſs his own experience, and to jump out of one love into another, when he found no ſatisfaction in the former. I conclude therefore that loving you, I do ſomething far more extraordinary than what Turnus hath done.

The truth is (replied Caſonia) I do not conceive either of you hath done any great matter; for Turnus loves me, becauſe he hath haply made a vow to love all; and you love me becauſe you are of a paſſionate and tender nature, and that not being able to faſten love where you deſired, you will try your fortune elſewhere, and addreſs your ſelf to ſome perſon from whoſe favour you may derive this advantage to make the World believe, that if you had not been loved, it was rather through want of knowledge in her whom you loved, than merit in your ſelf. I therefore think you both very happy, that I take not what you ſay ſpoken ſeriouſly: For if it were, you would haply both repent it, and if I were in an humour to ſatisfie you, I ſhould be much troubled to chuſe either, and be obliged to entertain his affection. How, Madam, (replied Perſander) can you any longer doubt what you have to do? How, Madam, (added Turnus) are you not yet fully ſatisfied in the buſineſs? For my part (replied I) methinks I ſhould not be ſo much troubled: And what, I pray, would you do (replied Caſonia) I would, replied I, have them both ſerve me for a long time, not engaging me to any thing ſo to be aſſured, that the inconſtant Lover were really become conſtant, and that the conſtant had abſolutely forgotten his former error: But during this ſpace, I would obſerve them very narrowly, and if I found them both equally conſtant, I would chuſe him for whom I had a greater inclination. I ſhould not haply do what you would (replied Caſonia) for were I to make the choice, I ſhould chuſe the more amorous of the two. Ah Madam, (cries out Perſander) how happy ſhall I be if you take that courſe! Ah (excellent Caſonia) how much ſhall I be ſatisfied, replied Turnus, if you make that wood good! It ſuits very well indeed, added he, with a man who never loved but once in all his life, to be confident he knows better how to love than any other. 'Tis too true, replied Perſander coldly, it is only a conſtant Lover who knows how to love well, but an inconſtant man is not fit ſo much as to ſpeak of Conſtancy. Time ſhall convince you what I am fit to do, anſwered Turnus, and Time and Love, replied Perſander, ſhall convince the fair Caſonia, that a man who hath loved conſtantly what was not worthy to be loved, can eternally adore her with as much Reſpect as Paſſion. Whatever comes of it (replied Caſonia riſing up) let it ſuffice that you have ſpoken contrary to your thoughts, let us continue what we now are I beſeech you, and be my conſtant friends if you expect any friendſhip from me. It is a great pity (replied I, looking on Turnus and Perſander) you did not fall in love with me rather than Caſonia, for I think this Adventure ſo particular, that I ſhould have been infinitely pleaſed to continue the humour. I aſſure you amiable Plotina, replied Perſander, that for what concerns me it ſhall laſt as long as I live, though the fair Caſonia contribute nothing thereto.

Turnus could not hear this without ſaying ſomething to it, whereupon Caſonia forbad them all further diſcourſe, and diſmiſſed them; telling them very ſeriouſly, that the next day they ſhould not be permitted to entertain her with ſuch extravagancies. Accordingly, for ſome time after, neither Perſander nor Turnus made any progreſs in their Loves, and he from whom Caſonia had received Gold, was no more eſteemed than the other.

In the mean time, theſe two Friends omitted nothing of what they thought might pleaſe Caſonia, and aſſure her of their affection; for Turnus could enjoy himſelf no where but when he was near her, all his old Miſtreſſes were indifferent to him, all the love he had reſerved he beſtowed among thoſe friends of hers whom he loved. Perſander alſo for his part, made it his only buſineſs to viſit Caſonia, he would ſee no more her whom he had loved, and he did all he could to inſinuate himſelf into this charming beauty, but to his unhappineſs and haply Caſonias alſo, Fortune was pleaſed to favour Turnus with divers occaſions to ſerve his Miſtreſs. For this latter being of a nature very eager and inventive, though otherwiſe a lover of his eaſe, he acquitted himſelf of theſe ſervices with ſo much obligation, that it begat in Caſonia a belief that he loved her beyond Perſander, for whom ſhe certainly had a greater inclination. Not but that Perſander did a many things both to divert and entertain her; and conſequently gave her ground to think, that he would have rendred her the ſame good Offices as Turnus if he had had the opportunities, but it was not the pleaſure of fortune ſo to favour him with them: And Turnus had this advantage over him, that he had obliged Caſonia in divers things of concernment, and in ſuch manner as might induce her to believe that he had a greater affection for her than any man had had. Beſides all which, Erſilia having been concerned in ſome of thoſe good Offices he had done her her daughter, and that a certain Sympathy of humour led her to favour this man, he had Cæſonia's Mother of his ſide. Not but that ſhe had an infinite eſteem for Perſander, but imagining to her ſelf a more abſolute power over Turnus than him, ſhe was the more inclined to beſtow her daughter on him, and to ſpeak truly, ſhe would rather have had a Son ſuch a one as Perſander, rather than as Turnus, but ſhe wiſhed ſuch a Son-in-Law as Turnus, rather than Perſander. As for Ceſonia, ſhe was more inclined to the latter, but believing her ſelf better beloved by the other, her reaſon or rather her error forced her to do ſome violence to her inclination, out of that opinion that it is a greater pleaſure to be loved than to love. For my part, being both my Friends, I was much troubled between them: But my friendſhip with Ceſonia being more ancient than with them, I conſidered only her intereſt, ſo that after a ſtrict examination of the buſineſs, I took part with Perſander, whom I was ſo much for, that I told Turnus that if Ceſonia asked my advice, I ſhould tell her it were better for her to marry Perſander than him. And accordingly ſome few days after, being preſſed by Ceſonia to take ſome final reſolution, ſhe asked me my opinion. I was not ignorant that though ſhe entertained theſe two Lovers with an equal Civility, ſhe had a greater affection for Perſander, and therefore adviſed her to prefer him before his Rival. Ah Plotina (ſaid ſhe to me) Turnus certainly loves me better than Perſander, though haply I love Perſander better than Turnus. But, ſaid I to her, how are you ſo particularly confident that Turnus loves you better than Perſander? For it happens many times, that one is ſo far from knowing preciſely their own apprehenſions, that I know not how you can have the confidence to judge of thoſe of others. That you ſhould put the value on the ſervices Turnus hath done, as to prejudice Perſander, is that I cannot by any means endure, ſince that if Fortune had favoured him with the ſame opportunities, he had done the like. I doubt it not (replied Ceſonia) but when all is done, the ſervices of Turnus are very conſiderable. They are ſo, ſaid I, but ſince the buſineſs is to know whether hath the greater love for you, and that you acknowledge Perſander would have done the ſame things that Turnus hath, methinks you ſhould not prefer Turnus before Perſander, eſpecially conſidering your inclination leads you to favour the latter rather than the former. But you conſider not (replied ſhe) that I am not of your belief, that a woman, to be happy muſt love, and that I believe quite contrary, that her ſatisfaction conſiſts in being loved. But whence is it that you imagine (ſaid I to her) that Perſander loves you leſs than Turnus? In the firſt place (ſaid ſhe) I apprehend, that Turnus proving conſtant for my ſake, hath made a greater diſcovery of love than Perſander: I find alſo a greater eagerneſs in the one than in the other; Turnus hath always a hundred things to entertain me withal, but when Perſander hath any opportunity to ſpeak to me, he hath much ado to find any thing to ſay, though certainly he have a great Wit. Ah Ceſonia (ſaid I to her) how ſorry am I to hear you ſpeak as you do, and to ſee that you know not, that that which you look on as an imperfection in love, is an infallible effect of an extraordinary paſſion: For whence proceeds that diſturbance of mind in Perſander when he ſpeaks to you, but that ore-whelm'd with Paſſion, he is troubled and is not able to ſpeak? And whence comes it that Turnus entertains you with a hundred extravagancies wherewith you are diverted, but that he is not of ſuch a tenderneſs of nature, as that Love ſhould put his Reaſon into any diſorder? But will you not at leaſt acknowledge (ſaid I to her) that the Letters of Perſander are fuller of Paſſion than thoſe of Turnus? For though you look on their Letters only as Letters of Friendſhip, yet may they well paſs for thoſe of Love. For Letters (replied ſhe) they are things of ſo ambiguous a nature, that nothing can be ſafely grounded on them: For I know a man, who during the ſpace of a long abſence, writ a many Letters to a Kinſ-woman of mine, which ſpoke all the tenderneſs imaginable, nor indeed could there be any thing more ſeemingly obliging, or more inſinuating. Being after all this returned, he carried himſelf towards her, as if he had never writ any thing to her that ſignified ſo much as ordinary Courtſhip. What you ſay (replied I) is ſo fantaſtick, that I think you have invented it to confirm your own apprehenſion: For how can a vertuous man bely himſelf, ſince that when he does it the diſproportion of his reflections injures only himſelf, and takes nothing away from the merit of thoſe people on whom he ſo reflects? But in fine, not to ſpend words vainly on a thing which cannot fall out often, do you acknowledge that Perſander writes as paſſionately as Turnus, and give me leave immediately to convince you of this Truth, by comparing theſe Letters you have of theirs. Since I have by chance two in my Pocket at this very preſent, (replied ſhe) it will not be hard for me to ſatisfie you: Whereupon I taking her at her word, ſhe gave me a Letter ſhe had received from Turnus ſome two days before, wherein I found theſe words.

Turnus to the Fair Cæſonia.

IF you thought not on me the laſt night, Madam, I am unhappy; for I never had ſo many thoughts of you, nor indeed did I ever think on you with ſo much tenderneſs as then. To acquaint you with them were hard for me to do, but in a word, they always amounted to this, that you were the moſt adorable Perſon in the World, and that I ſhould be the happieſt of men, if you were ſo favourable as to give me leave to disburthen my heart to you. Will you ever, Madam, oppoſe the felicity of a man who adores you, and will not pay his adoration to any thing elſe? Reſolve me, Madam (I beſeech you) for after the loſs of Hope, I ſhould take the loſs of Life but as a Courteſie.

Now

Now (says Cæsonia to me) do you think this Letter so indifferent? When I have seen that of Persander (replied I) I shall give you my opinion of Turnus's; whereupon opening it I therein read these words.

Persander to the Attractive Cæsonia.

TO have infinite Love for you Madam, not to see you, to want the opportunities of both hearing from you and sending to you, make up altogether too great a punishment, and it is impossible I should be able long to endure it. Your own cruel Prohibitions hindered me from Writing to you Yesterday; my cross Fortune, and I know not what ridiculous Prudence kept me from coming where you were, but you were perpetually present to my thoughts, and to speak truly, I was not in any of those places where I was. I contribute so much to my own unhappiness, as to think you did not the like, and that the Unfortunate Persander came not once into your mind, unless by some accident or through Civility, you were obliged to speak of him, or that you had not any thing to say of him in that excellent good Company wherein you were. Be pleased to let me know so much, Divine Cæsonia, I beseech you, for though I wish you greater satisfaction and enjoyment in all things than I do my self, I should entertain even death it self kindly, if you cannot have any true pleasure without me, as I cannot nor will without you.

Now, said I to her in my turn, Do you not think this Letter as passionate as the other? But if I should think so, replied she, I should infer nothing thence; for it is not to be doubted but Turnus loves me more eagerly than Persander. And I on the contrary, replied I, am confident Persander loves you as much as man can love: Nay, I question not but that you love Persander somewhat better than Turnus, and therefore you would commit a great error if you preferred Turnus before Persander. For is it not true, that there cannot be a greater Wit than his, that he hath a mind excellently endued with all gallantry and perfection; that you esteem him above all those of your acquaintance, and in a word, that there is not a more vertuous person in the world? I confess it, says she, but being of opinion, that if I should marry him, I should love him more than he me; and on the contrary, that Turnus will love me more than I shall him, and more than Persander doth, I am resolved no longer to disobey the command my Mother hath laid on me, to prefer Turnus before Persander. But Ersilia said I to her, makes this choice out of policy as you do out of humour; and therefore I now foretel, that you will be both deceived in it. But, replyed she blushing, were not Turnus worthy to be chosen without any dispute, of all the vertuous persons of Ardea, if Persander were laid aside? He were, replied I, but with all his wit, all his merit, all his good parts, nay and all his goodness, I would not marry an inconstant man newly become a Proselyte; for not to dissemble, the conquest you have made of him, you are indebted for to his Inconstancy.

This I seconded with an hundred other things, but what ere was said to Cæsonia was said in vain, for she thought the Inclination she had for Persander, would make her unhappy if she married him, and that he loved her not sufficiently; and Turnus had so dazled her with the greatness of his fame, by a thousand little flatteries and many real services, which Fortune favoured him with the opportunities to render her, that she was absolutely perswaded she was more loved by him than Persander, whom yet she could object nothing against, and who on the contrary had a thousand ways obliged her: So that Ersilia who doubtless was more desirous she should marry Turnus than Persander, having pressed her to resolve on something, and told her she should do well to conform her self to the intention she had to bestow her on Turnus; she inconsiderately consents, and perswaded he bestowed her self on the more amorous, she her self delivered this sad news to Persander: For he coming one day to see her, and finding her more cold to him than ordinary, he asked her the reason of it, which she told him without much ceremony. I beseech you now (said she to him, after she had acquainted him with the command Ersilia had laid on her) trouble not your self to make fruitless complaints to me, and consider you may yet be accounted among my Friends if you please. Ah Madam, replied he, if you cannot entertain my Love, I shall little value your friendship: but Madam, have you quite forgotten that you said, you would look on love above all things, and that you would bestow your self rather on the more amorous, than the more amiable. It is for that reason, replied she, that I do your merit some injustice. No, no, Madam, disguise not the truth, acknowledge that your mind is changed, and that instead of disposing your self to him who loves you most, you bestow your self on him you love best. Yet Madam, added he, to give you an extraordinary expression of love, I declare to you, that if I thought that Turnus could but love you all his life as he doth now, I should never charge you with my misfortune; though I am confident that I love you a thousand times more than he does. But Madam, since I am intimately acquainted with him, expect what I now foretel you, that as soon as you shall have made him happy, you will begin to be miserable your self. Not but that there is in Turnus a sufficiency of vertue and goodness, but take in also all the Generosity of his Soul, I dare affirm Love will soon be dislodged out of his heart, when he shall once have no more to hope. Nay, I dare tell you Madam, that for Turnus's constancy you are partly obliged to me; since it is certain that if I had not been his Rival, he had loved you less, and would have changed his resolution ere this time; For not to flatter you, you, it is only emulation hath increased his love, and his Ambition hath been as great to out-do his friend, as to overcome his Mistress: But when you shall have put him into a condition, wherein he shall not have any thing either to hope or fear, you will find that of a Lover whom you thought constant, you have made an inconstant Husband. I know Turnus hath done you those services which I could not: But Madam, have I omitted any thing which I could have done? Or can you reproach me with any want of duty? I cannot, replied she, but I am so fully perswaded that Turnus loves me better than you do; that I shall never change my mind unless he force me to it: And therefore trouble not your self, nor say any thing to me to his prejudice. For his merit, Madam, I shall acknowledge whatever you conceive may be thought to his advantage; but for his affection, give me leave to tell you, that you are not well acquainted with it: For in a word, Turnus is but an inconstant man somewhat disguised, yet I do not accuse him of having purposely deceived you. On the contrary, I assure you he is deceived himself, and believes he shall always love you as he doth now: But time will shew you if you alter not your resolution, that his mind is still the same; and you shall find on the contrary, that the unfortunate Perfander will have a constancy for you, which all the World shall reproach him with, and that he shall condemn himself for; for I perceive, that how unjust soever you may be to me, I shall love you eternally.

After this, Perfander said a thousand other obliging things to Cesonia, but she had already consented to what her Mother had proposed; and how that Erfilia had acquainted Turnus with it. So that not any ways relenting, she only set her self to entreat Perfander, not to bear any ill will to his friend for the choice she had made. But, Madam, you shall then promise that if Turnus's love die and mine out-live it, notwithstanding your injustice, you will give me leave to reproach you with it. If that happen, replied she, I should so well deserve it from you, that I make no great difficulty to give you leave.

Hereupon Perfander made his last assault on Cesonia's mind, but was as before repulsed; for she considered what Perfander said to her, rather as an effect of the greatness of his Wit than of his Love; and Turnus by a thousand little flatteries, such as cannot be expressed, had so strangely perswaded her that he infinitely loved her, that she had not the least doubt of it; so that though she had an infinite esteem for Perfander, yet she continued firm to her design. Perfander (in the mean time) may be said to be much more miserable, than Turnus was happy, though at the beginning he thought his happiness excessive: For my part, I was so angry with Cesonia, that I could do nothing but chide her for her injustice, and that not so privately but that Turnus knew of it. Nay one day, I would needs perswade him to resign Cesonia to his Friend, but being incensed by my opposition, I saw his Passion increased by what I said to him, insomuch that my business was to keep these two friends falling out; and indeed I managed things so fortunately, that though Perfander was tempted to break the promise he had made to Turnus in the beginning of their love, yet I prevailed with him to endure a misfortune which could not be remedied, without using any violence.

But that which was most remarkable was, that three days after Turnus was married he went to visit Perfander, who was fallen sick through grief, and spoke to him the most obligingly he could, to wish him to a continuance of Friendship: Adding particularly, that he should think the possession of Cesonia too dear, if it cost him the loss of his affection. Ah Turnus (cries out Perfander) were I in your place I should not say so: For I assure you, I should easily part with all your friendship for Cesonias affection. To this Turnus, in stead of some bitter answer, continued his mildness, and put Perfander into such a trouble, that he knew not what return to make him; for he intreated him to come and see him as he was wont, he assured him he should not be jealous, that he knew his Wife infinitely esteemed him, and he promised him his friendship. But the more he spoke, the more was Perfander's vexation increased: Nevertheless, he answered him very discreetly, neither accepting nor refusing his offers, as not knowing whether he should do, such a disturbance had love caused in him: Which done, he dismissed him without any incivility, or any particular expression of Friendship.

In the mean time, Cesonia, though she seemed to be satisfied, yet was somewhat troubled in her mind at Perfander's indisposition, which proved so dangerous that it was feared he might die of it: But at length he overcame it, though not that Passion which had seized his soul. On the contrary, it became so violent, that not being able to live without the sight of Cesonia; he resolved withall to endure that of his Rival, and to accept the proffer Turnus had made to him to continue friends. He therefore went to visit him, which visit Turnus took with much kindness; he brought him into Cesonias Chamber, before she had any notice of his coming, and intreated her to receive him as his friend; which done, having conducted Perfander into the Garden, he began to tell him he had a design to Travel. Perfander at first, conceived Turnus had some extraordinary occasion that obliged him thereto, not being able to apprehend that one whom Cesonia had chosen for the most amorous, could be perswaded to leave her, to go and Travel without any necessity, within a month after he had married her. He therefore asked him if he had any business of importance that obliged him to that resolution: None at all (replied Turnus) but to tell you the truth, it is long since I have had an inclination to travel, and now there is nothing to engage my stay at Ardea; and that I fear not you should take away Cesonia from me in my absence, I am resolved to satisfie my Curiosity.

Perfander hearing Turnus speak in this manner, was so astonished that he could not tell what answer to make him, nor indeed had he returned him any, had it not been that he had pressed him to accompany him in his Travels. So that being obliged to speak, he told him, he had business required his stay at Ardea; whereupon he took his leave of him.

On the other side, Turnus whose head was full of this humour of Travelling, spoke of nothing else else, and that with so much impatience, as to his departure, as if he had had a Mistress in every one of those places whither he pretended to go, and had never loved any thing at Ardea. Persander said nothing at all to him of it, and onely asked what caused him to take such a sudden resolution. To which Turnus answered, that two friends of his, having acquainted him with their intentions to travel, they had stirred up in him those he sometime had, so that he had resolved to go with them.

Not long after, Persander came to see me, to see what I should say of Turnus his design of Travelling, and if I knew not what Cesonia thought of it: For me thinks (said he) that having made choice of Turnus for the more amorous, she should take his departure somewhat unkindly. Cesonia (said I to him) hath more wit then to make her complaint to me; but I can read in her eyes, that she takes it most hainously. And for my part, if it were my own case, I should think it very hard measure that Turnus should marry me, only to forsake me, being not obliged thereto by any rational ground. But what saies Ersilia, repli'd Persander? Ersilia (repli'd I) repines secretly at it; but for Cesonia, that which confirms me that she is absolutely inraged at it, is that I have understood by a Maid that waits on her, that unless it was the first day that Turnus acquainted her with his design, that she endeavoured to oppose it, she hath not spoke one word since to divert him from it. Ah Plotina (cries out Persander) the amorous Turnus is no longer such, and the unfortunate Persander, notwithstanding his misfortunes is more amorous then he. For in fine (continued he, shewing me a Letter he had received from a Kinsman) you may see by what is written to me, that it were for my advantage to leave Ardea, and that I am promised a very considerable employment elsewhere. But notwithstanding my being slighted by Cesonia, I cannot be induced to quit the place where she resides, and deprive my self of all sight of her. I assure you (repli'd I) you are almost as much to be blamed as Turnus; for I do not think that Cesonia deserves you should so much as think of her. Besides (said I to him) all your love to her will be to no purpose, for she is vertuous, and though it should happen she lost all love for Turnus, and should repent she had preferred him before you, your happiness will be never the greater. Ah Plotina (replied he) you know not how ingenuous Love is in finding out Pleasures; for it is to me a very sensible one, the very thought that Turnus is now to leave Cesonia. Nay, it is no small delight to me to imagine the Tears she sheds the day of his departure, will be rather the tears of indignation then Sorrow; And though I expect not ever to be happy, yet there is a certain kind of Hope which stands Centinel about my heart and keeps in my love, But what (replied I) if you have not lost your discretion, can you hope? I have no hope to be loved of Cesonia (replied he) but I hope that Cesonia will love Turnus no longer, and will haply regret the unfortunate Persander.

We said one to another a many things of this kind, whence I apprehended that Persander had still an infinite love for Cesonia, and that she mistook her self much that she had not made choice of him. To be short, all were so surprized at Turnus's departure, that a many things were reported of him, which were not true; but at last, notwithstanding all Ersilia could say to him, he took his leave. So that she then saw she was deceived, when she imagined to her self the absolute disposal of Turnus; for this humour of Travelling having taken him in the head, as soon as the Passion he had for Cesonia was satisfied, all the Charms of that excellent person were not strong enough to divert him. 'Tis true, his flatteries to her at parting were extraordinary, but they proceeded not from any great regret he had to leave her, though he was to be absent almost a whole year. Cesonia however at first, bore his departure with constancy enough, and out of a consideration of glory, betrayed not any the least dis-satisfaction at this voyage. Nay she had not the confidence to speak to me of it; and so discreetly avoided all discourse thereof, that I could not take it ill that she was so reserved. Besides that, for my part, I sought not the occasion to reproach her that she had not believed me, because I could take no pleasure in afflicting her to no purpose.

In the mean time, the whole City came to visit her, and comfort her for the absence of Turnus, and among the rest came Persander: for I had forgot to tel you, that Turnus at his departure had been to take his leave of his friend, that he had spoke very obligingly to him; that he had intreated him to continue his friendship to his Wife, and had desired Cesonia to admit the visits of Persander as those of any other, lest it should imagine he had forbidden him out of jealousie. Accordingly Cesonia disposed her self to receive the visits of Persander, conditionally they were not too frequent, and that he should say nothing to her, she might be offended at; resolving, in case he presumed to entertain her with the affection he had for her, not to see him any more; for Turnus had so far injoyned her to see him, that he could take no other resolution. Upon these terms, Persander, who had still an extream affection for her, visited her sometimes, and behaved himself with so much respect to her, and such acknowledgement of her Vertue, that he betrayed not his Passion in his discourse; but if Cesonia had examined his looks, they would have acquainted her with the most violent love in the World, 'Tis true a certain secret melancholy took up her spirits so much, that she would not seek what she was not desirous to find.

Hence it also proceeded, that Cesonia during Turnus's absence, avoided as much as might be, coming to great Feasts, and carryed her self as a Woman of great Vertue, and love to her Husband, and tender of his reputation should have done, especially, being young and handsom, having a Husband absent, and divers Lovers in the places where she resides.

But whiles Cesonia lived after this rate, and was extreamly troubled in her mind at Turnus's absence, when two months were passed ere she had received any tidings of him, he sent a man expres to Ardea, with divers orders. Cesonia was much amazed to understand that her Husband who she thought had taken shipping long before.

before, was ſtill at Rhegium, which place he ſpoke not of leaving for ſome time; whereat being much ſurprized, ſhe thought fit cunningly to ſift out what ſtaid Turnus there, and put her off with ſuch an unlikely account of it, as much increaſed her Curioſity. But that which was moſt myſterious to her, was, that ſhe came to underſtand that the man had brought a Letter from Turnus to Perſander, that he had ſpoken with him divers times, and that he could not return to his Maſter, till he were diſpatched by Perſander. So that being infinitely deſirous to know what might be in the Wind, ſhe was in an extraordinary diſquiet, for ſhe would not have any private diſcourſe with Perſander, though ſhe had for him the greateſt esteem in the World. Nor could ſhe eaſily condeſcend to give me any order to find it out, as conceiving that if ſhe had made that requeſt to me, I ſhould fall a chiding of her. But at laſt ſhe applyed her ſelf to me, and having made me promiſe I would not quarrel with her, ſhe told me what ſhe had ſo much mind to know. But (added ſhe) I would not have Perſander imagine that you ask him any thing for my ſatisfaction; for I would not give him any pretence or occaſion of diſcourſe concerning Turnus. I promiſed Cæſonia to obey her directions, and kept my word in not charging her with any thing. 'Tis true, I did not forbear it ſo much in performance of my promiſe, as out of compaſſion, obſerving in her eyes, that ſhe ſaid to her ſelf all that I could have ſaid to her.

As ſoon as ſhe had left me, I ſent to Perſander to come to me; which when he had done, without any mention of Cæſonia, I asked him what buſineſs he had with Turnus. He at firſt was loath to tell me the truth, but being well acquainted with his humour, ah Perſander (ſaid I to him) if you ſatisfie not my deſire, as to what I would now know, I ſhall never permit you to ſpeak of Cæſonia. You know that I am the onely perſon with whom you can rationally diſcourſe of her, and that I am your only comfort in this caſe. Perſander not able to deny me any longer, ſhewed me a Letter he had received from Turnus, wherein putting him in mind of their ancient Friendſhip, he intreated of him an extraordinary courteſie in doing that for him which he ſhould underſtand by the Bearer of the Letter. Whereupon Perſander told me, that Turnus deſirous that his family ſhould not know the vaſt expences he pretended to be at in this voyage, intreated him to write to a Kinſman of his at Rhegium, to furniſh him with ſuch things as he ſtood in need of: That further, he deſired to have ſent him, divers rarities which are made at Ardea, ſuch as are only fit to be preſented to Women, pretending a deſign he had to paſs through divers Courts, where he might make his advantage of them. And in a word (added Perſander) without diving any further into his intentions, I do for Turnus all he deſires of me, though he hath ruined my Felicity without eſtabliſhing his own; and within theſe two daies, I diſmiſs him he hath ſent to me, with all thoſe things he deſires.

This done, Perſander ſpoke many thinks very honourable and obligingly of Cæſonia, yet without any deſire made to me to tell her of it, as knowing it would have been to no purpoſe, though I am confident his love to her was guided by innocence it ſelf.

Having thus underſtood Turnus's buſineſs with Perſander, I thought not to have acquainted Cæſonia with it, leſt it ſhould afflict her. But I muſt confeſs, reflecting on her obſtinacy in oppoſing me, I was not very ſorry, I could convince her, I was in the right. Beſides that, it being fit ſhe knew what expences Turnus was at, that in caſe he ſhould ſend for wherewithall to continue his extravagancies, ſhe might take ſome courſe to remedy it, I reſolved to tell her the truth. But when I had acquainted her with all Paſſages, ſhe ſuſpected ſomething beyond what I had, which was, that Turnus had no other reaſon to ſend for all thoſe things, then his being fallen in love at Rhegium. To be ſhort, ſhe immediately ſent for the man who was come from Turnus to Ardea, and pretending that ſhe knew what ſhe was before deſirous he ſhould have told her, ſhe managed the buſineſs with ſo much diſcretion, that the man who had a great reſpect to Cæſonia, and thought his Maſter was much to blame, confeſſed at laſt (thinking ihe might remedy it) that he was indeed fallen in love at Rhegium, that his expences there were exceſſive, and that if ſhe took not ſome courſe to get him back to Ardea, he would continue there ſome time. To tell you what effect this new inconſtancy of Turnus had both on Cæſonia and my ſelf were not eaſie for me. But for Cæſonia, when ſhe had diſmiſſed the man, ſhe fixes her eyes ſwelled with tears on me, and remembring what I had ſometime ſaid to her. Ah Plotina (cried ſhe) you had great reaſon to tell me that Turnus was but an inconſtant man diſguiz'd, and that I had done better to have preferred Perſander before Turnus, then Turnus before Perſander. But alas (added ſhe) it is now no time to complain, it was the cruelty of my Fortune, when I thought to have choſen him who loved me moſt to have taken him who loved me leaſt, to his prejudice who loved me more, and haply better. The word haply is not well placed where you put it (ſaid I to her) for it is not to be doubted but Perſander will love you while he lives. Ah Plotina (ſaid ſhe tome with a high indignation) if there were any means to repent, I would repent me of the injuſtice I have done Perſander: But alas I muſt not for my own ſake admit any thought of repentance, and I muſt live ſo with Turnus, as if he were conſtant, and ſo with Perſander, as if I were indifferent to him. Divers other things came from Cæſonia wherewith I was extreamly moved.

Notwithſtanding all this, ſhe wrote to her Husband with all the reſpect and mildneſs in the World, and having diſcovered her affliction to her Mother, it was reſolved ſhe ſhould pretend to be ſick, that divers of Turnus's friends ſhould be intreated to write to him, to indeavour to bring him home again, and that ſhe her ſelf would alſo invite him with the greateſt inſinuation ſhe could uſe. To be ſhort, ſome days after, ſhe was ſo much Miſtreſs of her own thoughts, that ſhe writ to him a Letter infinitely paſſionate: But he being at that time much taken with his loves at Rhegium; and underſtanding from ſome friends at Ardea, that Cæſonia was not very ſick, he returned not to Ardea, but remained two months anger at Rhegium that is to say, as long as his Passion lasted. He then went to Syracuse, whence he was to go into Greece, but he was no sooner come to Syracuse, but he fell in love with a Princess of that place, which is one of the greatest Beauties in the World.

Besides all this, Turnus having with him two friends who were of Ardea, and were very complyant with his humour, much of what he did came to be known by that means, for one of these two was Brother to one of Turnus's former Mistresses, when he first fell in love with Cesonia. She being acquainted by her brothers Letters with all the new loves of Turnus, was very glad to find that the charms of Cesonia had been no stronger then hers to confine Turnus's affections, and maliciously divulged what her Brother had written to her concerning the Loves of this unfaithful Husband. By this means the business came to be so generally known, that there was none but might without any breach of civility speak to Cesonia of it, either as to blame Turnus, or pity her. She in the mean time had observed so much reservedness in her carriage, that Persander had never met with any occasion to speak to her without witnesses. But one day Ersilia having employed him with some business of consequence, and Persander being come to give her an account of it he found her not at home, but met with Cesonia, with whom he was obliged to stay, expecting the return of Ersilia but he found her in so melancholy a posture, that she hardly knew how to entertain him. Persander on the other side having so favourable an opportunity to speak to her, had not the power to tell her what he was desirous she should know; but at last the love he had in his soul making him more confident: It is long since Madam, said he to her, that I vainly seek what I have this day found; yet I beseech you Madam, added he, imagine not it is my purpose to say any thing to you whereat you may be offended, and therefore forbid me not to speak, for I shall only bemoan you, and but once accuse me in my life; all I have to say is, to conjure you to believe that as Turnus hath not been able to quit his inconstancy, Persander shall never be otherwise then constant, and shall love you while he lives. Ah Persander, said Cesonia to him, triumph not over my misfortunes, for it is enough to have an inconstant husband, without having a Friend defective as to respect. I beseech you therefore say not any thing to me which I shall not be satisfied to hear. No, no, Madam, said he to her, fear not any thing from the unfortunate Persander, he desires nothing of you, he hopes for nothing from you, and the sum of all he would have, amounts to no more then the favour of one single audience from you, that I may have the satisfaction of your own confession, that you were mistaken when you had bestowed your self on the most amorous; for Madam you need no further experience then that of this day, to make the comparison. To be short, added he, this Lover that was so eager, so constant in appearance, forsakes you as soon as he was possessed of you, and falls in Love with divers others as soon as he is out of your sight; But the unfortunate Persander, though treated with insupportable injustice, loves you still, without hope of ever being loved by you, and shall love you while he lives. Turnus hath left you without any cause, and I, whom affairs of consequence call hence, remain only to see you, though I am confident you bestow not a thought on me, that you would have me quit all love to you, and that I can pretend to no other advantage then that of pitying you, and doing you those services you can expect from a generous Friend. But I beseech you, deny me not this favour, trust me with the burthen of an affliction you cannot conceal from me. Speak not any thing of favour to me, nothing of obligation, nothing that may discover that you so much as think I love you; but tell me only as a discreet and faithful friend, that you are dis-satisfied with Turnus, that you are sensible of his injustice and his inconstancy, and are at last convinced that you have made an ill choice. I therefore expect no other reward of the respectful passion I have for you, then to see you dis satisfied with my Rival; and to give you an infallible expression of the greatness and purity of my inclinations, I protest to you, that, if I could change his heart, and make him constant to you, I would do it, so to make you happy, though I doubt not but I should be much more miserable then I am, if you were satisfied with Turnus.

I beseech you, Persander, said she to him, content your self that I tell you in general terms, that I have done you an injustice, and expect not I should trust one with the knowledge of my affections, who is Rival to him that causes them. Besides, imagine not that the inconstancy of Turnus shall ever make me do any thing against Innocence; for I am vertuous for my own sake, not for his: and therefore flatter not your self with a groundless hope, if you are not disposed to affront me: You might indeed sometime have hoped without doing me any injury; but now the case is altered, and indeed I take it not well, that when you speak to me, you bemoan me. Do that secretly, if you have so much generosity, as to pity my misfortunes, and increase them not by giving me so much cause to quarrel at your constancy, as I have to complain of Turnus's inconstancy.

After this Persander said a many other things which neerly concerned Cesonia, but she continued firm in her resolution, not to permit him to entertain her with his passion, how innocent soever it might be. She would also have needs forbidden him to visit her; but he made it so much appear to her that it would find all the Town discourse, that at last she consented he should see her sometimes, conditionally he would never speak to her of his affection. She would further make him promise her, not to speak at all of Turnus; and in fine, she said not any thing to him, which though a jealous husband should over hear, he could be displeased with. But Persander being a very discreet person, had a greater esteem for Cesonia then before, and his Love, instead of diminishing any thing by the loss of Hope, was much augmented; in a word, he was screwed into a higher love to Cesonia, then any man could have been.

Cesonia on the other side, understanding from time to time, that Turnus continued not eight days in any place ere he had found out a new Mistress, stress, was extreamly exasperated against him. But that which encreased her misery, was, to see Persanders constancy to her, though she did nothing for him. For though he said nothing to her concerning his Love, and did none of those heroick actions, which are the ordinary marks of a great passion, he did a many others, which Cesonia and I took notice of, and which satisfied us, that he was infinitely passionate in his Love, though he said nothing of it. He was even blinded into a compliance to Ersilia, by whom he was very much loved; he never came to Cesonia when there was any company there: If any one commended her in his presence, there was such a visible satisfaction in his eyes, as if he were concerned in her reputation; if any one endevoured to excuse Turnus, he could not but discover his indignation. If Cesonia chanced to be sick, he could not be at rest any where; he loved what she was taken with, even to things intastable; he conformed all his apprehensions to hers; he saw her as often as he could; he loved me for her sake, as much as if I had been her Sister; and when he and I were alone, she was the constant subject of our discourse; he looked on no women with any delight, but Cesonia; and in a word, Cesonia was the sole object of all his pleasures, and all his affection. Notwithstanding all this, he mastered this violent passion, through the aw he stood in of the person who caused it; and indeed, so far did she conceive her self obliged thereby, that insensibly, contrary to Cesonias first intentions, she trusted him with the knowledge of her discontents. But I must needs give her this testimony, that she never either did, or said any thing that Persander could take any advantage of: so that it may be said he was her Lover, and that she was only his Friend: Those good thoughts which she had for him, were so innocent, that it was the reason she made not that provision against a many little inconsiderable circumstances, which how innocent soever they might be, yet proved the occasions of all ill reports: For it was talked abroad, that Cesonia cleared her self up for the inconstancy of Turnus, by the constancy of Persander: and that which raised many strange reports, was, that he whom Turnus had sent to Ardea, to bring with him what he had sent to Persander for, having told it some body at his departure, who soon after divulged it, it was known that Persander had sent Turnus such things, as should detain him some time out of his Country. And as Calumny sucks Poyson out of the best actions, so it was reported about Ardea, that what was done, was with the privity of his Wife, and that Persander had not done him that good office, but to keep him at a distance from Cesonia. Besides, her Beauty and her Vertue raising her to the enmity of her own Sex, the business was so strangely glossed upon, that I thought my self obliged to acquaint her with what was said of her, for I knew her innocence, and that it was time for her to remedy this evil, and put envie and calumny to silence, by taking away those pretences they make use of. That which gave the greatest colour to these unhappy reports, was, that the Friends of Persander pressing him to marry, he so roughly rejected all Propositions of that nature, that it was easily perceived there was some secret considerations that obliged him to be so backward. There was also another thing that made a great noise; for you are to know, that Persander, who besides a great Wit, hath other excellent good parts, and particularly Poetry; and it being impossible but that a Lover who is indued with that quality, must write something, though Persander durst not shew any Verses directed to Cesonia, as purposely made for her, yet could he not avoid the writing of some. But to the end, in case they might be gotten some way from him, she might not receive any injury for whom they were made, he called her by a name which had no resemblance to hers; for instead of Cesonia, he called her Dorinica. He shewed me divers Copies, and (if I am not mistaken) presented her sometimes with them, yet not acknowledging they were made for her, but only to have her judgement of them, for certainly Cesonia is very good at such things. It unfortunately hapned one day, that Persander having made a Paper of Verses, and left them on the Table in his Closet, thinking he had locked the Door, there came one of his acquaintance to see him, who finding the Doors of his Lodgings open, enters without speaking to any body into Persanders Chamber, and thence into his Closet, where he had often seen him. But not finding him, spying the Verses on the Table, which he thought very amorous, he read them twice over, and got them by heart, without any other reflection thereon at that time, than that he was taken with them; which done, understanding that Persander was not within, he went his ways, not saying any thing to any body. From thence he went to give a visit to a Lady he was in love with, who had an ill opinion of the Cabal of the Fair Solitaries in general, by reason of a particular dis-affection she had to Cesonia, who was one of them. He repeated to her the Verses he had learned, which she had no sooner heard, but she said, that certainly they were made for Cesonia. She also got them by heart, and being one that talks much, one that goes fast, and whose Fancy far out-runs her Judgement, without considering what might be the consequences of it, she dispersed divers Copies of them. But that you may the better know what the business came to, I must repeat them to you: They were these,

For Dorinica.

I In her Presence fain would dye,
That her Fair hand might close my Eye;
And when my soul in sighs expires,
This is my Martyr she might say,
I would by some sublimer way.
But behold! Be silent my Desires,
We Dorinica must obey.

You may eaſily judge, that theſe Verſes contain nothing that could with reaſon prejudice Caſonia, yet made they no ſmall noiſe abroad; nay, ſuch as whence were drawn very unhappy conſequences. It hapned alſo that the laſt Verſe falling in very pertinently, as ſimple as it is, in regard there is ſomething amorous in the very cadence, it became a certain frolick to quote it upon divers occaſions, ſo that it was a general humour to ſay, how pertinently or impertinently, it mattered not.

We Dorinica muſt obey.

Though there were no other reaſon for it, than that it was become an expreſſion a-la-mode. But at laſt, the buſineſs growing very common, I ſpoke to Caſonia of it, with all the ſincerity of a faithful Friend. I had no ſooner acquainted her with what was ſaid of her, but ſhe bluſhed, and was extremely troubled. However ſhe was not much to ſeek what to do. I muſt need confeſs (ſaid ſhe to me) that Perſander hath ſo carried himſelf towards me, ſince I fell into misfortune, and hath ſo much obliged me, that I cannot but have for him the tendereſt friendſhip in the World; nay, I muſt acknowledge that unleſs it be when I am with you, my diſturbances admit no remiſſion, but by acquainting him therewith. But it ſeems I muſt be deprived of that ſatisfaction, and I ſhall do it in ſuch a manner as ſhall ſilence all the Calumny that perſecutes me. This Caſonia ſpoke with ſo much trouble in her countenance, that I eaſily perceived ſhe took ſome ſtrange reſolution: So that I thought to have told her it was enough, if ſhe were more circumſpect in ſome little Occurrence, and that it were not diſcreetly done abſolutely to break off with Perſander. No, no, Plotina (ſaid ſhe to me) ſay nothing to me, for I ſhall do what I have reſolved; but only pity the unhappy deſtiny I have to ſtruggle with. And that you may the better know how to pity me, I muſt acquaint you, my dear Plotina, with the true ſtate of my Soul, that fully underſtanding my frailty, you may accordingly commend me for the power I have to conceal it. Know then that I have ever had a violent inclination for Perſander, and only an ordinary eſteem for Turnus, and that if I had not believed the latter loved me incomparably beyond the other, and that it was greater pleaſure to be loved than to love, I had never married him. But that which makes up my preſent puniſhment, is that Turnus's inconſtancy hath raiſed in me a deteſtation of him, and the conſtancy of Perſander hath raiſed in me a love of him. The Gods know (added ſhe, bluſhing) whether I have not equally reſiſted both the hatred I have for Turnus, and the affection I have for Perſander, and notwithſtanding theſe two Paſſions, made a ſtronge reſolution to live contentedly with him whom I hate, and by all means poſſible to conceal my affections from him whom I love. But all conſidered, I cannot but reſent the injury Turnus hath done me in ceaſing to love me, as ſoon as he was aſſured of me, and am ſo ſenſible of the obligation Perſander hath put upon me, by continuing his affection, when he can hope to receive no viſible expreſſion of mine, that I eaſily foreſee that through theſe two oppoſite apprehenſions, I ſhall lead the moſt wretched life in the World, eſpecially ſince I muſt wraſtle with them as long as I live.

I ſhould never have done, if I ſhould acquaint you with all Caſonia ſaid to me, and what anſwer I made her: But as we were thus ingaged, Perſander comes into the houſe; and one of Caſonia's women being come into her Cloſet (where we were, to give her notice of it) ſhe gave order he ſhould be brought in. He was no ſooner entred, but ſhe ſeeing there was none but we three, and fixing her eyes full of ſadneſs and melancholy upon him, I beſeech you Perſander (ſaid ſhe to him) do me the favour to think never the worſe of me, when you ſhall underſtand a certain requeſt I have to make to you.

Ah Madam (ſaid he to her) though you deſired my death, I ſhould not take it ill at your hands, and therefore you may aſſure your ſelf you cannot make any requeſt to me that ſhall oblige me to hate you. But, Madam, (added he) What ſtrange requeſt is it you have to make to me? I am firſt to intreat you (replied ſhe) to be confident that I have for you the greateſt eſteem imaginable, and acknowledge my ſelf infinitely obliged to you. But that done, I am to intreat you, to tell me whether it be true or no that you have for the unfortunate Caſonia, a moſt tender and a moſt diſintereſted Friendſhip. For Friendſhip, Madam, (ſaid he to her) I know not whether I have any; but for affection, I aſſure you, never had any man ſo much as I have for you, and that if I were to loſe my life to make good this truth, I ſhould do it chearfully. No Perſander (replied ſhe) you ſhall not need to do any thing of that nature, and without loſing your life, it ſhall ſuffice only that you henceforward loſe all ſight of me. Ah, Madam, how cruel is that word only, and how little does it oblige me? For I think it more inſupportable to be ever deprived of your ſight than my life. But, Madam, do you ſpeak to me in good earneſt? I do Perſander (ſaid ſhe to him) and Plotina ſhall tell you the reaſon of it. Whereupon I told Perſander what ſcandalous reports were ſcattered up and down, whereof he had not heard any thing before; for being of a nature very ſenſible of reputation, his friends durſt not tell him any thing. I had no ſooner acquainted him therewith, but Perſander caſting himſelf on his knees at Caſonias feet; Alas, Madam, (ſaid he to her) can you lay this misfortune to my charge; to me, I ſay, who love you without acquainting you ſo much, and have that power over my ſelf, as to conceal the moſt eager, and moſt violent paſſion that ever was? However, divine Caſonia (continued this afflicted Lover) I ſhall willingly not be innocent, and to make me guilty, there ſhall need no more than that my love hath cauſed you the leaſt diſquiet. But, Madam, all crimes are not baniſhed, there are more kinds of puniſhment than one. No, no Perſander (replied Caſonia Sonia) forcing him to rise up, I wish not your banishment as a punishment, but as a remedy for the evil I suffer; for certainly it is not just, that I believe at the same time unfortunate and innocent, should be thought guilty, when I am not. If therefore it be true that you love me, resolve to chuse one of these two things. Ah, Madam, (cries he) how difficult do I think the choice you put me to, though I know not yet what you would say to me: However it be (said Cesonia) there is no other expedient left. But once more, Madam, (replied he) what choice is it you put me to? That you would either quit Ardea (replied she) and never come into it, or at least not of a long time, or that you would marry, and never see me often, but when you cannot possibly avoid it. Ah, Madam, (cries he) into what a strange extremity have you reduced me? Ah Persander (replied she) what an unhappy conjuncture am I in for your sake? Reputation I value above all things, and though I have done nothing whereby mine should be prejudiced, yet am I in a fair likelihood to lose it; if therefore you love me, and any true Generosity, assist me to preserve that, which once lost you cannot restore. I give you two days to take your choice of these two things I have proposed to you; and if you do it not, I shall be more dissatisfied with you than with Tarnus.

Hereupon Persander made a thousand fruitless expostulations, and propositions, and proposed a many several expedients; for, he was content not to see Cesonia any more at her house, conditionally he might see her sometimes at my Chamber; nay, he at last came so low, as that he would not seek to her any where, provided he might write to her; but there being in things of this nature a certain mystery & obligation, Cesonia would on by any means ingage her self. She told him he must obey, that he loved her not, if he preferred not her Reputation before all things; and that she would absolutely hate him, if he resolved not either to marry, or absent himself for ever.

To tell you all they said one to another, and what I said to both, were to presume too much upon your patience. But I shall tell you, that since there have been Lovers, there were not any that passed two such long and cruel days, as those Persander spent in making this dreadful choice. For when he thought on this perpetual, or at best very long absence, he was no longer Master of his own thoughts, nor indeed of his words: Never to see Cesonia, seemed to him a thing so cruel, that he thought death it self more supportable. On the other side, when he thought of marrying, he had such a horrid aversion thereto, that he could hardly admit any Treaty of it: he thought he could not in honour marry one he should not love; and love inspired him with apprehensions so opposite to those of Marriage, that he could not take any resolution that way. Not but that it was some ease for him to think that he might at least remain by that means in Ardea, that he might see Cesonia in the Temples whether she would or not, and flattered himself with a hope that she might change her mind. But for this eternal absence, that which troubled him most in it, was, that he believed Cesonia would forget him: So that how great soever his aversion to marriage might be, yet he thought it spoke something more amorous, not to leave Cesonia, than eternally to forsake her: Nevertheless he could not resolve in the time Cesonia appointed him, but spent eight days in bemoaning himself, and doing nothing but writing Letters to me, to entreat me to get an arrest of that cruel Judgement: Cesonia avoiding all interviews in that time. But at last Cesonia understanding there was divers reports abroad, which gave people occasion to think there was some secret correspondence between her and Persander, sent him word, that it was her absolute Will he should take his choice: So that this unfortunate Lover looking on this Removal as absolutely insupportable, and thinking it would be conceived extravagant, was content to Marry, conditionally Cesonia made choice of a Wife for him; for there were three or four Ladies whereof his Friends proposed to him the choice. But if Persander was much troubled to chuse, Cesonia was no less to advise him: yet at last finding that she who had the greatest Fortune, had the least Beauty, she gave me order to name her to Persander, who was very much pleased with an imagination, that Cesonia pitching on a Wife for him that was not over handsome, might do it out of some considerations of kindness to him. But Cesonia's design took not, for the Friends of that Lady having heard the reports of the loves of Persander and Cesonia changed their minds, and answered him, that they thought not their Daughter handsome enough to cure Persander of so violent a Passion. This unhappy Lover therefore was forced to address himself to another, who certainly was as indifferent to him as the former, but was questionless much the handsomer; and to be short, the Marriage was talked of as a thing absolutely concluded.

No sooner were all parties agreed, but Cesonia was infinitely troubled at it, and was so much incensed against Persander, that she could not be more exasperated against Tarnus, than she was against him. Nevertheless she durst not at first discover her apprehensions of it, but I soon observing she was fallen into a new discontent, tormented at last into a confession, that she was extremely vexed that Persander had chosen rather to marry, than to depart. For in fine, said she, if he loved me so much as he would make me believe, he could never have consented to marry, especially with so great a Beauty, as he is now to have: but certainly the reason of that is, that I am destined to the experience of all kinds of Inconstancy: Tarnus as soon as he became my Husband, ceased to be my Lover, and Persander, who pretends so much obstinacy in love, will certainly become a Lover of his Wife, as soon as he shall have marryed one. But, said I to her, what concerns it you, whether he loves her, or loves her not, since you will never see him more, and are absolutely resolved never to receive a gallant Letter from Persander? I know I am much to blame, said she to me, and I am so disordered to see my own weakness, and the humourousness of my apprehensions, that I blush at it; for certainly I shall never see Persander, I shall never receive either Verse or Prose from him, that shall mention his Love;

Love; and Turnus, how inconstant soever he may be, shall, if ever he return, find me faithful to him. But when all is done, I cannot but be troubled that Persander marries, and marries one he can love. But said I to her, you have put the choice upon him: I confess it, replied she, but I expected not he should have made the choice he hath. It is not yet too late, replied I, for I am confident Persander hath so much aversion from marrying, that if you but let him know your dislike of it, he will give over all thoughts thereof. No, no Plotina, replied she, it is now too late, for I wished Persander might not marry, and since he thinks it fit to do so, there is no remedy; and if you acquaint him with the strangeness of my resentments, I should never endure the sight of you. This Cesonia spoke with so much earnestness, that I durst not disobey her; so that Persander thinking he did a thing at least acceptable to Cesonia, married. But the day before his Wedding, I saw him so pensive, and found Cesonia so melancholy, that it may be said, never any Marriage caused so much heaviness. In the mean time, Persander being a person of much honour, he had for his wife all possible Civility, and somewhat the more, in regard he considered it as a means to stifle the rumours which had been so prejudicial to Cesonia. So that gaining hereby the reputation of a good husband in Ardea, he soon got that of an ill Lover with Cesonia. Thus having two Infidelities to deal with at the same time, she fell into a hatred of all men in general. She would never meet with Persander in any place where he might take any occasion to speak to her; and she so carefully avoided him, that though he was very desirous to acquaint her with what he suffered for her sake, he could never have the opportunity. And indeed it is certain, there never was a man more unhappy then he was at that time, for though his wife were excellently handsom, yet was she an insupportable burthen to him, and his imagination was so full of Cesonia, that he could not think of any thing else. But at last it chanced that a Chariot of Cesonias hapning to break two miles from Ardea, Persander passing by casually in another, found her in that perplexity. Being very glad of so favourable an opportunity, he comes out, and entreats her to make use of his; nay, offers not to come in himself, and to take a horse from one of his servants that followed the Charriot. Cesonia at first would by no means be entreated, but I being with her, told her it was no time to stand upon punctilio's, that it was better to accept the proffer Persander made, then to lie in the fields all night, that the affectation of not receiving such an office, would questionless be ill intrepreted, and that it were not fit he got on horse-back, whereupon she took my advice.

Now Cesonia and Persander having not spoken one to another since that days conversation whereof I told you before, they were both in no small disturbance. But at last Persander whispering broke forth first: Well Madam, said he to her, you would needs be obeyed, and might it please the Gods you knew what I suffer in obeying you and how dearly I purchase your reputation. You have made so good a choice replied she blushing, that I think you are rewarded for the services you have done me, by the very doing of them, and consequently, I am not so much as to give you thanks; for when all's done, it is a greater pleasure to be husband to a handsome wife whom a man loves, then to be banished. Cesonia spoke this with a certain accent, which satisfied Persander that there was some resentment of displeasure and jealousie in the heart of this excellent Beauty, whereat being both much surprized, and much troubled, he entreated her to express her thoughts more clearly, but she would not hear of it; and all he could get from her was, that she forbade him ever to see her. Persander who loved her now better then he had ever, having left Cesonia at home brought me also to my chamber; and being very importunate to know the true thoughts of my Friend, I told him something of what I knew; for I thought the condition those two Lovers were in, so strange that I could not but speak of it: I shall not repeat to you all he said to me, but shall only tell you, he seemed to be so afflicted that Cesonia should imagine he loved his wife, and that he had not made such a choice as satisfied her of the greatness of his affection, that it much pitied me. But at last taking a resolution to cure Cesonia of this jealousie, though he knew he was not to expect any thing from her, he took the pretence his affairs furnished him with, to go to travel. By this means he left Ardea soon after his marraige, as Turnus had, though for different reasons. But at his departure from Ardea he writ a letter to Cesonia, so passionate, and so full of respect and tenderness, that I think Love never dictated such another; and indeed it was received by Cesonia with a very sensible sorrow, though checquered with a certain joy to see Persander more constant then she had thought him. But presently after she condemned her self for it, and was so far from being satisfied, that she would often say to me, that she thought her self so highly blamable, how vertuous soever she might be, that she durst not examine her true apprehensions.

In the mean time Turnus after a years travel returns who being a man vertuous, though very inconstant, he complemented Cesonia with the greatest kindness in the world: but his kindness was without eagerness, without transport, and without Love, and that which was most strange of all, was that assoon as he was returned, he fell in love with Persander's wife; and having met with one of those pick-thanks who are always the messengers of ill news, that gave him some particulars of what had been said of Cesonia, he became jealous of his own wife at the same time when he fell in love with his Friends. Thus was the unfortunate Cesonia ore-whelmed with all kinds of disgraces; for she had a husband that was both jealous and in love at the same time; she was her self guilty of both love and jealousie; the presence of her Husband was burdensome to her, the absence of Persander she was not able to bear, though he would not have him recalled; and for Persander, he only was absolutely miserable, as being void of all hope of ever being otherwise.

In the mean time Persander's wife being a vertuous woman, gave Turnus but very cold entertainment, but love being commonly exasperated by opposition, his passion grew so violent, that conceiving it might make much for him, he told her that Persander was still in love with Cesonia. But

But she answered him, that since Cesonia was true to him after all his Inconstancies, she would be the like to Persander, though he should not have changed his passion when he married her.

On the other side, some body having written to Persander that Turnus was fallen in love with his wife (who was called Danae) and that not very privately, he thought it the less dangerous if he pretended to be in love with his, nay conceived he should not much offend Cesonia thereby; whereupon he returns to Ardea. He was no sooner arrived, but Turnus came to see him, with all the eagerness of a Lover who would be well thought of by a man whose Wife he is in love with: Not but that he considered the Visits he then gave Persander opened Persander the way to his House; but being above all things confident of his Wifes Vertue, he chose rather to give Persander occasion to see Cesonia, then miss his opportunities of seeing Danae: So that the beginning of this Society had in it something infinitely pleasant: But at length the apprehensions of these four persons were so disordered, that there never was heard any thing of the like nature: For not only Persander and Turnus broke all to pieces, but it withal made a division of the whole City; and there are in this adventure an hundred remarkable particles, which were too long to relate. Twice they took up Arms upon the account of these two Factions, whereof the Loves of Persander and Turnus were the cause or the pretence: Divers Duels were fought, very fatal to some; it was an ordinary question in all companies, whether one were Persander or Turnus, for these two Lovers had derived their names to all of their party. They had also their different colours, and things came at last to that hight, that people were in a general expectation of an Insurrection in Ardea; for there wanted not those who would gladly have fastned on such an occasion to compass their own ends and possess themselves of Authority. On the contrary, all discreet and well affected persons, vainly troubled themselves to find out some expedients to give check to so great a disorder. But at last, when all the world could not imagine any remedy for so great a mischief, I found out a way adventurous 'tis true, but withal necessary; which was to propose to Persander and Turnus to make a publick and legitimate exchange. For there having hapned among us within some times divers examples of reputation, I found that both Religion and the Laws, authorized by Custome, permitting that Persander might forsake Danae, and marry Cesonia, and Turnus quit Cesonia, and marry Danae; I found I say, that neither of both having any children, and their Fortunes being equal, there needed no more, to reconcile these two Families, and restore and establish Peace in Ardea, by taking away all pretences from the factious, who aimed only at the publick disturbance, then that these two women should shift houses.

But though Persander and Turnus easily saw their own happiness by the expedient I proposed to them, yet a fantastick reflection of hatred hindred them at first to consent to one another's happiness; insomuch that Turnus to hinder Persander from marrying Cesonia, would chuse rather not to marry Danae, and Persander to hinder Turnus from the possession of Danae, would never meddle with Cesonia. But at last Love growing predominant, their eyes were opened to see Reason in what I proposed, and joyntly entreated my meditation in a business which they thought not very difficult to bring to effect, for it had the verdict of the Laws; what had lately hapned, confirmed the Law by Custome; their Friends should in all likelyhood easily consent thereto, and the two women should not probably hinder it. It was not impossible, but that Danae being convinced that her husband never had any affection for her, but an infinite love for Cesonia, would think it an advantage to lose a Husband that loved her not, to gain another who died for love of her. As for Cesonia, it might be thought she should be glad to exchange an inconstant man for one who had ever faithfully loved her, and whom she dearly affected, though she had with much care concealed it.

But these two women made all the difficulty that was; for Cesonia held that love expired when marriage was admitted, and for that reason she would sit down with the loss of one Lover by marrying Turnus, and would not expose her self to the loss of another by marrying Persander, that consequently she chose rather to be miserable all her life in the manner she now was, then to fall into some way of misfortune, more insupportable then the other. But Danae was much more hard to be prevailed with: I beseech you, (said she to me, when I pressed her to follow my advice) force me not to acquaint you with all my thoughts, since they are much different from yours. I confess (added she) I have a Husband that hath a violent passion for Cesonia, but since he is a discreet and moderate person I am confident he will never slight me the more for it, and that I shall never have any other cause to complain of him: Nor can I charge him with having deceived me, for I have married him before he ever told me that he loved me: But for Turnus, as inviting as he is, he would make me absolutely miserable; for when he married Cesonia, he infinitely loved her; I am not so great a Beauty as she, and therefore since he hath been inconstant to that divine person, he must needs prove so to me: by which means I should be the Victim of Persander and Cesonia, and he be much more miserable then I am already. But you consider not (said I to her) that if you further not this design, you will incur the hatred of Persander, for it is impossible a Lover should not hate whatever hinders him from possessing his Mistress.

For Cesonia I used no other argument to her then the constancy of Persander, to bring her to reason: yet these two Women had much ado to be brought to this exchange, particularly out of the considerations of Modesty; and if their Friends had not forced them, and made it appear how far it concerned their Country, the business had never been done. But at last, this private being become a publick Interest, and the chief Pillars of Religion and Civil Magistracy interposing therein, the exchange was made in the Temple of Concord, but without much ceremony, because Cesonia and Danae would have it so. I shall not trouble you with what passed between these four persons at this meeting, nor acquaint you with the joy of Persander and Turnus, or the satisfaction on of Cesonia to see her self rid of an inconstant Husband, and in the power of a faithful Lover: But I shall tell you that Danae, who certainly was not a little taken with Turnus, was not mistaken in her conjectures; and that this lovely, but inconstant person, soon after his marriage, began a-new his Love sallyes, which continued till death put a period to them; for he was killed, expressing a great and high Courage, when Tarquin made his approaches to Ardea. But that which was most observable, was that it hath been discovered since his death, that he was fallen in love again with Cesonia, meerly through his humour of Inconstancy; for he had confessed as much to one of his Friends. As for Persander, he hath continued the most constant Lover in the world; and indeed, he was loth Cesonia should be exposed to the inconveniences of a long siege, though she was desirous not to forsake him; and it was upon that account, as you know, that we went along with you out of Ardea, when we were taken by some of Tarquin's Troops, notwithstanding all the Valour of Aronces, Herminius, and Celeres. I would also particularly tell Amilcar, that Persander, after the death of Turnus, took Danae into his care, and sent her out of the City with us. I have further understood this very morning by one of her Guards, that Persander is as importunate for the deliverance of Danae, as of the other Captives, and that he is not only constantly faithful in his love, but withal constantly Generous and Just.

Plotina had no sooner given over speaking, but Amilcar began to thank her that she had killed Turnus in her Relation; for in fine, said he, I have a very good friend called Zenocrates, who pretends something as well as I, to the pleasure and reputation which infallibly attend those who are ingeniously and fortunately inconstant; and yet he would be forced to confess, that Turnus was a thousand times more inconstant than we. Now you know (added he with that seriousness which he sometimes affects when he is minded to act a Vice) when a man would do any thing, he is very proud to be perfect, and the best at it: I am therefore much obliged to you for Turnus's death, who had far out-run Zenocrates and me in Inconstancy. Not but that he hath received much injustice; for when all is done they should not have summ'd up amongst his inconstancies, the changes of his Love to Cesonia and Danae when he had married them; for as you know, it is not much the mode that Husbands should be in love with their Wives. I assure you, replied Plotina, Persander is still with his, will be as long as he lives, and there is no other difference between what he hath been and what he now is, but that he is not so great a Gallant in publick as he was wont; but for the resentments of his Soul, they are as full of tenderness, passion, and respect, as they were when he was but Rival to Turnus. And for my part, I know nothing so unjust as the procedure of those people who spend five or six years in sighing and groaning, and doing whatever lies in their power to gain a woman they love, and having married her, slight her the next day.

As Plotina was speaking thus, a great noise was heard in the Court, insomuch that Clelia being frighted with it, as being in a condition of alwayes fearing some new misfortune, Plotina went into a little with-drawing Room, which had a little grate that looked into the Court whence the noise was heard. Opening it hastily to see what the matter was, she saw people bring in his body, who had promised to deliver Clelia: Whereupon returning into the Chamber, Ah Madam, cryed she, you are not yet come to the period of your misfortunes, for he who should have terminated them is dead. At these words Clelia and Amilcar were extremely surprised, and could not well apprehend what she should say: But having expressed her self more clearly, and Amilcar not knowing how to believe her, he went into the place where she had seen what she spoke of, and saw the body of this pretended Deliverer of Clelia, which they had newly brought in, and an infinite number of people hearkning to those that brought it, who related to such as knew it not, how the misfortune happened: So that Amilcar returning into Clelia's Chamber with much sadness in his countenance, she doubted not but what Plotina had said was true, and was extremely troubled at it: Yet could she not for the present comprehend all the malice of her fortune, and little suspected as well as Amilcar, that Aronces had killed this man, whose death happened in so unfortunate a conjuncture.

In the mean time Amilcar conceiving it necessary he saw Tullia, to perswade her to take this occasion to deliver Clelia before Tarquin should dispose the Guard into another hand, was extremely troubled that he could not get out, for that he who commanded in the absence of the Captain of the Guard who was dead, was so employed about knowing how it had happened, that there was no possibility of speaking to him. It was therefore to no purpose that Amilcar should call to the Guard which was in Clelias out-chamber to get out, he was forced to stay above four hours ere he could get the door open: But at last he got out, having put Clelia and Plotina into the best hopes he could, though he conceived not much himself.

As soon as he got out, he went to Tullias, who discovered an extraordinary trouble at this accident. But Madam, said Amilcar to her; I humbly conceive, that before the King send any new Orders for the guarding of the Captives, it were fit you set them at liberty. Ah Amilcar, said she to him, it is a thing now absolutely impossible; for the Lieutenant to him that is dead, who is now in full power and pretends to his place, is so faithful to Tarquin, that there is no likelihood of corrupting him; and I am but too much given to believe by reason of this accident, that good Fortune begins to shake hands with me, for it hath happened very strangely. To be short (added she) I cannot so much as know who hath killed this man, whose life contributed so much to my quiet; and all that I can say of it is, that the fire began at Brutus's Aunts, that it is said there were some secret enemies of Tarquin's seen in the same street disguised; that they endeavoured to secure them, and that this man was killed by some one whose name cannot be learned: and it hath hapned that the stupid Brutus drew his Sword against the King's Officers. But he hath withal so little sense, that he hath been here, as if he had done nothing amiss, and were confident his stupidity should free him from the pun-punishment he deserves. So that considering by what an adventure my design is crossed, and satisfied there must be some plot which I cannot discover, I must needs (if Tarquin change not his mind) take some extraordinary resolution: For if I were to set Rome on fire, to avoid being slighted by a daughter of Clelias's, I will rather begin with the Palace where she is imprisoned, than suffer my self to be made the slave of a slave, though I should perish my self in the fire I had kindled. The cruel Tullia spoke this with so much expression of Fury in her looks, that Anilcar was in some doubt that she who had made no conscience to pass through her Fathers body to get into the Throne, might easily be drawn into some extravagant resolution. He therefore told her it were not amiss to stay till the end of the Treaty or of the Siege, before she resolved on any thing, and that in the mean time, he would do her what service he could with Tarquin.

Upon this Spurius Lucretius (who was then Governour of Rome) came to acquaint her, that certainly there must be some secret conspiracy in the City, inregard he had been advertised of some nightmeetings in divers places, and that it was requisite some end were put to the Siege of Ardea, lest the absence of Tarquin might occasion some rising. 'Tis true Lucretius spoke not this aloud; insomuch that Anilcar seeing he whisperd, departed, and came to Racilias. But he was much surprized to see the house half burnt, and not to find there neither Aronces, Brutus, Herminius, Racilia, nor Hermilia. Not knowing what to think, he went to Sivelias, where he learned the truth, and where Brutus came soon after, with whom he conferred about what was most fit to be done, for considering how things stood, it seemed necessary they knew what passed in the Camp, and yet it was withall requisite Anilcar returned with Tullia. Whereupon Brutus offer'd to go to Tarquin, for though nothing were communicated to him, yet was he fitter to observe what was done, then any other, as being not mistrusted by any. Besides that having been made Tribune of the Celeres (which was a kind of Horseguard first raised by Romulus) he had then some pretence to go to the King about something that related to his imployment, which should signifie no more then to confirm Tarquin in the opinion of his incapacity: and to speak truly, Tarquin had not bestowed it on him, had it not been to disappoint another of more ability to discharge it; there being at that time no employment gotten by election, but all being at the sole disposal of the Tyrant.

Brutus therefore took a resolution to go to the Camp, to discover what passed there, that so he might acquaint those who were employed about the deliverance of Rome, the liberty of Clelia, and safety of Aronces. But in his way thither he took that house of Valerius's where Aronces was, to whom he delivered Clelias letter, which he had received from Anilcar, and withal acquainted him, that he was not charged with any thing had passed, as also neither Herminius, Artemidorus, Zenocrates, nor Celeres. He told them however, it was not fit they returned to Rome before this Tumult were appeased. and that it were known what Tarquin said of it.

Herminius in the mean time whose purpose it was to get into Ardea, was detained by Aronces till the very last day of the Cessation. But Tarquin having some suspicion of Valerius, Brutus told them he thought it not safe for them to stay in that place, so that he advised them to go along with him assoon as it were night, assuring them he would bring them to a certain house of Collatia where they should be more secure. But (replied Herminius) you consider not that Collatine is Lord of Collatia: Pardon me (replied he) but I know Collatine is in the Camp, and that he sees Lucretia but very seldom; besides the house to which I would bring you to, stands alone far from any other; the Master of it is one that hath neither Wife nor Children, one that hath a dependance on me, and may be trusted. This said, Brutus was no further opposed; and Valerius who was present, being of the same mind, they went away that evening together, and Brutus conducted his friends to that mans house where he himself had lodged, when he saw Lucretia in the Garden, which was the last time that ever he spoke to her. For from that time he had not so much as the sight of her, so carefully had she avoided all interviewes with him, and indeavoured to live a retired and solitary life. The Moon shining very bright, as this illustrious Troop came near Collatia, Brutus discovered the house where Lucretia lived; whereupon not being able to keep from sighing, Aronces who was next him, overheard it, and asked him the reason of it. Alas (said he to him) can I possible see the house where the attractive Lucretia lives, and not sigh. Ah my dear Brutus (said Aronces to him) though your grief be just, yet is it not so well grounded as mine; for as to Lucretia, you fear neither her death nor the exorbitance of a Tyrant. 'Tis true, the punishment of my love consists not in fear (replied he) but I feel something worse then the most horrid fear, since I am certain never to have any society with the Divine Lucretia, and having at the same time a love for her, and a hatred for Tarquin, my soul struggles with two violent Passions, without any hope to satisfie them; for though I am continually plotting against this cruel Tyrant, yet my reason tells me, I shall never destroy him; so that I rather contrive my own destruction, and am busied to deceive my self, then to do any advantagious service to my Country: Aronces answered Brutus as might be expected from an unfortunate Lover, that is, as a man who thought himself the most miserable of all Lovers; for as we think not the misfortunes past, less then those we suffer; but in as much as the sence of them is past; so does not any man believe the mis-fortunes o another less then his own, but because he is not sensible of them.

But at length Brutus having disposed his friends into the mans house who was so faithful to him, took his way to the Camp, where he arrived just upon the departure of Sextus, who was gone no body knew whither. As soon he came, he went to see Tarquin, the Prince of Pometia and Titus, who having already heard of the burning of Racilias house, the death of the Captain of the Guard, and the tumult which followed in Rome, asked him what news he brought; but he much wondred that they knew not what he had done in the adventure venture, and it seems Tullia, and those who had sent Tarquin the account of it, gave so little heed to what Brutus had done, that they had quite forgot to acquaint this Prince that he was any way concerned in the disorder. He was also very glad to see that Aronces, Herminius, Artemidorus, Zenocrates, and Celeres, were not at all accused.

But the Prince of Pometia, who had an infinite affection for Hermilia, was more inquisitive into the accident of the fire, so to be satisfied what was become of her. 'Tis true, Brutus answered so impertinently to what was asked him, that this Prince was not much more satisfied than before; nor indeed had Brutus any other business there, than to hear what was said. He therefore understood that the Treaty of Ardea was still in the same Posture, and that there was no great hope of any alteration; Tarquin being willing to deliver up all the Captives but Clelia, but would by no means hear of dismissing her. But Horatius who was grown very powerful in Ardea, obliged the people of that City to demand the liberty of Clelia, as well as Cesonia, Plotina, Danae, and their friends. The Envoy of the King of Clusium made a great stir that there was no news of Aronces, and employed all the interest he could to hinder Clelia from coming into the hands of those of Ardea. But he might have spared both his fear and his pains, for Tarquin's passion was obstacle enough.

Things being in this posture, Tullia and Lucretius sent severally to Tarquin, and those who were sent by them, came into his Tent while Brutus was there, which the Tyrant took no notice of. Brutus by this means hearing what was said to Tarquin, as being not bidden by any one to withdraw, he understood that the Messenger from Tullia told him, that she had at last discovered that Herminius lay concealed in Rome; that it was he whom the Captain of the Guard would have secured; that Aronces with three other friends had relieved Herminius, that they had left Rome; and therefore it lay upon him to find them out. On the other side, Lucretius particularly acquainted Tarquin, that he had discovered that Tullia endeavoured to get the Captives into her own power, though he knew not the reason of it; and that he had understood that some persons had lain concealed at Valerius's Country house, who were gone thence towards Collatia. But within two hours after Lucretius himself arrives, to acquaint Tarquin that since he had sent to him, he had been credibly informed that those who had lain hid at Valerius's, were for certain at Collatia, or at least had been there: So that Tarquin being exasperated at so many unlucky reports, gave out divers unjust and violent orders. And Clelia being that which at that time found his mind most employment, he resolved to have her brought to the Camp, that so she might not be at the disposal of Tullia, saying aloud to one of those Creatures who promoted his Passions, that she should absolutely either satisfie his Love or his Revenge. For Herminius, his purpose was to promise extraordinary rewards to those that should bring him either dead or alive: He resolved to make the same promises to those that should bring Aronces to him; and for Artemidorus, Zenocrates, and Celeres, he was extremely incensed at what they had done.

Brutus understanding so many things of so great consequence together, none having the least fear or suspicion of him, thought fit his Friends at Collatia had notice thereof: But not knowing well how to trust any other with what he knew, he resolved to go himself to the place where he had left them, to bid them depart thence: Yet could he not go till the next morning, lest his departure might be suspected. But as he was ready to depart, the Prince of Pometia and Titus, who were going to Rome to see Hermilia and Collatina, asked him whether he would follow them, supposing he was also bound for Rome: Besides that they were much taken with Brutus's affected simplicity, especially ever since he had accompanied them in their journey to Delphi, when Tarquin frighted by a prodigie, had sent these two Princes to the Oracle at Delphi to know the meaning of it, though till that time they always sent upon such occasions into Tuscany. Now Brutus had behaved himself so ingeniously in this voyage, that without discovering his understanding, he had diverted them very much: But he had carried himself more cunningly than they thought, for he had brought an offering to Delphi, though they perceived it not, which was in some measure a representation of his understanding; for he had caused a kind of Golden Scepter to be inclosed in one of those staves which men carry rather out of grave Custom or as a badge of Authority, than for necessity; to intimate to Posterity at least, that his understanding lay concealed under a gross stupidity, as that precious offering was inclosed within a piece of Wood of little value. Nay Brutus had better understood, than those Princes, the answer of the Oracle which they consulted: For they having demanded who should Reign after Tarquin, the Oracle answered, He who should first kiss his Mother. The Prince of Pometia and Titus (as witty as they were) had understood it according to the literal sense, and had put it to the chance between themselves, whether of them should first salute the cruel Tullia, hoping thereby to exclude Prince Sextus their Brother, though the first born of the Family. But Brutus not acquainting them with their error, found out another meaning of the words of the Oracle; for imagining, that the Earth is the common Mother of all men, he pretended to fall down, and kissing the ground, he thanked the Gods that had put him in some hopes he should one day put a period to the Reign of so cruel a Tyrant. This hope yet was but very weak when the Prince of Pometia and Titus, asked him to go along with them to Rome, as being in no small fear of Tarquin's cruelty, towards those persons for whom of all the world he had the greatest esteem.

But that he might omit nothing that lay in his power for their preservation, he excused himself to those who would have carried him to Rome, not but that it was his intention to go thither, as soon as he had been at Collatia, for he thought it necessary that Amilcar should employ his interest with Tullia for the welfare of that admirable person, without whom Aronces could not be happy. To make therefore the best advantage of his time, he departed, purposing to go attended only by one slave: But Fortune was pleased to dispose otherwise of him, for Tarquin who was impatient to have in his power those who he was informed lay hid at Valerius's, and who were or had been at Collatia, intreated Collatine and his Father-in-Law Lucretius, to go thither immediately, and if they were there to cause them to be secured, if not, to be pursued. Now it happened so fortunately that they overtook Brutus in a cross Road, where one way led to Rome the other to Collatia. Brutus no question was not a little troubled at their arrival; for he easily imagined that Collatine and Lucretius went not without some reason to Collatia.

But though he could give them no good account of his taking that way with them, yet he bore them company, they never asking why he did it; for taking no great heed to him, they fell a discoursing as freely as if he had not been there, and permitted him to follow them without so much as speaking to him. He in the mean time desirous to dive into their design, hearkned very attentively to what they said. Lucretius was engaged to Tarquin out of considerations of Ambition, and Collatine of Kindred, for they were both vertuous, and detested the cruelty of that Prince: So that falling into discourse about their present employment, I know not, says Lucretius to Collatine, whether we should be glad to find what we are going to look for; for though I was heretofore the cause of Herminius's banishment, I would not have him now fall into the hands of Tarquin. But was it not you (replied Collatine) that informed the King that some people lay concealed at Valerius's? 'Tis true (replied Lucretius) but if I had not done it, I must have concealed my self; for the cruel Tullia knowing that I had understood so much, I was no longer Master of it: I am now satisfied, but too late, that Lucretias Mother had much reason when she would have disswaded me from ingaging my self too far into the Interests of Tarquin; for to measure things according to his nature, there is nothing so certain, as that he is a professed enemy to all that are any way ambitious, or have any love of Glory; and indeed it was the constant saying of my wife, that Tarquin would be the only ambitious man in the State, that those who lived under him must not be his Subjects but his Slaves; that he would ever be an enemy to all persons of honour, and that I should one day be ore whelm'd with the ruines of his house, if I dis-intangled not my self out of his concernments. I assure you (replied Collatine) that Lucrecia continues in the resentments of her Mother, for though she leads a very retired life, and seems to be nothing concerned in those things that are done in the World, she hath Tarquin in the greatest detestation that may be. She never meets with any occasion to say something which might disengage me from the interests of Tarquin, but she doth it with such earnestness, as I find her not subject to in any thing else. She remembers all the exorbitances of Tarquin, and all the cruelties of Tullia: She hath not forgotten even those little expressions of Generosity, in words which fell from all those whom they have either banished or put to death, and from the constancy of so many illustrious but unfortunate persons; she draws those infallible consequences, which convince her that Tarquin will be ruin'd; so that she is perpetually telling me it were better to live quietly at Collatia, than to be so much about the King. It is long since (replied coldly Lucretius, reflecting on the Letter he had some time found) my daughter hath had a horrid aversion for Tarquin, though she could not well tell the reason of it, for people of her age are not ordinarily much concerned in State affairs.

Brutus hearing what Lucretius said, was much troubled at it, and felt in his heart a certain redintegration of Love which filled it with joy, out of an imagination he had, that he was somewhat concern'd in the hatred which Lucretia had for Tarquin, and that when she would oblige Collatine to disengage himself from his interest, and endeavoured to perswade him that the Tyrant would be destroyed, she called to mind the design which he told her he should have as long as he lived to ruine him. So that entertaining himself with this reflection; Alas, infinitely amiable Lucretia, said he, is it possible that I am not banished out of your memory, and that the love of the unfortunate Brutus, contributes somewhat to the hatred you have for Tarquin? Can I yet be happy enough to deserve the reflection of your thoughts in the midst of your solitude? But why should I doubt it, resumed he, doth not the innocency of our affection assure me, that Lucretia remembers it without any disturbance of mind, and that it is the object of her most pleasant imaginations?

As Brutus entertained himself in this manner, he heard Collatine say to Lucretius, but is not that Sextus who crosses the Road, and who followed only by one Slave, seems to avoid meeting with us? 'Tis he without doubt (answered Lucretius) but since he will not be seen, let us not see him; for he is young, insolent, and fantastick; and certainly it were not civility to pretend to see him since he endeavours so much to avoid it. But whence should he come now, added Lucretius? Princes of his humour (replied Collatine) do things so obscurely, that it must never be asked whence they come.

While Lucretius and Collatine were thus engaged in discourse, and kept on their way not pretending to see Sextus, who crossed the fields purposely to avoid them; Brutus felt somewhat in his heart which cannot admit expression; for looking on Sextus as a Lover of Lucretia, he was tempted to put his feigned stupidity in practise, and to follow and lay hold on him as a Rival, whom he abominably hated, and indeed he might easily have quitted Lucretius and Collatine, who would not have hindred him, and have pursued Sextus who had but one slave about him no more than he. But thinking withal, that when he should have killed Sextus, Rome were not delivered, and that he must quit the design of delivering it, the love of his Country stifled in him that violent eruption of jealousie which had stirred him, when he saw Prince Sextus, who riding very fast, soon got out of their sight, whose meeting he so much avoided.

But they had scarce rid on half an hour, ere Collatine spies one of the Slaves that belonged to his wife coming towards them, running as fast as he could possible, thereby discovering there was something extraordinary that obliged him to make such haste: So that Collatine coming up to him, What's the reason, (said he to him) that thou makest such haste? Hath Lucretia sent thee about some buſineſs that requires it? Right my Lord, (replied the Slave) and I am commanded from her, to tell you and Spurius Lucretius, that it concerns her very much to ſee you both as ſoon as may be poſſible. She further deſires you if it may be, to bring ſome of her intimate friends with you: But knoweſt thou not (replied Collatine) what hath obliged Lucretia to ſend thee? No my Lord (replied he) and I have no more to ſay to you than what you have heard.

Lucretius and Collatine not able to imagine what ſhould oblige Lucretia to ſend for them, began to put on ſomewhat faſter than before, not laying any thing to Brutus, who having a greater Curioſity to know what the matter was than they, followed them, they not offering to forbid him: For beſides that, he was never miſtruſted by any; he had alſo endeavoured as much as his ſtupidity permitted him, to hold a fair correſpondence with Collatine, out of a hope that it might one day procure him the happineſs to ſee Lucretia. They therefore rid all three faſter than they had done before, and that without ſpeaking to one another, every one imagining to himſelf what might be the occaſion of this meſſage. But for Brutus, his mind was in a greater diſturbance than either of the two; for it coming into his thoughts that he was to ſee his dear Lucretia, whom he had not ſeen ſince he had had with her the moſt paſſionate, and moſt raviſhing diſcourſe that ever was, he had a certain trouble in his mind, which yet had ſomething in it that was pleaſant.

But at length they came to Collatia, where they were no ſooner arrived, but they met Valerius, who having had notice that he was ſuſpected, was going to a certain friends houſe; ſo that Lucretia having deſired her Father and Husband to bring ſome of their friends with them, they ſtaid him; for though Valerius was not ingaged in the concernments of Tarquin, yet was he no enemy either to Lucretius or Collatine. Taking him therefore along with them, they paſſed by the houſe where Arences, Herminius, Artemidorus and Celeres were. But Brutus did not ſo much as look that way; and for Lucretius and Collatine, they almoſt forgot they were ſent to Collatia from Tarquin, ſo much were there minds taken up with the meſſage they had received. Having therefore alighted, they were going into the houſe, and were hardly gotten to the ſtone walk which you come into, when you have paſſed through the Court, but they ſpie Lucretia, who was on the other ſide in an Entry at the bottom of the Stairs, but they perceived her to be ruffled, pale and melancholy, and they ſaw in her looks, grief, indignation, and diſorder. 'Tis true, ſhe bluſhed extremely, when intending to lift up her eyes, and to ſpeak, ſhe met thoſe of Brutus. That ſight put her into ſuch diſturbance, that ſhe ſtep'd back, turned her head aſide, and was not able to bring forth that ſhe was about to ſay. But at length having lifted up her eyes to Heaven, ſhe turned her ſelf towards her Father and her Husband, who ſeeing in what trouble his Wife was, was very earneſt with her to know the cauſe. Ah Collatine (ſaid ſhe to him) lifting up her eyes a ſecond time to Heaven (as it were to beg its protection) if the misfortune which hath happened to me could be expreſſed, it were not ſo great as it is; but all that modeſty permits me to tell you, is, that the infamous Sextus came into my Chamber, that he is both, the moſt criminal, and the moſt inſolent of men; and I am the moſt unfortunate perſon of my Sex, though the moſt innocent. This known continued ſhe, with tears in her eyes) ask me no more, but be ſo generous, as to promiſe I ſhall be revenged, that you will exterminate even the whole Family of the Tarquins, that you will die rather than ſuffer them to live; and in a word, that none hereafter may know the violence I have received, but ſhall withal, know the revenge that followed it. As ſhe delivered theſe words, Lucretia certainly not out of any deſign, met again the looks of Brutus; 'tis true, ſhe preſently turned aſide, but not till he could have received certain motions which ſeemed to demand his particular revenge on Prince Sextus. Whereupon her Husband coming near her, began to chear up, and promiſed to revenge her, while a faithful woman-ſlave, that belonged to this afflicted Beauty, gave Lucretius a ſhort account of Sextus's Crime, and this terrible accident, which all the World hath been acquainted with; upon which, Lucretius, as well as Collatine and Valerius, promiſed Lucretia to revenge her. For Brutus he promiſed no otherwiſe than by his looks, and certain threatning geſtures, which he could not abſtain from; for though he was deſirous to ſpeak, yet could he not poſſibly do it on this firſt apprehenſion, ſuch a ſtorm had grief, rage, indignation, love, and jealouſie raiſed in him.

But theſe four Illuſtrious Romans having promiſed Lucretia to revenge her, Valerius, who loved her extremely for her virtue, beſides the relation of an ancient friend of his illuſtrious daughters, deſired her not to afflict her ſelf ſo much, and that ſhe ſhould live for the pleaſure ſake of ſeeing her ſelf revenged. No, no Valerius (replied this generous perſon) it ſhall never be ſaid that Lucretia hath taught the Romans by her Example, that a Woman can out-live her Reputation. With theſe words, the vertuous Lucretia appearing more fair and reſolute than before, drew a Ponyard, which ſhe had hid about her, and lifting up her hand and arm, and looking up towards Heaven, as it were, to offer her ſelf a ſacrifice to thoſe Gods whom ſhe invoked, ſhe thruſt it into her breaſt, and fell down with her boſom all bloody, at the feet of the unfortunate Brutus, who had the fatal advantage to have the laſt of her looks, and to hear the laſt of her ſighs. For while Lucretia, Collatine and Valerius were making horrid out-cries to expreſs their aſtoniſhment and their ſorrow, this unhappy Lover caſt himſelf on the ground, ſnatches the Ponyard out of Lucretias breaſt, and ſeeing her reſigning up her laſt breath, in a manner as if ſhe yet knew him, and begging his revenge, his mind was ſeiſed by a certain heroick fury, which when he ſaw that this admirable Woman was dead, raiſed him up, with the Ponyard all bloody in his hand, and enabled him to ſpeak with ſuch Eloquence as the Gods ſeemed to have inſpired into him. Inſomuch, that all thoſe who in an inſtant were come from all parts of the Town, to ſee ſo ſad a ſpectacle, were ſtrangely ſurpriſed to hear Brutus, who ſtill held up the bloody Ponyard nyard: For he ſpoke the nobleſt things in the World, to ingage Lucretia, Collatine, Valerius, and all that heard him, to revenge the injury done to Lucretia, and expel out of Rome the Family of the Tarquins. So that prevailing with all thoſe who heard him, both by reaſon of the admiration they had of him, and by the ſight of ſo fair and ſo ſad an object, as alſo thoſe great things he ſaid unto them, he derived the fury of his own ſpirit into thoſe who heard him.

This done, he delivered the Ponyard into the hands of Collatine, and thence into thoſe of Lucretius and Valerius, and afterwards into thoſe of all that were preſent, and made them all ſwear by the chaſt blood of Lucretia, to revenge her death, to follow and be guided by him: Whereupon, not to ſpend time in fruitleſs tears, he ſent for Aronces, Herminius, Artemidorus, Zenocrates and Celeres, and having given them the ſame Oath with the ſame Ceremony, he commanded Lucretia's Chariot to be made ready, and aſſiſted by Aronces, his dear friend Herminius, and divers others, he puts into it the fair Corps of that vertuous perſon, laid on rich Cuſhions, and cauſing the Chariot to be covered with a Mourning Cloth, he himſelf gets on Horſe-back, commands all the people to follow him, and riding up and down the City of Collatia with this Ponyard in his hand, he preſently took his way towards Rome. But he was followed thither by all the the people of Collatia, that were able to follow him; for as the vertue of Lucretia, while ſhe lived, raiſed her into the adoration of all; ſo being dead, did it ingage them to revenge her death; and for more ſecurity, Valerius ſet Guards at the Gates of Collatia, to hinder any thing to be carried to Tarquin. Brutus therefore comes to the Gates of Rome with a conſiderable number of armed people about him, every one having what he could get, before any notice of his coming was brought. For his part, he rid behind the Chariot of Lucretia, ſo that having that ſad object full in his ſight, and the Ponyard wherewith Lucrece had killed her ſelf in his hand, he thought what cannot well be imagined, and what it was impoſſible he could have expreſſed himſelf, love, grief, jealouſie and rage, had put his reaſon into ſo much diſorder. He hath indeed ſince ſaid, to expreſs the greatneſs of his diſturbance, that in this emergency he minded not the Liberty of Rome, but in order to revenge the death of the innocent Lucretia, and made uſe of the Intereſt of his Country, which was ſo dear to him, only to ſatisfie his Paſſion. Nor did he then think of revenging the death of his Father and Brother, and ſo much was his mind taken up with this ſad accident, that Lucretia was the only cauſe of this great and dangerous attempt. Nor was this deſign ſo inconſiderate as it ſeemed to be: For Brutus, Aronces, Valerius, Herminius, Zenocrates, Artemidorus and Celeres knew that there was in Rome ſo great an inclination to a Revolt, and were ſo well informed of the great number of thoſe who were ſecret Enemies to Tarquin, that they entertained ſome hopes the people might be drawn into an inſurrection. Aronces hoping the deliverance of Rome might procure Clelia's liberty, was as zealous to break its chains, as if he had been a Roman, and was as earneſt in the revenge of Lucretia, as if he had been her Brother. Herminius for his part, had been always ſo exaſperated againſt the violences of Tarquin, was ſo ſenſible of this adventure of his friend, and ſo moved at the affliction of Brutus, that he was as forward to revenge Lucretia, as if Valeria had received the ſame injury. For Artemidorus, Zenocrates and Celeres, they being all vertuous and gallant ſouls, were eaſily drawn in to ingage in this noble attempt; and for Valerius it was ſo long ſince he wiſhed the deſtruction of Tarquin, and the Liberty of Rome, that he was eaſily concerned in the revenge of Lucretia. But that which was moſt ſtrange, was that Lucretius and Collatine, who were ſent from the Camp to exerciſe the Orders of the Tyrant at Collatia, and who had permitted Brutus to follow them without ſaying any thing to him, acknowledged him for their Leader, and came along with thoſe, whom had not this ſad accident happened, they ſhould have ſecured, and conducted into the Priſons of Tarquin; ſuch a change of reſolutions did this ſtrange adventure work in them, and ſo much reſpect had the great worth of Brutus, diſcovering it ſelf ſo unexpectedly inſpired into them.

On the other ſide, Aronces, Herminius, and his friends, who had quitted Rome diſguiſed, were now reſolved to appear there openly. 'Tis true, they were attended by a ſtrange multitude of people from Collatia, who by reaſon of their diſcontents were fit inſtruments to raiſe a Commotion in Rome. Beſides, Aronces, Herminius, and Valerius having conferred together, had thought fit their friends had notice to be ready, for their force could not march very faſt, by reaſon of the Chariot which carried the Corps of Lucretia. They therefore ſent Celeres before, who receiving inſtructions from theſe three excellent perſons, made haſte to give Amilcar notice to get together all their friends in the moſt ſpacious place of Rome, and that they ſhould come thither armed. He was alſo to adverтiſe the Sabii and the Veſtals, with whom they held intelligence, that there might be nothing wanting, which might contribute to the enterpriſe. Lucretius for his part, being then Governour of Rome, ſent Orders to thoſe who were under him, to be ready for ſome expedition, bidding him whom he ſent not to mention, what had happened to Lucretia. To be ſhort, the Chariot that brought the Corps of that admirable perſon came to Rome, before any thing was ſuſpected.

Being come to the Gates, Brutus who doubted not but the ſight of ſo ſad a ſpectacle would move to pity, and exaſperate the hearts of the people, and conſequently ingage them to a riſing, went himſelf and took off the great mourning Cloath that covered that excellent body; but as he drew it off, he turned his head aſide to hide his trouble from Collatine. Whereupon, the Chariot entred uncovered into the City followed by Brutus, who held the bloody Ponyard in his hand, and by the Father and Huſband of Lucretia with their eyes full of tears, and by the multitude of the people that came from Collatia, bewailing the death of Lucretia. Curioſity and amazement mazement soon seised the minds of all those who were spectators of so strange a spectacle, and the same beauty of Lucretia which made her subject to receive the violence, contributed also to her revenge: For being but newly dead, she appeared so admirably handsome, that the people of Rome who had heard so much of her Beauty, and hardly ever seen her by reason of the solitary life she led, was extremely moved at the sight of so many Charms; but seeing her dead, was desirous to know the cause of her death and the rather from that multitude of people who followed the Chariot, and wept as they went.

This obliged almost all those who saw Lucretia's body, to follow it, and so augmented the number of those that accompanied it, insomuch that he who conducted the Chariot, being hindred by the crowd of people, was forced to go more softly. Brutus, thought fit the people had time to come together, to soften and be moved of it self before the design absolutely broke forth, and that it were not amiss to expect till they were come to that place where they were to find their friends met together. He therefore said not a word, and riding close to Lucretia's Chariot, he only shewed the people by some gesture of his hand and eyes that object. But being come to that spacious place, which is between the Capitol and the Palatine Hill, where they were resolved to rest, Brutus caused the Chariot to be staid before the Gate of the Temple of Jupiter Stator, which Romulus had built in accomplishment of a vow, which he had made in the time of the war with the Sabins.

This done, Brutus alighted, and got up on a place two steps high, whence, as being at that time Tribune of the Celeres, he had the priviledge to speak in publick on divers occasions. At first sight, in regard he was accustomed to make known the Orders of Tarquin, with much simplicity to those that were under his charge, there was no body troubled himself much to hearken to what he said, all thronging to get near Lucretias Chariot, and to understand the circumstances of her death. But Amilcar coming in, followed by a great number of Valerius, Herminius and Collatine's friends, and those who had before heard Brutus speak at Collatia, making it their business to impose silence on the rest of the multitude; at length, the illustrious, and too too unfortunate Lover, with a fierceness in his countenance that challenged respect, lifted up his eyes to Heaven, and shewing to the people the Ponyard he had in his hand.

BEhold Generous Romans (said he to them with a certain accent of Authority) this is the very Ponyard which the fair Lucretia thrust into her own heart, though as far from any crime as innocence it self. I shew it you, O ye Romans, to obtain your permission to use it against the most cruel enemy you have. 'Tis for that, that the illustrious Father of the vertuous Lucretia, and her unfortunate Husband are come with tears in their eyes to demand justice of you: But that you see so many gallant men with their arms in their hands, is not so much to revenge the death of this generous Roman Lady, as to deliver you out of Slavery. This is the day, generous Romans, that you must shake off the the Yoke of the outragious Tarquin, and the cruel Tullia. The blood of Lucretia hath made Heaven propitious to you, and the injury she hath received from the eldest Son of your Tyrant, ingageth all the Gods so far to revenge her death, that though you should not concern your selves in it, I am confident the same Gods who have inspired into me the attempt of turning him out of the Throne which he hath usurped, will take vengeance of his presumption, and will also punish you for your baseness, if you joyn not with so many gallant men, who are resolved to die this day, and be sacrificed near the body of the chast Lucretia, rather than continue their subjection to the most abominable Tyrant in the World.

Brutus pronounced these words with such a noble confidence, that the people of Rome astonished to hear him speak after this manner, was really perswaded the Gods had done a miracle on him, that the great understanding he then expressed was inspired into him; that they ought to look on him as a Messenger from Heaven; that they should hearken to him with respect, and follow his directions; so easie a matter it is, to dispose of the minds of the people, when one knows how to make use of those things whereby they are surprised. So that after a great noise of acclamations, every one crying silence, the whole multitude became so strangely quiet, that Brutus drawing a happy Presage from the attention they gave him, continued in these words.

I Have already told you, generous Romans, continued he, that this was the day designed for your Liberty, and I tell it you once more. This certainly is the day that you shall recover your own just Authority, since that it is of you that Lucretius and Collatine demand justice for the violence the chast Lucretia hath received from the insolent Sextus. But alas, who can say he ever saw a crime equal to this of his? For suppose this injury of Sextus had been done to one of your Slaves, it were capital according to our Laws. But, generous Romans, you are not to learn that Lucretia was of a very noble blood, descended of a Family very considerable in Rome, even before the first of the Tarquins had so much as thought of leaving Greece to come into Italy. You know further, that she was admired for vertue; that she was Daughter to the Governour of

of Rome, and wife to a near Kinſman of Tarquin. But it ſeems neither the conſideration of blood, nor that of Hoſpitality, nor the obligations of humane or divine Laws, nor any reſpect of the Penatial Gods, witneſſes of the preſumptuous fury of Sextus, had the power to divert him from committing a crime ſo abhominable, that it can hardly be expreſſed, and ſuch as the vertuous Lucretia, though ſhe contributed nothing thereto, could indure to out-live, and hath choſen rather to die than to be in a condition to be guilty, though but of the memory of it. But if the innocent Lucretia hath periſhed through the crime of Sextus, it is but juſt that Sextus be deſtroyed to ſatisfie the death of the innocent Lucretia. It is therefore of you, generous Romans, that Lucretius demands juſtice for the death of his only daughter: And it is of you that Collatine demands the ſame juſtice for the outrage he hath received from a Prince that ſhould have been his Protector. For to whom can theſe illuſtrious, but unfortunate perſons addreſs themſelves to be revenged of their Enemy? To the cruel Tullia, Mother to this unjuſt Prince? To her, I ſay, who made no conſcience to poyſon her former Husband, though the moſt vertuous Prince in the World, who contrived her Sifters death, a woman infinitely vertuous; who ſaw her Father maſſacred, though the greateſt and wiſeſt of all our Kings, and cauſed her Chariot to paſs over the body of that unfortunate Prince, to get into the Throne ſhe is now poſſeſſed of with ſo much injuſtice: You know, Romans, that I tell you nothing but what is true, and that I add nothing thereto. How then can we hope for any protection from the wickedeſt woman in the world, to revenge the moſt vertuous? Nor is there any probability of obtaining any juſtice of the Husband of ſuch a Wife, a worthy Father of the Executioner of the innocent Lucretia. For beſides that, he hath contributed to all the crimes of Tullia, that he poiſoned his former Wife, put to death a Brother and a Father-in-law, what hath he not done to your ſelves? and what hath he not done to all Romans in general, and to every one in particular? He hath thruſt Slaves into the Senate, he hath impoveriſhed the rich, oppreſſed the poor, baniſhed or put to death all of quality, who have not diſſembled their vertue to ſave their lives; he hath undertaken a War only to keep you under, he hath imputed falſe crimes to hook in the fortunes of thoſe he did accuſe; and hath even built Temples, though a deſpiſer of the Gods, as much as any man, only to amuſe and imploy the common people, that ſo he might the more Tyrannically exerciſe the Authority he hath acquired through thouſands of crimes. By this means is it come paſs, that the ſame Romans, (who according to ſacred Preſages, were looked on as Conquerours of the World) are turned wretched Mechanicks, and are fitter to handle a Rule and Chiſel, than a Sword or a Buckler. Nevertheleſs, as wicked and abominable as he is, if he were but your lawful King, Lucretius and Collatine would ſubmit to his injuſtice, without troubling you with their revenge, and would content themſelves to ſeek it only of the Gods. For my own part, I ſhould alſo apply my ſelf to them for that of my Father and Brothers death, who, as you know, increaſed the number of his innocent Victims. But generous Romans, you know that Tarquin is not your lawful King, nor ever can be. This unjuſt Prince is crept into the Throne, contrary to the Fundamental Laws of our State; he was choſen neither by the Senate, nor by the people; he laughed at the Augures, and their Preſages, which are obſerved upon theſe occaſions, and ſlighted all Ceremonies of Religion, which he hath always made a ſtalking-horſe to the Intereſts of his Ambition. You ſhould therefore be ſo far from acknowledging him to be your King, that you ſhould think your ſelves obliged by the fidelity you owe your laſt lawful King to revenge his death. Revenge it then, Romans, by revenging that of Lucrecia, and to give you another motive to induce you thereto, know that the Daughter of the vertuous Clelius, your fellow-Citizen, whoſe life the Tyrant, after he had baniſhed him, hath ſo often endeavoured to take away, is one of his Captives, and that haply ſhe will be expoſed to all the misfortunes of Lucretia, if we do not ſuddenly deliver her. But what do I ſay? Your buſineſs is not only to revenge your late King, your Fellow-Citizens dead or baniſhed, nor to deliver the Daughter of vertuous Clelius, and Neece of the Grand Veſtal, but it lies upon you to revenge your ſelves, and to keep your Wives, your Daughters and Sifters from falling into the ſame inconveniences. Conſider, O ye Romans, what kind of Succeſſor Tarquin will leave you, if you take not a generous reſolution to root out the whole Family; conſider what preſumption Sextus will ariſe to, if this crime eſcape unpuniſhed; how great the inſolence will be of a new Tyrant, born and brought up in Tyranny, and whom we ſhall encourage to be more cruel through our own ſhameful cowardize. Let us then take this generous reſolution, which the whole World ſhall one day celebrate with infinite praiſes; all we have to do, to be free, is to will it, we need no more than ſhut our Gates againſt a Tyrant, to become Maſters of Rome, and to drive away a mischievous Woman, to banish hence all Vices. When we have once put in execution so noble a design, I am confident Tarquin's own Soldiers will prove his most implacable Enemies. They are all your Brethren, your Children, or your Friends, they are subject to the same tyranny as you are; you are all ingaged in the same interests, they acknowledge the same Laws, they adore the same Gods; and certainly, we shall no sooner have shown them so great an Example of Vertue, but they will chearfully imitate us. The most difficult part of the attempt is past, in that we have taken the boldness to speak so freely, and break that infamous silence, which made us the Complices of Tarquin by conniving at so many outrages, so many villanies, so many crimes. But since we have this day begun to bemoan our selves, I doubt not but our lamentations will stir up the vertue of all Romans, and that what was privately resolved, will be publickly put in execution. Tell me, I beseech you, Generous Romans, is there any one among you, who hath not secretly repined at the injustice of Tarquin, and hath not made vows and imprecations against him? And have I not reason to believe that all Romans will be of our side? Nay, I dare presume to tell you, that you are no longer in a condition to deliberate what you have to do; for since you have heard my Remonstrances, it concerns your well-fare, that you carry the business on to the utmost extremity: Tarquin, as you well know, being so little accustomed to make any difference between the innocent and the guilty, that he would rather sacrifice all the Romans to his vengeance, than suffer one particular Roman to escape his revenge. Be therefore no longer in suspence, since you are already Traytors to him; and that you may defie his injustice, resign your selves to the conduct of the Gods. I therefore conjure you in the name of Romulus, our illustrious Founder, not to suffer Sextus to come into the number of his Successors; I conjure you further in the name of Numa, the most religious of all our Kings; and I conjure you once more, in the name of Servius Tullus, the wisest and most vertuous Prince that ever was. But I particularly demand your revenge for the admirable Lucretia, and the liberty of Clelia, in the name of the vertuous Tanaquil, whose memory will never be lost among us. Consider therefore once more, that since we have no lawful King, you have the disposal of the Supreme Power. Consider, I say, that you will be guilty of all the crimes your Tyrants shall hereafter commit, if you lay not hold of this opportunity, that Fortune forces upon you. The day I now speak to you on, is a fortunate day, it is neither that of the Calends, nor that of the Nones, nor yet that of the Ides, all which are fatal to great Enterprises; all Presages favour us, and in a word, as I have told you already, we have no more to do to be free, than to desire it. Let us therefore courageously take up arms for the Liberty of our Country; but let it be with that Heroick Confidence, which is always precedent to all great and fortunate emergencies. I have already told you, that this attempt is easie, and I tell it you once more; but supposing it were not, and that we must struggle with a Civil War within our Walls, such as might arm Citizens against Citizens; that we must see the same Forces that now besiege Ardea before Rome, and that the Temple of Janus were to be eternally open, should this oblige us to quit the design of destroying so unjust a Tyrant? Were it not more noble to see our Country ingaged in a perpetual War, than forced to a perpetual Slavery? Romulus, who is now in the number of the Immortal, waged a War against the Sabines as soon as he had laid the Foundations of Rome, but upon much slighter grounds than we have to war against Tarquin, since that he continued it to justifie the carrying away the Sabine Virgins; and we have to deal with the Ravisher of Lucretia. Numa the Second of our Kings, but the first for Piety, allowed by his Laws, that there might be yet Wars, though he met not with any occasion to raise any during all his Reign. Tullus Hostilius did not only carry on that so famous War of Alba; but was also engaged against the Fidenates and the Veientes. Ancus Martius had to do with the Inhabitants of Latium, with the Sabines, the Veientes, and the Volsci. The former of the Tarquins of whose vertues the latter have not any, had he not War with divers Nations, especially the Thuscans? And Servius Tullus, a person of much Vertue and Moderation, did he make any difficulty to War against the Thuscans, though out of no other considerations than those of Glory? Judge then, Romans, from hence what these great Princes would have done, if the publick Liberty had been in any danger, or that it had been to revenge so horrid a crime as that of Sextus's. Have not we been ingaged in a War for Tarquin? And are we not still engaged in one against our Neighbours to make him the more powerful? Why then may we not as well be engaged against him? It cannot be said we want any thing to raise it; for if we are for our selves, there is nothing against us, Rome having within its own Walls, Soldiers, Captains, Armies, and wherewithal to subsist, without the assistance of any thing but its own strength, and its own vertue vertue. Let us then resolve to undergo the miseries of an eternal War, rather than sign a Peace with our Tyrants; for even the certainty of death should not fright us from doing our duty, since a glorious death is to be preferred before an ignominious life. Besides, imagine not there is any among us, that expects or pretends to be your King; for we absolutely declare to you, that our design aims only at the destruction of the Tyrant, and that we act upon no other Principles than those of the Publick Good, Justice and Glory. Let us then couragiously take up arms; for, as I have already told you, it were henceforth more dangerous to continue in Peace, than to begin a War. Let us revenge the innocent Lucretia: Let us maintain the priviledges of the Vestals, which Tarquin hath violated by detaining the Captives of Ardea: Let us recall Vertue into Rome, and to execute the first act of Authority: Let us expel Tullia out of our City: Let us shut the Gates of Rome against our Tyrants: Let us make good our Walls, if they assault us: And in a word, let us rather die like true Romans, than live any longer like infamous Slaves. And now, O ye just Gods (added Brutus, looking up to Heaven) who are the disposers of this World, and the Protectors of Rome, infuse a true desire of glory into the hearts of the people that hears me, and suffer not your Altars to be any longer prophaned by the unworthy Offerings of our Tyrants. And you, illustrious Founder of our City, whom Vertue hath ranked amongst the Immortal, suffer not your work to be destroyed; and let not Rome, which must one day be Mistress of the World, be any longer subject to the humours of the most cruel of Mankind, and suffer not vertue to be at such a distance from the Throne, as not to be secured against Vice, even in the houses of private persons. Divine Egeria, who inspired wise Numa with such holy Laws, infuse into all those that hear me, an ardent desire to destroy him, who hath so slightly observed them. Diana, Goddess of Chastity, to whom our late King hath built a sumptuous Temple, suffer not the chast Lucretia to be unrevenged. Ye sacred Guardians of our Houses, for whom we pretend to have a particular adoration, forsake us not, but resign up our enemies to our just vengeance. And finally, thou great Jupiter, Master of all the Gods, to whom the abominable Tarquin hath built a Temple, out of sacrilegious motives, curb this insupportable Tyrant, whose Pride is such as only Thunder can pull down. Revenge so many unfortunate men unjustly oppressed; hinder Rome from being destroyed, inflict the severest punishment on me that may be, if the love of my Country be not the only resentment of my heart; and as far as it is possible, infuse into all Romans the same resentments of treated for their Tyrants, as the heart of Brutus is at this time seised with, that Rome may be delivered, and all Romans put into a condition of happiness. Let us proceed (generous Romans) this is the last day of your Slavery; if you follow me, Victory expects us, and I see her already stretching out her Arms to us. Speak, that I may know whether your apprehensions are the same with mine, or at least satisfie me by certain signs, what you would, or would not have. For if it be true, that I and my friends are the only true Romans, and such as only deserve so glorious a name; and that nevertheless we must quit all hope of delivering our Country: This Ponyard (added he, lifting up his arm) that hath pierced the heart of Lucretia, and which I preserve to pierce that of the Tyrant, if opportunity befriend me, shall presently run through my own, and ease me of life, which I cannot any longer preserve with pleasure or reputation.

At these words the friends of Brutus, Aronces, Valerius, Herminius, Lucretius and Collatine, beginning to cry out all together, Liberty, Liberty, all that infinite multitude made the same cry, and expressed it self by a thousand tumultuous voices, that it was absolutely resolved to shake off the the yoke of Tyranny. But Brutus, whom the love of Lucretia made then more active than that of his Country, caused the Body of this admirable Woman to be laid at the entrance into the Temple, placing some of the Inhabitants of Collatine to guard it; which done, conferring with Aronces, Lucretius, Collatine, Valerius, Herminius, Artemidorus, Zenocrates, Amilcar, Celeres, Mutius, and divers others, who offered their services to him, it was resolved, that the first thing was to be done, was to secure the Gates. But the Liberty of Clelia being the main business of Aronces in this deliverance of Rome, he was of opinion, that while Brutus went to seise himself of the Gates of the City, it were fit another party of such as took up Arms for them, should be sent to take in Tarquin's Palace, so to secure Tullia, and to hinder the illustrious daughter of Clelia from being exposed (during this Tumult) either to the insolencies of his Guards, or the cruelty of the abominable Tullia. This Proposal of Aronces seeming not unnecessary, a Party was assigned him for that purpose; nay, they permitted Artemidorus, Zenocrates, and Celeres to follow him: and Brutus getting into the head of all those who had already taken up Arms, went to possess himself of the Gates.

The first Gate he came to, was that which they called the Carmental gate, which was between the Tarpeian Rock of the Tiber: Next he went to that which is near Janus's Temple, and the Viminal Hill: then to Romulus's gate, towards the Palatine Hill: and lastly, to that which is called Pendana, or otherwise Romulida: But as he went he made a strange alteration in this great City. In a short hours time all the Temples were opened, all Shops shut up, the whole People were in Arms, all the Women went to their Devotions, and there was nothing to be heard through all the streets of Rome, but Imprecations against Tarquin and Tullia, Complaints for the deplorable death of Lucretia, and the Praises of Brutus. The Salii began to sing in their Temples, to demand the liberty of Rome, and doubled their care for the preservation of that miraculous Buckler, which was confounded amongst eleven others like it, lest it should be stolen. The Vestals came all about their sacred Fire to beg the same thing of the Goddess Vesta; the great High Priest sacrificed for the same purpose: So that these examples of Piety authorizing the Insurrection, had no small influence over the minds of the People.

In the mean time, the creatures of Tarquin, those whom like so many slaves to him he had thrust into the Senate, or the executioners of his Cruelties, were at a strange loss; for the rising proved so sudden and so general, that they had only time to flee to Tullia, who was now in such a condition as she was never in before. Now as it happens that in all popular insurrections there is ever a third party that minds only Plunder; and endeavours to enrich it self by anothers loss: Herminius who much feared the disorder, desired Valerius's leave to place a Guard at his house, lest the excellent Valeria should be exposed to any affronts; as also to dispose another at Sivelias, where Rœcilia, Hermilia, and Collatina then were, with the Prince of Pometia and Prince Titus, who yet knew not any thing of the Tumult, in regard this House was in a street somewhat distant from the place where it began. But it happened that Mutius, Herminius's Rival (who had been one of the first that joyned with Brutus) was come, out of the same apprehension, to Valerius's door, with the same design as Herminius: So that these two Rivals asking one the other what brought them thither, they very roundly satisfied one another. But Herminius being at the same time both generous and discreet, though naturally of a fiery nature, broke not forth into any violence upon this accident; but speaking to Mutius, I beseech you, said he to him, let our difference remain undecided, till we have delivered Rome; and if you will take my advice, let us endeavour to deserve Valeria by the destruction of Tarquin, for our valour this day is only due to our Country. I am content (replied Mutius) but I think not fit to depart hence, if you allow me not to leave here as many of my people, as you do of yours; which being accordingly done, Mutius returned to Brutus, and Herminius went to his vertuous Mothers to place also a Guard there. But before he came, the noise of what had hapned to Lucretia, and the rising of the City was gotten thither, so that the Prince of Pometia, who was then entertaining his dear Hermilia, and Titus who was talking with Collatina, were extremely disordered; for being both very vertuous, Sextus's crime caused in them a certain horrour. The Tumult in the mean time still encreased, and they were not ignorant that Rœcilia and Sivelia loved not Tarquin, and that they could not in honour forsake their Mother, how wicked soever she might be; wherefore there was a necessity they should part with Hermilia and Collatina, but after the most cruel manner in the World, since they had not the liberty to speak any thing to them in particular: 'Tis true, their eyes bid them a sad and sensible adieu. But the Prince of Pometia was somewhat happier than Titus, for he had the time to tell his dear Hermilia in few words, that he was extremely afflicted to leave her. Alas, Madam, said he to her with a low voice, if what is reported of Sextus be true, I fear the Gods will henceforth forsake all the Tarquins, and that I must take my last leave of you; for I look on his crimes as so horrid, that I think it but just to be punished for it, for no other reason, than that I am his Brother. If this unhappiness befall me, added he, pity my sad destiny: But though my Father lose his Kingdom for it, I shall have some comfort, if I lose not your affection.

Having said this, he was forced to accompany the Prince his Brother, and they were hardly come to the stair-foot, but Herminius, who had a great esteem for them, meets them, followed by those whom he intended to place as a Guard at Sivelias, till the Tumult were over. This meeting surprised them very much; for the Prince of Pometia and Titus seeing Herminius followed by people in Arms, easily apprehended from his being in Rome in that posture, that the danger was greater than they had thought it. Herminius on the other side, who infinitely esteemed them, and was indeed much obliged to them, in that divers times they had opposed the King their Father in his behalf, who knew that it was for his sake they affected not Mutius, and met them thus in his Mothers house, was extremely troubled what to do; for it was unquestionably fit they should be secured, had he only considered the design he was upon: but thinking with himself, that Honour, Generosity, and the very consideration of Hospitality permitted him not to do it, he chose the more noble side, and speaking to them: How sorry am I for your sake, my Lords (saith he) that you are Brothers to Sextus, and are obliged to be entangled in his ruine; and how sorrow am I for my own, that I am forced to be of a party contrary to yours: Yet to assure you that I have a respect for Vertue where-ever I find it, and will do you all the favour lies in my power, and haply somewhat more than I ought, I offer you a Guard to the Gate of the City which is now nearest; nor indeed can you take any other resolution. You are without Arms, you have none with you but slaves, the whole City is risen, there is nothing can oppose us, and deliberate a minute longer, I shall not haply be in a capacity to protect you. The Prince of Pometia and Titus hearing Herminius speak in this manner, were much surprised at it, for they knew his reality, and doubted not the certainty of what he said: Notwithstanding they stuck a little tle at the resolution they were to take: but hearing a great noise in the street opposite to that through which they were to pass, and seeing there was no choice to be stood upon, they accepted Herminius's proffer, but with intention to go out of the City, and to get into the Palace, where Tullia was, by a secret door that Herminius knew not of, in regard it was built in his absence from Rome. To be short, having acknowledged Herminius's generosity, and regretted their own misfortune, they were brought to a Gate of the City which Brutus had not as yet possessed himself of, conducted thither by Herminius himself, who having upon his return placed a Guard at Sicelias, drew up to Brutus, who presently came to that Gate, at which the Prince of Pometia and Titus went out.

It hapned in the mean time, that this generous action of Herminius was so far from being prejudicial to the common cause, that it advantaged it; for these two Princes being gallant and withal vertuous persons, their presence might haply have cooled the zeal of those who took up Arms against Tarquin. He did not therefore conceal from Brutus what he had done, assoon as he was come up to him. But as it is impossible to preserve any Order amongst a multitude of people that takes up Arms on a sudden, Rome was in a most deplorable condition; for though the whole City were up, yet every quarter not satisfied it was so, busied it self in making Barricadoes against the others. Those of the Capitol fortified themselves apart, lest some one of the Tarquins should possess himself of the Arx that was on that Hill. Those of the Palatine hill did the like; and those of the Aventine cut down almost all the old Lawrels, wherewith their Hill was in a manner covered, to block up the ways. They also guarded both ends of the Sublician Bridge by which Ancus Martius had joyned the Hill of Janiculum to Rome. Those also of the Quirinal Hill fortified themselves, as did also all the quarters of that famous City. There was also a Guard at the Circus, lest it might have been made a certain Fort: Those of the Sacred street barricado'd themselves: Those of the great street of Apollo did the like: that called Eros did the like: the street of the three Ways which was very populous divided it self, and was the only part of Rome where the Inhabitants disagreed. But for those that lived in the Cyprian street, never was there such fury heard of as they expressed against their Tyrants, for it having hapned that it was in that street the cruel Tullia caused her Chariot to pass over the corps of her Father, they conceived themselves obliged above all the rest, to signalize their animosity against her: And indeed these were they who contrary to Brutus's intention, plundred certain Houses that belonged to some Creatures of Tarquin, and kill'd some that fled from them, though they made no opposition.

Brutus having thus possessed himself of the Gates, and desirous to know what success Aronces had in his enterprise, he was for some time in no small disquiet, for he was informed that all those places I have named were barricado'd: So that not being able at first to infer any thing thence but that the City was divided, he had some reason to fear, that his Design would not prove effectual, that Lucretia should not be revenged, and Rome not delivered from her Tyrants; yet did not his great Heart fail him, but without any further debate he went from quarter to quarter, from Hill to Hill, from one place to another, and was extreamly satisfied to find that all the Romans were of the same party. So that having acquainted them all that they were guided by the same Genius, such an infinite number of people followed him, that the multitude proved a hindrance to him.

Having therefore given Orders every where, he went to see what posture Aronces was in, who had it seems met with a greater resistance then he had expected. For all Tarquin's creatures being tumultuously gotten about Tullia she had a many hands with her, such as being by their own Interests obliged to defend themselves, did it very obstinately. 'Tis true Aronces behaved himself extraordinarily in this adventure. As for the cruel Tullia, when they told her of the first beginning of the Commotion, she laughed at it, and thought it would come to nothing; and when they acquainted her with her Son's crime, and Lucretias death, this detestable woman said, that if Sextus had caused Collatine to be poisoned out of the way, before he had made any love to his wife, she had never killed her self. But when she understood for earnest that the whole City was risen; and that they were coming to seize her in her Palace, she was hurried into the greatest fury and rage possible. She would needs go up into a Fort which looked into the spacious place before the Palace, but the people who were already gotten together there in Arms had no sooner seen her, but they gave her all the abusive language she deserved; So that not seeing any safety in exposing her self to the violence of an incensed multitude, she thought it her best course to make good the Palace, and to send to Tarquin, hoping he might come time enough to hinder this Tumult from proving his destruction. But at the same time as she was sending to Tarquin she commanded a ponyard to be brought, poyson to be prepared, and that the Palace might be set on fire, if she were forced to fly at the Sally-port which was in the Moat; which done, being desirous to have the sole disposal of Clelia, she sent for her Keeper, to entreat him to translate her into that part of the Palace where she was, that so (said she to him) she may be more secure during the Tumult. But this man being sufficiently acquainted with the intentions of Tullia, answered her, that he durst not remove that Captive out of the palace where she was; that he had sent to Tarquin assoon as the rising broke forth, and expected his Orders concerning her; whereupon he withdrew, and putting himself in the head of his Companions, would not return any more to Tullia, though she sent for him divers times.

On the other side, the Prince of Pometia and Titus, compassing the Walls of the City to reach the Sally-port, whereat they hoped to get into the Palace, walked with an incredible disturbance; for being discreet and vertuous, they detested their Brother's crime, and easily fore-saw how dangerous the consequences of that Insurection might be. But when they reflected on the concernment they had in this unjust action, they were almost perswaded to return into Rome, and put themselves at the head of those who endeavoured to revenge Lucretia; for Titus was in love with the Sister in Law of the Illustrious deceased, and the Prince of Pometia with Hermilia, who was an intimate friend of Lucretias. 'Tis true, he would have been much more afflicted if he had known her to be Brutus's sister, and that Brutus was the the Leader of that exasperated multitude which had taken up Arms.

Things being in this posture, Aronces, followed by Artemidorus, Amilcar, Zenocrates, Celeres, and those whom Brutus had commanded to obey him, was gone to set upon the Palace where Tullia was, hoping either to take it, or force her from Rome, but principally to deliver Clelia. And indeed this Illustrious (but unhappy Prince) did prodigious things in this business; and having broke open the outer-gate, he was the first with his Sword in his hand to assault those who made it good, and indeed did it with extraordinary resolution; for the Prince of Pometia and Prince Titus (who were at last got into the Palace at the afore said Port were in person in this outer Court, both giving Orders, and fighting themselves. What was most observable in this engagement, was, that the cruel Tullia, who saw all from her chamber window, and the admirable Clelia, who with Plotina was gotten to that little grate, whence she had seen the Body of him who should have delivered her, when Amilcar was with her, were both Spectators of it: So that when the valiant Aronces, seconded by his Illustrious Friends, had at length caused those to retreat who made good the gate he had broke open, he spies the cruel Tullia at the Window before him, and the admirable Clelia at another on his left hand, so that having before him at the same time, the only object of his love, and one of the greatest objects of his hatred, it much augmented his Valour, especially finding the Prince of Pometia and Titus at the head of theirs, it seemed to him a matter of great Reputation. The fight that happened in this outer Court, was long and resolute on both sides; for it being fortifi'd with a certain Rayl two steps from the ground, and that there was an ascent of certain stairs to come into it, it was a great advantage to Aronces's enemies. However Aronces forced them so far twenty times, and was himself as often forced back to the Gate.

But while this Combate lasted, Clelia suffered something beyond all imagination, for she saw every minute her dear Aronces in a possibility to be dispatch'd; She had divers reasons why she should fear she might prove the cause of his death: For observing that Aronces in the very heat of that tumultuous Engagement, turned his head divers times towards the window where she was, she was so much afraid it might prejudice him, that she would have been glad to have been thence. But all considered, her curiosity to see what should happen to her dear Protector being the stronger, she staid to behold that furious Combat, which certainly had something of more violence then is ordinarily observed in any engagements of War. For the Romans who followed Aronces were so enraged and so impatient to become Masters of the Tyrants Palace, where there was excellent good Plunder, that of what humour soever they were, none wanted motives to fight, The Covetous considered the riches of the Booty; the Generous the destruction of Tarquin; Aronces's friends, the liberty of Clelia, the Vertuous generally on the chastisement of Tullia, and revenge of Lucretia.

There wanted not also on the other side divers causes of an extraordinary Valour: For as to the Prince of Pometia, and Prince Titus, though they had a horrour for the Crimes of their Father, Mother, and Brother, yet a Throne lying at stake, all they could pretend to was in hazard, and for those who accompanied them, they were so far perswaded that if they were taken, the people would tear them to peices, that they made an incredible opposition; insomuch that there was not any thing of this nature heard of before, then being so many people kill'd in this Encounter, that the place where they fought was covered over with dead Bodies.

But that which had in likelihood proved the ruine of Aronces, was, that while he fought and forced the Valiant Princes, he had before him, up to a certain Lodge, Tullia sent out others by a gate that was on the right hand, who shut Aronces in, and immediately thereupon Barricaded the Gate which he had broke open, by which means he was shut into the outer Court of the Palace, and could not be relieved from without. There was indeed some opposition made against those who executed the Orders of Tullia, but at last they were effected, Aronces being at that same time particularly engaged with the Prince of Pometia. For Zenocrates, he dealt with Prince Titus; and for Amilcar and Celeres, they endeavoured to get within the Rayl, to make way for some of their men, and declined forcing the Lodge, which was so obstinately maintained.

But when Aronces understood by the cries of those that fought behind him, that the Orders he had given for the guarding of the Gate which he had forced, had not been observed, he gave himself in a manner for lost, for he could not fight in two places, having not so great a Force as that he could any way divide it. Upon this the greater part of his men were more troubled how to force a passage out of the Court, then desirous to take in the Lodge. But this being not the design of Aronces, who would have chosen rather to die then to retreat, and quit his resolution of delivering Clelia; No, no (said he to those who minded only the forcing of the Gate) it is not there that we must fight; for Persons truly Valiant never go out at the same places by which they came in.

in: Follow me therefore Romans, for that way that you would go, there is nothing to be expected but ſlavery, and the way I bring you into, leads you into Liberty.

Aronces pronounced theſe words as if he had been really aſſured of Victory; ſo that all drawing up to him, he made a freſh attempt; but did it with ſo much courage, and was ſo well ſeconded by all his friends, and particularly Zenocrates, that the Prince of Pometia, and Prince Titus were found to give ground. Aronces forced them to quit the Lodge, and all they could do, was to ſacrifice part of ther people for a ſafe Retreat into the Palace, with much ado to keep out their enemies from coming along with them.

Thoſe in the mean time who ſallyed out by the Orders of Tullia, to poſſeſs themſelves of the outer gate, no ſooner perceived that the Princes their Maſters had quitted the Lodge which they maintained, but they alſo forſook the gate they were to keep, and entred into the Palace the ſame way they came out; by which means Aronces and his Friends became abſolute Maſters of the Court. But being further deſirous to force the Palace-gate, the cruel Tullia commanded to be caſt on them a certain artificial Fire which Tarquin had made uſe of ſome time on the Tiber, in the time of the Sabine war: For there being ſome of that compoſition ſtill left, Tullia cauſed it be employed to the great diſcommodity of the Combatants, in regard the fire faſtned ſo on any thing it touched, that it could not be gotten off, nor put out, but with much difficulty. Beſides, ſhe cauſed to be thrown out at the windows whatever was proper to cruſh down her enemies; nay ſhe pulled down a certain row of Pillars, which ſtood on a Model on the top of her Palace, to overwhelm thoſe who ſhould endeavour to become Maſters of it. Thus though Aronces had no more enemies with ſwords in their hands, yet was he in greater danger then before; for from all the windows in the Palace they ſhot arrows, caſt this artificial fire, or threw ſomething to preſs down thoſe that it light upon.

In the mean time the valiant Aronces, not moved at the greatneſs of the danger, and thinking himſelf over-happy that his dear Clelia ſaw what danger he was in for her Liberty, notwithſtanding that tempeſt with Darts, Stones, and Fires, made uſe of the ſame Engine, which he had before employed to break open the outer gate: for Lucretius being Governor of Rome, had furniſhed him with it, when he firſt ſet upon the Palace.

Things being in this Poſture, Brutus who was become Maſter of Rome without any reſiſtance, comes to the place, having given order for all things elſe-where. But he comes thither followed by Valerius, Herminius, Lucretius, Collatine, Brutus, and an infinite multitude of armed people: So that Tullia and the Princes her Sons ſeeing that the Inner-gate of the Palace would be forced, and that it was impoſſible for them to hold out till the arrival of Tarquin, took a very ſtrange reſolution; for the Gate being broken open, and falling, Aronces ſpies in a great Entry a many combuſtible things heap'd together, which Tullia had cauſed to be brought thither on a ſudden, and which ſhe had ſet on fire when ſhe went away: ſo that inſtead of finding armed People to make good that Gate, Aronces and his Friends ſaw only a great eruption of flames which denyed them entrance after a very ſtrange manner. This Illuſtrious Prince therefore being forced to retreat, turned his eyes towards the window whence he had obſerved Clelia, and where he then ſaw her; but he now ſees her in ſuch a poſture as pierced his heart; for he perceived her clinging to the Grate, to avoid going with certain men who would have forced her thence, and looking towards him to demand his aſſiſtance: Soon after he loſt ſight both of her and Plotina, nor could he any more ſee the cruel Tullia; ſo that imagining in all likelyhood that this unjuſt Princeſs had tranſlated Clelia ſomewhere elſe, and that ſhe was in her power, he felt ſomething it is impoſſible to expreſs. Coming therefore up to Brutus and Herminius, he told them what a confuſion he was in. He had no ſooner acquainted them with it, but Brutus having told them there was a ſecret door to the Palace, he doubted not but that Tullia and her people had reſolved on an eſcape. In a word, though there were divers things thrown out at the Windows, it was not with ſuch violence as before; ſo that it might eaſily be perceived the Palace was in a manner forſaken. Had there been no other concernments then thoſe of Rome and Brutus, it had been but neceſſary to let thoſe eſcape who endeavoured it, and render their Gods thanks that they were gone, not taking the trouble to purſue them. But the Liberty of Clelia being at the ſtake, though Brutus's ſoul was fully taken up with the grief and revenge he took, and was to take of the death of Lucretia, and the Liberty of his Country, yet he told Aronces he ſhould have what force he pleaſed for to overtake Tullia, before ſhe ſhould joyn with Tarquin, who in all appearance would ſoon leave the Camp to come to Rome. But that nothing might be done but upon ſure grounds, whilſt they endeavoured by the help of Ladders to get in at the Windows, which were now forſaken: Herminius ſent immediately to the Walls to diſcover what people were flying in the fields, while, that no time ſhould be loſt, they ſent orders to thoſe who kept the Horſes whereon they came from Collatina to Rome, to bring them where they were.

In the mean time thoſe whom Herminius had ſent upon the Walls, returning ſaid the Fields were full of people running away, ſome with Arms, others without; ſome loaden with luggage, others not quite cloathed: ſome on horſeback, others afoot; and that amongſt the reſt, there were a many women. But that Aronces might no longer doubt whether Clelia were within the Palace, it hapned that thoſe whom Tullia had left to hold the Aſſailants in ſome play for a while, fearing they might be ſurprized if they ſtayed too long, ſoon followed her: ſo that it being now eaſie to get in at ſome Windows, whence they had taken away the grates, they found the Palace abſolutely diſ-inhabited, there being left only the Prince of Numidia, who was ſtill very ſick, and ſome few other wretches, who having been hurt in the firſt Combate in the Court, were got in with the Princes, when the Lodge had been forced, and had ſtaid (though much againſt their Wills) in that forſaken Palace. Whilſt therefore Lucretius did what he could to quench the fire, Aronces having gotten into the Palace, went to Clelias Chamber, where he found her not. But what was moſt horrid of all, was, that he underſtood by ſome of the wounded, that Tullia had cauſed that Illuſtrious Roman to be taken away, againſt his Will, in whoſe cuſtody ſhe was, who yet would needs follow her. He underſtood further, that this cruel woman went thence, having Clelia in one hand, and a ponyard in the other: and that ſhe ſaid as ſhe went out, that if ſhe were purſued, and likely to be overtaken, ſhe would firſt kill Clelia with it, and afterward her ſelf. No ſooner had ſhe heard theſe cruel expreſſions, but he is filled with fury, and he was no leſs diſturbed at the fear of Clelias death, then Brutus was at that of Lucretia. In the mean time he was at a loſs what to do in ſuch an unhappy conjuncture, in as much as he was forced to ſtay for Horſes ere he could purſue Tullia, though he was much in doubt whether he ſhould do it or not; for if he followed her too weak, it would come to nothing: if he went with great force, he feared the cruel Tulla might really do what ſhe had threatned. Yet was he infinitely deſirous to follow her, and was in an extraordinary diſcompoſure, that he could not do it aſſoon as he wiſhed.

On the other ſide Amilcar ſought all the Palace over for the other Captives, but he could not learn any thing either of Ceſonia or Danae, or any of the reſt of their friends, only Plotina he underſtood had voluntarily followed Clelia.

But at laſt the fire being quenched, and thoſe who were gone for the Horſes having brought them, Brutus and Aronces conſulted with all their Friends, and having well conſidered the ſtate of affairs, and underſtood from the wounded Soldiers that remained in the Palace, that Tullia had ſent for Tarquin, and that when ſhe went thence, ſhe thought him far on his way to Rome; it was reſolved, that Lucretius and Valerius ſhould remain at Rome, to take all neceſſary orders there, and to ſhut the Gates againſt the Tyrant, if he ſhould offer to enter in; for it might be eaſily imagined, that in an occaſion of ſuch importance as this was, Tarquin would not bring with him too great Force, in regard it would take up too much time; beſides, that it was likely enough he might think it no hard matter to appeaſe this Tumult. It was alſo conceived that Sextus would be retired into ſome place, that ſo he might not incenſe the people by his preſence: So that Brutus reſigning himſelf to the juſtice of heaven, to his own great heart and conduct, undertook to put the Camp into the ſame diſorder as he had done Rome. To that end, he told them, he would take ſuch a way, as that in all likelyhood he ſhould not meet Tarquin, and, that Clelia might not be neglected, a Force ſhould be aſſigned Aronces, wherewith to follow Tullia, and do what he thought conducing to the ſafery of that admirable perſon. The Deſign of Brutus ſeemed at firſt ſomewhat too high, but he ſo far ſatisfied his friends, that it were vain to make a riſing in Rome, if Tarquin continued Maſter of the Army; and in fine, he ſpoke to them with ſo much authority, that, they could not but comply with him. However it was not thought fit he ſhould go without any Guard; whereſore having found that they could preſently ſend out two hundred Horſe, Brutus took fifty of them, and aſſigned the reſt to Aronces. But the difficulty was to get out of Rome; for the Romans who then looked on Brutus as their Tutelary Deity, oppoſed it with ſo much earneſtneſs, that it was like to cauſe a general diſorder throughout the City; and there were above two hours ſpent ere they could be perſwaded, that it was for their Intereſt that Brutus went out of Rome.

Aronces on the other ſide, had as much ado to get out as he, and they were both encompaſſed by ſuch a multitude of people, that though they were the deliverers of Rome, they were not Maſters of themſelves: So that it was almoſt night ere Brutus and Aronces could get out of the City, which was no ſmall affliction to this diſconſolate Lover, whoſe buſineſs was to ſeek out his Miſtreſs

But when theſe two unfortunate Lovers were gotten out of Rome, their friends were divided, Herminius and Mutius ſtood for Brutus, conceiving themſelves more obliged to him, as being Romans, and Artemidorus, Amilcar, Zenocrates and Celeres, were of Aronces ſide. But though they were divided as to Intereſts, yet did they joyntly wiſh the proſperity of their ſeveral deſigns. For Aronces, he took the way that he was told Tullia had taken, who he underſtood had taken up two Chariots at a houſe ſhe had within two miles of Rome, for ſhe went from the Palace on horſeback. But for Brutus, he wheeled about another way into the Camp without meeting Tarquin, and he was ſo fortunate, as to reach it juſt at the break of day. Nay, it happened ſo critically, that by the ſame time that Tarquin had got to Rome, Brutus came to the Camp, where he no ſooner arrived, but he underſtood that Sextus was gone out of the way, as ſoon as the report of the inſurrection at Rome was brought thither.

In

In the mean time, how ſenſible ſoever Brutus might be of the death of Lucretia, the deſign he had to revenge it, was the reaſon that he ſpoke of nothing but joy, triumph, and liberty. In a word, this illuſtrious Roman going from Tent to Tent aſſembled all the Officers; but while he gets them together, he ſpeaks to all the Soldiers he meets, he tells them all that Rome is free, that Tullia had left it, that all the adherents of Tyranny were ſent out of the City; he aſſures them that Tarquin ſhould find the Gates ſhut againſt him, and entertains them with peace, reward, glory, and reſt. He repreſents to them the fruitleſs inconveniences they had ſuffered during the time of the Siege of Ardea, he calls them the true deliverers of their Country, if they have but the courage to declare themſelves; he intreats them, he importunes them; nay ſometimes he threatens them; he takes Herminius to witneſs of all he ſays, whoſe integrity he knew was well known; to their intereſts he adds thoſe of the Gods, and he ſpeaks to them after ſo confident and heroick a manner, that the prodigious change which they found in him, produced the ſame effect in the Camp as it had done in Rome and Collatia, and raiſed in them admiration and reſpect for him: So that the name of Brutus, and the word Liberty paſſing from mouth to mouth, the whole Camp fell into diſorder, and both Officers and Soldiers unanimouſly ſubmitting to Brutus, acknowledge him for their chief, and the deliverer of their Country. Whereupon ſending haſtily to acquaint thoſe of Ardea, that he reſtored them to that peace which Tarquin would take away from them, provided they would joyn with him againſt Tarquin, he raiſes the Siege and begins his march towards Rome, beſtowing the pillage of the Tyrants Tents upon the Soldiers, ſo to engage them by that act of hoſtility to perſiſt in their revolt.

But while Brutus ſeconded by his friends manages the affairs of the Camp with ſo much ſucceſs for the Liberty of his Country, and the revenge of Lucretia. Tarquin arrives at Rome, confident that his preſence would eſtabliſh his Authority there: But he was much miſtaken, when he ſaw the gates ſhut againſt him, and that ſome told him from the Walls, that the people of Rome baniſhed him for ever with all his Family, and declared him unworthy the name of a King, which he had with ſo much injuſtice uſurped. Tarquin having not with him at this time above four hundred horſe, was forced to retreat; but could not do it without horrid threats to thoſe who had denied him entrance; for he knew nothing of what was happened in the Camp, and thought he had no more to do to chaſtiſe Rome, than to raiſe the Siege of Ardea. But when in his return he underſtood by the King of Cluſium's Envoy whom he met, as alſo by ſome of his own creatures, that his Army was coming againſt him under the command of Brutus, whom all obeyed and acknowledged for one of the greateſt men in the World, and by this means found himſelf without any aſſiſtances, between a City riſen againſt him and a revolted Army; he had certainly need to ſummon up all his Courage, to ſupport ſo great and ſo ſudden a Revolution. Upon the firſt relation of this ſtrange accident, he made a halt; then he asked whether they knew where Tullia was, and what was become of the Captives; for thoſe who came from the Camp told him they were gone from Rome. But being told that the Captives were in Tullia's diſpoſal, and that ſhe had taken the way to Tarquinia, he alſo took the ſame and that with much diligence, commanding ſecretly two of his creatures whom he had employed in thouſands of Crimes, that if his enemies ſhould purſue him, and ſet on him with a party ſtronger than his own, they ſhould keep cloſe to his perſon, and if they ſaw him in any likelihood to be taken, kill him: For though I have a heart great enough to hinder me from falling into the hands of my enemies, ſaid he to them with his eyes full of fury, yet I fear my arm will prove too weak to diſpatch my ſelf, or ſhall miſs the firſt attempt I ſhall make on my ſelf, if I am forced to it. Hereupon he began to march, and this unjuſt Prince who ſaw himſelf overwhelm'd with all kinds of miſfortunes in an inſtant, and that through the crimes of his Son, or Wives, or his own, was ſo abominable, as not to have the leaſt remorſe; but employed his Wits to be revenged of thoſe whom Heaven uſed as inſtruments to puniſh him for uſurping a Kingdom, and ruling with ſo much cruelty and injuſtice.

Brutus in the mean time, though crowned with the glory of freeing two Cities at the ſame time, and being the deliverer of his Country, and the revenger of his dear Lucretia, was the moſt unfortunate man in the world, when it came into his mind that Lucretia was dead and Sextus alive. And indeed, though Brutus was of a nature gallant, mild, and the moſt obliging in the world, yet after the death of Lucretia he ſeemed to have changed his humour and temperament, and all his life after affected a certain auſtere vertue, wherein there ſeemed to be ſomething of roughneſs; nay, ſometimes ſomething of cruelty, to thoſe who were not informed of the ſecret of his heart, and could not gueſs at the true cauſe of his melancholy; and that inſatiable Ambition which though Rome were delivered, he had to root out the race of the Tarquins. Yet had he withal an admirable command of himſelf in this great occurrence, wherein it concerned him to confirm his Victory by his Preſence. For when he had diſpoſed his Troops about the Gates of Rome, he made his entrance, which was with extraordinary acclamations, and without any further delay, having returned the Gods thanks in Janus's Temple, which he cauſed to be ſhut the more to aſſure the people, he called a Council of all the perſons of Quality in Hoſtilius's Court, as being the most convenient place of any for great Assembly. They were no sooner got together, but the people by an unanimous consent, having no lawful King, conferred all Authority on Brutus with this Title of Consul, only for one year. Which done, this new Consul ordained the Senate to consist of three hundred, which he chose with so little contestation that all the Citizens were satisfied.

But while Brutus, Collatine, Valerius, Lucretius, Herminius and Mutius were busied about the regulation of their City, so to perpetuate the liberty they had acquired, Aronces, the unfortunate Aronces met with a contrary destiny: For having parted from Brutus and been informed which way Tullia took, when she left the house where she had taken up the two Chariots; he followed it till he came to a place, where he understood that the multitude of people that followed Tullia was divided. In this place was he at a great loss, not knowing what resolution to take: He imagined indeed that his business being only to find out Clelia, it was more likely she was rather in that party where there were Chariots, than where there were only Horses, and he was not much mistaken; for he conceived that Tullia seeing her self far enough from Rome, had sent the Princes her Sons to the Camp, and kept on her way. And indeed it happened so, that this cruel Princess seeing her self in that extremity, would not take Clelia with her to the Camp, but thought better to carry her to Tarquinia: But she being in one Chariot, and having disposed the Captives into another, he who had the conduct of the latter being faithful to Tarquin, whose misfortune he had not yet understood, and making it his business to deliver Clelia out of the power of that cruel Princess; carried his business so handsomely, that he caused him who conducted the Chariot of the Captives to go somewhat slowly, so to be at a distance from that of Tullia, who having her mind persecuted with the memory of her Crimes, and the representation of the miseries would fall upon her, thought not on Clelia, as not suspecting any could be guilty of so great a presumption as to offer to take her away from her. She thought indeed at first to have taken her into her own Chariot, but the very sight of her being troublesome to her, she disposed her into the other, which going more slowly staid somewhat behind. This man therefore in order to his secret design, having caused the Axle-tree of the Chariot of the Captives to be broken, when it was taken up at the house by which Tullia had passed, told him who conducted it that he must overtake Tullia, and therefore must put on a little faster. But he had scarce gone a hundred paces ere the Axle-tree flew asunder, so that there was no going any further. Upon this accident he said they must needs leave the Chariot there, and that every one of his Companions should take one of the Captives behind him: So that these unfortunate Beauties not knowing what to do, and seeing that it was to no purpose to make any resistance, submitted, thinking they were all to follow Tullia. He who was the Author of the design, took Clelia into his charge; one of his Companions took Plotina behind him, another Cassonia, another Donae; and so some or other the rest of the Captives.

Now while these Captives were together, they had resolved to endeavour each to perswade him who carried her to bring them to Rome or Ardea, and the more to engage them to promise great rewards. Accordingly, Clelia was no sooner on horseback, but she began to intreat him who carried her to do an act of vertue, and carry her to Rome; promising him extraordinary rewards if he did it. She prevailed so far, that the fellow, who as I told you had his secret design in it, seemed to condescend; and making a little halt, he took the first way he came to on the right hand. But Clelia not desirous to be alone with him, intreated him to perswade his Companions, who had the charge of her friends to follow them; or at least that Plotina might accompany them: He answered, that if the business were communicated to so many, it would be discovered; but at length calling to him who carried Plotina, pretending he had broken something about his Bridle, he made him stay a little behind the rest: So that turning out of the way, and taking advantage of a little hill, they put on a good pace. But coming to a certain passage which Plotina knew, as being of the Country, she perceived the fellow instead of carrying them to Rome, drove towards Ardea: So that acquainting Clelia with it, that afflicted Beauty told him that he was out of his way, and that his design was to ruine them. By no means (replied he) for I deliver you out of the hands of a Princess who hates you, to put you into the power of a Prince who loves you.

At these words was Clelia extremely disquieted, for she chose much rather to be exposed to the cruelty of Tullia than the passion of Tarquin. And not knowing that that Prince was gone from before Ardea, and that he had neither Kingdom nor Army, Clelia was in an incredible disturbance: Insomuch that without any further deliberation she casts her self off the horse, the fellow not being able to hinder her, and calls Plotina to her assistance, who could not do as much, as being held fast by him who carried her. Not that Clelia had any hopes to save her self, but hoped only by making a little stay there, that the Gods whom she invoked would send her some relief.

In the mean time, Tullia having observed that the Chariot of the Captives followed not, caused her own to be staid, to know whence the disorder happen'd: But at last understanding that it was broke, she commanded to be brought into hers, not out of any motive of goodneſs, but out of a conſideration of the moſt cruel jealouſie in the World: So that ſome that were about her putting themſelves in order to ſatisfie her, they called him who was charged with the conduct of that Beauty. But not finding him and acquainting Tullia with as much, ſhe commanded twelve of her people to purſue them, and to bring Clelia back or never to ſee her again. Theſe proving ſucceſsful in their ſearch, were come almoſt to the place where Clelia caſt her ſelf to the ground, and where ſhe yet was obſtinately refuſing to get up again: So that he who was to have brought her to Tarquinia, ſeeing theſe twelve Horſe approaching whom he preſently knew, he ſaw it was not his beſt courſe to return any more to Tullia, but to ſeek protection from Tarquin. He therefore attempted once more to perſwade Clelia, really thinking he did her a good Office: But Madam (ſaid he to her) you conſider not that Tullia would not have you in her power, but to put you to death. It matters not (anſwered the generous Clelia) I would rather ſuffer death, than the love of your unjuſt Prince.

She had no ſooner ſaid this, but ſhe perceives a great body of Horſe towards Ardea, and imagining they were ſome of Tarquin's Troops, ſhe began to run croſs a Meadow, before thoſe whom Tullia had ſent to take her, though ſhe doubted not much but that ſhe ſought her own death. She had not gone twenty paces, but turning about to ſee whether ſhe was followed, ſhe perceives twenty horſe drawn off from the Body ſhe had ſeen, making towards her as faſt as they could ride: So that conceiving they would eaſily overtake her, ſhe ſtood ſtill, ſeeing indeed ſhe could do no otherwiſe; for thoſe twelve horſe diſcovering that they whom they ſaw, were not of Tarquin's Forces ran away; and he who would have carried Clelia to the Tyrant perceiving it alſo, got up on Horſeback, and provided for himſelf, and his companion to diſburden himſelf of Plotina, ſet her down and followed him.

Hereupon theſe two Beauties being met again, and reſolving to die together, were much ſurpriſed to ſee Horatius riding before thoſe twenty Horſe, which were drawn off from their Body: For though Clelia loved him not, nay might indeed charge him with all the misfortunes of her life, as having hindred her to marry Aronces near Capua, and knew that he did hate that illuſtrious Prince, and was by him reciprocally hated; yet in regard he was a vertuous man, and had a reſpect for her, beſides an infinite love, it was ſome joy to her to ſee that ſhe was not any longer ſubject to the violences of Tarquin. Horatius on the other ſide, being come in the head of theſe twenty Horſe, out of no other conſideration than that of Humanity, to relieve women whoſe condition he ſaw was ſuch as needed relief, was no leſs amazed to find the admirable Clelia. He preſently alights, and coming towards her with infinite reſpect; Well, Madam, (ſaid he to her) ſhall I obtain pardon for having carried you away from Capua, by bringing you to Rome; now that it is delivered from that cruel Tyrant, who hath ſo often ſought the life of the Generous Clelius.

I know not (replied ſhe) whether the crime you ſpeak of is of ſuch a nature as may be abſolutey pardoned; but I am certain you will put an extraordinary obligation on me if you bring me to Rome, ſince Tarquin hath no more to do there. But Horatius (added ſhe) may I truſt you? You may Madam (replied he) and if I bring you not immediateiy to Rome, account me the moſt infamous of Mankind: For in a word, (I profeſs to you) conſidering the obligations which it hath pleaſed my deſtiny my Rivals ſhould caſt on me, I will never prejudice him by any other ways than thoſe of my addreſſes, my ſervices, and my own Vertue. But Madam, (added he) we muſt loſe no time, for there have happened ſo great changes in one day, that methinks all ſhould change again in one day: Therefore give me leave to ſet you on a Horſe which you ſhall guide your ſelf, that ſo you may not ſuſpect I have any deſign to force you any where, and may the more willingly permit me to be your Conductor.

Notwithſtanding all this, Clelia would needs be aſſured by a new Engagement, that Horatius would bring her to Rome; which done, this illuſtrious Roman chuſing out a Horſe among thoſe that followed him, cauſed one of his people to attend and conduct Clelia, and another to take Plotina behind him; and ſo without any further ſtay he took his way to Rome, followed by the whole Body which had overtaken him.

But Clelia being extremely deſirous to know the State of affairs, whereof ſhe had not heard any thing, ſince ſhe had ſeen her dear Aronces expoſed to ſo great danger (for her ſake) in the Palace Court, intreated Horatius to acquaint her with what he knew. He therefore told her, that Brutus had wrought a revolt in the Camp; that he had ſent word to Ardea that Rome would have peace with her, adding that for his own particular, to come as ſoon as he could to her, he had got together two hundred Horſe, with intention to caſt himſelf into Rome, having not been certainly informed that Tullia had carried her with her. Horatius had ſcarce told her thus much, but he underſtood from ſome of his men who went before, that there was ſeen in the Plain into which they were entring, a very deſperate Fight between two parties very unequal in number, for there might very well be on one ſide, three or four hundred Horſe, and there ſeemed not to be on the other much above an hundred. This intelligence put Horatius into ſome diſorder, for he muſt needs think it could be no other than Tarquin, who he knew had taken with him from the Camp three or four hundred Horſe, and conceived he muſt have met with ſome of thoſe who had revolted from him: So that his heart being divided between Love and Honour, he knew not whether he ſhould go and relieve thoſe who ſtood in need of his aſſiſtance, or make it his buſineſs to conduct Clelia ſafely to Rome. But to make a mean between both, and to know at leaſt more certainly what the matter was, he ſent ſome of his men to make diſcovery, and lay cloſe behind a little hill.

Clelia, who little imagined that the Illuſtrious Aronces was engaged in a dangerous fight againſt Tarquin, and thought he had been in Rome, or with Brutus, was very importunate with Horatius, not to trouble himſelf about any thing, but to bring her into ſome place of ſafety. And indeed, her inſinuations were ſo prevalent, that he ſeeing thoſe whom he had ſent out, returned not ſo ſoon as he expected, he could no longer endure that Clelia ſhould be in any fear of falling into the hands of Tarquin. So that he turned out of the way he would have gone, leaving only two of his men, to bid thoſe whom he had ſent, when they were returned, to follow him the way he ſhould lead them, which was the neareſt to go to Rome. But theſe two waited to no purpoſe, for thoſe who had been ſent out to diſcover the Parties that were engaged, had been forced to fight themſelves, Tarquin, who had ſoon perceived them, having ordered thirty of his men to engage them, out of a fear of being ſurpriſed by ſome freſh ſupplies; and accordingly, they had been either taken Priſoners, or cut to pieces: Beſides, that Tarquin having been informed by thoſe who had been taken, that Horatius was not far from him with two hundred Horſe, and eaſily inferring that if he joyned with Aronces, he were utterly loſt, ſince that valiant Prince found him ſo much work with ſo ſmall a handful of men, he commanded his people to make one final attempt to overcome him; for till then, in regard he was Son to a King, who was his Ally, from whom he expected Protection, he had given Order that he ſhould not be killed. But conſidering the importunity of his preſent condition, he was obliged not to debate the buſineſs any longer: So that Aronces was in an extreme danger; for he had about an hundred Horſe left, and had almoſt four hundred to deal with.

Beſides all this, the Prince of Pometia and Prince Titus had joyned their Father, and being obliged to fight for their Father how wicked ſoever he might be, they engaged Aronces with an incredible Courage, though they had an infinite eſteem for him. 'Tis true, the Valour this Prince expreſſed that day was ſo prodigious, that there never was ſeen any thing like it; for he was ſeveral times ſurrounded by his enemies, yet could they neither take him Priſoner, nor hurt him. He killed (in a manner at Tarquin's Elbow) that valiant Hellius, with whom he had ſome time fought near Ardea: and if Tarquin had not uſed a ſubtle ſhift, he might have been overcome by him, ſo ſignal was his Valour, and ſo worthily was it ſeconded by that of Artemidorus, Amilcar, Zenocrates and Celeres.

To this may be added, that the Romans whom he had with him, were in ſo much fear of falling into the power of Tarquin, that they behaved themſelves ſo much the more gallantly. But at laſt Tarquin having cauſed ſome of his people to make out-cries, as if Rome were returned to its Duty to him, and that his Army had changed their reſolutions; thoſe who were with Aronces taking Alarm at this falſe report, though he did all that lay in his power to hinder them from believing it, ran away; ſo that he was left alone with his four Friends, amidſt ſo great a number of Enemies; yet would he not yield, till that there was no other remedy, after he had received a wound in his right Arm; but at laſt he was forced to ſubmit to the multitude by which he was ſurrounded, and become the Priſoner of a King, who had loſt both his Kingdom and his Army.

But that this adventure might prove yet more inſupportable to him, it hapned that Tarquin, whom it concerned to treat him, had indeed an extraordinary care of him, out of ſome conſiderations of Policy only, though he hated him moſt horridly, both as a Lover of Clelia, and that he found him in Arms againſt him; ſo that after he had put a Guard upon him, and thoſe Friends of his who met with the ſame Fortune, except Amilcar, who made a ſhift to eſcape after he had been taken, it hapned that Tarquin cauſing Aronces to be dreſſed at the firſt Houſe he met in his way, one of Horatius's men, who had been taken by ſome of Tarquin's, ſtanding near him when he was dreſſed, knew him, and made acquaintance with him. Aronces who could not want a curioſity for ſuch a Rival, asked him by what adventure he came thither, and where his Maſter was? To which this man, being of the humour of thoſe, who when they relate things, love to circumſtantiate, anſwered, That Horatius recovering at length of his wounds, found himſelf in a condition to caſt himſelf into Rome; that told him how he had found Clelia, highly expreſſing the ſatisfaction that Beauty had in meeting him ſo ſeaſonably, aſſuring him that he was to carry her to Rome, and that they would be there very ſuddenly. The firſt apprehenſions of Aronces, were extremely confuſed and entangled; for after a long fear that Clelia might periſh through the cruelty of the implacable Tullia, he arrived to a ſlender comfort, when he underſtood that ſhe was not in her power. He was notably diſſatisfied that ſhe went to Rome, as alſo that ſhe was quite out of the reach of Tarquin's violence, and Sextus's; but when after all he conſidered, that ſhe was fallen into the hands of a Rival, a perſon of ſo great worth as Horatius, one who had ſuch an advantage over him, as to render him ſo conſiderable a ſervice; and withal ſaw himſelf wounded, and Priſoner to a Prince, who he knew loved Clelia, and who would not fail to return him to the King his Father, and to engage him into his Intereſts, he thought himſelf the moſt unfortunate man in the world, for he fore-ſaw what in reaſon ſhould be the conſequence of ſo croſs an accident. Accordingly when when he was on Horſe-back, and forced to follow a Prince, whom Fortune had forſaken, and who went for refuge to Ceres, intending to ſend thence to Treat with Porſenna, he entertained himſelf after the ſaddeſt manner that could be. For when he called to mind with what eagerneſs he wiſhed Romes Liberty, and Tarquin's Ruine, and conſidered that the Misfortune of that Prince was the only cauſe that he was his Priſoner, he acknowledged in himſelf, that men were guilty of great raſhneſs, when they preſumed to deſire any thing preciſely of the Gods; ſince that many times what they deſire, proves more prejudicial to them than what they fear: So that not daring in a manner to wiſh any thing, for fear of making any wiſhes againſt himſelf, he was extremely afflicted, eſpecially when he conſidered that Clelia was in a place where he had two very conſiderable Rivals; that himſelf in all likehood ſhould be turned over a Priſoner to the King his Father, and ſaw not any thing from whence he might derive the leaſt comfort; but the hopes he had in the Friendſhips of the Illuſtrious Brutus, and the generous Herminius.

Комплиментъ

TO THE ACCOMPLISH'D LADY, THE LADY Conſtance Enyon.

MADAM,

THE Opinion I have of your Goodneſs muſt needs be very great, when I think the preſumption I am guilty of, in this addreſs ſo innocent and juſtifiable, that I do not much doubt your pardon. It is certainly no ſmall one in me, to make uſe of your name, to do that, which of all things, I take the greateſt pride and pleaſure in; that is, confidence to let the World know, I cannot receive a favour with half as much freedom and ſatisfaction, as I can acknowledge it. To thoſe I have received from Your ſelf, I cannot but add the many extraordinary Obligations, I am indebted to your noble Relations, and particularly thoſe at Cumberlow; and among thoſe, to that accompliſhed Perſon, whom the World juſtly admires, to find, at ſo few years, ſoaring in a Flame ſo high, as that of the Author of the Hiſtory of Philoſophy. Theſe Madam, are ſo great, and conſequently, preſs ſo much upon my memory and reſentments, that, ſince the greateſt acknowledgements I can make of them, are in my apprehenſion, much below the advantages I have made thereby, it is no miraculous effect of Gratitude, if I graſp at any occaſion to do it.

For, what I now preſent you with, Madam, I need ſay no more by way of recommendation of it, than that it is a third Volume of that excellent Romance, whereof you were pleaſed with ſo much kindneſs to receive the two former; with the ſame fate too, that is, that it hath gone through more hands than one. The advantages you are to make of it, I am not to preſs, ſince it is, among your other perfections, not the moſt inconſiderable, that you can diſcern the excellencies, and diſcover the defaults of things of greater conſequence, than thoſe of this nature. But when I reflect on your Sex, I cannot but do my Author this right, that as no man hath put greater obligations ligations on It, than he, by the noble and generous characters he hath honoured it withal; so is it but just, you have the esteem and affection for him, which you have not for any other.

Thus, Madam, having given you an account of this address to your self, and presumed your pardon for it, I have a far greater confidence to obtain it for another I make to Heaven; which is, that you may meet with that indulgency of fortune and happiness, which so much good nature, so noble an education, such a vertuous inclination, and excellent endowments, as yours are, may justly expect. And this, Madam, shall be the perpetual wish of,

MADAM,

Your most humble and most obliged Servant

J. Davies.

The Third Part.

BOOK I.

Aronces was doubtless a very miserable man, in being a Prisoner unto a Prince whom fortune had forsaken, and one that was his Rival too; but the thought of Horatius's carrying Clelia unto Rome, made him more miserable than either; not but that he was very glad of her being out of the tyranny of Tarquin, and power of terrible Tullia; yet nothing did so much sting his soul, as to think that Horatius should be him that restores liberty unto Clelia. Indeed, could he have seen into the soul of this fair one, his own soul had been better satisfied; for though she had good reason to be glad of going to Rome, yet it went much against the hair, to see that Horatius should be her Conductor thither; she apprehended both Aronces and her self to be in a very ill condition, though Horatius was infinitely obliged unto Aronces: And when she bethought her of how she was going to see, at the same time both Aronces, Horatius, and the Prince of Numidia, she apprehended a million of miseries: for after she had seen her dear Aronces fight so valiantly in the Court of Tullia's Palace, she could not imagine he could be out of Rome: sometimes her fear was that he was wounded, and sometimes that he was dead, so as these fears in her thoughts would not suffer her to enjoy those sweets which her own liberty, and the liberty of her Country, might have procured unto her.

As for Horatius, his joys to see Tarquin ruin'd, Rome deliver'd, and his Mistress in his own possession, did so much take up his whole heart, as for a while he never bethought himself, how his Rival was the party loved, and not he. At last, turning his eyes upon Clelia's fair face, who at that time was in a deep study, and such a study as spoke much sadness, he imagined that Aronces was the subject of her study; so as calling to memory all those testimonies of tenderness which that fair one had expressed towards his Rival upon several occasions, and all those bitter expressions towards himself, the tide turned, and what was joy but a minute before, was now sadness: Indeed, when he came to bethink himself, that in carrying Clelia to Rome, he carried her unto a place where he expected to find Aronces, unto whom he owed his life, his heart was most sensibly afflicted; he was then within a little of altering his design, and falling into the same thoughts which he harboured when he carried away Clelia in the great Earthquake, and defended her against the Prince of Numidia, upon the Lake of Thrasimenes: But when he remembred how that violence got him the aversion of Clelia; how since then, he was more miserable than before; and how Aronces won the heart of this fair one, only by the grandeur of his virtue, he kept himself firm to the resolution which he had taken, of overcoming Aronces, by no other way, but by endeavouring to excel him (if it were possible) in virtue. Thus did both Clelia and Horatius think upon Aronces, though by motives very different: and Aronces entertained thoughts of Horatius and Clelia, which were as unresemblant as the two passions from whence they sprung; though certain it is, they sprung from one and the same cause: for if Aronces had not been in love with Clelia, he had never hated Horatius: Horatius on his side, had most tenderly loved Aronces, if Aronces had not loved Clelia; and Clelia had been good friends with Horatius, had she not been so sensible of Aronces his love. But, which was most admirable, the Prince of Numidia was less hated by his Rivals, than they were by one another, because they thought he had the least share in the affection of Clelia.

As for Tarquin, his heart was swelled with as much Cruelty and Revenge, as ambition could infuse, and with all that a slighted love and pale jealousie could prompt him unto: but in the midst of all, he retained the arrogance and grandeur of his courage; and it may be said, that in falling from a Throne, he yet kept footing upon it; for in the midst of all disasters, he still thought upon such remedies as might conduce to the cure of them; and he found it some sweetness, to have in his power the only beloved Lover of Clelia: He hoped also, that this would help him to remount the Throne; so as this unfortunate Prince, whose crimes might well make him fear his future condition would be worse than the present, did not for all that despair, but went to Tarquinia with such an undaunted resolution and boldness, as Aronces could not chuse but admire at. But whilst this proud Tyrant, and this illustrious Prisoner went to Tarquinia, Horatius with his men conducted Clelia and Plotina to Rome, as I told you before.

In their way thither, they espied a very handsome woman by the side of a little wood, who perceiving so many horsemen, desired to conceal her self, having none with her but an old shepherd for her guide, whose condition they knew by the Shepherds hook which he had in his hand. This object begetting a curiosity in Clelia, and her own misfortunes teaching her to pity the condition of others, she looked very attentively upon this woman, who desired to slink away out of sight, at the seeing such a number of men: but when she had well viewed this woman, and shewed her unto Plotina, they both thought her to be Cesonia. Clelia then crying out, and calling upon Horatius: Oh good sir, (said she to him,) I beseech you let yonder woman be carried with me to Rome; certainly she cannot discern me amongst so many. But to oblige you unto the satisfaction of my desire, know that she is one of the Prisoners of Ardea, her name is Cesonia; and my love unto her is such, as you would do a most high favour if you could bring her to me. Clelia had no sooner said so, but Horatius commanding some of his chief men to eye her, he set spurs to his horse, and being followed by four men of quality, who heard not what Clelia said, they went towards the place where this woman and this old shepheard were. The Wood not being very thick, they were quickly found out, for both being on foot, they were quickly overtaken: Horatius was no sooner come within hearing of this woman, but he said, I beseech you fair Cesonia, do not fly from Clelia who hath sent me to you, nor shun a man who knows your merit, though not you, and who is ambitious to serve you.

Upon these words, Cesonia turning about, she stopt, and knew her dear Persander, who was one of those which accompanied Horatius. As she was beyond expression joyed, so Persander on his side, who came out of Ardea only to hear what was become of her, he was so surprized at the sight of her in that place, as he had much ado to speak: for Horatius had so many things in his mind, as he never told it was Cesonia: and Plotina had not time enough to tell him; so hasty he was in following Horatius, so as Persander had much ado to recover himself out of his astonishment. Whilst Horatius was advancing towards Cesonia, and she not knowing whether or no she should believe a man whom she knew not, the old man who was her guide, turning about, and knowing Horatius, he stept nearer that valiant Roman, and looking fiercely upon him, shaked his sheephook at him: Oh villain (said he) is not Clelia this second time in thy power, and does not that suffice thee?

This language causing Horatius to look attentively upon him, that spoke thus angerly unto him, he knew him to be Clelius the Father of Clelia; He no sooner knew him, but he alighted from his horse, and advanced to him in a very humble manner: Oh generous Clelius, (said he unto him) I think my self most happy in that I am in a condition to repair my crime, and in being able to restore unto you that most excellent woman, whom I ravished from you in the heat of a most violent passion: For now know, that though I still have, and ever shall have the same affection unto your most admirable Daughter, yet I do not entertain all the same thoughts; the truth is, in lieu of carrying her away, my only thoughts are of carrying her to Rome; and my only aims are to get her out of Tarquin and Tullia's power, as you may understand from her own mouth, she being within two hundred paces of this place. Moreover, you cannot question the good intention of my heart; for I am in the head of two hundred horse, and consequently able to dispose of Clelia's liberty: but so far am I from any thoughts of carrying her away, as I do offer to put her in your power, and guard you both unto Rome, without asking any other recompence, but only to forget what's past, and not to deny me the seeing of her whom I adore.

Clelius hearing Horatius speak so submissively, and looking then upon him, as upon the Son of that woman whom once he dearly loved, his anger was a little appeased, so as Cesonia taking heart, and being much joyed to see her dear Husband, also to find that her guide was Father to her friend, though she could not well conceive, why he should be in that equipage wherein she found him; yet he spoke unto them all, and advised them to go presently unto Clelia, since she was so near. After this, Horatius used many generous and kind expressions; Persander, he took Cesonia behind him, and one of Horatius his men lent Clelius his horse: This done, they all went to the place where Clelia stayed in expectation of her dear Cesonia, whom she no sooner saw with Persander, but she galloped to meet them with Plotina; but all this while Clelia never thought to meet with more consolation than she could hope for; yet Horatius, desiring to make use of such a favorable occasion, he advanced towards her, and shewing Clelius unto her, The Gods having some pity upon me (said he unto her) and doubtless being desirous I should obtain some part in your esteem, though not in your affection, have given me the happy opportunity, Madam, of restoring unto you the generous Clelius.

Upon these words, Clelia looking upon him whom Horatius shewed unto her, she cryed out for joy, and would have cast her self upon the ground at her Fathers feet; but Clelius would not permit her, saying, That they could not make too much haste to Rome, since Tarquin was not in it; For my part (said Plotina with a pleasant air) I am perfectly of your opinion, for I am so full of fear, as you would do me the greatest pleasure in the world, if you would speedily carry me unto any place where I might be in safety; for though I cannot tell from whence Clelius came, nor why he is disguised in the habit of a shepherd, nor how Cesonia escaped; yet I had rather be going speedily thither, than stay a minute to know all these things: But yet (added this pleasant Lady) we may do two things at once, for we may be going and talk too as we go; for it is but singling out as should hear, from those which should not. The counsel of Plotina seeming good, after Clelius had expressed unto his Daughter his joys of finding her again, and that Clelia, Plotina, and Cesonia had caressed each other as much as they could in that place, Clelius placed himself betwixt the two first of them; as for Horatius, he got himself on the other hand of Clelia, and Persander on the other hand of Cesonia; the way being large, they might easily walk a front, and might unheard talk to each other, for all the rest kept at a handsome distance, so as disposing of themselves in this order, Clelia asked her Father from whence he came; for truly truly (said she) I never knew any thing of you since I was a Prisoner unto the Tyrant, unless that the Prince of Numidia told me that you were in a place which he could not name: for being very dangerously wounded in endeavouring to deliver me, he grew so much distracted, that Amilcar, whose name doubtless you know, and to whom I am infinitely obliged, could not understand where you were, though he imagin'd you could not be far from Rome. Truth is, reply'd Clelius, I being at the end of my exile, and not being able to endure that you should be the slave of him that was the Tyrant of my Country, and my mortal enemy, I resolved for Rome, where I understood by some intimate friends, there was a disposition to revolt. But do what I could, it was impossible to hinder Sulpitia from following me; so as we came from Cora together, mean while, fortune brought us to meet with the Prince of Numidia, by coming to Ameriola, who knowing us, treated us most generously; but that not being the place of finding you, let it suffice you to know that he is worthy of your esteem, and of my friendship; that it was I who sent him to Rome with Letters for a friend of mine, who was to facilitate the enterprise which failed; for not knowing then where Aronces was, and knowing that Horatius was in Ardea, I thought they took care for your liberty. Mean time, I understanding from Ameriola, that the Prince of Numidia's enterprise had failed; that the report was, Aronces was at Rome, and that there was great Tumult, I disguised my self as now you see me, to get into Rome, not then knowing the truth of things. So as having sent back my horses, I began to foot it; when I espied this fair one (said he unto Clelia, and pointed at Cesonia) who not knowing which way she went, came unto me, and asked where she was, and desired me to direct her either unto Rome or Ardea: The memory of your misfortunes making me compassionate of hers, I asked her by what adventure she came to be alone, and so out of her way; unto which she answering very handsomely, she acquainted me in few words with the flight of Tarquin, and all passages in Rome since his departure, I not yet telling her that I was your Father, because that could not advantage her, but might prejudice me, she is still ignorant of it.

All my care was of conducting her speedily unto Rome, when we espied the Cavalry which is your guard: For my part, said Cesonia unto Clelia, I have no great matters to relate unto you, for all I have to tell you, is, That he who conducted me, understanding from a friend of his, how angry Tullia was at your flight, and having no mind to see her again, though he was no cause of it, he resolved to quit the incensed Queen, and carrying me under a Tree, he left me there: I, not knowing what to do, and utterly disliking to be under the power of the most wicked woman in the whole world, I took a way opposite to that from whence I came, and walking I knew not whither, I came at last unto this little wood, where I was most glad to find the generous Clelius, whose age and Physiognomy invited me to ask his protection, and that he would conduct me either unto Rome or Ardea; for in that dismay I knew not well where I would be. After this, Clelius enquired of Clelia, concerning Aronces, who told him in short all she knew; but though he spoke very low unto her, yet Horatius heard, and knew by Clelia's countenance that she spoke with a feeling tenderness of his Rival, so as it damped him with unexpressable sadness: Yet hope did a little underprop his heart, and the state of things made him think, that happily some adventure might fall which might be advantageous unto him; for when he remembred the lamentable condition wherein he was, when his Rival found him wounded in a Wood, and how he was beholding unto him for his life, he thought himself much less miserable, than at that time, so as his mind was very free to entertain Clelius all the way with discourse of all that was memorable at the siege of Ardea, not omitting how Porsander had there signalized himself upon several occasions. But in conclusion, Clelius being the first of the Company that discovered Rome, he was possessed with a most extream joy at the sight of it, after so long an exile from it: he never thought how he was in a habit unfit to appear therein: Clelia indeed did put him in mind of it, but he made answer, That as long as he had a heart becoming a true Senator of Rome, he cared not for the habit: yet they met with an expedient for this; for as they came into Rome, stood a house which belonged unto one that was an ancient acquaintance or friend unto Clelius, where they stayed, and where he was furnished with a habit sutable to his quality: after which, they went unto the Gates of the Town; but a very strict Guard being kept, they were stopped until such time as Brutus, who then was sole Master of Rome, was informed who they were that asked entrance: he no sooner heard of them, but he sent Herminius to receive Clelius, Horatius, and Porsander, not knowing that Clelia was with them, giving order afterwards, to quarter the Cavalry which Horatius brought. So as when Herminius went to receive them, and conduct them unto Brutus, he was most pleasingly surprised to see Clelia, Cesonia, and Plotina; for he thought that Clelia was with the cruel Tullia, and could not imagine what was become of the other Captives: for he knew very well, That when Tullia forsook her Palace, Clelia was only mentioned unto Aronces, and where the rest were, was not known. Thus Herminius now wanting nothing but to see the return of Aronces, he received all these illustrious persons with abundance of joy, and did all manner of imaginable honours unto Clelius in particular; he beseeched him to take a lodging in the house of the virtuous Sivelia his Mother, who would take all possible care of Clelia, until Sulpitia came, and until his own house was made ready. The way in going to Brutus, being to pass by this house, Clelius presently espied the virtuous Sivelia, who was his ancient friend, and leaving Clelia, Cesonia, and Plotina with her, who received them with that generous civility whereof she ever made profession, Clelius, Horatius, Porsander, and some principal men of Ardea, were conducted unto Brutus by Herminius: This enterview passed tumultuously enough, for Lucretius, Valerius, Colatin, Mutius, and many others, were then with Brutus, advising upon several necessary affairs concerning the establishment of Romes liberty; Brutus yet did highly applaud the valor of Horatio at the siege of Ardea; and the sight of Clelius gave much satisfaction unto so many illustrious Romans, for he was known to be always a most irreconcileable enemy of Tyranny and the Tyrant; Brutus also, did him all imaginable honours: Clelius again returned a million of applauses. But as he styled him the Liberator of his Countrey: No, no, generous Clelius (said he unto him) never bestow any such glorious titles upon me: for a right Roman ought not to assume any above the rest of the Romans; let us therefore only render thanks unto the Gods for our deliverance from servitude in which we were, and to take away all likelihood of ever being under the power of one single person, I do declare that I will not be Consul alone, but will put into the hands of the Senate and People, all that Authority which they gave me, unless they will appoint one to be my Partner: For indeed (said he most generously) I dare not trust my own virtue in such a business. Brutus had no sooner done speaking, but all that heard him were opposite to his design; yet he standing firm to his principle, told them plainly, that he would propound it the next morning in the publick Assembly: however, he being ever a man most regular in all points of civility, he went towards the evening unto Sivelia, to see Clelia there, unto whom he seemed much troubled for Aronces, and told her in short, how he went out of Rome with a design of delivering her. Alas (said she with a sad sigh, and looked upon Plotina) certainly it was that unfortunate Prince which was in Combate with those Troops which we saw when Horatius brought us away. She had no sooner said so, but Artemidorus, Amilcar, Zenocrates, and Celeres, came to Sivelia's house, who confirm'd Clelia in her thought, and told all the Company that Aronces was Tarquins Prisoner; also how they all made a retreat after they had seen their illustrious but unfortunate friend taken. Yet they did not fear that he would be ill used, because as the case stood with Tarquin, it was no policy for him to shew any odium against the Son of such a great King, who only was able to relieve him in his misfortune; but still they conceived that he would not set him at liberty, so as all the company apprehended this adventure with abundance of sorrow. Brutus resented it as the friend of Aronces; and foreseeing the sad consequences as a true Roman; and especially out of compassion upon an unfortunate Lover, who is more sensible than any other of any thing that disturbs the love of his friends. As for Clelius, he having almost always loved Aronces as his own son, ever since he saved his life in his Cradle, and keeping him from perishing after his shipwrack, he was exceedingly troubled: Sivelia out of tenderness and generosity, did pity him: Herminius was ready to run desperate: Horatius, out of grandeur of soul, and to merit the esteem of Clelia, he commended him, and said, That a Prince so virtuous as he was, deserved a far better destiny, than to be the Prisoner of the most vitious man upon earth: Cesonia and Plotina could not keep their eyes from gushing out into tears: as for Artemidorus, Amilcar, Zenocrates, and Celeres, they pitied Aronces, pitied Clelia, pitied Brutus, pitied Herminius, they pitied Rome, they pitied themselves: As for Clelia, she was sensible more than thought can reach unto; yet she durst not shew all her sorrow, though the example of her friends might well have authorized hers; nor would she too much smother her sadness, lest she should infuse some false hopes into Horatius: but she having such an even and just temper in her affliction, that she could not be accused, either of excessive grief, or of too much carelessness. That which made her the more mistress of her spirit, was, because she believ'd the life of Aronces was in no danger; for she knew not that he was wounded, but she conceived the cruel consequences of his imprisonment; the least of which was, that she should be separated from Aronces for a long time, and be exposed unto the passion of Horatius, who having made his peace with Clelius, would become more confident; so as this sage Lady, in restraining the violence of her sorrow, did deserve much commendations. Mean while, as one subject of compassion doth easily renew the remembrance of another, so Clelius asked Brutus concerning the Prince of Numidia, and understood that in visiting the Palace of Tarquin after Tullia was gone, they found him upon his bed, who never cared for the disorder and noise which he heard, looked calmly upon those that run from Chamber to Chamber with naked swords, not knowing whether there were any men so desperate as to defend him. Clelius understood further, how since the care which was taken of that Prince, had something restored him unto the freedom of his spirit, Alas, alas, (added Brutus, and sighed) I cannot tell whether or no it be a good office to restore a miserable man unto his wits, since certainly it makes all men in the world the more miserable. Brutus expressed this in such a sad manner, as made all those pity him who knew the distemper of his soul, and were not ignorant that the death of Lucretia did more grieve him, than the liberty of Rome rejoyced him; for notwithstanding all his zeal to his Country, could he but revive Lucretia, he would do it with abundance of joy, though at the rate of erecting that Throne which he had pulled down. Doubtless he would have dyed a hundred deaths, rather than live in the servitude wherein he did: but he would have lived a slave all the days of his life, rather than never to see Lucretia but in her Tomb. This sad adventure had so much changed him, that he was scarcely knowable; such of his friends as were not admitted unto the secrets of his soul, did believe that this alteration proceeded from the weight of his cares which hung heavy upon him; but those of his Cabinet counsel, who knew the grandeur of his soul, they thought it to be love only which loadned him; his conversation was only upon such things as were necessary for the publick good, unless he spoke of his sorrows and passion unto such as knew of them. He was not only always more serious, but also more haughty; and he could not flatter any but the people of whom he stood in need to revenge Lucretia, and to maintain the liberty of Rome: So as after so much good language as he thought fit to comfort Clelia, he retired himself to think upon other matters, but especially to give that great example of moderation, of which he had made such profession unto his Friends: Mean while, Clelius went to see the Grand Vestal his Sister, and received visits from all his Friends: Clelia was visited by all the the Ladies of quality in Rome; amongst the rest, by Lucilia, by Hermilia, by Celerina, by a Lady of quality called Flavia, and another named Edvina. Hermilia, and the sister of Collatine, being compounded of such a secret Melancholy, as would not suffer them to rejoyce in the Liberty of their Country, so much as others; they kept always together. Valeria also went to visit Clelia, who gave such a reception unto all these Ladies, with so much obliging Civility, though with a little tincture of melancholy, as she won their Loves, the very first day.

Mean while, Brutus according to his design, harangued the Senate and people, as he said he would; And with so much Eloquence, and Authority, as it may well be said, that their suffrages were not free, because he left none at liberty to be of any opinion contrary to his: He did so expresly aggravate the danger of making but one Consul, as the Image of Tyranny working upon the minds of those to whom he spoke, they all obeyed at will, and consented that the Soveraign power which he had, should be divided. But when it came to the vote, who should be his Copartner; the affair was greater than was imagined: For, as all new establishments meet with many difficulties; so such a murmur did arise, as made it evident, there would be Contrariety of opinions in this Choice: The multitude did not aim at chusing one that was the most able, the most wise, and the most valiant, but only such a one as was the most irreconcileable enemy of Tarquin. For, had they aimed at the most able, they would have looked upon Valerius, whose Prudence was admirable, whose honesty was known to all the world, and who had generously seconded Brutus in delivering Rome: They would then have thought upon Clelius, whose experience was great, and virtue high: They would have chosen Lucretius, they would have thought upon the wise Herminius, though he was thought too young to be Consul, though his high birth and heart rendred him worthy of any thing: They might have pitcht upon many other illustrious Romans. But, as I said before, thinking only upon such a one, whom they thought most obliged to hate Tarquin; they all concurred in their Votes, and no name could be heard but Collatines, whom the multitude thought more engaged to ruin Tarquin than any other, by reason of Lucretia's death, and wrongs received from him: such popular deliberations are commonly tumultuous, inconsiderate, and derogatory to right reason, so as they never considered that Collatine himself was of the Race of Tarquins. Brutus, who heartily wished Valerius to be chosen, and hoped he would; he was much surprised to see Collatine the man: for he could not endure him, but hated him as much, as if he were his Rival; also he looked upon him as a party cause of Lucretia's death, by infusing Love into the heart of Sextus, when he inconsiderately carried him to see that fair and unfortunate Lady: He looked upon him as a person whom she ever hated, though out of Nuptial conscience, lived well with him: and he looked upon him as a man, who bore the name of Tyrant; but to speak ingenuously, he did not look upon him through all these Considerations, but because he ever looked upon him as his Rival, so as it grieved his Soul to have him for his partner in Authority: Yet since it concerned the safety of Rome, that no division should appear betwixt them, in that new establishment; and since also it concerned the glory of Lucretia, that he should give no ground of guessing why he hated Collatine; therefore he constrained himself in this Rencontre: he thought again, that if he should oppose what the multitude propounded, it would breed a great Combustion; For, now there was not one single Roman, who hoped not for some little share of the Royal Authority: So as Brutus, whose piercing eye saw things as they were, and foresaw the consequences of this affair; he dissembled his thoughts, and told Valerius in secret, how angry he was that he was not Consul. But in conclusion, the mind of the multitude must be satisfied, and Brutus seemed not to take it ill; complying therefore with the Times, he himself was the first that saluted Collatine as Consul, unto whom from that time, the people began to render all honours which that dignity required: Brutus offered him the first place, but he would not accept it, nor indeed the people consent unto it: so as it was resolved, that there should be but one Consul before whom the twelve Lictors should walk, and before whom the Hatchet and bundle of Rods should be carried, lest it should incense the people, who do not love those emblems of Authority should be doubled, which may punish them when they deserve: Not that the Authority of the prime Consul was greater than the other's; for Brutus would not permit it, for fear of such consequences as might ensue: But as for these bare emblems of honour, they belonged unto Brutus only.

Howsoever, after that Collatine was chosen, Brutus would have his Colleague confirm all those who the day before were tumultuously made Senators, Censors, Pretors, Ædiles, Questors, or Tribunes: after which, Brutus caused a publick Oration to be made, never to suffer any to raign in Rome, nor that any should ever be brought to consent unto it, either by menaces or promises. They did establish as a Law, that the Consulship should last but one year; that for the future, none should be Consuls under forty three years of age; none Pretors under forty, none Ædiles under thirty seven, none Tribune under thirty, and no Questor under twenty seven. Brutus would also have it, That the Consuls should be of the most illustrious Races; and that the three hundred Senators should be Noble-men.

After which, the Senate being regularly assembled, they voted to regulate the Power and authority of those who had the conduct of things sacred; for it being the custom, that the Kings should offer some sacrifices in person, to shew that they had an absolute authority in these Dominions, and that they had no dependency of any but the Gods, Brutus would not have the Consuls do as the Kings used to do: But he made a Royal Sacrificer for that Ceremony only, and that they should submit unto him that was the chief in matters of Religion. After which, the means of making war against Tarquin, was taken into consideration: They provided for the Guard of the Town; they consulted how to keep their Neighbours from joyning with the Tyrant; they swore a solemn league betwixt Ardea and Rome; they resolved to keep the Cavalry which Horatius had brought, and to send Deputies unto Ardea, to thank that Town for the resistance which they made against the Tyrant. And Brutus omitted nothing that might conduce to the publick good, to the ruine of Tarquin, and to the revenge of Lucretia, after which every one returned to his house. Mean time, Clelius with Amilcar, went to see the Prince of Numidia, who knew him at first, and asked for Clelia. This Prince being much joyed to hear that Clelia was escaped, he beseeched Clelius to give him no occasion of hatred, protesting unto him, that he should die with some contentment, if he could be but assured of his indifferency. Clelius, who was generous, and saw him in that pitiful condition, by endeavouring to deliver his daughter; he assured him, that she should be full of acknowledgment to him, provided he would be reasonable. Ah generous Clelius (cryed he out) I will be any thing that will keep me from being hated by Clelia, and from being unjust unto Aronces; but yet I would adore your divine daughter for ever. Yet sir, my demand that she would not hate me, is because I would die more contentedly, for I know that I cannot live long. Oh Sir, (replyed Amilcar, after his usual way of freedom) If you do not dye of your wounds, as I hope you will not, and wish you may not, you will die either of love or grief: time will undoubtedly cure those two kinds of maladies; Death will not triumph over Lovers, and unfortunate persons, without the help of a Feaver, or some disastrous accident: But to advance your cure (added he) I will answer, for the esteem of your Mistress, and for your Rival; I will also answer for their friendship, if you could but surmount your love. Oh Amilcar (cryed he out) were my heart like unto yours, I should quickly surmount it, but to my misery we do not resemble. Afterwards, this Prince, who was naturally of a violent temper, began to fret and grieve inwardly, so as Clelius seeing him in a condition not to be long conversed withal, he left him, and went to take order for the repair of his house, which Brutus caused to be restored unto him, to the end he might receive Sulpitia, who was to arrive the next day. As for Amilcar, unto whom Clelius was much obliged, he went unto Sivelia's to see Clelia; for having had no discourse in particular with her, he accounted it as if he had not yet seen her; yet he could not have any private discourse with her at that time, because Plotina, Valeria and Herminius were there: But being all persons of strong reason, discourse was almost as free, as if they had all been intimate and particular friends: Herminius having spoken much of Clelia unto Valeria, she did not so much constrain her self, but both discoursed of their sorrows as freely as if they had been ancient friends: After a while of discourse, Valeria might easily be found a person of no common rank: her Physiognomy was so full of spirit, she spoke so well, and to the purpose; her tone was so charming, and her discourse so genuine and free, that of all those illustrious Romans which came to see Clelia, there was none pleased her more than Valeria; so as having a strong inclination to love her, she received all the civilities which the charming mistress of Herminius did her, with extraordinary kindness.

I beseech you (said Clelia, in answer to some applauds which Valeria gave her) do not judge of me by what you see now, but trust unto what Herminius and Amilcar shall tell you of me, for they are my ancient friends and know me. I am not to day in my right humor, and my face is so much altered, that did I care for it I should grieve extreamly, not but that I have a thousand subjects of joy: For I see my Father again, I see him in Rome, I see the power of Tarquin demolished, and I see my Country delivered: But for all that, the clouds of displeasure will not dissipate, and the miserable condition of the most virtuous Prince upon earth, makes me that I cannot gust any joys without ingratitude: You see with what freedom I talk unto you, and you easily perceive that I reckon our acquaintance from the first day I was acquainted with Herminius. You honour me abundantly, (replyed Valeria and blusht) but believe it, Madam, I will not dye ungrateful, but in my humour do requite you in a most extraordinary manner: For to discover my heart unto you, I confess that I have ever believed, a person of any solidity ought not to contract amity so lightly, as to close with them at the first sight, for appearances are very fallacious: there are many who do please the first hour, yet when they are better known, will displease for ever after: And I assure you, that since the fair and unfortunate Lucretia betook her self to a course of solitude, I never entertained any friend whom I could name particular; not but that Hermilia, whom every one knows to be the sister of illustrious Brutus, is a person whom I love and esteem; and that another named Flavia, has a great share in my heart. But Madam, it is not after such a manner as I loved that most excellent Lady, whose death would certainly have caused mine, if her solitude had not accustomed me to living without seeing her: yet Madam, I must tell you, that I do find such inclination in my heart toward you, as I never found for any, but for virtuous Lucretia. Madam, reply'd Clelia, I am infinitely obliged to you, for ranking me with her who cannot be parallel'd by any without injustice; but to retaliate confidence for confidence, I must acquaint you that I do more for you, than you for me; For I must confess unto you, that except Plotina and Cesonia, unto whom averse fortune has devoted me; I have no friends whom I love so well, as to trust them with any of my secrecies: True indeed, friends I have; Herminius and Amilcar are so, and will be as long as I live; but as for feminine friends, I have found so few a number of such as are capable of solid friendship, as I content my self only with their society. But towards you, added Clelia, I do find a strong disposition to love you, and it shall stick of you, if I be not at this very day perfectly your friend. Whilst these two fair ones were talking thus, Cesonia, Plotina, Amilcar and Herminius, were talking of the late Revolutions: But Amilcar not affecting over-serious discourse, and hearing Clelia name him, he interrupted those two illustrious Romans, and asked them, what they talked of; We talk of a business so important (replied Valeria) as will mar all my felicity, and of a thing which neither Clelia nor I ever did before: for, though we have not known one another yet half a day; yet we intend to begin a league of friendship which must last as long as we live. Both of you, replied Herminius, are able to move love eternally, and the more you know, the more you'l esteem and love each other. For my particular, said Plotina, I see nothing extraordinary that you have done: what wonder is it, that two so fair as you, both flowing in wit, and knowing each other long by reports of friends whom you dare trust, should contract friendship so soon? For, this I am sure of, that if you contract amitie with one whom afterwards you find not answerable to your fancy, it is an easie matter to break off: Though perhaps I am one (said Amilcar) who makes and breaks these kind of affections which they call friendships, though they deserve not that title; yet I am clearly of Valeria's opinion, and maintain that it is very frivolous to make these imaginary friendships so much talked of in the World.

For my part, said Herminius, I must confess, that I do not well understand what friendships you mean. I have heard of a great Friendship, and under friendship, and a solid, ardent, and inviolable friendship: but as for an imaginary friendship, it is new to me; and I believe it is forged in your imagination: I cannot tell, replied he, whether or no I did forge it in my fancy; but I think that I did not erre in calling it so; But, I believe (added he and smiled) you are not well acquainted with all kinds of friendships, because you do not apply your self to know that by which Clelia taught you all secrets at Capua, by giving you that ingenious paper, which hath made such a noise in the world: Also, I believe you are ignorant, how there are friendships by occasion, friendships by fashion, friendships by humour, friendships by judgment, friendships by wit, friendships by Interest, friendships of Complement, friendships of Love, and of many other kinds, not reckoning that friendship of imagination so unknown to you, and which so many use: For my particular, (replied Cesonia) you would do me a favour, if you would tell me how it ariseth in the hearts of those that have it; It ariseth (replied he) between persons whose spirits are near alike, as Plotina and I should, if we had no judgment. Five or six foolish Proverbs uttered with a good grace, and taken into an imagination, is sufficient to beget one of these whimsy friendships; all the pleasure thereof, that can be hoped for, is the age of an afternoon: I speak this by experience, for I remember how I got my self eight or ten friends in a quarter of an hour, by making a handsom description of a woman that had a mind to be very fine, and yet knew not how to dress her self; but indeed, they were all nothing beholding to me if they had considered it. For, I vented this Raillerie before two of their near kindred: Truth is, it was rather an error of memory than discretion; but I am sure, if I had not been in a very merry mood that day, or had spoke nothing but good sense and judgment, these eight or ten fond women had never been my friends. Thus Fancy and Imagination is a thing that begets these fading friendships, which are like mushroms, grow up in an instant, and die as soon. You have paraphras'd so learnedly upon this kind of friendship (said Herminius) as I believe it would be very acceptable to all the Company, if you would explain all those kinds which you have named. For my part, (said Plotina) I profess he shall lose mine, of what nature soever it be, if he do describe them all, one after another. I beseech you all (said Amilcar, then seeing Clelia and Plotina about to make the same request) command me nothing, for I would have the fair Plotina know, that her menace does affright me, and forces me to satisfie her Fancy.

Begin then presently, replied she; yet (added she) I will dispense with you, for omitting those friendships by occasion; for I have made many of that kind in my life. Some friends only at the Temple; others, friends only of my friends, and others at Balls. For, there we agreed very well to laugh and jeer at those that danced ill: there we took out one another to dance, and talked very obligingly together; and yet we never saw one another, unless at some Feast, or by accident: But, I hapned to be so well informed of any thing that related to them, that I knew them as well as themselves: but I have said enough of this kind, and I had better let Amilcar speak concerning friendship in fashion. As to that (said Herminius) I can speak as well as Amilcar: For, in my travels, I knew a woman, who indeed had many excellent qualities; who yet cloister'd up her self as it were, and would not permit the world to croud her with Courtships, but would be known only unto those whom she esteemed; but upon a suddain, having taken a fancy to three or four persons of the highest rank where she lived, and to come and see her, and extoll her; presently it became the mode to love her, to talk of her in all places, to applaud her, and write unto her. Some would say, they knew her, though they never saw her in their lives; because they thought it a disgrace to say, they never saw her: so as she might well say, that their friendship unto her, was a friendship of fashion. I beseech you (said Amilcar then) give me leave to tell you, what friendship of humor is: I know a man (said Cesonia) who does love so fantastically, as I believe, I may well interrupt you from speaking: He is a man of wit, and understanding enough, and yet one, who never loves any but Fools and ignorant persons: Because, as I think, he had rather be admired by brutes, and adored by dolts, than to have friends as able as himself: Yet some days, the same whimsy which makes him love these kind of men, makes him abhor them, and ingenuously confess, that he knows not why he loved them. You may be sure (said Amilcar) that I dare not add any thing unto what the fair Cesonia hath said: but I hope, I may speak of the friendships by judgment: I beseech you, (said Clelia then) be not too hasty, but give me leave to speak of that friendship, of which only, I am able to discourse with delight and experience, if I may without vanity say it. For, I call it Friendship by Judgment, when one takes time to know the person whom one would love: when one is chosen that is virtuous, good, and wise: when one enquires who are his friends, when one observes of what temper and humor he is, and when one is assured that Love will be reciprocal: for without all these qualifications, it is not any Friendship of Judgment: when I see a woman that pleaseth me; when I hear her name many persons as her particular friends; that afterwards she has received many kind offices from them; if after all this I hear her rail and backbite them, would it be an argument ment of judgment to love such a person, how amiable soever she may be otherwise? But, if on the contrary, I find a woman of an ingenious spirit, who zealously defends her absent, or unfortunate, or dead friends: It were an argument of a sound judgment, to Court the affection of such a generous person. Now, (said Amilcar) I hope for a room to speak, since the discourse is to be, friendship that comes by wit and ingenuity: For, having a good wit my self, it belongs to me to talk of that which I have so often caused. Not, but that Herminius (added he, and smiled) has as good a wit as I, and better: but that he thinks it a kind of crime to shew it: Therefore, since I am a wit by open profession, I know better than any how little we are obliged unto those, who care not for seeing us, but only to hear some pieces of wit flash from us, or to tell us some impertinences themselves. These are a sort of men, who are ready to break their buttons with laughing, or are ravished with admiration as often as they see you: they have always about them some Copies of Letters, or verses à la mode, new songs, biting Satyrs against their best friends, and many other conceits which often themselves understand not a line of: They will shew you wit in one hand, and folly in another. They will ordinarily mistake wit for nonsense, and repeat some good lines, as things of no conceit: And again, will out with some pitiful stuffe in such a passionate tone, as if they were repeating some sapphick Verses. I remember a woman, who to shew the bravery of her wit, had always in her Pocket or memory, all the good and the bad Verses that were made in the Neighbour-hood where she lived: she told me one day, she would shew me some lines which were much cryed up for good, but for her part, she found no great matter in them. But (said she) I have some others that are most admirable: But I not trusting much to the judgment of this Lady, had a mind to see those Verses which she discommended, rather than those she reported to be so rare: so as after a few entreaties, she was perswaded to repeat both: But truly those which she said she was ashamed to remember, were a most admirable composure, the measure and numbers were so natural and genuine, as spoke both passion and wit, and such as touched the heart, and moved to tenderness, more than to please and divert. When she had done these good lines, you see, said she, that these are not worth so much pains as to remember, but there are others of an excellent strain, the expressions are admirable, and the conceit delicate.

Oh Madam (said I) you are a most incomparable wit, I beseech you make good your promise: I will, answered she, upon condition that in recompence you will shew me some Verses of your own. Then she began to spit out a number of big sustian words which made a mighty sound, but signified nothing. A Gallimafry of Gibbrish, which wrought highly upon the fancy of this Lady that repeated them. Well (said she, with an Air suitable to her capacity) are not these strong lines? Do you think I do not know what is wit? Come, Let me hear some of your lines. Ah, Madam, (answered I) mine will sound very ill after such as you have repeated; but being much pressed by her importunity, I made two or three Verses of a Song upon a sudden, stuft with nothing but [illegible] sense in it, which passed her approbation better than if they had been witty; but in conclusion, I waited upon her to her house, with a resolution never to come at it again: But the truth is, this humour of hers is rife every where; but my greatest wonder is, that people should be so inquisitive and desirous of things which they understand not, nor are pleased with, but only to shew unto others of as mean capacities as themselves; yet they will often venture at Verse themselves, and vent lame cripled Copies which have neither reason nor rime in them; a whole sheet sometimes of nonsense, one Verse a foot too short, another two feet too long, and all but so much labour and Paper spent: This kind of people will out of a fond vanity, be contracting friendship with wits, and hang upon them as their dear friends, and lovers: yet the world is full of such simplicians, and many women will be extreamly ambitious in obliging a good wit to come and see them, as if they had some real business of high concernment with them; and if he do come, but prove not of an humour to flatter the Lady, she will study revenge, she will scandal him, she will hate all he loves. I could say much more upon this subject, but there are other friendships which must be discoursed upon. As I remember (said Plotina,) there was a friendship of interest mentioned: As for that (said Amilcar) all the world knows it; for there is an interest (of pleasure at the least) in all the friendships that are. For eight days together, I visited one of my friends every day, but did not receive the least sign of any friendship: the ninth day understanding accidentally, That a man who had power to do me much harm, did love me very well: Then her cheek was smiles, and nothing but love and favour flowed from her; she endeavoured all she could to captivate my heart if possible: so as what all my wit and endeavour was not able to do, this interest did it in a moment; for ever since I found her so sweet, so kind and affable, as I believe, if I had put her to the tryal, I should have found her but too kind.

Thus matter of interest, can make friends, I beseech you, (said Plotina) give me leave to speak of walking friendship; for I know many women in the world, who are good for nothing but to walk with their friends in Gardens, and gadding abroad only to shew their dress, or their fine Coach: their discourse is only of Clothes, Weddings, and Burials; and talk of any thing else they are most impertinently tedious. I know one whom I have never seen all winter long, but as soon as summer appeared, she would come and carry me to walk; and but for that, she would never have seen me; but I will speak no more of them, because I would hear Amilcar discourse upon friendship of Love: As to that (replied Herminius) there is not any well accomplished man in the world, but is able to speak something of it. And I suppose Amilcar intends to speak of those who having a passion in their souls, do endeavour to make friendship with all those women of their Mistresses acquaintance, whether they like them or no. You have hit so right upon my meaning, said Amilcar, that I desire to stand silent, and you to speak. Amilcar, replyed Herminius, the company will be losers by that; and besides, you are more [illegible]

...in such kinds of friendships than I am. Indeed (said Amilcar) should I reckon up all the simple friendships which Love has mov'd me to make, you would then say, I were a man of large experience in such matters: for should I number up the million of Mothers, Aunts, Cousins, Friends, Neighbours, Fathers, Brothers, Sisters, and such like, to whom I have been complaisant, only because I was in love, I should never come to an end: Truth is, the knowledge I have gotten by these kind of friendships, has been much merry diversion unto me; for I have by them made many an odd discovery: whensoever I saw a man of ingenuity give a visit unto any simple woman, I presently enquired whether she had not some fine kinswoman, some fair Neighbour, or some gallant friend: And when I saw any witty woman frequent the society of my fooliſh fellow, I never questioned but he courted him for some other kind of conversation, so as in a short time I grew so cunning, as I knew all secrets without ever being told them: for I concluded this as a necessary consequence, that when any woman seems to love such a one whom it is impossible she should ever love, either for justice, or for any profitable interest; this feigned Love serves her only as an umbrage, under which she may see one whom she really loves, though she do not shew it. Appearances are so deceitful, (replyed Clelia) as it is often very unjust to make conclusions by circumstances so doubtful: for who, that sees the apparent stupidity of Publius Brutus, would think him a man of the highest soul, and that he should be Romes Deliverer? It is most certain (said Herminius) that it is very dangerous to judge of things by outwards, be they never so seeming: As for example (said he, and whispered with Amilcar) who would ever imagine that Brutus, who is all glory, and who has done the highest action that ever was, should not esteem himself very happy? and yet I am perswaded he is more miserable than ever he was. After this, two Ladies came unto Clelia's house, and Valeria going away, Herminius went also within a quarter of an hour after, and went unto Brutus whom he found alone, and in melancholy as he thought to find him. Although Herminius knew Brutus had good cause for his sadness, yet he resolved to divert him from it as much as he could, and to oppose the love of his Country against the effects of that love which still he retained to the unfortunate Lucretia. For Sir, said he unto him, your sorrows are no other than such as a thousand Lovers have as well as you: but then, Sir, you have such a consolation, as no other Lover ever had besides your self, since never another Lover found the liberty of his Country by the death of his Mistress. Oh Herminius, (cryed he) That which you propound as consolation, makes me infinitely more sad: for is it not the height of cruelty, that the same which hath saved Rome, and which I have so much wished, should make me eternally miserable? Yes, yes, Herminius, added he, should I live a thousand ages, I should take delight in nothing but revenge, and should daily renew my grief for the death of incomparable Lucretia. But, Sir, answered Herminius, you know, that revenge is counted the highest of all delights, and therefore having carried out your revenge upon Tarquin, in the most noble way that ever was, you have great reason and just cause to comfort your self. Revenge is sweet, I confess, replyed Brutus, but it gives me no calm delight, nor ever will. Common injuries indeed, which may be repayed by revenge, may find a satisfaction and quietness of mind to the wronged party: But alas, mine is none of those, for all my revenge can never restore me Lucretia. I have driven Tarquin out of Rome; I forced proud Tullia to fly away: Infamous Sextus dares not shew his head, the virtue of his Brothers cannot secure him from the fury of the people: All Romans do enjoy their liberty, and reverence me as receiving it from my hand; but for all that, Lucretia is dead, and I am more grieved at her being in her Tomb, than I am joyed at the Tyrants being out of his Throne: And as an addition to my misery, Collatine shares in the soveraign Authority with me: yes, my dear Herminius, he is so insupportable to me, that without extream violence upon my self, I cannot endure him: for first, he is of Tarquines name, which is a horror to me; He was my Rival, he married Lucretia, his shallow merits made her miserable; he, and his indiscretion, was the cause of that horrid accident which happened, and consequently the cause of her death. I hate him, because he does not lament her death enough; for the Consulship which the silly people has conferred upon him, has almost made him forget the loss of that rare woman. You are so ingenious to torment your self, replyed Herminius, that the more one strives to comfort you, the more one afflicts you, and therefore 'tis better never to talk of your grief, but of your revenge. No, no, replyed Brutus, all's in vain; for where so ere I am, what so ere I say, or do, I have still Lucretia in my mind, and to my great torment do always see her striking a Poniard into her breast, and look upon me as if she bad me revenge her death. No, Herminius, her Ghost never leaves me, nor never will; and therefore, never fear renewing my griefs, since I my self renew it every minute; she is infinitely dear and precious unto me, and I were a most perfidious villain, if I could be any wayes comforted.

After this, Herminius, to turn the discourse handsomely, began to speak of Aronces and his misfortunes, and the advantage which Tarquin might have by keeping that Prince in his custody: For, said he, he will thereby oblige Porsenna to arm in his behalf: Common policy also invites that King to assist Tarquin; and when that league is made, honour will not suffer Aronces to be against his Father; so as if that happen, as most probably it will, I shall look upon him as one of the most miserable Princes upon earth: For he will be constrained to fight for his Rivals, in fighting for Tarquin and Sextus: He will be forced to take the unjust side, he will strike at his dearest friends, and which is hardest of all, against the Father of his Mistress. 'Tis true replyed Brutus, but this will be his consolation, that he will be against Horatius, and the Prince of Numidia. However it be, said Herminius, that great Prince will be exposed to abundance of misery; and therefore for the interest of Rome, for the interest of Clelia, for the interest of Aronces, for the revenge of Lucretia; it is good to hinder Porsenna from arming on Tarquins ſide, ſince there is none but he whom we need to fear. Indeed (ſaid Brutus) all the neighbouring Eſtates have not power enough to protect him: nor is it ſo eaſie a matter to perſwade little Republicks to aſſiſt a King tumbled down from his Throne, as it is to inſpire that deſign into a great and Potent King, who by the conſequence of the thing, has indirectly intereſt in the re-eſtabliſhment of Tarquin. Not that he can ever have any Right to Protect a Tyrant; but, you know, Policy does change the names of things according to the ſeveral intereſts of thoſe that act in them: ſo, it may be, that Tarquin who is diſclaimed at Rome as a Tyrant, will be looked upon at Cluſium, as a legitimate and unfortunate King, driven out of his Kingdom by his Rebellious ſubjects. So as to prevent that, I conceive it expedient to negotiate with Porſenna; but the difficulty will be to know, how: Sir, replyed Herminius, I conceive it good to conſult with the Prince Artemidorus and Zenocrates about it: you know that the Princeſs of the Leontines, is ſiſter unto the firſt of them; that ſhe is with the Queen Galerita, the Mother of Aronces; and that ſhe has a great reputation and intereſt in that Court, ſo as it were a good expedient, if you could oblige Artemidorus and Zenocrates to go unknown unto Cluſium, and acquaint that Princeſs with the true intereſt and condition of Aronces, to the end ſhe may do him ſuch ſervice as he deſires. But, replyed Brutus, Aronces is in the hands of Tarquin, who certainly will never part with him, unleſs Porſenna promiſe to aſſiſt him. But, replied Herminius, if Porſenna will not aſſiſt him, he will be ſo far from being able to keep Aronces, that he will not know how to keep himſelf. There is ſome reaſon in what you ſay, anſwered Brutus, but you never conſider that Porſenna, who would not have Aronces to marry Clelia, will not treat with Rome, now Clelius is returned, but upon condition, that match ſhall never be; yet you know that Aronces will not conſent unto that treaty. I know it very well (replied Herminius) but I know withal that however it be, it is very requiſite to have one in the King of Cluſium's Court, though only to know how things paſs there. I grant it (anſwerd Brutus) and accordingly Herminius took upon him to propound the buſineſs unto Artemidorus and Zenocrates.

Mean time, Sulpitia arrived the next morning, who was ſo highly joyed to ſee Clelia there, that it pleaſed her more than to ſee her ſelf in Rome and Tarquin out on't; or to ſee Sivelia, Racilia, Hermilia, Collatina, Valeria, Ceſonia, Plotina, Flavia, Salonina, and all the reſt of the illuſtrious Romans, who came in Troops to viſit her. On the other ſide, Clelia, whom Sivelia then reſtored unto Sulpitia, had a double joy in being again ſo near her virtuous Mother. For, beſides her affectionate tenderneſs towards her, ſhe looked upon her as one who loved Aronces, and did not love Horatius. She had alſo the ſatisfaction to ſee, that though Clelius had enjoyned her to forget what was paſt, and to receive that illuſtrious Roman very well; yet ſhe gave him but a very faint entertainment: but ſhe enquired very affectionately of the Numidian Prince, and of Aronces as a man whom ſhe moſt eſteemed. Clelia received alſo that day a moſt ſenſible joy; For, Aronces having ſuborned his Guard, procured one to go unto Rome with one letter unto Herminius, and another unto Clelia.

The meſſenger addreſſing himſelf unto Herminius, according to his directions, he preſented the two Letters unto him: And Herminius after he had read his own, went immediately to carry back unto Clelia, who, without making any ſecret of the matter, ſhewed them unto Sulpitia: The letter unto Herminius was thus writ.

Aronces unto Herminius.

FOr Gods ſake, dear Herminius, pity my misfortune, and bid all our illuſtrious friends pity me alſo. But above all, oblige my Divine Clelia not to change her thoughts of a miſerable man, who, whether in fetters or on a Throne, will ſtill be the ſame to her; For, as it is not in the power of virtue it ſelf to make us happy, unleſs fortune conſent, ſo it is not in the power of Fortune to make me forſake Virtue, in forſaking Clelia. Negotiate therefore for me, as I would ſo you, if you were in my ſtead; And ſpeak unto that moſt admirable perſon whom I adore, as you would have me ſpeak unto Valeria, if your misfortune were equal unto mine. Tell Brutus that Tarquin hopes to be able for a war, and that I will do all I can to hinder the King my Father from embracing his intereſts.

After Clelia had read this letter, ſhe opened her own, and found theſe words.

The unfortunate Aronces to the moſt Divine Clelia.

THough, Madam, my Rival had the advantage of carrying you back unto Rome; yet I am Tarquins Priſoner for endeavouring to ſet you at liberty: when you conſider of the good turn which Horace has done you, conſider alſo that the unfortunate Aronces would gladly die to do you ſervice: But above all, never forget your promiſe, unleſs you would have me die deſperate.

The reading of this Letter did exceedingly move Sulpitia, and her admirable daughter; who concluded with Herminius, that Clelius ſhould ſee it. Mean time, they informed themſelves from the meſſenger of Aronces and his wounds, who told them, that in all likelihood, they were not dangerous: They alſo underſtood by him, that Aronces was guarded very ſtrictly: They learned further, that the enterview of Tarquin and Tullia was with much bitterneſs, and yet their bad fortunes had united them: He told them alſo that they had ſent unto Ceres, which was cleer by them, to engage that Prince unto their ſide: found that the report went, Tarquin intended to go unto Veies that great and potent City, whose neighbourhood might much incumber Rome, if it should declare for him. After they had satisfied their curiosities, as far as the messenger was able to inform them; Herminius carried him unto Brutus, that he also might know the state of things; and, to the end, he should not repent quitting the Tyrant, he gave him a round sum of money, and promised imployment, if any wars were.

After which, Artemidorus, Zenocrates, Amilcar, and Celeres coming in, Herminius, who according to his resolution, had spoken unto the two first, told Brutus, that they both of them offered to go unto Clusium, with a design not to be known unto any, but the Princess of the Leontines. So, as it was resolved, that they should depart within few dayes. As for Celeres, his affection unto Aronces, moved him unto a design of going unto Tarquinia, to hear news, and also the more easily to receive such orders as he would give, either for the Court of the King his Father, or for Clelia.

As for Amilcar, he resolved to see out the destinies of Rome, since it might be advantagious unto his Master, to Aronces, to Clelia, to Brutus, and to Herminius: and since it was pleasing unto Plotius, unto whom he was as officious as unto any whom he called Mistress. Mean time, Hermilia and Celatina, who suffered both under the same kind of affliction, they grew to love each other most tenderly through this equality of misfortune: for, if one grieved for the absence of the Prince of Pontia, the other did the like for the absence of Tiridates. So as often mixing their Tears and Complaints together; they therefore confined themselves to their Chambers, it not being permitted at that time, to appear sad in Rome: For indeed, if any was seen without joy and mirth in his eyes, he was presently censured for one of Tarquins friends; And according to the natural injustice and insolence of a people newly set at liberty, they would have a Law which should inflict most terrible tortures upon such as looked melancholy at such a time when Rome was enfranchiz'd: So as now, it was not permitted any to grieve for the death of any kindred or friend, unless they would run the danger of being taken for some of Tarquins Creatures, and be thrown down headlong from the Tarpeian Rock. Brutus did as much as he could to restrain the fury of the people: But, lest they should cool in their hatred of the Tyrant, out of policie he suffered their murmur. As for Celatina, though he had more cause to hate Sextus, than any other; yet in his heart, he did not wish the establishment of a Common-wealth. For, being of a Family whence two Kings issued, perhaps he had some squint hopes of being chosen.

Upon divers occasions, he was observed to act very faintly, especially in regulating matters of Religion: Brutus would have a King of the sacrifices created, being unwilling the Consuls should attribute this honour unto themselves, lest it should too much smell of Royalty, and rub up the memories of such as were well affected to that kind of Government. This business being a matter of great importance, and which Brutus thought fit to communicate unto the people as well as the Senate, it was taken into consideration; And (as a thing very observable) the same people who so universally had cryed up Collatine for a Consul, having observed him opposite to the opinion of Brutus, they were bitterly incensed against him; and cryed him down as loud as they had cryed him up.

The multitude made a mighty murmur against him, some said they were much to blame in thinking upon any for a Consul, that bore the name of Tarquin, since that only was cause sufficient to banish him Rome: others added, That he appeared more a Tarquin in heart than name, since he was contrary to the opinion of Brutus, who was the true deliverer of Rome: some said, he held intelligence with Tarquin: others, that his aim was to make himself King, and all generally concluded, that there was a necessity not only of a dismission from his authority, but of his packing out of Rome. At the first, he behaved himself as Consul, and commanded silence: but thinking to appease the multitude, he incensed them: Afterwards, seeing his power not obeyed, he begun to Cajole the people; but the more submis he was, the more insolent were they: some argued him culpable, because he would keep the Authority against the intentions of those who conferred it upon him. Brutus seeing so great a Tumult, and being unwilling to oppose Collatin directly, though the publick good required that Valerius should be in his place, and though his secret hatred against him wished it, yet he went another way to compass his end. For after he had excused Collatin in those accusations wherein he was charged, he said it was a thing impossible his heart should adhere to the interest of Tarquin, who had so much wronged him.

But for all that (said he most subtilly) were I so unfortunate as ever to be suspected by the people, I profess I would not keep the authority one quarter of an hour after, and I do now at this instant offer it up, if it be thought that the publick good requires it. Brutus had no sooner said so, but the people applauded him to the Skies, after which he seemed more animated against Collatin: so as Lucretius who had more resolution than his Son in law, who also knew that he was not fit for that place; who hated Tarquin more than Collatin did; who had the heart of a true Roman; who knew that Lucretia left no children, and who dearly loved Brutus; he turned towards his Son in Law, and spake thus unto him; Why, Collatin, will you not lay hold of a noble occasion, of doing a great action, in voluntary surrendring the Consulship, since it is not pleasing unto the people? Make it appear Collatin, by this free dismission, that you quit an authority which you have no mind to keep, since you do so easily part from it: if you would be rul'd by me, I would advise you to put your self in a capacity of being recalled unto Rome, by banishing your self freely to day. For my part, I protest unto you, that though you married my Daughter, yet I think my self more obliged to take Romes part than yours; so as seeing the people incensed against you, and ill perswaded of your good intentions concerning the liberty of your Country, I think my self obliged both in honour and reason to advise you as I do: Then (added he in a low voyce)

It is in vain to keep that Authority which will be taken from you. Collatin now found himself at a pitiful non-plus: but, in conclusion, seeing all the people against him, knowing Brutus no friend, and finding Lucretius also his opposite, he surrendred that power which was given him into the hands of Valerius, who by the contrivance of Brutus and Herminius, was chosen with one voyce; Lucretius, who pretended to it, not being offended at it, so cunningly was the business carried. Mean time, to shew Collatin how pleasing the generous counsel he had given Collatin, was unto the people; they permitted Collatin to transport all his estate out of Rome, with Collatina, whom he would not carry with him, because he knew more than the people did, to wit, the league 'twixt Titus and her. So as thinking that if he carryed her where he was, that Prince perhaps would come and see her, and this would render him suspected at Rome, to which he hoped ere long to be recalled: he left her with Racilia, for Collatina's Mother was dead long before. Thus this fair Lady, who hoped that the misfortune of her Brother would be advantageous to her, she found her self more miserable, though being with Hermilia, was a great consolation to her. Mean time, according to the course of all the world, which will have some sigh whilest others sing, whilst Collatina mourned with Hermilia, all true Romans rejoyced to see the illustrious Brutus, and sage Valerius, masters of the soveraign Authority, for both of them were able, both couragious, both professed enemies of the Tyrant, both reverenced by all Romans, and both friends. So as it was the general hopes of all to see the liberty of Rome solidly established, since two men of such noted virtue sat at the helm of affairs: Indeed this great City, reposing themselves upon the prudence of these two great Men, as men in a ship upon a skilful Pilot, all was calm, every one was quiet, and for a few days, not a word of any false news flew about, no politick disputes troubled the tranquillity of the Town; not but that it was well known there was a Cabal of young men, and of high quality, who wished well to the dominion of Tarquin, because they shared in the debaucheries of Prince Sextus: but yet they durst not speak out their thoughts: And Rome was all peace, when the guards at the Gates came to tell the Consuls in open Senate, that there were some Envoyes from Tarquin, who demanded entrance. At first, the opinions of Brutus, of Valerius, of the illustrious father of Clelia, Lucretius, and of many others, was, not to hearken unto them, or permit them entrance; but their opinions altered, when they heard that they whom Tarquin sent, were two of those Priests called Fecialians, of which there was twenty in Rome, whose office was to declare War and Peace, to be spectators of Combates, and executed the Function of Heralds, and sometimes of Envoyes, or Mediators. These men were held in such great veneration at Rome as the superstition had perswaded the people, that if they did not give respect unto the propositions they brought, they should pull down vengeance upon themselves: so although Brutus and Valerius did believe that such men as had quitted Rome to follow the Tyrant, and came from him, would never find protection from the Gods; yet knowing how the multitude stood affected, they thought it prudence to give them their satisfaction in observing their old customs. Brutus also added, that it was expedient to manifest unto all their Neighbour States, that they had all right reason to maintain that liberty which they had recovered by force, and that they should hearken unto these Envoyes from Tarquin, whose propositions would be so apparently unjust, that they would incense the people more when they heard them.

The opinions of Brutus and Valerius being followed, they sent a man of Authority to receive these Envoys, and bring them to the Senate, but not suffer them to speak unto any as they passed through the Town: mean time, these Envoyes, or Heralds fearing the violence of the people, they attired themselves in such a Garb as might best set out their qualities, and beget respect, for according to the custom on such occasions, they wore Crowns of Laurel upon their heads, two darts in their hands; the one, half burned, to shew them as their propositions were answered; for they used divers ceremonies when they declared War. Mean time they perceived by this encounter, how powerful Religion is in the minds of the people: for notwithstanding the inveterate hatred which the Romans had against Tarquin, these Envoyes passed through Rome without the least violence offered unto them; yet many were heard to murmur, which made it apparent, they were no welcome; but having several designs in hand, they were not out of hopes of well serving him that sent them. They were men of able parts, they were instructed by Tarquin and Tullia, they were Romans; they had many kindred in the Town, and they had divers Letters from Tarquin, to many young men of Quality: they had also some from Sextus, for his old friends, so as the main matter of their negotiation, was only to speak unto the Senate, as an umbrage to plot something in Rome, which might advantage the Tyrant. Yet they kept their design very close and were conducted to the Senate, unto whom, in few words, they delivered the cause of their coming. At first, the Consuls, and Senators expected that the Heralds would ask no less than the Soveraign Power for Tarquin, and that they would recal him: But in lieu of that, they only said, that Tarquin to shew, he had more moderation than those who drove him from Rome, demanded only a restitution of all that was his own proper estate, and that it might be transported unto the place where he was. This feigned moderation surprised the Senate, and puzled them more than if the Envoyes had demanded the Crown for the Tyrant, who sent them. However this being a business which could not be determined in their presence, they withdrew; and to further their close design, they desired leave, to go amongst those that were of their own Function, who stayed in Rome: which was granted, and they conducted thither. Yet Brutus and Valerius, commanded to observe them narrowly, and not to stir from them.

But after they were retired, and the matter put to the vote, the opinions of the Senators were strangely divided, and which way soever they considered the thing, they found it a peevish business:

Should

Should they deny Tarquin, what was his own, though he had never raigned in Rome, were such a piece of Injustice, as would give him a just pretence for a War: should they consent to his demand, they should enable him to make it. So as the thing being very Controverfial, and the Senate so newly established, as those of which it was composed were hardly acquainted with each other; it was impossible for Brutus and Valerius as able as they were, to determine the business that day, nor the next; no, nor the next following that: Mean time, they durst not take upon themselves the absolute Authority, lest the people should say, they expelled the Tyrant, only to become Tyrants themselves. So as they were forced to submit the matter unto Time, and stay till those that were of a contrary opinion, did yield unto theirs; or else so united all those that were of their judgment, as they might be able to oppose them that contradicted them: But whilst the Senate was debating the business, without coming to any result, Tarquins Envoys did unperceivedly and cunningly transact their business: For, seeing they had no answer the first day, they desired leave to send unto those that imployed them, which in Common Justice could not be denied.

True it is, they were always accompanied by one that observed them, but yet they made a shift to blind his eyes; for they being two, whilst the one of them was talking unto any one whom they thought fit to employ, the other entertained their spie with discourse: Now, such as were well affected either unto Sextus, or the Princes his Brother, they sought out for such occasions as might bring them to the speech with those men that were of their interests: of which number were the two young Aquilians, and two others of the illustrious Family of the Vitellians, who got to speech with one of these Envoys, and received Letters of him from Tarquin: The Envoy also gave him sealed Pacquet for the two Sons of Brutus, not telling them from whom they came: After which, it being agreed amongst themselves, that they should meet when it was dark in a Garden which belonged to the house, they parted. These four young Romans failed not to meet accordingly, and one of Tarquins Envoys began to perswade them unto a Restitution of Tarquin to the Throne, and to make a Confederacy in the Town, to let him in by night with such Troops as still remained with him; promising unto them Mountains of Recompences, if they could do him so great a service: Alas, (said the Envoy) what good can you expect from this Alteration of Government? You see, even now, that though the two Consuls be as able men as are in the whole world; yet they cannot get a result upon a business, which would be resolved in an hour, if the Authority were in one single person: Tell therefore, all the young Gallantry, your friends, that all their Glory and Advantage consists in the re-establishment of Tarquin, though he should be a Tyrant: For, the Court of a Prince has Grandeur and magnificence in it: Tell them that all pleasures and delights are for ever banished from Rome, if Tarquin be: Make them understand that Kings, be they as rigorous as they are, yet sometimes they pardon and recompence: But the Laws are inexorable, and punish severely without mercy: they are always more favourable to the poor, than to the rich; to the common people, than to men of Rank. Represent unto them, what a heart-burning it will be, when they shall see themselves subjected to a multitude, to Cringe and Court those whom naturally they ought to command.

Tell them, that Kings being elective at Rome, it were a gross baseness in the Nobility to sit still, and lose their hopes to a Crown: In short, tell them, whatsoever you shall think best to prompt them on unto so great a design. These young Romans unto whom this discourse was addressed, and who of themselves were apt to embrace what was desired of them, they promised Tarquins Envoy as much as could be required: and this discourse being in the night only by Moonshine, and in a Garden, they had as good an opportunity as could be, to argue upon the enterprise: For, the Envoy had gained the slave, who had the charge of shutting the doors of the house: He that was appointed to keep an eye over their Actions, fell asleep: And all Rome was in a profound calm, whilst a business was consulting which might captivate them all.

Mean while, Tarquins Envoy asking the young Romans, what they had done with the Pacquet, which he gave them for the two Sons of Brutus, they told him that as yet they had not met with them; but in the morning they would go unto them, and in the evening at the same place, they would give them an account of all things; After which they went away. In their way home, he who had the Pacquet directed to the two Sons of Brutus, asked the rest what they thought of that Pacquet: For my part, (said one of the three, whose name was Aquilius) I am much mistaken, if it be not letters from two fair Ladies, who were brought up under Tullia: the one of which is a Slave of a Noble extraction called Teraminta: And I am sure, that Titus and Tiberius (so were the two Sons of Brutus called) are deeply in love with them. This induceth me to think, that Tullia has a design, by this means to draw Titus and Tiberius unto their Party. But (replied one of those who had not yet spoken) I wonder these Loves should make no greater a noise in the World, and that I should never hear a word of it. The reason is (answered he) because the War of Ardes imployed every one so much, that they had no leisure to talk of amorous discourses as in idle times of peace. But (said the other) though Titus and Tiberius should be in love with Octisia, and the young Teraminta, do you think they would ever desert the interest of Brutus? Yes, yes, answer'd he, for Love is stronger than Nature: And I know, there is no great tenderness in the hearts of these young men towards their Father: For, Brutus affecting a strange kind of lumpish stupidity, the young men have been extreamly ashamed of being his Sons: 'Tis true, they were so (said one of them.) But now, since Brutus is known to be one of the most glorious persons in the world, and performed such high Actions, doubtless Titus and Tiberius are changed in their opinions of a Father. I grant (answered Aquilius) that now they esteem him whom within a few days before they sleighted: But for all that, if they be really in Love, they cannot love a Father, who in expelling a Prince which loved them, exiled also their Mistresses: besides, they they being brought up in great Liberty and Freedom, they will much insist upon obedience to the commands of a Father: Well, well, (said Aquilius) to morrow will tell us more: And indeed, as soon as it was day, Aquilius, who had the Packet, went unto Titus and Tiberius: And the other three went every one severally to their particular friends, whom they thought most apt to adhere unto their opinions: Mean time, Aquilius was no sooner alone with Titus and Tiberius, but he gave them the Packet which was directed unto them: They had no sooner opened it, but they found two letters, the Characters of which they knew: For, that directed unto Titus, was from the fair Ocrisia whom he loved: and the other to Tiberius, was from the young slave Teraminta, whom he affected with a most violent passion. So as these two Lovers being infinitely impatient to see these Letters, they opened them, and read them in private, though they knew the secrets of each other, and though their friend was also acquainted with their Loves. But after they had read them to themselves, they read them aloud to Aquilius, who found that from Ocrisia to be thus indited.

Ocrisia unto Titus.

YOur destiny, Generous Titus, is in your own disposé, and it is only long of your self if you be not happy: you have told me ten thousand times, that you would do any thing in the world, to win my love: which if you will make good, and if you will reign in my heart, do what you can to make Tarquin reign in Rome: For, if you do not, you shall be for ever banished from any heart of mine.

After the young Aquilius had heard this Letter, Tiberius read his, which was in these terms, Teraminta unto Tiberius.

IF the unfortunate Teraminta be not out of your memory, as she is out of Rome, you will still remember how heavy the chains are which she wears. It is in your power to set me at Liberty: For, it is promised unto me, if you will take the Kings side. You know that in the condition wherein I am, I have nothing to dispose of but my affection. And that I do most faithfully promise unto you, if you will but do as I desire, and as you ought: Brutus was not so much obliged to deliver Rome, as you are to deliver me, since I do give you the means: Either unslave me, or resolve never to be mine.

Well (said Aquilius unto these two Lovers) what answer you to these two Letters, and what do you resolve upon? For my part, (said Titus) I cannot tell what to do: For I do love Ocrisia as well as is possible for any to love, but withal, I love my honour also: and indeed, what can I do for Tarquin, against my Father, and all Rome? If you will but imploy your Courage, (replied Aquilius) you will shortly find it no such difficulty as you think, to put Rome again under the Power of a Prince, who is so near a-kin to you, as it is but just to put that Crown again upon his head, which Brutus pulled off.

Oh ye good Gods (cried out Tiberius) in what a confused Labyrinth am I brought? for truly, I must ingenuously confess, that I am an enemy unto all Republiques: I had much rather obey a Tyrant, than be a slave unto the rash people, and to see my Fortune depend upon the humour of the giddy multitude. I know my Father has done a most high Action, and it were against Nature and Reason so much as to question whether I being his Son, ought, or ought not to take his part. But then, ought I not to deliver Mistress when it is in my power? and must I deny her any thing unto whom I have promised all things? But, Aquilius (said he) suppose I should overcome my repugnancy unto the Law of Nature, and follow such motions as Love inspires me with, all would be in vain: For, my Father is Master of Rome: Tarquin is hated, and the same cruelty which made him reign so long, will doubtless debar him from ever reigning again in Rome: because all Romans knowing how revengeful he is, will never trust him: Therefore though the interest of a Father should not restrain me, the impossibility of the enterprise ought: For, it is a most gross folly to attempt a thing against all reason, when there is no manner of possibility to effect it. For my part, (said Titus then) I shall hardly think any thing impossible. For the people are so giddy and mutable, as one may expect, or one may fear any thing from them: How strangely violent they were in chusing Collatine a Consul, and with the same violence and breath, expell'd him Rome? Therefore if a confederacy were on foot, I should not despair of its success, and would be one amongst them, provided they would save the life of my Father; for I must confess, I cannot lose Ocrisia and live. Perhaps (replied Tiberius) I love Teraminta more than you Ocrisia; but being not so great a hater of this new Government as you are, and seeing no possibility to alter it, I am not so hasty as you. However (said Aquilius) I promised the Envoys of Tarquin to bring you unto them: and indeed, they had earnestly entreated Aquilius to contrive it so, that they might speak with them, if it might be with safety. Aquilius did not fear his friends would reveal a thing which would ruine him if it were known; and therefore he told them, that for his part, he was resolved to do all he could for Tarquin, although he did not love him; and that he would break off all friendship with them, if they would not go to morrow in the evening, into the Garden where they had already spoken with the Envoyes of the Prince. Thus the Sons of Brutus not well knowing what they would, or would not do, and not knowing whether Love should yield unto Nature and Honour, or whether Nature and Honour should surmount Love, they promised Aquilius to go whither he would.

But whilst Brutus and Valerius were striving to unite the opinions of the Senate; whilst the Envoys of Tarquin were sowing seeds of confederacy; whilst the young Aquilians and their friends were plotting a confederacy against the deliverers of Rome; and whilst all the people of Rome expected with much impatience the resolution of the Senate; Horatius casting all his cares of the publick good upon the wisdom of those who then had the Authority, he thought upon nothing but how to make advanadvantage of the absence and misfortune of his Rival; Herminius and Mutius, upon nothing but to please the charming Valeria; Artemidorus and Soranus, upon nothing but their own and their friends business: The Prince of Numidia, nothing but complain he could not dye, since he was not beloved: Herminia and Collatina, in discoursing of their common misfortunes; Clelia, in grieving for the miseries of Aronces: and Amilcar, in diverting himself in all things, and in diverting Plotina in all manner of things that might afford her any delight. Mean while, Sulpitia being of the prime Quality, and a little disaccustomed at Carthage, and Capua, from the extream severity of Rome, converse and discourse at her house was very free: Also at every alteration of Government, the people are for a while excused from the exact deportments of their Country. So as almost all Men and Women of any excellency of parts and ingenuity, did Rendevouz every day at the house of Sulpitia. Clelia, doubtless did wish her self free to leave her misfortunes: but since she could not have her will, and being as wise as fair, she dissembled part of her grief, except when Horatius looked upon her; for then out of an obliging tenderness to Aronces, she found some sweetness in afflicting Horatius by shewing her melancholy, which she knew he would interpret as she desired he should; but though she was very serious and sad, yet was she both civil and sociable.

The same day that the Sons of Brutus received the two Letters, Clelia having observed in seeing Mutius and Herminius together, that they look'd very coldly upon each other; she asked Valeria what the matter was betwixt those two brave men: Valeria, she blusht at the question, so as Clelia never staying for an answer, told her in a low voice, that she would never ask her any thing again, for I am much mistaken, if I do not see the cause of their Quarrel in your eyes: Truly, replied Valeria, you need not seek for any other cause, than the injustice of Mutius, who thinks it a shame to change a resolution which he had fixed upon. I am so apt to judge favourably of Herminius (replied Clelia) that I doubt not but Mutius is in the wrong, and his Rival in the right: but for all that, it is not impossible that two Rivals should hate one another, yet not be unjust. Whilst these two Ladies were talking thus, Herminius and Mutius, who were no good friends since Tarquinius expelled Rome, they looked very roughly upon each other, and conversed not together unless when some other broke the Ice; for though they had agreed to defer their difference until the liberty of their Country was established, yet they could not constrain themselves, and one might easily perceive they sought for an occasion of being contrary in opinions. Yet Mutius was much perplexed, for Amilcar and Plotina, talking with them and Cesonia, began unawares to speak of Aronces and Horatius, and to say afterwards in general, that it was the most unjust thing in the world, for two Rivals to hate each other upon no other ground, but loving the same person: For truly (said Plotina very pleasantly) He who hates his Rival because he loves his Mistress, must also endeavour to be hated himself by the same reason. What you say, replyed Herminius then, is very witty: but yet I am perswaded, that there are not so many Rivals unjust as you imagine. For my part (said Cesonia) I never knew any that loved. Doubtless, replyed Mutius, there are some who esteem, but there can be none who do not hate: I never knew any, no more Cesonia, (said Amilcar) that loved their Rivals.

The reason why all Rivals are so (replyed Herminius) is because it is a thing impossible that two men should pretend unto one and the same thing, but they must look upon each other as men that would make each other miserable, so as commonly one of the two is always unjust. For my part, said Plotina, I must maintain that it is rather envie than love, that causeth hatred in the hearts of two Rivals: Oh, I beseech you (said Herminius) do not attribute so vile a quality unto all Lovers; Well, well, said she, and laughed; I am not so much in the wrong as you think: For the same thought that so often makes two ambitious men hate each other; that two fair ones should not esteem; that two brave men should so easily quarrel; that two good wits should lash each other; does make two Rivals not to endure one another. For my part, said Herminius, I cannot consent unto that, because I cannot believe that Love can beget envie: But most true it is, that two Rivals can hardly be without the one, giving some cause of complaint against the other: so as it being not natural to endure a Rival, one does easily look upon the other as an enemy That (said Amilcar) may very well be, but it is very odd, that though the love which causeth this hatred do cease, yet it often happens that the hatred does not cease; and though two Rivals do agree to cease loving their mistress, yet they will be always enemies: And yet (replied Cesonia) I have seen two Rivals very well reconciled: That never happens, replied Mutius coldly, unless they come to scorn the person whom they loved. Indeed, said Herminius then, scorn sometimes reunites what love divided: But when the person loved is such a one as must be for ever so, then doubtless it is hard for hatred to cease betwixt Rivals. Mutius would have answered, and answered sharply, when Clelius returned from the Senate, and put a period to this discourse. Mean time, Amilcar fearing left Mutius and Herminius should quarrel at their going out, he went with Mutius, as most apt for it, because most unfortunate: And being witty, stout, and pleasing withal; he began to speak freely unto him of his love to Valeria, and to tell him, that he was much to blame for agreeing no better with Herminius, were it for nothing but for his own interest. For, (said he) any woman of wisdom and virtue, cannot endure any quarrels should arise about her: but on the contrary, she loves a Lover that out of his respect to her, will put up petty injuries in her presence: You, Amilcar, replyed Mutius, have a reputation of loving so highly, as you are able to beg confident sometimes unto your Rival: But I who love unto such a height, that love often turns fury, I cannot do so; yet I must confess you speak reason, and I am resolved to endure the sight of Herminius for a while: After this, Amilcar sometimes humouring, and sometimes crossing his opinions, he became almost his confident, although he was the most particular friend of Herminius. On the other side, Clelia and Valeria, who were talking

ing together whilst the discourse was general, they entertained themselves with a thousand obliging expressions; and Confidence being a most infallible sign of solid amity, they desired each other to relate their Adventures. Yours are so illustrious and extraordinary (said Valeria unto Clelia) as it is but a reasonable curiosity to desire the knowledge of them: But mine are so poor, as there is nothing in them that will divert you: for I cannot think it will be any pleasure unto you, to know that I was so unjust, as to hate you before I knew you: How? replied Clelia, did you ever hate me? Yes, Madam, replied she, I did; And though upon no other reason, but because I should too much blaze my injustice, I would not relate my adventures unto you. This Circumstance, replied Clelia, is enough to swell my curiosity, and invites me to conjure you unto it: but, by the way, added she; who obliged you to cease hating me? Aronces, replied Valeria. You speak such Riddles, replied Clelia, as I beseech you to unfold them. I beseech you, Madam (said Valeria) do not enjoyn me to tell my own story, but let Herminius do it, for he knows my life as well as his own; and so it was resolved, but not executed accordingly: for so it happened, that Amilcar after he parted from Mutius, he went unto Herminius, whom he obliged to tell all his adventures. So as when Clelia told Herminius the next morning, what was resolved betwixt Valeria and her, he put it off himself, and beseeched that Amilcar might relate her life: With all my heart, said he, I am most obedient (said this pleasant African) but upon condition that Plotina and Cesonia be present at the Relation, for I would not deprive those two excellent Ladies of a delight so great: Amilcar said this in such a frolique air, as Herminius consented unto it, upon condition Valeria would consent also: so as Amilcar taking it upon him, and the hour being appointed when Cesonia and Plotina should meet at Clelias Chamber; they all met accordingly, and Amilcar addressing himself unto Clelia, he began thus:

The History of Herminius, and of Valeria.

WEre I to speak of Herminius only unto you, Madam, I should tell you his Adventures, without mentioning the advantages of spirit: But since Cesonia and Plotina have but lately known him; and since Herminius is none of those who shew all their Riches at the first sight; give me leave to tell them in few words, that this illustrious man, who sometimes speaks very little, yet can speak most elegantly when he will; and that he can speak with as much power and authority when any occasion requires it, as he can pleasantly and amorously, at other times; His soul is Noble, Great, Tender and Generous; he is full of sincerity and goodness, he is naturally liberal and just, and to lap up all in this, Herminius has all the virtues without one vice. Some will sometimes upbraid him with wilfulness, and a little Choler; but for my particular, I never saw any obstinacy proceed from him, which might not in reason be termed Constancy and Resolution. So as it may be said, his obstinacy is a virtue, because he never is so, but when he is in the right: As for his Choler, the truth is, did he not a little bridle himself, it would appear sometimes a little too much. But as for his wit, it is unlimited; there is nothing which Herminius cannot do most admirably well: he writes both in Verse and Prose, both equally, incomparably: he is for works of Learning and height; he is also for Railery and Gallantry: in all which he observes a smooth, genuine, and facetious decorum: He is also for matters of Love, and expresses himself in such passionate Characters, as one may plainly perceive, he is sensible of that passion whereof he treats: and which is most admirable, he never treads the steps of another, but on the contrary, has a way by himself, and wanders not a jot from the matter, as most do, who are given to filch from others: and having both wit and judgment of his own, all his Fancies and inventions are equally gallant and judicious. He is capable of any thing: I have heard him in one day make Speeches, Letters of business, of Love and Gallantry, Songs, Heroick Verses, and Verses of Love; and all with such ease, that when the Fancy takes him, he does them ex tempore; he will write them in the midst of a great company: He does them as if he never thought upon them: And if I may commend myself in commending him, I will tell you, without a lie, how one day he and I answered one another, so long in Verse amongst a company of Ladies in Capua, as all that heard us were amazed, and thought it impossible to be done without inchantment. One shall meet with men sometimes of a high election of wit, Learning and Fancy; but they cannot hold it out: For after some facetious pass, they will fall off unto pitiful low and common conceits: their style is rough, and disgusts such palates as are any thing critical, or delicate. But Herminius is a man singular in Learning, Wit, Judgment, and Politeness: He is none of those who has knowledge and wit at will; yet want a smooth and pleasing humour: For, as wise, knowing, and serious as he seems, when occasion serves, he will be all mirth and diversion: Yet he is not much affected with all sorts of pleasures; for he delights not in hunting, Musick, Painting, Feasts, and such like: but in Complacency he will be one at them all; and will do all he can to make men think he loves them as well as any. He will sometimes be so much taken up with a trifle, as if he were ignorant in any high things, sometimes he will apply himself to men of mean capacities, as if he were able to reach no higher; he could comply with all sorts; and never left any merry company: yet this man, who is able to inspire mirth into any company when he pleaseth, can live in solitude with as much content as any man living upon Earth.

'Tis true, indeed, he loves his study so well, as if he affected the company of dead men better than living: And if the generous Sivelia did not sometimes divert him, he would bury himself in his study: I am confident, that should he lose Valeria and Sivelia, he would absolutely renounce all commerce with the World: And yet this earnest inclination he has to his studie, cannot make him neglect any matter of business: As insensible as he seems, he has a heart most sensible of Glory, of Amity, and of Love: but he has these two last qualities in a very particular manner: For, where he is only a Friend, he will seem as if he were a Lover: and where he is a Lover, one would think think he were only a friend. Yet this proceeds not from the weakneſs of his affection but from the generoſity of his Soul, which makes him too little intereſted in his paſſion; As for example, had he a Miſtreſs whom a King would marry, he would ſacrifice his love, his joy, and his life, to ſee her upon the Throne: For loving the vertue more than the Miſtreſs, and thinking an intereſt of pleaſure in Love no better than a mercenary intereſt in Friendſhip, he thinks only of doing what generoſity requires: But whether he act the part of a Lover, or a Friend, he is always equally Liberal and Generous: and certainly, there is nothing but impoſſibilities which he would not do for ſuch as he loves: he takes a part in all their misfortunes: he is an enemy to their enemies: he will maintain their glories, before his own: more ſenſible of any affronts to them than to himſelf: And generoſity is ſo natural unto him, that it ſhines in all his actions: he will help his poor friends when he can, and when they would: he is in general, the moſt officious man living: he will often neglect his own buſineſs, to do anothers: and does ſhew his liberality in a thouſand trifles, which many Gallants more able than he would never think upon. I have known ſome of his friends that are extremely afraid, and careful to commend any thing he has, leſt he ſhould give it unto them; He knows how to give a thing handſomely, as well as any man living: and if Fortune had done for him as ſhe has for many others, there ſhould not be any well ſhaped man of his acquaintance, miſerable: Moreover, Herminius is a general Scholar, and a moſt kare Poet: Heſiod, Homer, and Sappho are his own, all the ſages of Greece are his familiars: 'Tis true, he never affected thoſe nice ſpeculations which Thales the Mileſian had upon the Stars, ſo much as he did that part of Philoſophy which regulated Manners: Herminius is a man that is able to do any thing that he takes in hand; and he never did any thing ill favouredly: He would ſometimes undertake to ſpeak upon a matter in publick, without any preparation for it: He has a moſt ſtrange and vaſt memory: after once reading of a large Copy of verſes, he would repeat them, and not miſs a ſyllable: alſo he would do the like in Proſe.

Thoſe who think that memory, wit and judgment cannot lodge together, are miſtaken: for he has both: Though he was owner of all the vertues, yet he cared not for ſhewing them, and will often ſtrive to conceal them from ſuch men with whom he is not familiar. And yet he affects glory: but he finds ſo few in the world, that are able to judge aright, that he cares not for the applauds of the multitude. Moreover, Herminius is ſo thankful and acknowledging, even for the leaſt good offices that he repays them all with uſury; and which is moſt rare; this man who is able for all things, who can make a Hiſtory of the World as eaſily as a ſong, and who knows no limits unto his parts; yet is he modeſt beyond all thought.

This excellent quality alſo he has, that he can keep a ſecret the beſt of any man alive; and which I highly eſteem him for, he is abſolutely incapable of any envy and ſlander: and is not ſevere unto any but himſelf. He ſutes with my humor principally in this, that he can uſe good fortune better than he can endure bad, becauſe he is much more ſenſible of ſorrows than of joys. As to the Ladies, he holds them in a high degree of reſpect: I could ſay much more of this illuſtrious Roman; but I had better make him known unto you by his ſtory, than by a deſcription which will come ſhort of his worth. As for Valeria, though Ceſonia and Plotina do not know her ſo well as Herminius, yet I will not make any long deſcription of her: As for you Madam, I obſerve you love her ſo well already, that I doubt not, but you do perfectly know her. But for my part, I muſt confeſs ingeniouſly unto you, that I never in all my life ſaw a more amiable perſon than Valeria. She is indeed but of a middle ſtature, yet ſo well made, as ſhe need not envie any that are taller than her ſelf: Her eys, are not ſuch as ſeem for bigneſs, as if they would look three or four ways at once: but hers are full of life and love, and able to conquer the hearts of ſuch as they ſhine upon; Her complexion is a little pale: yet ſuch a paleneſs as being mixt with a languiſhing and modeſt air does exceedingly well become her; And this Valeria, who has a million of charms more than I need mention, ſince you know them, has alſo a Soul ſo noble, a heart ſo tender, a wit ſo accurate, a ſpirit ſo gallant, and every way ſo rarely qualifi'd, that ſhe is worthy to be the Miſtreſs of Herminius.

Moreover Madam, never wonder, that this ſtory which I am to relate, ſhould be as full of Gallantry, as if ſhe had been at Capua or Carthage: For, thoſe amongſt whom ſhe has paſſed her time, are naturally ſo full of wit, as had they been born in deſarts they would have invented Gallantry.

Alſo Publius Valerius, the Father of Valeria, allowed ſuch honeſt freedom in his houſe unto all men of merit, as it muſt not be thought ſtrange if the Roman ſeverity be not exactly found in the things which I am to relate unto you.

I never need to tell you, that Herminius is of a Race illuſtrious, That his Father died an Exile: That the vertuous and generous Sivelia his mother is a moſt admirable woman: But let me tell you, that at her return to Rome, her principal care was that Herminius ſhould be acquainted with men of beſt quality there: So as the houſe of Valerius being the common Rendezvous of all the wits and men of Rank; ſhe entreated Valerius to admit Herminius amongſt them. Valerius was the friend of Herminius his Father, and did highly eſteem the vertue of his generous Mother; and therefore, he was very glad to ſee him oft at his houſe, and commanded Domitia his wife, and Valeria, to bid him kindly welcome: Herminius made ſuch uſe of this liberty, as he got the eſteem of all theſe illuſtrious Perſons; he being of a ſweet, civil, complaiſant, liberal, and ingenious temper, he made the greateſt divertiſement of this gallant Cabal, of which was Collatina, a Lady call'd Flavia, who had wit and beauty in perfection; and another Lady call'd Salonina, who was very fair, and had many amiable qualities, though ſhe harboured ſome unjuſt opinions. However, Herminius was officious, and always ready to do any thing they would have him, and was extremely civil and liberal to all the Ladies; he did not find in himſelf any other thoughts of Valeria, than ſuch as eſteem and admiration uſe to beget in the hearts of ſuch men who value merit. Valeria on her side, she held Herminius in a rank of esteem and amity; not thinking he would ever be in love with her, since he was not at that time: so as there was betwixt them all the familiarity that vertue could permit. Things being upon these terms, and the great feast of the Salians approaching, which is highly celebrated at Rome, and whose Ceremonies are so magnificent, that all the world desires to see them, either out of curiosity or custome Valeria, Collatina, Flavia, and Salonina, would go see this feast: Herminius promis'd to provide them windows in the sacred street, through which the Salians were wont to pass, the first day of Mars, which is the day of that Ceremony, which though I am no Roman, I do know as well as you, though I cannot relate, because I never saw it.

Then said Plotina, and smiled, I am more knowing than you in matters belonging to the Salian Ceremony, for I was once at Rome upon that day. I beseech you Madam, reply'd Amilcar, let me hear the relation of it, and instruct an ignorant African, who had need have some leisure to think upon what he is to say. But if whilst I speak, you think upon what you are to say, reply'd Plotina, you will not mind what I say. Let not that hinder you from satisfying the curiosity of Amilcar (said Clelia) for he can sometimes think one thing and speak another: However, answer'd he, I require a relation of the Salian Ceremony from Plotina, otherwise, I will tell no more of Herminius. Your denial will cost us very dear (said Cesonia then unto her friend) and therefore I beseech you satisfie the curiosity of Amilcar quickly, that he may satisfie ours. Since it must be so, said Plotina, I must tell you that the Salians are twelve in number; that they must be of the Patrician Race; and that upon the first day of Mars, they Celebrate a feast unto all the Gods that govern Arms; so as all that is to be seen in this Ceremony, has some emblem of War in it: The Salians wear that day Coats of Arms embroidered with divers colours, with great Belts of gilded Leather studded, Murrians of polished Gold; they have also Swords hanging by their sides, Javelins in their right hand, and Bucklers on their left arms, like unto those which fell from heaven miraculously in the time of Numa.

The Salians being thus habited, they dance and skip through the Town to the sound of Instruments, and sing songs to the honour of Mars, whose feast they celebrate. But that in dancing they may emblem War; in some places they draw their Swords, and strike upon the Bucklers according to the cadency of tune, and keep time without any confused noise or clashing: Those that dance and strike thus, do make an Idea of a Combate in their dance: sometimes they are all in order and figure; otherwhile they seem to fight with one another: some assault, others retreat, and all in figure and time, according to the tune: But the rarest thing amongst these twelve Salians was, There were also twelve fair Salian Women, dress after the Salian mode, except without Swords and Bucklers: Before them marched soft Musick, suitable to the sweetness of their Sex. These also danced through the streets as the Salians did, seeming by their actions to incite the men to dance well, sing well, and fight well: Those who would give a reason why they bring women into this Ceremony, can find no other but this, That all Heroick Actions whatsoever, are principally inspired into men only by a desire of pleasing women. I shall not mention all the streets through which the Salians passed, nor their sacrifices, because I will let Herminius bring his friends into the Sacred street to see them. After this, Amilcar thanked Plotina for her relation, and returned to his own in this manner.

Herminius having promised to provide windows for all the Company, he failed not of his word: the young Hermilia joyn'd with this good Company. As for the men, besides Collatin and Manlius, there was one called Volesus, who certainly was a man of merit; and one Spurius Largius, who flowed in wit: the Prince of Pometia, and Prince Titus, were there also.

Herminius, delighting handsomely to surprise those whom he desired to please, he carried all the Company to the sacred street, but told them not of any other entertainment, but seeing the Salians pass: yet he had so ordered things, that these Ladies entred into a Chamber most richly furnished, and the floor strewed with all delicate variety of flowers the spring could afford, the smell of which far surpassed that of Roses or Violets. The Ladies having never seen the like before, thought themselves in a Garden, and stooped to gather flowers for Nosegays: but Herminius saved them the labour, for he presented unto them baskets full of Posies, of all sorts of flowers, tied up with Ribbons of various colours, so as the Ladies not thinking themselves able to commend Herminius enough for his Gallantry, they thanked him a thousand times, after which, they found very rich Carpets laid in the windows for them to lean upon; Herminius thought it not enough, for all things to be handsome in the Chamber, but he had provided most rare Musick in a Closet adjoyning: and to compleat the entertainment, he gave them a most sumptuous banquet.

Now, that you may the better understand the sequel of this story, be pleased to know, that Volesus, who, as I told you already, was a man of merit, was in love with Salonina, who indeed was rarely handsome and fair, though she had some unjust opinions, and who was then one of the best friends of Valeria, who was not then in any great amity with Lucretia. So as Volesus being a Lover, and Lovers naturally are jealous, he imagined that Herminius was also in love, for making such treatments of Gallantry, but yet he was deceived, for Herminius did such things very oft, because they were Gallantries in themselves, not because he loved the persons whom he treated; yet Volesus measuring the minds of others by his own, he began to dispute with Herminius, hoping thereby to discover who the Lady was, to whom this Gallantry was intended, and wished with all his heart he might not have him for his Rival; so as seeing every one thank Herminius, for my part (said he and smiled) I will not thank him; for I assure that I am beholding unto some Lady in the company for this feast, and that nothing but Love could inspire Herminius with a design of so much Gallantry. Truly (said the Prince of Pometia) if one should judge by appearances, there is some reason to be of Volesus his opinion. For my particular (said Titus) I have long thought Herminius

to be in Love with some Lady in this company, for he visits them every day, he cannot endure to be any where else, and grumbles if any desire him to go and see some others: on the contrary, he is pleasant and merry when he is in the company of the Ladies that are here: he can invent a hundred diversions, write elegant Letters, make songs, and as now you see, very gallant Feasts. Very good, said Herminius, and smiled, you will perswade me that I am in love with every one in the company: for indeed I have the same inclination to all the company in general, which they say a Lover has to a Mistress in particular. But perhaps (replyed Spurius) you do not love all the company in general, but only because you do love some one in particular.

Since Herminius is my very good friend, said Valeria, I hope to make him in love with me. Since he is but indifferent to me (said Salonina) I am out of that hope: for my part (said Hermilia) I know Herminius does not love me. And I am sure (said Flevia) that I shall never win his heart; no, nor Collatina. Well, well, said Herminius, I love you all in general, and never yet asked my self, whom in all the company I loved best. Since so, replied Valeria, and innocently smiled, I beseech you observe your self a while, and if you find that any one of these Ladies has captivated you, to tell me in secret as one of your best friends. But suppose (said Volesus) he should love you, will he tell you of it? I beseech you (said Herminius) do not question her upon that Article: for what know I, but I may love her more than I think? No, no, Herminius, replied Valeria, you subject I know, that you do not love me: but in case you be deceived, (answered Collatina) must Herminius tell me whom he loves? Ah Collatina, replied Valeria, should I be so unhappy as that Herminius should love me more than I would have him, I would not have him tell you; but since I can keep a secret better than any of my friends, I had rather Herminius should tell me, than you, or any else: So had I, replied Herminius, and I do solemnly promise, that as soon as ever I am in love, I will tell you, and discover the bottom of my heart unto you. But before I engage my self to hear you, answered Valeria, I will make my conditions with you. You need but name them, replied Herminius, and you shall be obeyed. I would then (answered she) that in case I be your Confident, you be a meer hearer, that must sit idle and do nothing to serve you, not so much as to give you counsel: but on the other side, I think nothing more horrible, than to be such a confident as will busie her self in a thousand things wherein she has no interest. But in case you be my Mistress, replied he, what should I do then? I would have you promise me, answered she, that you will never tell me any thing that shall anger me, and that if you do, never to see me again: I will engage my self, replied he, never to tell you any thing which ought to displease you, but not precisely that it shall not displease you, for all Ladies have their Capricious humours, wherein they will be angry without any cause.

As Valeria was going to answer, they heard a farr off, the musick which went before the Salians: And there being one place better for sight than any other, Herminius carried Valeria thither; which favour she received only as a simple testimony of his friendship: Afterwards every one beheld the Salians pass with great attention and delight, except Herminius, who fell into such a deep study, that all the Company observed him; and Collatina asked him what he thought upon. Truly (answered he) I am striving to know whom I love, for now I begin to think that I am in love with some body: Oh Herminius, (said the Prince of Pometia) if you be once in love, you will quickly know with whom it is: If so, replied Herminius, my Mistress should know it as soon as my self, for I was resolved to tell her as soon as I knew; nor is it reasonable to put a Mistress to so much pains, as to guess at that love which she her self caused. For my part, (said Salonina, and smiled) I should be gladder to guess at a thing of that nature, than to know it any other way: for when one guesses at it, one is not obliged to answer. Why do you busie your self, said Valeria, in such impertinent discourse, in lieu of looking at the Ceremony, since we all came hither to see it? For my part, said Salonina, and laughed, I have seen the Ceremony two or three times before, and I care not for seeing it again; and the truth is, these kind of shews are good for nothing but a pretence for the meeting of such good company as here is; but the worst is, one shall not every year find an Hermippus, and an Herminius in love. As for love, replied Valeria, the thing is yet doubtful: No, no, said Spurius, I will engage my self to be in love, if he be not; and if before a moneth be at an end, he be not much more miserable than he is now. For my part (said Herminius) I know not well what you say: but if it be so, one cannot be in love unless they be miserable, then I am not in Love; for I do find in my self a secret joy and satisfaction, without knowing any cause for it. Ah Herminius, replied the Prince of Pometia, most certainly you begin to be in love; for almost all beginnings of Love are pleasing: And most assuredly, when any man of soul is either merry or sad without a cause, he is in Love.

After this, the ceremony being ended, all the company did stay a while in the Chamber, and then parted. But in parting, Herminius promised Valeria to tell her very shortly, whether or no he was in love, and with whom it was: And indeed, ever since this time, he became his own spie, and observed all the secret motions of his heart: So as in a short time he found that he loved Valeria much more than he did all the Ladies in the company: For, when he went to Domitia's house, and found not Valeria with her, he was vexed, though all the rest of the Ladies were there: And on the contrary, when he found her alone, he never missed any of the rest. So he found that he preferred Valeria before all the rest, but yet knew not whether this which he found in himself was Love: but on the contrary, would for a few days have perswaded himself that it was only Amity: For, because he had heard from all Lovers, that Love was a terrible Torment, and because he himself in his verses of Gallantry, expressed so many Fires and Fetters and Torments, and Sighs, and Tears, he could not believe he was in Love, because he was so far from being miserable, that he thought himself happy.

He thought also, that he desired nothing: and that tenderness which he found in himself towards Valeria, was only tenderness of Friendship, which being proportionable to her merit, must needs be greater than an ordinary Amity. So as though he did not believe himself in Love, yet he loved Valeria: And which was strange, he shunned putting the company in memory of the conditions which he had made with that charming person: because he thought himself not Gallant enough to tell her that he was only upon terms of Friendship with her: Indeed the opportunity did not offer it self very soon; For, Valeria being very sick for fifteen days, all the company were very sad, and Herminius more than any, for he could not find any rest any where: he went many times in a day to ask how she did: he visited those that looked unto her to be the better informed, and he met none but he told them how ill Valeria was; But at last, this fair one mending upon it, her intimate friends had the liberty to go and see her: so as their company diverting her, she recovered her health, her beauty, and her good humour very fast. Salonina, Flavia, Hermilia, Spurius and Volesus going one day to her house with Herminius, they fell into talk of the Salian Feast, and to remember him of his engagement to tell Valeria whom he loved. And talking merrily, they told Valeria that it was her part to press Herminius unto the performance of his promise. But the most strange passage in this encounter was, that Herminius, as I told you before, would not tell Valeria what he thought, because he thought it not handsome to tell a fair Lady that he did not love her: And Valeria on the other side, who observed how much he was troubled at her sickness, and received every day a thousand Testimonies of esteem and tenderness from him, she did not desire him to keep his word, lest he should say, that he was in love with her: For, esteeming him very much, she was loth to change her way of behaviour unto so good a friend. So as the one not offering to speak, and the other not willing to hear, Flavia, Salonina, Hermilia, Spurius and Volesus, began to chide them, and to say, that certainly they knew each others minds without speaking: and they were so pressing upon them, that Valeria to justifie her self, commanded Herminius to keep his word: He not daring to disobey, rose up, and carried Valeria to the other end of the Chamber, towards a Balcony which looked into a Garden.

But when he was there, and that fair one asking him whom he loved, he found himself at a strange perplex. For he felt such a Qualm rise upon his heart, that he could not answer; and he was the worse, because at that very instant, he began to think himself in love: The fair eyes of Valeria meeting his at that instant, he was so charmed, that he changed colour: Valeria fearing the truth she durst not press Herminius any further; who seeing she asked him no more, he ask'd her, how it came to pass, that her curiosity ceased? It comes to pass (said she) from a Maxim of equity: For, as I have no mind to tell that which I would not have known: so, I would not have you press me to tell me that which I see you have no mind to tell: And therefore to testifie unto you that I am discreet, I say no more: Yet offer, if it please you, to tell all the company, that you have told me, you are not in Love. Oh Madam (said he) I would not have you say so: Then I will say, that you are in Love, (replied Valeria and laughed) and after I have assured them that it is not with me, I will leave them to guess, whether it be Salonina, Flavia, Celatia, or Hermilia that you love.

No, no, Madam, replied he, Never say that I am, or I am not, until you know certainly what I am But how should I know that, (replied she) unless you tell me? You may know it Madam, (answered he) if you will but know the thoughts of my heart. Do you think, replied Valeria, that I am so much in love, as to discern whether you be or be not in Love? For, that is a thing which I know not how to give or to take. Though all you say, Madam, be true, answered Herminius, yet you may know whether or no I be in love: for if you know that the thoughts of my heart be of any other nature than Friendship, you may easily conclude that I am in love: know therefore (added he, and would not give her time to answer) that upon a strict examination of my heart, I have discovered that there is one in this company whom I do esteem and love above all the world, and who is so necessary unto my joy, as I have none if I be not with her. Well, well, (replied Valeria, and smiled) I will not keep you any longer with me, lest I weary you: And therefore without putting you to any further trouble in telling me your thoughts, I assure you that you are only my Friend.

Oh Madam, replied he, I beseech you, do not judge so hastily of my affection, and never fear I can be weary of being with you: And therefore give me leave to tell you, That my tenderness to the person of whom I speak, is so great, that all her miseries are mine. I look upon her with delight; I admire her with abundance of joy; all she says pleases me; her beauty charms me; her goodness ravisheth me: and her wit strikes me with such a respective astonishment, as is above common admiration. But after all this, I am not jealous, I desire nothing; and all my thoughts are so pure and free from any interest, as I cannot think any one's affection like unto mine. I have already told you, replied Valeria cunningly, That all your thoughts of me proceed only from Friendship, and I am very glad of it: for as they talk of Love, one is never very happy by it.

Since Madam you say, replied Herminius, that my thoughts of you are only Friendship, I hope there is no hurt if I tell you, that you are the same person whom I prefer before all the world, and whose company I love so well, that I cannot endure to be any where else: Also, I beseech you give me leave to hope, I shall find affection for affection from you: For the same vertue, which they say allows Ladies to be ungrateful unto their Lovers, requires they should be reciprocally kind to their friends. But Madam, (added he, and would not give her leisure to speak) I had almost forgot to tell you, That you are not only the person whom I love best of all the World, but also to speak sincerely, you are the only person whom I love. For, when I examine my self well, the affection which I bear unto others, is nothing in comparison of that I bear unto you. And when I said that I would desire nothing, truly I know know not what may happen hereafter: For, at this very Instant, there comes upon my heart such a violent desire of being loved by you, that if you leave me hopeless, I perceive I shall be the most miserable man in the whole World. You deceive your self, in speaking as you do, replied Valeria, for Friendship never makes any miserable. But Madam, replyed he, perhaps you do not know what thoughts my Soul has of you. What ere they be (said she, and would have gone away) I will go and tell the company that you are only upon terms of Friendship. With all my heart, answered he: For, if perchance I should be in love with you, as there is great likelihood I shall, it is best that none but you in all the World do know it. Nay, replied Valeria, if that misfortune ever happen, I wish I may never know it: After this, Valeria left Herminius, and blushed, not well knowing what she should say unto the company: Come Valeria, (said Salonina, as soon as she came) is Herminius a friend or a Lover? Is it you, or Flavia, or I, that is adored? does he love all the company in general, or any one person in particular? I must ingenuously confess (answered Valeria) that Herminius is not in love, and therefore we are all of us equally obliged unto him for his assiduous visits unto us; Oh, Madam, replied Herminius, I did not think you would have said so: If I be mistaken, answered she, I cry you mercy, my memory is so bad that I may be excused; and if I did not say aright, yet I am sure I said as things ought to be.

After this, all the company fell upon Herminius and Valeria, and contested amongst themselves; some affirmed that he was in love, and others, that he was not; and all in general did divert themselves very pleasantly upon this matter all the rest of the day.

Mean while, great alterations grew in the minds of Valeria and Herminius: for Valeria made more doubt of Herminius his affection, than she did before he spake unto her: And Herminius on the contrary, did not doubt at all that he was in love, since the time Valeria told him his thoughts were only effects of friendship. When he came at home, he accused himself for speaking too faintly and coldly of his affection; he repented himself of his too much prudence; and he upbraided himself a thousand times with blockishness, in being so long before he knew that the thoughts of his soul were effects of love.

As for Valeria, though she was as vertuous a person as ever lived, and though at that time she could not imagine she could ere endure any should love her, yet she could not chuse but chide her self for harbouring some little belief that Herminius did love her, and could not chuse but think upon Herminius whether she would or no.

Things then being upon these terms, you must know that Volesus who loved Salonina unknown to any, and that Salonina did not hate him, they were full of joy: for Spurius falling deep in love with Salonina, Volesus had the satisfaction to see his Rival most horribly ill treated by that fair one his mistress: that Spurius was a man of many admirable qualities, and none ill, except that he was the most revengeful of any man living. Valeria and Salonina were then most particular friends, for Lucretia was not of their society: So as Valeria saw all the bitter affronts which Salonina put upon Spurius; yet it is not to be imagined, there was the same confidence between Valeria and Salonina, as there was since between Valeria and Lucretia: for they communicated such secrets only, as may be said, they made great mysteries of small trifles. But for all that, they loved, or at least thought so; and in their familiarity, Valeria would sometimes tell Salonina, that she treated Spurius too sharply: for truly (said that wise Lady) I conceive it fit to be severe with judgment: and when a man of good parts is in love with a well qualified woman, she ought to carry it so, as to let him know that his passion is displeasing unto her, without scorning or sleighting the man: for it is very dangerous to procure the hatred of those who love you, and certainly it is much better to be hated by one, who never loved you, than by a slighted and contemned lover. For my part (replied Salonina) I think nothing more glorious for a woman, than that she can sleight a very brave man, only because he is in love with her. Valeria replied upon Salonina, and Salonina answered her, but they did not alter one anothers opinions: So as Spurius was treated by Salonina, worse than ever any poor lover was; and yet she made many advantages unto her self by it: for thereby the love of Volesus augmented, and she got such a Reputation of severity in the world, as gave her precedency before all other Ladies of her age.

But whilst Salonina was favourable unto Volesus in despising Spurius, Valeria received from Herminius a thousand ingenious and innocent testimonies of his love: for not a day passed, but he gave some fresh delight by some pleasing surprize or other. He was assiduous, exact, officious, and full of respects towards her, and so very reserved in giving his testimonies of Love, that Valeria did often doubt of what nature his affection to her was. And yet she came insensibly to be out of all doubt, nay to fear that the same man whom she thought did not love her enough, would come to love her too much. Yet Valeria carried her self with that prudence, as she kept off Herminius a long time from telling her openly that he was in love with her. But I have often heard from Flavia, who was a particular friend unto Herminius, that she easily perceived he loved Valeria, and that Valeria was not sorry for it: for though she did not any thing to augment the love of Herminius, yet she did not all she might to extinguish his flames.

Mean while Spurius who had a great heart, and was naturally proud, he grew so sensible of Salonina's scorn, as he resolved to drive her out of his heart; and accordingly he ceased from coming to see her, and went seldomer to Valeria and his other friends, lest he should meet her. But Salonina being gone into the Countrey, he visited all the company which she frequented; and to his misfortune, finding an inevitable charm in the sweet eyes of Valeria, he fell in love with her. And in lieu of opposing this growing passion, he himself blew the bellows that made it burn. For being of a proud temper, he fancied it a great pleasure to himself, if he could win the favour of a Lady whose merit was far above hers who had slighted him: so as he flattered his passion with hope, hope, and the more because Valeria who in her heart would not be sharp to Herminius, and yet would not let it appear she had any extraordinary tenderness towards him; she was willing to entertain the courtship of Spurius, to the end that her kindness to Herminius might be attributed to sweetness of humour to all in general, and not any particular thoughts of any one. Spurius then seeing that his addresses were not repulsed, he became down-right in love with Valeria, to whom yet he durst not speak openly of it. So as when Salonina returned from the Countrey, she found that this Lover whom she had so badly used, and whom she thought still fettered in her chains, that he had broken them, and assumed those of Valeria, who as I told you, was the chief of her friends. Though she never loved Spurius, though she loved another, though she loved Valeria as much as she could love; yet she was vexed to the soul that she lost this Lover; and her heart burned with anger against Valeria, for captivating a heart which she would not accept. Yet Salonina concealed her thoughts: But as there is a jealousie of Pride, as well as a jealousie of Love, hers of Valeria was so great, that hide it as well as she could, it was quickly perceived, that as often as she came unto her, there was a certain Air of constraint in her face, and that sweet and affable smile which she used to have in her cheeks did not at all appear: Yet she saw her often; but she hardly knew what to say unto Valeria when they were alone together. She was always disposed to find some fault or other; for whereas all young and fair Ladies that love one another, use a hundred pretty questions about their beauties, or about their dresses, yet Salonina almost never saw Valeria, especially if Spurius was present, but still something was amiss about her: And yet she spit her malice as if it had been a simple effect of friendship: For she would still be asking her whether or no she was sick, and whether she slept the last night, meaning thereby, that she looked very ill. She would pick a thousand quarrels with her Dress, and nothing about her but was out of order. When she talked with any envious persons, of which there are a number in the world, and with whom one may speak freely in disparagement of all fair ones; she suffered them very gladly to speak all the ill against Valeria, that the malignity of their envy could invent: and she her self would come out with many petty faults, which made it evident she would have been glad if they had been greater. For she said, though untruly, That Valeria had not the lustre and charms of a great beauty; and that her beauty had been very mean, if her wit had not helped it to a Reputation. Fortune (said she) is all in all; and it is as requisite to get a reputation of wit or beauty, as it is to get riches: For, (said she unto her envious Cabal) Valeria speaks no better, nor no more, than others can: and yet she has the reputation of a superlative wit, above all others: she is so fortunate, that her vertue costs her less than many of her friends: For, she passes for vertue it self, and yet she is not so holy, but Spurius and Herminius do pay her a thousand services which others perhaps would scruple to receive.

Salonina would yet commend her, and say, that Valeria was her very good friend: and when she spoke any ill of her, it was with a zealous wish that she had all those faults which her jealousie made her believe she had. Mean time, Valeria could not imagine she should take it ill, that she should allow of the visits of Spurius as she did: for seeing her treat that Lover so harshly, she could not suspect she had any interest in him. Yet it was not long before she perceived the coldness of Salonina: So as Valeria being all sweetness, she asked her from whence this alteration in her humour proceeded. What have I done, what have I said, what have I thought (said this sweet Lady unto her, when they were alone together) that you do not smile upon me as you were wont to do? Believe (answered she very faintly) the alteration is in you, not in me: and you not seeing things as you were wont to see them, you accuse me of that change which is in your own mind.

No, no, Salonina (replied Valeria) I am the very same that I was, and if my company do not please you, it is because there is something in your own mind which makes me so wearisom unto you: But Salonina take heed (added she and smiled) for I assure you, I do not weary people long, without extremely wearying my self: And, therefore to preserve the amity that is betwixt us, if you have any thing to accuse me of, do it sincerely, that if I do clear my self, you may repent of your coldness, and if I do not justifie my self, that I may beg your pardon. Salonina seeing her self thus pressed by Valeria, she was vexed to the heart: and expounded all the goodness of this sweet Lady, unto a hidden interest which related unto Spurius. So as dissembling her real thoughts which she was ashamed to discover, she answered that she had nothing to accuse her of: but expressed feigned Caresses and protestations of Friendship; yet she did it in such a manner, as did not perswade Valeria that they were real: But it troubled this Charming Lady very much, that all the World should ask her what the matter was betwixt Salonina and her. Salonina on her side was put to it to pump for an answer unto those that asked her the same question: especially Volesus, whom she wished very well: for she was so free as to tell him, that she stomached Valeria because she entertained Spurius, and was angry that Spurius did not now love her, because he now loved Valeria: So, as she told Volesus such opposed causes of complaint against Valeria, as she thought good, enjoyning him, not to speak of it. But though she might easily deceive Volesus, who loved her very well, yet it was impossible for her to deceive Flavia, who as I told you, was the friend of Herminius, and upon good terms with Salonina: For this Lady had a most particular faculty in discovering the most close interests of all the female Cabal.

And indeed, she reason'd the matter upon just grounds: For (said she) when I see any young and fair ones quarrel and jar without any apparent cause, I certainly conclude, that it is either out of envy, or interest of Love, or jealousy. So without farther scrutiny into the profundity of right reason, I look after such fantastical motives as Love, Jealousie, and envy, may inspire, according to the quality of their fortune: and it happens very seldom, but I hit right upon such things as I am inquisitive of, when once I am a little acquainted with the Intrigues of a Cabal. Flavia being so cunning in such things, she had a light suspicion of the Truth.

So

So as walking one day with all the company in the Gardens of Nemi, which were very fine and pleasant, she saw Salonina look very attentively upon Valeria, who then stood betwixt Herminius and Spurius, and she looked upon her with a kind of sourenes and disdain, which she did not perceive in her self. So as Flavia, who had a subtle and penetrating wit, and would not be denied any thing, she took her aside, and carrying her from the rest of the company: I do not ask you as others do, said she unto her, what the matter is betwixt Valeria and you, for I know that she has cured Spurius of that Love which he bore unto you, and that you are not pleased with it. I think, replyed Salonina and blushed, that after I have treated Spurius so sharply as I have done, I shall not much care who shews him any favour: I confess it, answered Flavia, and that's it which makes me wonder: for, I am not such a novice in things of the world, but that I know you love Valerius well: that you never loved Spurius; That you loved Valeria before Spurius loved her; and that you never loved her since you thought he did. Moreover, Never tell me as you do others, that you ever loved Valeria; for you never see her but for formality and fashion sake: And did you but see your self, when any one commends her, or when out of policy, you commend her your self, you would plainly see that your eyes betray your heart, and that it is an easie matter to know, you have secret hatred and grudge against Valeria, which you would not discover. You are very plain, replied Salonina; and shall be plainer yet, replied she especially, when it is to reunite my friends, and make peace and quietness in the society wherein I am. Therefore, if you do not confess the truth unto me, and tell me the thoughts of your Soul, I will take the part of Valeria against you: I will condemn you every where: and may be I shall tell Valerius what I think. Perhaps, replied she, you will condemn me more when you know my true thoughts: not that they are such (added Salonina calmly) as you imagine. For indeed, since I must discover the bottom of my heart unto you, and that it is in vain to dissemble, and say, that I hate Valerius, I will confess unto you, I am very well pleased, and allow him to love me: and you may well think, I have no interest in Spurius, whom I have so sharply treated, as Valeria thinks I have been too severe: Nor, is it any interest I have in Spurius, which makes me take it ill from Valeria that he looks favourably upon him. But to tell you truly, she knowing what aversion I have to him, and thinks she should not endure him, nor in honour receive him so kindly whom I have so much scorned, nor so oft admit him into the Cabal, that I can hardly ever see her but see him also. Truly, replied Flavia and smiled, I did not think you so good a friend as you are: but that I may the better know your mind; Pray answer me directly to every Question I shall ask you. I will replyed she. Then tell me (said Flavia) why have you such extreme aversion to Spurius, who is a man of a most noble race? I cannot tell, answered Salonina, the right etymology of the word aversion: but I am sure that my exceptions against Spurius proceed not from any particular cause, nor can I tell why I cannot endure him. Since so, said Flavia, why should Spurius be more offensive to you now he addresses himself unto Valeria, than when he made his addresses unto you? Because, replied she, if Valeria did not favour him, I should not see him so oft, and should not be vexed to see that he does not displease her, as he did me. But further, said Flavia, whether had you rather that Spurius should be always troubling you with testimonies of his affection; or that you should be rid of him, and see him love Valeria? Truly, replied she, and blushed, I had much rather he should love me than Valeria: for then I should have the satisfaction of treating him ill: I should not have the vexation to see him so happy as he is; and I should have the advantage to see Valerius more diligent, more exact, and more amorous: For, certainly nothing more sharpens a Lover, than to have a gallant Rival; and it is the greatest favour that comforts the heart of a Lover, to treat his Rivals ill: Doubtless, replied Flavia, there is much wit in what you say; but without any more questions, which if you do not answer sincerely, I must tell you, that all this perplexity in your heart, is nothing else but a vain jealousie which makes you not endure Valeria should rob you of a Lover; and that you think your beautie receives an injury, because Spurius looks now upon you with eyes of indifferency. Well, well, said Salonina then, I do confess it: Valeria does vex me in receiving Spurius so kindly; and if the fancy take me, I will recall him by some sweetness towards him, since it was that way she gained him.

Valeria, replied Flavia, is not more sweet towards Spurius than towards Herminius, and all men of Rank that see her: But suppose she were a little complaisant towards him, what does that import you, that he displeaseth you, since you will not love him, and since you love Valerius? Since all my reasons cannot give any satisfaction (replied she in a fume) believe if you think good that I am unjust and fantastical: but since there are some fantastical humours which sometimes are delightful, I will give my self the diversion of taking Spurius from Valeria, as she has from me; for if I be not much mistaken, it will not cost me above half a dozen kind looks. Salonina spake this with such a forced smile, as made Flavia judge, she might do as she said. So as since Flavia was much the Friend of Herminius, she thought after some consideration, that it was a good office to take a Rival from him; for she plainly perceived that he loved Valeria: So as falling into Railery with Salonina, she told her, that she liked her humor very well, of reducing Spurius, though it were only to treat him ill; and that it would be a great glory unto her beauty, and the more innocent, because she did no harm unto her friend: Also the more extraordinary, because she would be fickle without being unfaithful. I see crafty Flavia (said Salonina) that you mock me for my fantastical humour: but if you keep secret, I will make you more sport than you imagine. Flavia, whose end was only to divert her self, did promise her all she desired, but did not perform all she promised: On the contrary, Herminius coming to see her the next morning, she made him her confident in all she had said unto Salonina, and was very merry with him at it, who thinking it fit Valeria should be acquainted with it, he went with Flavia to visit her, and to tell her what had passed betwixt Flavia and Salonina, to the

the end she might advise what was best to be done in the matter.

But upon good consideration, this wise Lady thought it not expedient to alter any thing in her behaviour; for since she permitted the addresses of Spurius, only to receive the services of Herminius, without being thought she esteemed him above another, she conceived she might well continue as she did before, and all the alteration that was, was that she did not esteem Salonina so much, nor would ever love her; yet she would not quite break off with her: However, since that time, there was a greater league of amity betwixt Flavia and Valeria than before; and Herminius grew a little more bold with Valeria, than he used; yet he durst not tell her down-right, that he was in love with her: he knew very well that she knew he was; and he saw it did not displease her: but she carried the matter so handsomely, that Herminius hating the word Amity, and not daring to use the word Love, he made use of the word tenderness to express his thoughts of her.

But at last, finding a fit opportunity which fortune unexpectedly presented unto him, whilst Salonina, Flavia, Hermilia, and some other Ladies were in one walk, and he with Valeria in another, he engaged to speak freely: And Valeria having heard Herminius say, That he had so many disgusts against life, as made him almost desire to be rid of it, or at least, not to look upon death as any great evil; and seeing him in a deep study, she smilingly ask'd him, if his desire of death was upon him. No, Madam, said he unto her, nor I assure you ever was, since I was in love with you. In love? replied Valeria and blusht. Yes, Madam, in Love, answered he.

But Herminius, replied she, you mean Amity: and you are in such a deep study, that you take one word for another: so as were I not disposed to interpret all that you say favourably, I should quarrel with you. Do then, Madam, replied he: for I assure you, I meant the word, Love; and there is no other in all our language, that can express those thoughts I have towards you. And since, Madam, (added he, and would not give her time to speak) I am fully perswaded that I tell you nothing that is new, but that all my actions have long told you, that I am most desperately in love with you; I cannot well tell whether you knew it before me; for I must confess, that the purity of my affection made me take it for amity: But to tell you truly, its fervency and ardour, makes me know what it is: Moreover, Madam, (continued he in a most humble posture) I have one favour to beg, which I beseech you not to deny me. If it be to forget your boldness, replied she, I will do it, provided you repent, and promise never to commit the like. No, Madam, replied he, But my humble suit is, That you will not too much follow the customs of the time: for I have not a heart like other Lovers: I know it is the fashion for all Ladies to be angry the first time they are told that they are loved: and that though they are resolved to entertain those that speak to them of love, yet they must fret and fume, and forbid any loving them, and put their Lovers to the necessity of blazing their passion, so as when they would entertain and hide it, they cannot. I beseech you therefore, Madam, to think seriously with your self, whether you would have me to love you, or have me to die, for there is no medium betwixt these two extremes: And I do declare unto you, Madam, That if you do forbid me to love you, you do command me to die. Also let me tell you in all possible sincerity, that the boldness which I assume in loving you, has no ingredient in it which can displease you: for though I have a most tender passion towards you, yet I protest unto you, I do not desire any thing from you in my advantage, but only that you will give me leave to adore you. Moreover, you are not ignorant, that those who have the dispose of you, have much esteem of me: And should I attempt it, perhaps I might oblige the generous Valerius unto a consent of rendring me happy. But Madam, I will not derive my happiness from the Authority of a Father: And I do declare, that I shall never be content, unless you give me your heart freely and spontaneously: Think therefore, Madam, what answer you will return me, and consider I conjure you, that you cannot forbid me loving you, but you must command me to die. To prevent me from forbidding you to love me replied she, you must never tell me that you do love me: but now, since you have already told me, I can do nothing for you without doing something against my self. Do not murmure if I take my own part rather than yours, and so I most seriously entreat you to regulate your thoughts and your words; had I not a very great esteem for you I should speak in a worse dialect to you; but valuing you at a very high rate of esteem, I would have you continue, if it be possible, within the limits of friendship, and that you will not force me to lose you; I promise you to do all I can for you; and to attribute all your services unto your tenderness of friendship, so long as your tongue does not oppose the advantageous opinion which I would have of you. Oh Madam (cried out Herminius) I beseech you do not forbid me to use the sweetest and most pleasing word in the world, to those that have that passion in their hearts that it expresseth. For the word Love hath such a secret charm in it, as joyeth the heart of that lover that pronounceth it, and moves the heart of that person who heareth it, if she have any tenderness of soul; The word Affection, is a word ambiguous, and suits with Amity as well as Love: The word Tenderness, as obliging as it is, may be applied to them both: But the word Love needs no interpretation, it alone expresseth all that can be imagined most obliging, and most agreeable. Deprive me not therefore of a consolation which will not cost you any thing: And to put my self in possession of this sweet word, be pleased to know, That I have towards you the most tender, and most respectful love, that ever any had: and what treatment soever I have from you, I shall retain the pure and holy Love, till death. To shew you my sincerity (replied Valeria) I will ingeniously confess, that if I could handsomely entertain any affection of this Nature, you are the only man I know upon earth, whom I would most desire should love me: For, you are transcendent in vertue, and of such a spirit, as must I love. But Herminius, it is not permitted unto any woman of vertue, either to love, or permit being loved: Upon this, all the rest of the company met them; so as they parted without resolving upon any thing.

However, Herminius thought himself very happy, in daring to tell Valeria positively that he was in love: For, though she had not permitted him to love her, yet he flattered himself with some hope, her mind would bend: And yet he found more difficulty than he expected: For Valeria, who certainly was as virtuous a Lady as ever lived, did more strictly forbid him, than he thought she would, though she did it with much sweetness. But at last, Herminius was so full of obliging Courtship, that the heart of Valeria melted: For he prevented all her desires when he could guess at them: He contributed a thousand wayes to her delights: he rendred good offices to all that she loved: he had no pleasure in any place where she was not: he was the most respective man upon Earth: he writ to her a thousand pleasing letters which could not any way offend her: and he behaved himself so, that none spoke of him before Valeria, but they spoke highly in his commendations, so generally was he esteemed.

Thus Valeria, melting by little and little, she allow'd Herminius to love her: but in allowing him, she expresly charged him to give no publick testimonies of his passion, and would not of a long time permit him to use the word Love in his Letters: but Herminius found out an expedient for this: For, he Covenanted with Valeria, that the word Amity, should betwixt them signifie Love, both in speaking and writing to her. And accordingly, the thing being thus agreed upon; Herminius writ letters unto Valeria, which passed only for letters of friendship, though yet they were letters of Love. Herminius therefore, obeyed Valeria so well, that Spurius seemed to be much more in love with her than he: but hoping to hide his own Gallantry under the umbrage of Spurius, he went along with him in all he did; thus these two Rivals appeared to be very good friends. Spurius for his particular, was so perswaded, that Herminius was naturally Gallant, as he did not think him to have the least hidden design upon Valeria: So as he was well satisfied on that side, and thought upon nothing but how to please that fair one. Herminius went on with the more confidence, because [illegible] who was very glad of that universal civility [illegible] the particular esteem she had of him, she did not treat him ill, though she did not allow him to speak openly of his passion: Also Spurius seeing how vexed Salonina was at his loving Valeria, he loved her both out of inclination, and out of revenge. Mean while, Salonina to execute her design of drawing Spurius from Valeria, who without intention drew him from her, she told Volesus that the world talked very loud of their affection, and to stop their mouths, she would seem as if she had a will to recal Spurius. But Madam (said Volesus unto her) had you rather the world should say, you permit Spurius to love you, than me? Yes, answered she, for in such things, truths only displease: and indeed, she was in the Right. For, because Valeria and she did not love Spurius, they favored him many favours, which they did not Herminius and Volesus.

So as this became one of the most pleasant Passages that ere was heard of: For, Salonina did all she could to recal Spurius; Valeria, who quickly found out the design of Salonina, and took delight in returning one trick for another, she did all she could to retain him: So as Spurius, though loved by neither, yet was he most highly courted by two of the fairest Ladies in all Rome. He being in this condition, joying to be revenged of Salonina whom he loved not, and hoping to be loved by Valeria whom he did love, his spirit was swelled with such extraordinary jollitie, as he thought of nothing but diverting all the company, as well as Herminius, and to vex Salonina. Not but that he always spoke unto her with much civility: but he affected to come out with a hundred trivial expressions which might drive her into despair. It hapned one day that Herminius had made a Song which the Salians used in that ceremony which I mentioned before: Spurius not thinking that this Song was made upon Valeria, he told it unto all the Cabal, that it was the rarest song he ever heard: Salonina did ask it of him, but he answered, that it belonged unto him who made it, to give it. Herminius hearing what Spurius said, told her that the verses were not worth the giving, nor did deserve the glory to be sung by so sweet a mouth as Salonina's. For my part, (said Valeria then) without enquiring whose they are, I ask them of Herminius as of one most ready, when he is pleas'd, to oblige me. Should I lay that command upon one whom I know (said Salonina, and blusht for anger) I am sure I should find him lazy enough. I have heard you heretofore, so much commend Laziness, (replied Spurius coldly, seeing it was addressed unto him) as I think, that those who would please you, may do well to be Lazie in obeying you: But as for Valeria, added he, she is not of that humour, since she likes those best that obey her soonest. Salonina being stung to the heart to see the difference which Spurius put betwixt Valeria and her; she entreated Herminius to repeat three or four lines of that song: Herminius being all civility, did so; and repeated those lines which afterwards you shall hear: But to the end you may understand them better, you must know, that Herminius did sometimes call his Mistress, Clarice, when he mentioned her in verses. And complaining one day, that she would shew him no favour, but barely to let him love her; he had said in an angry Love-fit (which seldom lasts above a quarter of an hour, and does but more augment the passion which caused it) That if she did not grow a little kinder unto him, he would leave her. The lines were these, which Amilcar sung,

Clarice, I will leave thee now,
Though none so fair as thee I know:
A little Love is charming sweet,
But too much Love is torment great:
What's this I say? I cannot find
An alteration in my mind.

Well (said Amilcar unto Plotina, after he had sung) have I revived the attention of the company by this Air, which suites so well to the witty words of Herminius? Yes, replied Plotina; but the interruption should be too long, and we lose the sequel of the story; we will not commend your verses, nor your song, though they deserve it: So Amilcar obeying Plotina, he assumed his discourse in these Terms.

Herminius having repeated these lines which I sung, Valeria told him, that she should see ere long, whether he had any design to please her: after which, she went away: As for Salonina, her mind was miserably incensed: For she found it not so easie a matter as she believed, to bring into her Fetters the Revengeful Spurius, who went out with Herminius presently after Valeria was gone. In going together, Spurius obliged Herminius to pass that evening away with him at his house; whither they were no sooner come, but I desired Herminius to promise him a thing which he would ask, adding that it should be of such a nature as it would not any way be prejudicial unto him. If so, said Herminius, why do you not freely tell me, what your desire is? You know (answered Spurius) that sometimes one shall have odd scruples and Fancies, of which no reason can be given: I will not therefore tell you what I desire, until you promise me satisfaction: Herminius at last consenting, Spurius earnestly desired, to let him send those Verses unto Valeria which she asked of him: and (said he) since you have the honour of making them, let me have the honour of sending them before you. Did I think you in love with Valeria (added he) I would not make this request unto you: but since you are not, and I am, methinks you should not deny me. Herminius at the first, looked shie upon the matter, and was in half a mind to break promise; but after he had studied a-while upon it, he told Spurius that he was willing he should send the verses that same night, and promised that he himself would not send to Valeria until the next morning: So as Spurius after a thousand thanks unto Herminius, he writ to Valeria in his presence, asking him pardon, if in writing unto that fair one, he mentioned something against him: after this, he shewed the Letter to Herminius, who found in it these words.

Spurius unto Valeria.

Madam,

I Humbly send you the verses you desired, and I send them unknown unto Herminius; I beseech you, in comparing my diligence with his lazineſs, make such conclusions as may be advantageous to me: and it's to be presumed, that he who satisfies your curiosity with most celerity, loves you with most ardor. Therefore if you be just, you are as much beholding to me for sending you these verses, though you did not honour me with your commands, as unto him who made them, since he did not send them unto you the first. And yet I consent you should esteem him more than me, upon condition only you will believe I love you better than he.

After Herminius had read this Letter, he had much ado to let Spurius send it; but at last he consented, and stayed until the slave who carried it, returned, purposely to see what answer Valeria sent, which upon the slaves return, he found to be this,

Valeria to Spurius.

YOu are, Sir, without doubt, most officious and diligent, and in recompence of your care to please me, I promise you to quarrel with your lazie friend, and to chide him as much as I thank you.

Spurius upon reading of this Letter was extreamly joyed: but as for Herminius, he seemed as if he were angry: After which he went home, still promising Spurius that he would not send his Verses until the next morning. And indeed, he kept his word, and to be perfectly punctual, he sent not to Valeria, till noon, and then he sent them with this Letter.

Herminius unto Valeria.

I Doubt not, Madam, but you who are the most punctual, the most regular, and the most perfect person that ere I knew in points of friendship, will not think you have any great cause of complaint or accusation of lazineſs against me. For I can safely swear and truly, faireſt Valeria, that since there were any persons in the world which knew you, as much as say as, which honour you, admire you, and love you, there was never any over whom you had more sovereign power, than over me: but by a croſs and cruel adventure so it chances, that I have not sent you these Verses so soon as I desired. When next I have the honour to see you, I hope to make my innocence better appear; and then certainly I shall make you confeſs, that appearances are fallacious, and that if one will be actually just, one must never judge any thing upon uncertain conjectures, especially when Herminius is accuſed of negligence in obeying you.

Herminius having writ this Letter, and included the Verses, as if he knew not that Spurius had sent them to Valeria, and then dispatched them to that charming Lady, who was yet a little vexed at his supposed lazineſs; so as after she had read his Letter, which she looked upon as a bare excuse, she resolved to punish her lazy Lover by a dry answer, and writ not above two lines.

It was this.

Valeria unto Herminius.

I Received those Verses yesterday, which you sent me not till to day, so as to return you lazineſs for lazineſs, I will not thank you till to morrow: Adieu.

Herminius having received this short Letter, he smiled at the anger of Valeria in lieu of troubling himself, and hoped to appease her very shortly: and indeed, as soon as the hour of visits came, he went unto Domitia's house, the Mother of Valeria, but he found that Spurius was as diligent as he, and his hopes of receiving thanks from Valeria, had infused high joyes into his spirit. Herminius to augment it, shewed him the short Letter which he had received from Valeria, before they came to the house, for they met in the street: after which they went together unto that charming Lady, Ladys with whom Flavia and Salonina already were. These two Rivals no sooner appeared, but Valeria gave Spurius a thousand obliging thanks for the care he had to please her: after which she taunted Herminius with a thousand ingenious reproaches for his lazineſs. But Madam, (ſaid the laſt of theſe) I writ a long Letter, beſeeching you not to condemn me before you heard me. I confeſs it, (ſaid ſhe) but it was one of thoſe voluminous Letters that contain much and ſignifie nothing: for when one hath a good excuſe, they need not write abundance of ambiguous ſtuff as you did.

But the truth is, after you had ſlept very ſoundly all night, without any memory of my requeſt which I made unto you, and after you had ſpent all the morning, never ſo much as thinking I was in the world; at laſt it came into your memory, that I deſired thoſe Verſes which you ſent me, who never imagined that Spurius would have been more diligent than you. Whilſt Valeria ſpake thus, Herminius ſeemed as if he were in the wrong, and that he had nothing to ſay in his Juſtification: ſo as Valeria continued on her chiding: But Salonina ſeeing all this advantageous unto Spurius, ſhe took the part of Herminius, affirming boldly, though ſhe knew not why, that certainly he was employed in ſome buſineſs of extraordinary concernment. Flavia, who knew nothing of this adventure, ſhe wondered that Herminius, who was the moſt punctual and careful man in the world, ſhould let Spurius be before him. Well, well, ſaid Valeria, were Herminius of a lazie nature, I ſhould not wonder at this: but he is of a quick and ſupliant diſpoſition, ſo as no woman in the world can ask any thing of him, but he is ready to obey her, though he have no eſteem or amity for the woman. Spurius then ſeeing that Valeria was ſo angry with Herminius, he thought himſelf much obliged unto him, for ſuffering him to ſend thoſe Verſes firſt: ſo as out of gratitude, he offered to excuſe him. Valeria ſeeing Spurius more careful to juſtifie Herminius than he himſelf, ſhe bluſhed for anger, and [illegible] with a diſcontented ſmile, that till [illegible] thought her ſelf worth the pains of [illegible] one cannot juſtifie himſelf to her [illegible] ſaid Herminius mildly unto her, if you will [illegible] pleaſe to juſtifie me, it is none of my fault; for if you pleaſe to read my Letter aright, you will find I am not very culpable, or if I be a little, it is not againſt you. For my part, ſaid Valeria, the more you talk, the leſs I underſtand you. But I beſeech you (ſaid Flavia then) ſhew us the Letter which Herminius writ unto you, that we may ſee if we can find any thing in it more than you, to juſtifie him. The better to juſtifie me, replied Herminius, you muſt read the Letter which Spurius writ unto Valeria, before you read mine. Very well, (replied Valeria) I think you are out of your wits; for what uſe can you make of the Letter I received from Spurius, to argue your juſtification? For Spurius ſaies, he ſent me thoſe Verſes which you did not know he ſent: It is by the very ſame words you ſpeak, anſwered Herminius in a low voice, that I can juſtifie my ſelf: For take but the pains to joyn the firſt Letters of every line in my Letter together, and you ſhall ſee I know that Spurius ſent you the Verſes which you required of me; and though I did permit him to ſend them, it was only with an intention innocently to deceive you. Valeria hearing this, ſhe took his Letter, and called out the firſt Letter of every line; afterwards putting them together, ſhe found theſe Words, I know it charming Valeria. Oh Herminius! (cryed ſhe out) I muſt confeſs you are not ſo much to blame as I imagined: yet you are not altogether innocent, for I do not love to be deluded, and I am reſolved upon revenge.

Salonina, who had a liquoriſh curioſitie to ſee what Valeria had found in the Letter, which juſtified Herminius, ſhe deſired it of Valeria, who gave it unto her, but ſhe underſtood it not; Spurius took it after her, and found not the myſtery; Flavia the like, and none could diſcover this ſubtilty of Herminius: For they could not imagine that he made uſe of the ſame invention which the Sybil did, who ſold her Books ſo dear unto Tarquin, which were all in Acroſtick Verſe. So as at firſt, none but Valeria knew of Herminius his juſtification and artifice; but every one was ſtrangely ſurprized to ſee he had made his peace in their preſence, and not know how: Spurius, Salonina, and Flavia, entreated Valeria to tell them by what enchantment ſhe ſaw that which they could not ſee. Valeria fearing leſt Salonina and Spurius ſhould unite and imagine the truth of the kindneſs that was betwixt her and Herminius, ſhe explained the Riddle to them: at firſt Spurius began to complain: but Herminius told him he had no reaſon, ſince he had kept the promiſe which he had made him, in letting him ſend thoſe Verſes to Valeria firſt; adding withal, that it were too much injuſtice unto himſelf, to be out of Valeria's favour for his ſake: after this, Spurius was contented. But as for Valeria, though her anger was now only a gloſs, yet ſhe proteſted unto Herminius, that ſhe would be revenged upon him for this trick which he had put upon her: for as ingenious and as innocent as it is, (ſaid ſhe) it is a deceit, and one does not love to be deceived; prepare your ſelf therefore to pay dear for the pleaſure you have taken in jugling thus with me: I will prepare my ſelf (replied Herminius) for any thing you ſhall pleaſe.

Mean time, Spurius not dreaming that Herminius was his Rival, but thought as all the company did, that all his Courtſhip was Amity, and proceeded from his Humour, not Love, he made no reckoning of Valeria's anger againſt him, but commended the invention of Herminius. However, Valeria ſtill reſolved to be revenged upon Herminius, and the better to deceive him, ſhe would take a little longer time for it: during which, Salonina and ſhe ſtood upon the ſame terms, which was, That they did not love one another, though viſits were frequent betwixt them; and both of them behaved themſelves towards Spurius, as before; the one ſtriving to recal him, and the other to keep him, though neither of them loved him; and though neither Voleſus or Herminius were jealous: for Salonina and Valeria told them ſuch things as kept them from it. As for Spurius, it was hard to ſay, whether he had more pleaſure in his hopes of being loved by Valeria, or in ſeeing himſelf revenged of Salonina: But at length, ſhe having ſome light ſuſpicion that Herminius was a little far in Valeria's favour, ſhe had an itching deſire to ſee ſome of thoſe Letters which he writ unto her, ſo as to be better ſatisfied whether they were any Love-Letters or no: she desired her one day to shew one of them, and asked her before all the company, and in presence of Herminius and Spurius, hoping that Valeria would not shew any, so as thereby she might make Spurius jealous. I beseech you, said she unto Valeria, let me obtain one favour from you: If I can, or may grant it (answered Valeria coldly) I will not deny you. I will not desire any thing unjust, or impossible, replied she: Be pleased to know, that ever since I saw the Acrostick letter, I have had a great desire to see some more of Herminius his letters unto you; for I am extreamly in love with letters of wit, especially his. Madam (said Herminius) your curiosity is mistaken: For, my letters unto Valeria, are not letters of wit. Such as they are, replied Salonina, I should be much obliged if she would please to shew me one of them: Valeria, who knew her fetch, and knew withal, that by reason of the Artifice which Herminius used in writing, she could never discover their intelligence, she gave him one of the letters from that illustrious Roman; which she read aloud, none apprehending it to be a letter of Love though it was, and that most tender. But since they knew not that the word Amity stood for the word Love betwixt them, they were all deceived: for Salonina knew very well, that when a man writes unto a woman, whom he dares not tell plainly that he loves her, and yet would have her understand his meaning, he useth to write certain words, which are applicative either unto Love or Amity: As affection, tenderness and such others. So as finding the word Amity so frequent in this Letter, Salonina repented of her Curiosity, and Spurius was confirmed in his opinion, that Herminius was not in love with Valeria: This letter being in my opinion very ingenious, I will repeat it unto you two ways: and methinks it to be the best metamorphosed, that ever I heard: The letter of Amity runs thus,

Herminius unto Valeria.

DId you know madam, how unexpressably I am joy'd, to find that my thoughts of you are effects of a most sincere Amity, you would say that I have such thoughts in my heart, as are transcendently extraordinary. For upon a strict examination of my self, I find my self so highly happy in loving you as I do, as I would not for a World love you after any other manner. Indeed Madam, when I consider of all those thoughts which my Amity does inspire me withal, I am so charmed, to know that they are worthy of you, as I infinitely rejoyce in my self, that I can love you as you deserve to be loved: But that my happiness may be compleat, Give me leave to hope, that when I have let you know how my apprehensions of you, are apprehensions of Amity, and of Amity the most pure and tender, that then you will retaliate unto me Amity for Amity; for if you do not, I shall be more miserable than you can imagine.

Is not this letter, a perfect letter of Amity, and Amity only, in which there is nothing that in reason can cause any suspicion of a Love letter? And yet change but one word, and you will find it to be a most perfect letter of Love: And thus it is turned,

Herminius unto Valeria.

DId you know, Madam, how unexpressably I am joyed to find that my thoughts of you, are effects of a most sincere Love, you would say that I have such thoughts in my heart, as are transcendently extraordinary. Upon a strict examination of my self, I find my self so highly happy in loving you as I do, as I would not for a world love you after any other manner. Indeed Madam, when I consider of all those thoughts which my Love does inspire me withal, I am so charmed to know, that they are worthy of you, as I do infinitely rejoyce in my self, that I am able to love you, as you deserve to be loved. But that my happiness may be compleat, Give me leave to hope, that when I have let you know, how my apprehensions of you are apprehensions of Love, that then you will retaliate unto me Love for Love; for if you do not so, I shall be more miserable than you can imagine.

After this, it is easie to imagine what pleasure it was unto Herminius and Valeria, to see so many persons deluded, especially Valeria, who always charged Herminius to keep his Passion secret: And he so observant to content her, that he lived in a constant constraint.

Mean while Valeria, still resolving upon revenge, she pretended to be very ill, and kept her Chamber two days, suffering none to see her: The third day she sent a letter unto Herminius, with order to him that carried it, that he should deliver it unto one of his servants, and come immediately away without staying for any answer.

This was the style of the letter,

Valeria unto Herminius.

IF I break off with you for ever, then accuse
None but your [illegible] that cruel violence which my
I do unto my [illegible] only to punish your Perfidie. [illegible] that you should use any more Unto a person [illegible] ready to do any goodness for
You? I strictly forbid you ever seeing me after this Unworthy proceeding: For, I know that you cannot be innocent;
And will not trouble my self with any further [illegible] of your Artifice.

As bitter as this letter was, it did not trouble Herminius at first: for upon the first reading his conceit was, that Valeria had returned him this for trick, and that he should certainly find it so. Therefore he began to observe the Letter very exactly: for he thought Valeria to have more wit, than barely to write such reproaches, only to perplex him. He looked therefore upon the first Letters of every line; he examined also the last letters: he turned them every way: and after he had tried all ways, he found nothing but bitterness against himself, and could not find any Artifice in the thing. Then he began to conceit, that either Salonina or Spurius, had done him some ill office: So being pitifully perplext, he went unto Flavia, to communicate his fears unto her: For, if Valeria was in good earnest, he concluded himself most miserable:

sensible: and if she only juggled with him, it vexed him to be deceived, and that he, who was reputed so ingenious, should not find it out. But Valeria, who had a good mind her design should take, and who thought that Herminius would shew the letter unto Flavia, she trusted her with the secret, and made her promise to be close and faithful, Imagining much delight in deceiving him, who had deceived her. So as Flavia straining courtesie upon such an occasion to be a little false unto Herminius, she set such a face upon the matter, as she seemed as much surprised as he was. Consider well with your self, (said she unto him) whether you have not acquainted some or other, with your passion to Valeria: For, if you have, you know how nice she is upon that. No, no, no, replied he, you only are the confident of my Passion. Then, (replied she) is it not some spark of jealousie? For, truly Herminius, you flow so with an universal Gallantry, as would make me desperate were I your Mistress: when ere you write to a woman, be she what she will, you always use more charming, and tender expressions than come from your heart: when you Compose any verses ex tempore, they are as amorous, as if they were dedicated unto Valeria. And you use a hundred Courtships unto all women whom you love not, which you should use only unto such as you love: believe it, you ought to be more circumspect and wary in such trifles; especially when you love one of a nice and delicate spirit, and a heart sensible. Ha, no, no, replied Herminius, if Valeria be angry, it is at something else; for I have told her a hundred times, that I never writ any thing but of her, and that she has many names in my Verses, as are attributed to Diana, only to delude such as read them. Upon this he was strangely perplext, and desired Flavia to go unto his angry Mistress, and ask her from him, what her pleasure was: Then, checking himself; but if it be only a fallacy, (said he) she will laugh at me the more. But no matter, said he again, I had rather she should laugh at me, than to live in this uncertainty. Then he looked upon Valerias Letter again, but finding no manner of mysterious matter in it, he resolved to imploy Flavia to discover what this charming Ladie meant. She feigned therefore to go and ask her what the matter was, though she went only to laugh with her at the inquietude of Herminius. So as Flavia thinking to delude her friend, she did him a very good office; for Valeria was more glad that Herminius was so much afflicted at her anger, than that her fallacy had so well taken.

But to be short, Herminius was three days in this cruel perplexity, and never saw Valeria; yet at last, this fair one, resolving to discover the truth unto him, she let him come into her Chamber, where none but Flavia and she was. When he entred, the picture of sorrow was in his eyes; he approached her with more reverence than ordinary, and beginning to speak; Oh Madam, (said he) what has unhappy Herminius done? He has deceived me (replied she, and smiled) and therefore he deserves all the inquietude I have caused in him, and something more: for having so sharp a wit as he has, and a wit able to deceive the most ingenious, he may be ashamed, not to find that in my Letter, which would undeceive him. Ah cruel woman (said he) your Letter contains nothing but injuries, and yet you mock me, and would make me believe there is some hidden mystery in your words: To shame you the more (said she unto him) give me my Letter, and if I do not make you blush, deceive me again if you can. Upon which he gave her the Letter, and she shewing him the last word of every line, putting them together, he found them to signifie,

Accuse only your deceit for this innocent Artifice:

Oh Madam (cryed he out) you know how to deceive better than I do, and you can deceive the deceiver: after which, he commended her invention, blaming her inhumanity in letting him continue so long in such tormenting inquietude: but at last, Flavia made peace betwixt them, who were so inclined thereunto, that there needed no Articles of Agreement to be drawn between them: but naturally promised never to deceive each other again: And to love eternally.

Their affections being very innocent, Valeria was the more free: and she who was most assured that she was never criminal, did more obligingly testifie her tenderness unto Herminius, as if she had not been so well assured as she was of her own virtue. Mean while Salonina, who was most horribly vexed both at Valeria and Spurius, she knew not what resolution to take; for she began to be ashamed of the way which she took with Spurius to reclaim him: and she could hardly endure Valeria. Her pride inspired her with a most fantastical opinion: for she who told Volesus, that she complied with Spurius only to hide her affection unto him, began now on the contrary to comply less with Spurius and more with Volesus in publick, in a thought that jealousie would draw Spurius unto her. And she did it with so much Art, that Volesus was pleased with it: for then he believed that the affection of this Ladie to him, was stronger than her reason; so he left Salonina at liberty, to follow her own Capricious humour, without thinking any more upon it. But Spurius being more subtil than Volesus, he knew, that whatsoever Salonina did, she had a desire to re-engage him; so as he enjoy'd, as I told you before, all the pleasures that hope and revenge could inspire him withal; and all the Cabal wherein he was, were all so gallant, so pleasant, and so full of spirit and wit, as it was impossible to live more pleasant lives, than all these illustrious persons lived. Not but that for all this, Herminius and Valeria had sometimes some petty quarrels; but since they sprung only from excess of tenderness, they quickly vanished, and their reconcilements were so sweet, as their quarrels might be called augmentations of Love and delight. Yet once there was a day whereon they had such a jarring, as put them both to much perplexity, the cause whereof was very particular.

You may remember I told you, that Valeria charged Herminius above all things to keep the passion which he had to her very close and secret; so as being very exact and prudent, and careful to content her, he constrained himself very admirably well in all encounters. It hapned one day, that he being with her, the Prince of Pometia came in, who having found Herminius the day before in a walk far distant from all company; he began to chide him, and to ask what was the cause of his ſolitary humour. Truly Sir, (ſaid he unto him) I ſhould pump very hard, if I ſhould endeavour to tell you: For firſt, I am not in Love; and as for ſuch things as I ſometimes do in my foolery, I aſſure you, that I do them without invoking Apollo, or any of the Muſes: I do them either out of raviſhment of ſpirit, fancy, or humour, or out of a neceſſity to obey my friends: and yet it's none of all theſe that brought me yeſterday into that melancholy walk: but I walked alone only becauſe I had no other company. A man (ſaid the Prince and ſmiled) who tells he is not in Love, when he is not neceſſitated to tell it, does argue that he is: Truly Sir, replied Herminius, It does ſo ill become a man of my age, not to be in Love, that ſince I ſaid I was not, I diſhonoured my ſelf: but what I ſaid was true; and it is not the cuſtome to lie to ones own diſadvantage. Whilſt Herminius talked thus to the Prince of Pometia, Valeria ſeemed as if ſhe took no notice of what they ſaid, nor to think upon any thing but her Dreſs, though ſhe liſtned very attentively. She heard therefore, that the Prince of Pometia continuing diſcourſe, asked Herminius, who ſaid he was not in Love, how it was poſſible he could hit upon ſuch paſſionate expreſſions in his writing, if his heart were not amorouſly touched. Truly Sir, (ſaid Herminius) Love verſes are things very fallacious; for ſometimes one may come out with very melting verſes, yet never be in Love; for to do ſuch things, it ſufficeth if one be of a paſſionate temper, though he have no paſſion: I know a man of great merit, who compoſed a moſt rare Copy of verſes upon Abſence, even in the very preſence of his Miſtreſs; and complained moſt pitifully of her rigour, when he was highly in her favour. He whom you inſtance, replied the Prince of Pometia, was in Love, and, as I may ſay, did only tranſpoſe his Conceptions: but you, who ſay you are not in love, I cannot apprehend you. And yet it is ſo, (replied Herminius, ſtill thinking he had done well) after which, the Mother of Valeria coming in, the diſcourſe changed. Yet Valeria talked but a little all the day; and when any asked the cauſe, ſhe anſwerd, her head aked, which cauſed none to ſuſpect that ſhe had any thing in her mind which vexed her. The hour of retiring being come, the Prince of Pometia went away, and carried Herminius with him. The next morning betimes, this Lover failed not to ſend, and know how Valeria did, who ſent him word back, that ſhe was no better than ſhe was the night before: After dinner, Valeria, who naturally did not affect any gadding abroad, and went to Tullia as ſeldom as poſſible ſhe could, yet ſhe went thither with one of her Couſins; but though ſhe ſaw Herminius there, yet ſhe never ſpoke unto him, but ſhunned him, and looked with an air of much anger in it, which ſo much diſquieted Herminius, that he could not chuſe but go and make his complaints unto Flavia, whom he ſaw with the Queen, and who promiſed him to go out with Valeria, to ask her what the matter was. Valeria going out betimes, Flavia followed her, after ſhe had whiſpered Herminius in the ear, and bad him come an hour after unto Valeria's where ſhe would be, promiſing to tell him what crime he had committed. As ſoon as Valeria came home, ſhe went unto her Chamber, Flavia followed her; but deſiring to ſee whether Valeria would of her ſelf ſay any thing unto her, it was a quarter of an hour before ſhe ſeemed to take any notice of any perplexity in her mind, but talked of ſuch things as they ſaw at Court. But as Flavia ſpoke pleaſantly, Valeria anſwered her ſo ſolemnly, as it was eaſie to perceive her mind was troubled; ſo as Flavia not being able any longer to endure her perplexity without knowing the cauſe, ſhe asked her what the matter was, you are ſo melancholy to day (ſaid ſhe unto her) as I cannot chuſe but ask you the cauſe. In the humour I am, replied Valeria, you would do me a pleaſure if you would not ask it; for I can hardly tell you, and yet I do not love to refuſe you any any thing. Yet you muſt either refuſe me, replied Flavia, or elſe ſatisfie my curioſity: for you were not wont to be humorous: and yet I ſaw you to day look ſo coldly upon poor Herminius as you came from the Queen, that I think you have done him great injuſtice: at leaſt I can aſſure you, that he thinks himſelf very innocent, and cannot imagine what crime you impute unto him. If the ſenſe of his affection were tender and delicate, anſwered ſhe ſharply, he might eaſily imagine what it is that vexeth me: for to tell you ſincerely, all his tenderneſs and delicacy is in his wit and tongue, and not at all in his heart. But I beſeech you, (ſaid Flavia) of what do you accuſe him? Does he not love you well? is he unfaithful? is he not obſequious enough? is he indiſcreet? or does he diſobey you? On the contrary (replied ſhe, and bluſhed for anger) he is the moſt diſcreet and obedient Lover that ever was. You ſpeak this in ſuch a tone, replied Flavia, and ſmiled, as if obedience and diſcretion were crimes; and as if in way to juſtifie himſelf, he ought to disobey you in ſomething, and brag of ſome favour you have ſhewed him. Ah, anſwered ſhe, he was never culpable of that crime; for he is ſo much afraid of it, as one cannot ſuſpect him in love with me: and is ſo extreamly careful to hide his affection, as one would think he hid it from himſelf. Good Madam, replied Flavia, did you not command him not to ſpeak of his Love unto any but me, and to hide it from all the world beſide? I confeſs it, replied Valeria: but did he love me as well as I would have him, it were impoſſible he ſhould hide it ſo well as he does.

I am ſure he has friends who ſee him every day, and ſuch as know all his inclinations, yet none of them has the leaſt ſuſpicion of his being in Love; and he has Rivals alſo which cannot perceive it: ſo as upon ſerious thoughts, I muſt needs conclude, that ſuch an affection as one can ſo eaſily hide, cannot be great. But good Valeria (replied Flavia, and looked earneſtly upon her) do you ſpeak this in good and ſerious earneſt, or is it only ſome light whimſey? No, Flavia, replied ſhe, this thought which you may think to be ſome whimſy, is in my heart, and not without good Ground. But I beſeech you, replied Flavia, if Herminius by any of his ſpeeches or actions had given any cauſe to diſcover the affection that is betwixt you and him, would you not have grumbled at him, and have puniſhed him for it? I confeſs I ſhould, anſwered Valeria, but it ſhould have been only as an act of imprudence which could have excused, because I should have attributed it unto an excess of Love: but this excessive discretion whereby Herminius deceives all his friends, his enemies and his Rivals, I cannot impute it unto any thing but faintness, and coldness in his affection. Then you would have the love betwixt you known, replied Flavia, and all your commands of discretion upon Herminius, to stand for Ciphers. No, replied Valeria, and when I forbad Herminius to confess he loved me, I expected obedience from him: but to tell you truly, I did not believe he could do it so easily as he does, nor that any one of his Loves should betray him. Yet he is such a perfect Master of himself, that he never so much as looks upon me if any be present: he makes nothing of talking with his Rivals; and no longer since than yesterday, he had the power to say insolently before my face, that he was not in Love: which certainly is the hardest thing in the world for one that has a sensible spirit, and tender heart.

As Valeria said so, Herminius entred, so as Flavia, who had a desire to give him an occasion of making his peace, she told him that he was very opportunely come to justifie himself: Oh Flavia (said this incensed Lady) if you love me, do not tell Herminius any thing I said unto you. Since you have intimated, that it is dangerous to obey you too much, replied Flavia, and smiled, I do not fear disobeying you in this: And indeed, Flavia asked Herminius (mauger all that Valeria said) why he told the Prince of Pometia before his Mistress, that he was not in Love. Alas, replied he, and sighed, I said it in obedience to unjust Valeria, who commanded me a thousand times to hide my passion; and I said it with such extream repugnancy, as she ought to be infinitely obliged unto me for it. No, no, Herminius, replied Valeria, and blusht, never deceive your self: that which you said in my presence, can never be pleasing unto me. I beseech you (said Flavia) how came this to pass? Imagine, replied Valeria, that the Prince of Pometia should come hither, and ask Herminius what he did the day before in a walk towards the wood, where the Nymph Egeria inspired the wise Numa; and that Herminius when he had no need, should answer him, that he knew not what he did, but that he was very sure he was not in love, and repeated this unnecessarily at least four times. Judge I pray, whether a man, who makes these terrible words to ring in the ears of her he loves, without ever being forced unto it, does not deserve to be suspected of a shallowness in Love: For indeed it was stretching his prudence too far: and I should sooner pardon Herminius, if out of a rapture of affection, and unawares, he had said before any one, that he loved Valeria, than I should, if he had said before me with so much tranquillity and aggravation, that he did not love me. Then Madam (said Herminius unto her) give me leave to tell all the world that I do adore you; and then you shall see whether or no I be too prudent a Lover, and whether I shall not make it my greatest glory to wear your Chains. Take heed of that (said she to him) for it is not my intention you should publickly own your love. Oh Madam, replied he, what then would you have me do? I would (answered she) that you should bridle your self so far, as not to say grosly before my face, that you do not love me. I assure you, Madam, replied Herminius, that if you had not been within hearing, I had not said so: but my hopes of doing a thing which I supposed would please you, did prompt me unto it.

But charming Valeria, I am so far from retorting any of these reproaches which you have given me, that I thank you for them, and most humbly beseech you to tell me, how a perfect and respectful Lover ought to behave himself, when his Mistress forbids him to say any thing of his affection. I would not have a Lover (said she) give any occasion to make it thought he is loved: if it be suspected that he is in love, I would not have him say at any time, or to any person, that he loves his Mistress: and yet I would not have it such a horrible torment unto him, to hide the passion that is in his heart, as that he should think it the most terrible of all punishments. But above all, I would never have him able positively to say before his Mistress, that he is not in love: especially when he is not forced unto it by any necessity; for if he have a tender and passionate heart, it is a thing which he cannot imagine, much less brook: But then, Madam, replied Herminius, what will become of all those absolute commands which you laid upon me, not to discover my affection? would you have me still use the word Amity in my Letters, to express my passion? I would, replied she; but I would not have you say before my face, that you do not love me; for if you did love me fervently, you would not be able to pronounce those cruel words. Yet he (added she, and looked upon Flavia) did never so much startle at the sound of them, or give the least sign that he was loth to utter them, but spoke resolutely, and loud, and in such a tone, as seemed to speak his heart: Ah cruel Valeria (said he unto her) I can no longer indure your injustice: I beseech you (said Flavia then unto her) what should Herminius do to appease you? Would you have him go presently unto the Prince of Pometia, and tell him that he is ready to die for the love of you? For my part, I know not how Herminius can give you satisfaction any other way, to repair the great injury he has done you. I see, replied Valeria, that you mock me: but I will maintain that one, who knows how to love aright, will not condemn me, but confess with me, that what I now say will seem a little too nice, and perhaps fantastical to those that are not in love, but such as are will allow of it: Well Madam, said Herminius, I will confess my self to blame: But I beseech you, are no errors in Love pardonable? Yes, said Valeria, very many: but let me tell you, that coolness in affection is seldom pardoned.

Oh I beseech you, replied he, do not give my supposed crime, a title so incongruent and unsutable: for the truth is, I am not culpable but of too punctual obedience, and of prudence too excessive: and my crime (if it be one) is an excess, no defect in Love: for had I lov'd you less, I had not been so careful to obey you, and conceal my Passion.

After this, Flavia having pressed Valeria to pardon Herminius, she was pleased to grant it. Yet it was two hours before the ſame ſweetneſs, and joy, and the ſame tranquillity which uſed to ſhine in the eyes of Valeria, returned unto them: but at laſt, all Clouds being diſſipated, Valeria appeared in her accuſtomed Luſtre, and humour. As for Herminius, he was ſtill a little troubled: For, he was afraid of ſhewing either too much, or too little Love: knowing very well, that Valeria, what ere ſhe ſaid, would find as much fault, if he diſcovered his paſſion, as if he concealed it over-much.

Mean time, Salonina ſeeing none of her deſigns to proſper, ſhe was in a ſtrange perplexitie: and the more, when ſhe found the humour of Voleſus, who being of ſuch a Nature as could not love, but where he found ſome difficulties, and ſeeing Salonina did more overtly ſhew her affection to him than ordinary, he grew glutted, and leſs reſpective and amorous than he uſed. So as after all her endeavours to recal Spurius, both by ſweetneſs and jealouſie, ſhe found her ſelf like to loſe the only Lover which ſhe had remaining, though ſhe was fair, and wittie. As for Spurius, he ſtill thought himſelf very happy, although he had no reaſon.

As for Herminius and Valeria, they were both well ſatisfied, and had good cauſe for it: But, as it is impoſſible to love long without ſome rub, a chance hapned that vexed them both, and which might very well do ſo. For you muſt know, that the jealouſie of Voleſus being augmented, and Salonina fearing to loſe him, ſhe reſolved to renounce her deſign of recalling Spurius. But in ſeeking to juſtifie her ſelf towards Voleſus, ſhe was not ſorry to do any miſchief unto Spurius, or unto Valeria alſo, whom ſhe loved not: So as endeavouring all ſhe could, to piece Spurius and Voleſus together; the occaſion preſently offered it ſelf. She met with't in Domitia's Chamber: it chanced that Salonina was ſitting between Voleſus and Spurius: And it chanced alſo that the company was very great that day: And that the Ladies which ſate by Spurius and Voleſus being gone, Salonina and they were ſeparated a good ſpace from the reſt of the company.

As for Herminius, though he did not often apply himſelf unto Valeria before company; yet ſince the approach of hiding his Love over-much was laid to his charge, he Courted her this day more than ordinary. So as Spurius ſeeing his Rival with his Miſtreſs, and could not leave Salonina without two apparent incivility, he kept his place. Salonina making uſe of this unexpected occaſion, both to cure Voleſus, to vex Spurius, and ſpite Valeria; ſhe turned toward Spurius, and addreſſing her ſpeech to him with a diſdainful ſmile, Since I am naturally very pitiful (ſaid ſhe unto him) I think it an act of charity to comfort you for the ill ſucceſs you have in all your enterpriſes of Gallantry. For truly, as full of merit as Herminius is, I think Valeria ought to prefer you before him, though upon no other reaſon, but becauſe you love her more than he. All Ladies in general, (replied Spurius faintly) are ſo apt to be unjuſt, that if this misfortune do befall me, yet it is not the firſt time. Salonina underſtanding his meaning, was afraid leſt Voleſus ſhould hear, and underſtand; So as beginning to ſpeak again haſtily, without anſwering to what he had ſaid, ſhe told him, that he was more beholding to her than he was aware of. For Voleſus knows, that I being full of acknowledgment for all the ſervices which heretofore you have done me, I was very ſorry to ſee you engaged in the ſervice of a Lady, whoſe heart is not in her own power: and perhaps I have endeavoured, to diſengage you, without any other intention, but to break thoſe chains which unleſs you do undeceive your ſelf, will grow more heavy upon you every day. For truly, (continued this crafty Lady) Voleſus knows very well, that I had never endeavoured your Reengagement to me, but only to diſengage you from Valeria, as much my Friend, as ſhe is: For, I being better able to penetrate into her heart, than you, I was ſorry to ſee how ſhe made uſe of you, only as a Cloak to hide the inclination ſhe had unto Herminius. But ſince I perceive, you do ill interpret my meaning, I leave you to your own bad deſtinie, and declare, that I will never again endeavour to Reengage you to my ſervice, nor diſ-engage you from the ſervice of Valeria.

Whilſt Salonina was ſpeaking this, Spurius unluckily looked at Valeria, as ſhe was talking to Herminius, and had then in her eyes ſuch a paſſionate and ſweet obligingneſs, that he bluſht: So as it might be ſaid, that the looks of Valeria did more perſwade Spurius to believe what Salonina ſaid, than all the Language of that crafty Lady could. So as then, not rejecting what this envious friend ſaid, as he had upon other occaſions, and Voleſus making one in this Converſation, it grew at laſt a Converſation of real confidence on Spurius his ſide, and falſe confidence of the ſide of Voleſus and Salonina, whoſe aims yet were not alike: For Voleſus talked with Spurius only to make him underſtand, that Salonina had no deſign of Love upon him: And Salonina had no other intention, but to keep him from being in love with Valeria: For, as envie doth prepoſſeſs the mind as well as Love; Salonina did not think, that in making Spurius jealous, ſhe ſhould augment his Love to Valeria: And indeed, Spurius at that inſtant growing jealous, he did become much more in Love than before: And chance alſo would have it, that the converſation of the day did augment this growing jealouſie: For, be pleaſed to know, that Valeria after ſhe had done talking with Herminius, when Spurius had obſerved the ſweetneſs of her looks; ſhe began to chide Salonina, for ſeparating her ſelf from the company with two ſuch Gallants as Spurius and Voleſus. So as being all joyned together, and Prince Titus with Collatina being come, they fell inſenſibly to talk of Amity, and Love: Some ſaid, that Amity ought to be preferred before Love, becauſe the pleaſures of it are more tranquil: And others, that Love ought to be preferred before Amity, becauſe the ſweets of it are infinitely more ſenſible. I conceive (ſaid Herminius) it is not impoſſible to joyn theſe two kinds of Pleaſures together: and I affirm that to make a Love durable, it is requiſite, that a woman be both the Friend and the Miſtreſs of her Lover: I ſay further, that if Amity do precede Love in the heart of a Lover, his Paſſion will be ſtronger, more durable, tender, more respectful, and also more ardent. Spurius hearing Herminius say so, he made an application of what he said, as unto himself: So as out of those sparks of jealousie which began to grow in him; He began to contradict him, and to maintain, that Love and Amity cannot be both, in the heart of one and the same person. For said he, these two are so little resemblant, as it cannot be conceived they should at one instant, be together, without so confounding each other as they cannot both be discerned. They do confound themselves indeed (replied Herminius) but it is so, as two Rivers which meet and mingle: yet in mixing, (said Titus) these two Rivers make but one.

I do confess it, (replied Herminius) yet the Waters of both the Rivers are there, though they cannot be separated; and that River which is the most famous, and alters the name of the other which it hath received, is the better, and more fit to bear great boats. If Tiber, which hath received forty and two Rivers into its Channel, had only the original water of its source, it would be but a petty brook. It is almost the very same in love: for to love sincerely, to cause love barely, there needs no high spirit, great merit, great beauty, great generosity, nor any taking charms in conversation: there needs no more than youth and occasions of seeing: The order that Nature hath established, is sufficient to beget this simple bare Love, as well as in Birds that sing in their seasons: But then as for great and high passions, it is requisite to have all the ingredients that are necessary unto great and perfect amity. I do very well understand what you say, replied Spurius; but yet I understand it with this difference, That a constant love ought to be grounded upon esteem, whereas you conceive it ought to be upon Amity.

Esteem and Amity are so oft together (replyed Herminius) as it is easie to take the one for the other: For one can hardly have a very great esteem of any without loving them also: not but that I know one may sometimes esteem enemies, but that is such an esteem as has limits; and it may be said, they esteem their good qualities, but not them: for as I conceive, it is high injustice to hate any whom they highly esteem. I think then, I was not much amiss, when I said, that amongst persons who converse much with other every day, great esteem and amity meet almost together; and therefore since you agree, that a constant Love ought to be grounded upon esteem, you will easily confess, that it may also be grounded upon Amity.

When one begins to have affection unto a person, with his reason free, and disengaged from all prejudice; he shall know all his good qualities: he will see them without illusion; and he will be assured that he can never see them otherwise: but on the contrary, when Love springs by the eyes in an instant, he does not see things as they are; so as upon the least disgust that happens, his prejudicate fancy diminishing, he sees his Mistress far otherwise than he saw her before: and seeing what he saw not before, his thoughts also change, and he thinks not what he thought before. But a Love that has amity mixed with it, there is almost nothing but death that can extinguish it. I do conceive indeed (said Spurius) that when a Mistress has all the necessary qualities requisite in a true and generous friend, Love is more strong, but I do not conceive how Amity can become Love: and though I should conceive it, yet I cannot agree that Love and Amity can subsist together, but think, that this affection does change into another Nature. I conceive (said Herminius) that a great esteem which begets a great and tender amity, may also easily become Love: But, replyed Spurius, why should it not become love at the first? For a thousand different reasons, answered Herminius: and for a thousand reasons which we our selves do not know, though they be hid in us: for the same natural reason and instinct which teacheth all Children to hold up their hands when they fall, lest they should hurt their heads, though they were never taught it; the same instinct, I say, makes a man who begins to look upon a woman of vertue, modesty, and wisdom, not to love her at the very first, because hope which often precedes this passion, or at least begins with it, does not stir any such motions in him as are apt to beget an ardent affection.

It may be also, that this man who begins to be a friend unto any amiable woman, has then some wandring thoughts another way, which hinders his heart from being so pregnant of Love. But when esteem begets Amity, when familiarity augments it, and when the heart of a generous man is free and capable of passion; if an amiable woman become kind and tender towards such a friend, he easily becomes a lover. For certainly, it is easier for a heart already warmed with an ardent amity, to fall into ardent love, than a heart that is indifferent: and I affirm further, that the amity which a woman bears unto a man may make him more in love with her, than he would have been, had she not been at all tender towards him. For my part (said Valeria then,) had I a Lover, and should discover such a temper in him, I should dislike it: I would indeed have him in amity before he be in Love: but I would have it to be the knowledge of merits that should change the nature of his affection, and not the signs and symptomes of my amity. Madam, replied Herminius, in consenting that his love should arise from the knowledge of your merits, you consent also that the symptomes of your amity do contribute something unto it: for Amity, as I conceive, is part of the merit of a generous person: and for my particular, I should be sooner melted by the tenderness of a generous heart, than by her beauty only. But for all that, this does not detract any thing from the glory of a Lady who is loved upon that ground; for all her tenderness would not move, if she had not many excellent qualities besides, which render her so precious. So as when Amity becomes love in the heart of a lover, or to say better, this love mixeth it self with Amity without extinguishing it, there is nothing so sweet as this kind of love; for as violent as it is, yet it is always more regulated than ordinary love; it is more durable, more tender, more respectful, and more ardent, yet not subject to so many tumultuous whimsies as that love is, which is without amity. But still you must confess with me (said Spurius) that this Amity becomes Love, and does absolutely change its Nature.

I have already told you upon this subject, (replyed Herminius) That Love and Amity do mix together like two Rivers, the Nobler whereof carries away the name of the other. But for all that, the water of the lesser is as well there as that of the greater; so as though a friend which is become a Lover, does say always that he is in love, and not say that he is in Amity; yet certainly both of them are in his heart, though he can hardly discern them; And it is most constantly true, that a Love of this temper, is more perfect than the other: To shew that Amity and Love are all one, (said Spurius) in the heart of a friend that is become a Lover, I need only to instance, that commonly when a man in love, ceases to be in love, there remains nothing in his heart but hatred, or indifferency: so as it must consequently follow, that amity is quite turned into love, or at least goes along with it. This happens sometimes (replied Herminius) but it happens very often, that Love cools, and Amity still remains. For my particular (said Valeria) I had rather one should be indifferent towards me, nay hate me, than to be no more than in amity, after he once loved me: For if one should hate me, I might believe, that perhaps he loved me though unknown, and that his hatred was a disguised Love.

But as for Amity which remains after Love, I look upon it as a dead Love that has no heat in it, and good for nothing: I know very well (added she) that almost all the love of the best husbands becomes amity: But I know withal, that there are few good wives, but will confess that it were better to be the Mistresses of those they have married, than to be no more than the friends of their husbands: I mean, such friends to whom their husbands impart no more of their secrets, than domestick affairs, and with whom they never hold any sweet conversation. Yet there are some (said Collatina) who are both Lovers and Husbands all their lives, and live so kindly with their wives, that they do enjoy all the sweets both of love and friendship. I assure you, (said Valeria) it is a harder matter than you imagine, to be both at once a good husband, a respectful Lover, and a very well accomplished man; for to be a Lover is to be a slave; to be a Husband, is to be a Master; and to be a well accomplisht man, is to be neither a Tyrant nor a slave to his wife.

I affirm also, That it is the honour of such wives as have good Husbands to let them have such an authority as may appear to the world, though out of excess in love, or some other cause, they would not have it: And a good wife will never desire it should be said, that she is the Governor of her Husband; but only, that she has a good credit in his opinion, that he esteems her, believes her, and loves her; not that he obeys her, as if he were not able to govern himself. Nor do I allow, that a Husband should be continually shewing himself a husband; An imperious husband, who looks upon his wife only as the first servant in the House, who trusts her with nothing, who never considers her, and who treats her as if she had not the use of Reason, as if he were not obliged to love her, and as if it were his Prerogative to love a hundred others, and she not to say Mum. Collatina hearing Valeria speak thus, began to twit her, and to say, that doubtless she would make the best wife, and the best husband in the world, since she was able to discourse so well upon the Laws of Marriage. After which, it being very late, the company parted.

As for Spurius, he went home with a heart full of jealousie: As for Salonina, though she was glad to observe, that she was the cause of it; yet sometimes this jealousie which she saw encreased, did vex her, because she saw plainly that Spurius had no affection at all unto her: But for all that, her hopes to win him off Valeria, did flatter her.

As for Herminius, he went away well satisfied: But as for Valeria, she being of a most delicate and nice spirit, she took it much to heart that Herminius should so hotly affirm, that Amity and Love together was requisite. For from thence she argued, that the first thoughts which he had of her were no thoughts of Love: So as the first time she wrote unto him, she debated it with him: and for four or five days the subject of their Letters was upon nothing else.

Mean time, Spurius was very unhappy: For, a jealousie encreased every moment in his mind, his hope lessened, and Fears grew more strong. In a few days therefore, he was grown all melancholy, sullen, mistrustful, pettish, and easily angred: He imployed himself in nothing but observing all the actions of Herminius and Valeria: And the more he observed them, the more jealous he grew: Not that they lived any otherwise than they used together: But it is the Nature and Quality of jealousie, to prepossess, to change the objects, to seduce reason, and to force an interpretation of all things to the disadvantage of the Interpreter: It troubles the senses; and whereas the eyes do sometimes deceive the imagination, it happens very oft, that the Imagination of a jealous man deceives his eyes, and makes him believe he sees, what he sees not: So as Spurius, being possessed with a most violent jealousie, he imagined a thousand things that never were. And as a jealous man always finds more than he seeks for; and for Spurius sought continually how to afflict himself, in seeking for some comfort, he caused unto himself a fresh subject of inquietude by the way which I shall tell you. Imagine then, that to ease all his doubts, he thought no better way could do it, than to gain one of Valeria's Slaves, who was witty, subtle, and naturally a lover of her self: For he had heard that Valeria scolded her of that fault: So as Spurius neglected no way to win her unto himself: when he met her, he saluted her very kindly; he commended her handsomness, and always offered to give her money. At first she refused, and said, that her Lady had charged her to take nothing of any person; and seeing he offered to give her, only to try if she would take, and then tell her Lady, she would not accept of any thing.

Spurius, hearing this woman speak thus, and knowing that she tickled to be taking what he offered, he told her she was mistaken, and that he would not have Valeria know of any thing he gave her: So as this young wench, after some slight refusal, did begin to accept of several things from Spurius: and after he had thus engaged her, he got her wholly unto him.

However, though she was very trusty, yet he would not tell him any thing, but that Valeria received letters very often from Herminius. But quite mode of letters was in this Gallant Cabal, this gave him no satisfaction. This slave also told him, that Valeria was not very careful of those letters which she

she received from Herminius: and that till she put a great number of them together into her Cabinet, she always either carried them in her pocket, or left them upon the Table, not caring who saw them. So as Spurius pressing her to get one of them, she promised to do it upon the first opportunity: and accordingly, about two days after, she took from her Lady one of Herminius his letters, and gave it unto Spurius, who to have the better opportunity of speech with this slave, he went unto Valeria's, when he knew she was not at home, which hapned then very often: For since Salonina and Valeria were out of League, there grew much Amity betwixt Valeria and Lucretia, who seldom stirring abroad, except to the Temple; was more visited by her new friend, than she returned visits. Spurius then going to Valeria's one day, when she was with Lucretia, he asked to speak with the slave, with whom he held intelligence under a pretence of delivering a message for her Lady. So as this wench gave him the letter which she had taken: but in giving it, she began to laugh, and told him, that she had given him as good as nothing. At first, Spurius thought, that though the wench was witty, yet perhaps she could not understand the letter, for he knew that Herminius could write but too well. When the wench saw that he made no reckoning of what she said, she laughed again, and said unto him, I perceive you think, I know not what I say, and that you think a poor slave cannot read; but for all that, I deserve a recompence from you: For, first I assure you, that it is no letter of Love: That perverse letter was fuller of Amity; and that if I can understand any thing there is no sence in the letter; Spurius being tickled with an itching curiosity, and knowing that Valeria would quickly return, he opened the letter and found these words,

Herminius unto Valeria.

I Confess Madam, that my Amity preceded my amity: And Amity and amity do sometimes resemble: but believe it Madam, when that happens, either the Amity must be very tender, or the amity not very great: And if you would have me speak without disguisement, your Amity is as far from resembling amity, as my amity is from resembling Amity.

After Spurius had read this letter, he was much surpris'd: for he knew that Herminius used not to write Nonsence or Tautologies, or to put the word Amity so often in one letter without any sence.

So as not knowing well what to think upon't he carried away the letter, not knowing well what to make of it: The wench would have had it again, but he was resolved to examine it better before he restored it: He carried it therefore home; and when he was in his chamber, he read it over a hundred times; but understood it no better at the last than the first time, for he could not imagine what to make of the word Amity. The worst for him was, he knew well that there was some hidden secret under it: For, had it been one of those Artificial ingenuities which Herminius used, he should have understood it.

On the other side, the little care that Valeria took in hiding these letters from Herminius, did give him some consolation: but for all that, this Gallimaufry of Amity puzled him so much, that not being able to unty this knotty Riddle himself, he resolved out of an excess of jealousie to shew it unto Salonina, hoping that her acute wit would help him to discover what he desired to know. He went therefore unto her, but did not acquaint her with his intelligence he had with Valeria's slave, but told her, that a friend of his found the letter, and intreated him to decypher it. Salonina took the letter, and was as much puzled at the word Amity as Spurius was. She thought at the first that she had found out the trick, so as looking upon Spurius, she said unto him: you shall see that Herminius and Valeria are agreed to use the word Amity, in lieu of the word Love: if they had, replied Spurius, the Letter would be as much nonsence, for I will read it so, and you shall see it: and he read it thus.

I confess Madam, that my love preceded my love, and love and love does sometimes resemble: but believe it Madam, when that happens, either the love must be very tender, or the love not very great: And if you will have me speak without disguisement, your love is as far from resembling love, as my love is from resembling love.

Well, (replied Spurius, after he had read the Letter) Do you understand the word Love, better than you do the word Amity? No, replied she, but I am resolved I will. And indeed this Lady, whose heart was full of curiosity, of envy, of anger, of jealousie, of vanity, and who moreover wished heartily that Spurius might be jealous, she began to look very seriously upon this Letter of Herminius, so as having a sharp and penetrating wit, she observed that the word Amity was written several ways in the Letter, for it sometimes begun with a great letter, and sometimes with a little. So that as soon as she had observed this, she hoped to discover the trick on't: she judg'd also, that Herminius being so exact in his writing as he was, would not use sometimes great and sometimes little letters to no end: so as she thought that this different manner of writing the same word, might change the sence, and indeed she was not mistaken; for when they agreed that the word amity should signifie Love, Valeria asked Herminius how they should do when they used the word Amity to signifie barely Amity: Herminius, who was full of invention, he told her, that when the word amity was to signifie Love, it was to begin with a little a, and when it was to signifie amity only, it was to begin with a great A. So as Salonina having observed this difference in writing the same word, and imagining that it might change the sence, she began to try it after this rule, and then found that good sence followed: of which Spurius was as glad as she: Salonina also told Spurius, that certainly this Letter was a consequence of that discourse, wherein Herminius affirmed, that Amity ought to be mingled with Love. So as after Spurius had observed this rule which she directed him to follow he found these words.

I confess, Madam, that my Amity preceded my love, and love and Amity do sometimes resemble: But believe it, Madam, when that happens, either the Amity must be very tender, or the love not very great: and if you will have me ſpeak without diſguiſement, your Amity is as far from reſembling love, as my love is from reſembling Amity.

Oh Madam, (cried out Spurius) you have but too much wit for my tranquillity: and the nonſence which I found in the Letter of Herminius, had been better for me, than the ſence which you have found out. For truly, ſince Valeria holds any intelligence of this nature with him, he does her wrong to ſay, that her Amity does not reſemble Love, for ſuch artifice is needleſs for an affection of another nature: However, Madam, (added he in a tranſport of ſorrow) I beſeech you diſpenſe with me, for not returning thanks unto you for the pains you have taken in unriddling this Letter: for truly I have not power to do it. And to tell you truly, I ſee you ſo glad at your diſcovery, and at a thing which infinitely afflicts me, that I was not more grieved when you were the moſt rigorous unto me. If you would have me ſpeak ſincerely (repliqd Salonina) I think it ſomething ſtrange you ſhould not bear me any good will for the pains I have taken in undeceiving you: for had you rather not know that Valeria loves Herminius? Doubtleſs I had, replyed he, ſo I were never to know it. For my part, replied ſhe, I am not ſo of your mind, but am very glad you find that I am not the only reaſonable perſon who does not render juſtice unto your merit, and who cannot afford you any more than my eſteem: for ſince the firſt time you loved me (added this crafty Lady) you thought me the only perſon in the world whom you loved, that would not love you again: but now you find by experience that it is not ſo. Ah cruel Salonina (cryed he out) Do not torment me with the rigour of another, after you have ſo much tormented me with your own: but if you ſpeak thus, becauſe you repent of your former cruelty, I ſhall think you excuſable. No, replied ſhe with a ſubtle ſmile: but on the contrary I ſpeak as I do, to juſtifie my cruelty. As Salonina ſaid ſo, Collatina and Flavia came into the Chamber, ſo as ſhe having the Letter of Herminius in her hands, it was not poſſible for Spurius to get it from her. Yet he asked it in a low voice, but ſhe would not reſtore it, but ſaid to him in Railery, that ſhe had more right to it than he, after all the pains ſhe had taken in expounding it: ſo as Spurius not being able to endure any longer in that place, he went out, and being extremely vext both at Herminius and at Valeria he was not very ſorry that this Letter remained in the hands of Salonina, imagining that ſhe would do ſome miſchief unto Valeria by it, againſt whom he was moſt horribly incenſed. And not being able to contain his grief, he went unto one of his friends, to whom he related the ſtate of his fortune. Did ever any find (ſaid he unto him) a more croſs and peeviſh fate than mine? for within this few days, I found my ſelf the happieſt man in the world, and now the moſt miſerable: when Salonina endeavoured to re-engage me, I had all the delights of a ſweet revenge; and when Valeria treated me kindly, I enjoyed all the pleaſures which hope can give in love. But now, I know that Salonina cares not for me, further than to take me off from Valeria whom ſhe loves not. Valeria cannot endure me, but only as a cloak to hide her affection unto Herminius: and whilſt both Volcſius and Herminius are happy, I am moſt miſerable. I muſt confeſs (ſaid his friend unto him) that your adventure is cruel, but you ought to take good heart; and were I in your caſe, I ſhould be glad to loſe a Miſtreſs that ſhould love any of my Rivals better than me. On the contrary, replied Spurius, I ought to be glad of the rigour of an inſenſible woman: for I look upon her as one incapable of affording any felicity unto any one no more than me: I look upon her, (I ſay) as an imperfect perſon, to whom the Gods have not given any ſenſibility or tenderneſs of heart, and one who is unworthy to be grieved for: But alas! when I think upon all the Charms of Valeria, when I conſider ſhe is fair, witty, vertuous, pleaſing in her humour, modeſt, and as I think, capable of tenderneſs, I am ſo afflicted at the happineſs of Herminius, that I do moſt horribly hate him: And in this angry mood, I know no other conſolation I can have, but to make him miſerable, and to trouble all the delights of Valeria, of Herminius, of Volcſius, and of Salonina. And indeed Spurius did nothing all that day, but plot how he might ruine theſe four perſons whom he moſt horridly hated. Yet he diſſembled with them, the more eaſily to harm them: But that he might the better prepare himſelf with a garb of conſtraint, he feigned himſelf ſick for a while: after which he appeared in the company as ordinary, though a little more melancholy, and a little more troubled for Valeria. Mean time, Salonina, who kept not the Letter of Herminius for nothing, he made a viſit unto Valeria, and drawing her aſide, told her, that to teſtifie how much ſhe was her friend, ſhe came to acquaint her how ſhe had loſt ſome of Herminius his Letters, becauſe ſhe heard one of her acquaintance ſay, that he had one of them in his hands.

Valeria not thinking that any of Herminius his Letters could be ill interpreted, and did not think ſhe had loſt that wherein the word Amity was ſo often uſed, which was the only one that could raiſe any ſuſpicion; ſhe told Salonina that ſhe was much obliged unto her for her good intention; but truly, (ſaid ſhe) If I have loſt any of them, I am not much troubled at it, neither in relation to my ſelf or Herminius: For all his Letters are ſo well penned, and ſo far from any ſuſpicion of love, as I do not remember the word Love is ſo much as once mentioned in all that ere he wrote unto me: Then, replied Salonina, thoſe who tell me they have one, are falſe Impoſtors: for here's the Copy of that which they ſay they have in keeping. Upon this, Salonina ſhewed unto Valeria the Copy of Herminius his letter, with the words of Love and Amity in their right places.

This fair and innocent Lady knowing the firſt line, ſhe could not chuſe but bluſh: yet preſently recollecting her ſelf, and ſeeming to call up her memory, ſhe told Salonina that this which may perhaps be thought ſome myſtery, was nothing but ſome ſuch trick as his Acroſtick was, or ſome ſuch fallacy, by which he had ſo often diverted the Cabal: And upon better memory, he did once write ſome ſuch invention in my chamber, but I apprehended ſo little danger in ſhewing it, that I left it looſe upon my table: ſo as certainly ſome or other has found it, and put an interpretation upon it. Since it is ſo, (replied Salonina, and ſeemed to believe her) I will never trouble my ſelf to get the

the original out of their hands who have it: but I think it better to tell them the truth, and so let them shew it as the invention of Herminius. If all people were rational (replied Valeria) it were not amiss to do as you advise: but since there is an ill disposition in most people to interpret the best things in the worst sense, you would do me a pleasure in procuring me this letter, and undeceiving those that have made any ill construction of it. Madam, replied Salonina, since it was never my faculty to flatter my friends, I must needs tell you, that I think the course you would take, is not good, but better to acknowledge it as a real letter, and let it pass as a common and indifferent trifle which you value not. Were there a middle course between these two (replied prudent Valeria) it were the best, and therefore it will be enough if you only tell those that have this letter, how that I do not value it at all: And if ere I meet with an occasion wherein I may do you any service of the like nature, I shall entertain it with joy: Alas Madam (replied Salonina) since I have no friend so ingenious as Herminius, you are are never like to do me the like office. But, replied Valeria, since Telesia useth to write unto you sometimes, and since he loves you in another manner than Herminius loves me, It is not impossible but I may do more for you, than you shall do for me. However (said Salonina) I am glad that I can shew the letter which Herminius wrote unto you; assuring you, whatsoere you think of me, that I will act for you with the same thoughts that now I have. After this, Salonina went away: And this malicious woman so negotiated the matter, that within three dayes there were dispersed above a hundred Copies of the letter of Herminius: Yet Salonina had not all the pleasure which she expected from this malice: For Herminius was so often known to vent such pieces of wit as these, without any particular design; And Valeria had so great a Reputation of Prudence, that few or none believ'd it to be more than only a passage of wit, and no particular complicative aim of any Gallantry in it. Herminius found this advantage by it, which now I am going to relate unto you.

The perplexity that he saw in the spirit of Valeria, made him fear left she should take resolution of seeing him no more, only to prevent scandal. For, though Valeria's heart was all innocency; yet she knew, that scandal seeks only a pretence to calumniate the most vertuous persons. So Herminius, who knew that Valerius and Domitia loved him, resolved upon two things; The first, to acquaint Sivelia with his Love, and oblige her to consent unto his design, and help him. The second: To ask Valeria's leave to apply himself unto those who had the disposition of her, for their approbation of his affection. Herminius therefore, told his generous Mother of it, who commended his design, and assured him, that she would assist him in all that possibly she could: For she found in this alliance, all that she could wish for, especially Vertue, and Nobleness of bloud. But when Herminius pressed Valeria to let him speak unto her Father, he found greater resistance than he imagined: For after he had moved her unto it, with a thousand tender and passionate expressions and prayers, he saw she chang'd colour, and beginning to speak, she would not give him any precise answer: So as troubled in mind, Oh most Divine Valeria (said he unto her) do not put my passion unto any further tryal: you may know it, and to say more, do know it: And yet you speak unto me as faintly, as if you did not know I love you, and as if you had not permitted me to hope I should not be hated. Indeed, answered she, I do know that you love me sometimes: but how shall I be assured you will love me always? How Madam? (said Herminius and interrupted her) can you be so unjust as to say that I love you sometimes? I who have not a minutes rest in my passion: I, who love you more than ever any can; I (I say) who think upon none; nothing but you, who would not live but for you, who cannot live a minute without you. Though I should agree, that you do love me, replied she, yet I cannot, that you love me as I would be loved. But Herminius, do not deceive your self: but know, that if you did love me always equally, you could not do as I have seen you: There are some minutes, some hours, and some days wherein you can so well hide your affection, even when you are not constrained unto it, as I have cause to fear how I do inseparably conjoyn my Fortune with yours; Though you are the only man in the world, for whom I would without aversion obey my Father, if he should command me to marry. For, I do declare unto you, I had rather be the Wife of a man that hates me, and always has hated me, than of such a man as once zealously loved me, and afterwards does not. For, since the first of these ever hated me, I never loved him, and by consequence, his hatred never troubled me, as the indifference of him whom once I loved, would. But I beseech you Madam, replyed Herminius, why should you presuppose, that I should change my mind? Did you ever see me inconstant unto any of my friends? Oh Herminius replied she, some men may be constant in Amity, that are not so in Love: And there are some men, who never have but one friend, who yet have many Mistresses. Madam, replied he, I am none of those: For, on the contrary, I have many friends, but you are my only Mistress, and I can safely say, that I have no other but you: For, if I did ever think my self in Love with any, I now see I was much mistaken when I thought so: For I never had such heart-burnings for any as for you. Do not fear then I shall ever change, when I cannot hope to be better: Nor think, that though time should offer any injury unto your fair face, I should yet alter my mind: No, no, Valeria; I do not love you for your beauty only: There are other excellencies in your soul and mind, which I prefer before the charms of your eyes, and all outward Lustre: you have a thousand, and a thousand beauties, over which time and age has no power: You have a thousand and a thousand Treasures which are not in the power of Fortune, and worth much more, than all those she is able to give: Fear not then, that my Passion will ere diminish as long as it is built upon so sure a foundation, and Cause so solid; I am nothing of the humor of those men, whose Loves are damped as soon as a little sickness has paled the Complexion of their Mistres-

ſes. I moſt humbly beſeech you Madam, think better of Herminius, and deny him not that permiſſion, which he aſketh, unleſs you will have him think you never loved him, or that you never will love him, and that you would not have him love you any longer. Though I ſhould (replyed Valeria, with a demi-bluſh) you would not believe me: For indeed I do not refuſe to conſent unto what you deſire, but leſt in conſenting, you ſhould love me no longer, or love me leſs. After this, Herminius redoubled his prayers, and expreſſed his deſires ſo tenderly, and full of paſſion, as ſhe permitted him at laſt to ſpeak unto Valerius her Father. So as Sivelia, who knew the vertue of Valeria, and much approved of this alliance, ſhe moved it unto Valerius, who liked the propoſition as well as ſhe could deſire.

But though both ſides carried the matter very ſecret, that it might not be known untill all was conſummated; yet the joys of Herminius did betray this important ſecret, and made Spurius partly gueſs at the truth, and fully diſcovered it by the intelligence of that wench which gave him the Letter of Herminius: ſo as entring into a new deſpair, it cauſed ſuch a diſturbance in his heart, as did confirm the opinion of ſuch who ſay, That a violent paſſion is often ſtronger than vertue or reaſon. For Spurius, who till then, had done nothing for which he could blame himſelf, unleſs loving too long, after all hopes of being loved was gone, he took a courſe to hinder Herminius from being happy, which he would not have taken, if jealouſie had not altered the conſtitution of his ſoul.

The truth was, he was an enemy unto Tyranny; he hated Tarquin; and he heartily wiſhed the liberty of Rome: yet in tranſport of paſſion, which then was Miſtreſs of his heart, he thought it not impoſſible to hinder the marriage of Valeria with Herminius, by acquainting ſome that were of Tarquins intereſt, how that in policy he ought to prevent this Alliance. Spurius then being acquainted with one that was kinſman unto Heſtius, that was in favour with Tarquin, he went to ſee him; and ſeeming to talk of the marriage of Herminius and Valeria, as the news of the Town, he began to ſpeak of the good fortune of Herminius. For truly (ſaid he very ſubtilly) if he had not good fortune, the King would never permit this marriage, which unites two of the moſt potent Families that are his enemies, and out of whom there are more exiles ſince Tarquin reigned, than any others in Rome. Spurius ſeemed to ſay this, not as if he deſired him unto whom he ſpoke, to tell Heſtius, and that Heſtius ſhould tell Tarquin, but only as wondring at the good fortune of Herminius. For he knew very well, that he to whom he ſpoke, would tell Heſtius all he heard: And indeed, as ſoon as ever Spurius was gone, this man went to his Couſin, and told him all he knew. Heſtius conceiving indeed, that this alliance between two Families, enemies of Tarquin, was to be prevented, he went unto that Prince to acquaint him with the buſineſs, and the conſequences of it.

Tarquin, who, except Horatius and Clelius, hated Valerius and Herminius, more than all the reſt of his enemies, he reſolved to prevent this marriage by his abſolute authority: Thus when Herminius and Valeria thought to paſs all their lives together in a moſt happy condition, Tarquin ſent for Valerius, to tell him, that for ſome reaſons which related unto the good of his ſervice, he charged him not to marry his Daughter unto Herminius.

Valerius out of his great and noble ſoul told Tarquin all that his generoſity guided by prudence did dictate unto him, to oblige him not to conſtrain him in a thing which ought to be free. But Tarquin anſwered, That if Herminius married Valeria, he would baniſh them Rome the next day, and that they ſhould never enter the City again.

Valerius not being able to oppoſe force, he retir'd home, where he found Herminius, who impatiently expected his return; for as a Lover is always fuller of fears than any other, ſo he was more diſquieted than Demitia, that Tarquin had ſent for Valerius. But when he was returned, the ſorrows of Demitia, of Valeria, and of Herminius, were extreme. Valerius related unto them word for word, all that the Tyrant had ſaid unto him, and all that he anſwered: after which Valerius ſpake unto them with abundance of wiſdom: For after many other things worthy of his great heart and high ſpirit; To teſtifie unto you (ſaid he unto Herminius) how much I eſteem your vertue, and how happy I think my Daughter would be in being your wife, I do declare unto you, that were it not I have ſome ſecret hopes to be one day profitable unto the liberty of my Country, I would exile my ſelf, and I would adviſe you unto the ſame, that you might live with Valeria in ſome part of the world, where vice does not triumph over vertue, as it does at Rome. But generous Herminius, you having ſo much ſpirit, ſo much heart, and ſo much vertue as you have, you are a Debtor unto your Countrey as well as I am: Therefore I exhort you to ſtay here, and to overcome that innocent paſſion which you have in your ſoul.

But to teſtifie how much I value you, I do declare unto you, That if your vertue cannot overcome your love, and that you cannot live miſerably, I do conſent to give you my Daughter, to deprive my ſelf of her and you for ever, and to permit you to go and dwell in ſome other part of Italy, where the power of Tarquin is not acknowledged, provided Valeria conſent unto it. Oh Sir, replied this wiſe Lady, though I do eſteem Herminius far above all other men, yet I do declare, that I am not able to abandon you to follow him: and I think him ſo generous, as he will not deſire to take me from the beſt father in the world: but I hope he is ſo reaſonable, as to be contented with that aſſurance which by your permiſſion I ſhall give him of my affection, that though we cannot live together, yet I will with all the innocence, and all the tenderneſs of a ſiſter, preſerve it inviolably for him: Yes my Daughter (ſaid Valerius) I do permit you to love Herminius as the only man worthy to be your Husband: and I would have Demitia alſo to love him, as if he were her ſon.

Oh Sir, replied Herminius, you do ſet before me a moſt happy example of vertue for me to imitate; for I muſt ingennouſly confeſs, that if you and Valeria did not give me ſo great an example of generoſity, yesterday, I cannot tell what answer I should have returned. But yet I see that I should be the most ungrateful, and most unjust man in the world, if I did not think my self happy in my misfortunes, though through the grandeur of my passion, and the Tyranny of Tarquin, I am the most unfortunate of men. As Herminius said this, one came to tell Valerius, that Spurius desired to speak with him: And indeed, that revengeful lover knowing that Tarquin had sent for Valerius, and being impatient to know whether his design prospered, he took a pretence of some business to speak with Valerius, purposely to see in what temper his spirit was. So that Valerius seeing tears in the eyes of Valeria, and despair painted in the face of Herminius, he went into another Chamber to receive the visit of Spurius. Valerius was no sooner gone, but word was brought Domitia, that some Ladies desired to speak with her; she seeing Valeria and Herminius in a condition unfit for visits, she put them into a Chamber within her own, and commanded the woman of Valeria to wait upon her Lady.

Valeria and Herminius were no sooner at liberty, but extremes of sorrow taking away their speech, they looked upon each other a while, and did not speak: Afterwards they went and sat down in the further part of the Chamber, where the servant durst not approach out of respect, though she had an itching desire unto it, that she might report unto Spurius what she heard.

But after this silence had lasted a while, Herminius was the first that broke it by a great and profound sigh, which was a preface unto the saddest words that ever afflicted lover pronounced. Alas, Madam, (said he unto her) Herminius now must not be happy in fair Valeria: it may be, I shall live a while after so sad a doom: But Madam, you that know how to love, do also know, that this word, Never, is a most fatal sound, if it be applied as I do. Yes Madam, to think that you shall never be mine, does cast such a gloomy mist upon my spirit, that my reason is confounded; and I repent of what I said unto the generous Valerius and you, when I commended both your vertues: Yes Madam, I am so overwhelmed with sorrow, that I have not the use of my reason, so as I think it not a folly to hope that I shall see Rome delivered from the Tyrant that oppresseth it; and by consequence, that it were an act of generosity to get out of a place where a Tyrant reigns so tyrannically: yet I know, that what Valerius has done, is great and Noble: but yet Madam, the love of a Father is nothing like the love of a Lover: And to speak things as they are, it is unjust to refuse being happy, out of reasons which have only appearances of glory: Truth is, there is not much probability, that Tarquin may be destroyed, and were it not more generous to flee out of his Tyranny, than to endure it, out of an ill grounded hope that one day he may be destroyed? Voluntary exile has some Generosity in it, when the cause is of such a Nature as this which calleth us; And since (my dearest Valeria, if a miserable man may call you so) it is so, it is not sufficient to live with the person whom one loves: Rome is a strange Country unto me, if we cannot live together in it: Asia or Africa shall be my Country, if I live there with you. But Herminius, replied Valeria and sighed, let us live still at Rome, and we shall always see each other as now we do.

Oh Madam, (said he and took her hand) you love but little, I know, you can be contented with the present condition of our Fortune: I know we shall be both in the same Town, That Sivelia's house is not far from yours: that I shall see you every day, and that I shall sometimes speak with you when none understands us but our selves: But all this will not make us happy, if you do not love me as I love you. For when love is ardent, the Lovers would be out of all danger ever to lose each other: they would be made as sure as possibly may be: They cannot without sorrow but they must sit together, if they be in company: And much less endure to be separated by whole streets, and a thousand obstacles which hinder them from seeing one another every minute: nor can they enjoy a thousand pleasures which the society of the person loved can give them. For my part, I am not of your opinion: I can think any Lover is able to say that he is happy, but when he has nothing to fear, nor hope for: Into what a lamentable condition am I reduc'd, who am in perpetual fears of losing you, and sees none but weak hopes of having what my affection merits: If Tarquins Ruine be the ground of my felicity, I have no remedy but death, since it pleaseth the Gods for Reasons which are hid from us, that he should be happy, and continue still Master of Rome. Alas, was ever any misfortune equal unto mine? for I dare not say equal unto ours, not knowing whether you will share so far in my misery, as to make it properly spoken. Truly, Herminius (replied Valeria) it is impossible you should doubt of my mind, and not know that I am most sensible of our cruel destiny; And truly, there is nothing more insupportable than to consider the obstacles of our happiness: Nor any thing that makes it more apparent, that the secrets of the gods are impenetrable: For they do cross our happiness, as if it were a crime to be good, and because there are too many men of vertue in your Family, and mine. Were I daughter unto some of Tarquins vicious Favourites, we should be happy: But because your Parents and mine are true Romans, we must be miserable.

Oh Madam, replied Herminius, you shew your abundance in goodness by speaking thus, and in not suffering me to bear the heavy burthen of my misfortunes alone, but to share with me in calling them ours: But Madam, are all these misfortunes without any remedy? Can we not consummate a marriage secretly, and live happily in some corner of the World? is your love to me so small, that you can deny me in a thing that is innocent? Should I desire any thing from you that were criminal, I should be unjust. But Madam, I am none of those Lovers, who think the Grandeur of their Love can make unjust requests excusable: Your vertue does regulate my will, and keeps my desires within the limits of innocency: but for you I have some cause to think, that I have some right to obtain from you any thing that is no crime. Give me therefore leave to get the consent of Valerius, either that I may marry you secretly, or that we may live out of Rome. You heard him so generous as to offer it: and you will be the most cruel person in the world, if you oppose my my happiness. Say rather the most reasonable, replyed Valeria: For indeed, Herminius, we should be the height of imprudence if we should think to hide a thing which in all likelihood will come to be known, and which would expose us unto the cruelty of Tarquin. Besides, such a secret would be contrary to my fancy and humour: And as for quitting of Rome, and my Father for ever, I am so sure that I ought not to do it, as I will never think upon it: Oh Madam, (replyed Herminius) you are too cruelly wise; what a sad Fate it is, I should be so deeply in love, and so miserable as to love one that will not do for me all that vertue permits her. Vertue, replyed this wise Lady, does doubtless allow all that reason does: But Reason sometimes allows more than vertue: Therefore, since it is equally laudable to be vertuous and to be reasonable, be for my sake both the one and the other: Submit your mind unto your Fortune; and to oblige you unto it, Consider, that in quitting Rome, you quit the Interests of your Country, you quit the vertuous Sivelia, you quit Valerius, you quit all your Friends; and more than all this, you will see me most sadly mourn for the absence of Valerius, and Domitia: Yet do not think (added she most obligingly) that my tenderness to you is the less: For it is to be thought, that one who has so much affection for a Father and a Mother, has a most ardent affection for a Lover, and would have for a husband. But of what use are Reason and Vertue, if they be not imployed upon such occasions as this? They will serve, Madam, replyed he, to make the Grandeur of my Love to be seen: But Madam, if I must yield unto you, what comforts shall I have in my misery, and what assurance against my Rivals, the number of which, I see, does every day increase? You may trust unto the promise which I shall make (replied she) That as long as you love me, I will love you: And, since the persons, who have the disposition of me, consent unto it, I will love you without any scruple. But Madam, replyed he, why do you say, that you will love me as long as I love you? Are you not able to say positively, that you will love me for ever, since you may be sure I shall love you as long as I live? When one does love, replied Valeria, he thinks that he shall Love always, and yet thousands of examples make it evident, that there are some Lovers, who cease to Love. Oh Madam, replied he, the heart of Herminius is not alike unto those Lovers that think so: Since so, replyed she, The Term that our affections shall last, shall be equivalent, since if you love me as long as you live, I will love you until I dye.

Herminius was so charmed to hear these obliging words from the mouth of Valeria, that he resolved to submit his spirit unto the reason of this wise Lady. He therefore commended her, he asked pardon for his importunity, and beseeched her to pity his imbecillity, and to comfort him in his misery, by her constant goodness.

So as Valeria being very glad to see that the power she had upon the heart of Herminius was so great, she spoke unto him so obligingly, that when Domitia and Valerius returned, they found his Soul in such a temper, as they desired it to be. Being therefore both of them charmed at his vertue, they assured him that they would love him as their own Son, as long as they lived. And indeed, ever since that day, they did love Herminius better than before. Yet for fear of incensing the Tyrant, they agreed, that for a time, he should not come so frequently unto them as he used, nor, that he should hide any of his sorrows, to the end, that unjust Prince might know by his spies, that they had obeyed him.

Things being thus, Herminius not acquainting Valerius nor Valeria, he went unto Prince Tatius, and to the Prince of Pometia, and imployed them to move Tarquin not to oppose his marriage. But though these Princes were very zealous in the service of Herminius; yet they could not do him any good: So as he grew so melancholy, that the Sabinitick Spurius was comforted in all his disgraces. He had also the pleasure to see, that Salonina did not marry Volesus: And some there was that suspected, he hindred the Parents of that Lover from consenting unto his marriage. So as though Spurius was not loved by neither Salonina, nor Valeria, yet he had the satisfaction to see they did not marry those whom they did love: and to break off the Society of so many excellent persons, who were always together. But Herminius yet found out an invention to establish another Cabal: for the Amity between Valeria and Lucretia being very great, these two Ladies became inseparable. So as when Lucretius the Father of Lucretia permitted his Daughter to go unto Rucilia in the Country, The Cabal grew as gallant as ever, Lucretia, Herminia, Collatina, and Valeria, being of it.

But the thing most particular in this adventure was, that Spurius, who now hated both Valerius and Salonina, and also Volesus and Herminius, especially the last of these, he took a fancy, that since he no other could, nor would be any longer his Rival, he would find him one that should. Endeavoring therefore how to bring such a fantastical design to pass, he bethought himself of Mutius, who till then never seem'd to have any amorous inclination, for, as perhaps you have observed him, Mutius is naturally proud and ambitious, and the love of Glory takes up so much of his heart, as I believe Valeria with all her charms would not be so pleasing to him, as some dangerous occasion would be, if he were sure to come off with honour. So as Mutius having a heart full of nothing but Heroick design, he never minded such trifles as are the delights of lovers: you should see him oftener with grave bearded Senators, discoursing upon the valour of Romulus, than with young Gallants. So as Spurius who was a friend unto an Uncle of Mutius, who had the Guardianship of him, he cast his eyes upon him for this fantastical design: And indeed he made no ill choice; for Mutius was handsom, he had wit and spirit; he was proud and haughty; and he was fit to court a Lady, and enrage a Rival. Spurius then finding Mutius as he was walking with one of the gravest Senators in the Capitol, he drew him aside upon pretence of some business with him. Sir (said he unto him) I beg your pardon for depriving you of a conversation which I know you preferred before all the young men of your own age, and before all the beauties in Rome: But, Sir, to speak sincerely, (added he, and smiled) I do aim at your honour in it.

For

For to be free with you, I love you very well, and you have often told me, that you would follow my advice in all things. Mutius was a little surprised at this, for he knew not why he should be reprehended for preferring wise men before such as were not: Though he did not love any reprehensions, yet since his Uncle had often commanded him to follow the advice of Spurius; and since he had often promised that he would, he asked him wherein he had failed, beseeching him to tell him, what he would do to get honour and glory. Since you would know, replied Spurius, I would, that you should not cross the order of nature: I would not have you wise before your time, but to think there is a kind of folly which well becomes all young men; and that to arrive at Glory the sooner, you must do many things which may seem a retreat from it: For in lieu of applying your self eternally unto these old, grave, and serious Sages, who are experienc'd in the conduct of affairs, and command of Armies, you should see all the Ladies in Rome, that have any beauty, wit, or handsomness: you should make your self some friends out of such as have spent five or six years in Gallantry, and are able by their example to teach you how to behave your self in the world. You should be in society with all such as have any reputation of excellency, but not hang upon them too much: Never go where you are not wished for: nor imprudently molest the pleasures of others, when you are not diverted your self; nor inconsiderately engage your self in such foolish company as meet with any business, and where none desires you. But you should cunningly and handsomely make your self desired: you should be sociable, you should love pleasures, you should court Ladies of merit: you should invent occasions to divert them: you should not be too merry nor too grave; but temperate with judgment: you must not be a Wit, nor Sword-man, nor a Gallant of profession. I beseech you (said Mutius) Tell me what one should do to get them: you must fall in love, replied Spurius. But, said Mutius, Can one fall in love when one will? I assure you (answered Spurius) when one is of your age, it is harder to keep out than to fall in love; but as long as you keep company with none but gray bearded Senators, your heart cannot be so easily engaged in love. But yet, replied Mutius, when I am in company with those men, I think my self very well; and they commend my wisdom and virtue: but on the contrary, when I go amongst Ladies, I am so far to seek what to say unto them, that I perceive they laugh at me. Oh Mutius, said Spurius, all compleat men must be expoled unto the Railery of women, before their wits can be refined; ask any of the Senators whom now you see so grave and wise, whether they were always so: if they be sincere, compleat, and ingenious men, they will tell you they were laughed at the first year they entred into the world; and that the second year they laughed at those who came after them: They will tell you that they loved amorous and gallant conversation and pleasures: That they had never been so compleat and polite, but by a desire to please; and that they had never found any such desire, but by being in love: They will tell you also, that love made them more zealously affect glory: made them more liberal, more valiant, and that they were much beholding unto this passion. But you know, replied Mutius, that all Lovers are not happy: Most true, replied Spurius, However (answered he and smiled) they have more consideration than you: For a man that knows the world a little better than you do, would never upbraid me that I was never in love. But Mutius, take all well that I say: for you may think that I have no other interest in the counsel which I give, but only to save me the sorrows to see, that you who are handsome, of a good birth, of spirit, of wit, do yet not employ them as you should.

Mutius hearing Spurius speak in such obliging language, did thank him, and assured him that he would follow his advice in all things; yet being of a proud temper, he did a little stomach this reprehension: but having a strong affectation and desire of glory, he resolved to hearken unto Spurius, and to ask him what he should do. You must so behave your self (said he) that it may be reported as news, you are in love with some person of merit: For though you be not so really, you ought out of prudence to behave your self as if you were; and therefore, if you will follow my advice, you shall accustom your self to see all the Ladies, who have highest reputation of beautie, wit and gallantry: Amongst the rest, Lucretia, Collatina, Hermilia, Flavia, Salonina, and Valeria: And to avoid that shame which your fear, of being reproached for not being loved, begin with one who is accustomed not to love those who court her, to the end you may not be the only man who shall be reproached, if your design do not take. And therefore apply your self unto the service of Valeria; and if you prosper better than I, doubtless it will be glorious unto you; and if not, you have the consolation that you are not without company.

But I beseech you, replied Mutius, is it not reported, that Herminius is much in her favour? Most true answered Spurius, and therefore it is that I advise you to undertake a design so brave: for an old Lover is sometimes easily driven out by a new Rival. Besides, you being young and brave, one that loves Glory and difficult enterprises, it will be a noble attempt to conquer a heart that is defended by a brave man, and much more glorious, than to assault one who will yield without resistance: The Mistress is fair, the Rival is owner of a thousand admirable qualities, and the enterprise is worthy of your self: To be free with you, I shall be very much obliged unto you, if you attempt the conquest. For I assure you, I shall be as much joyed if you can obtain the love of Valeria, as I should have been heretofore, if I my self had been loved. After this, Spurius used several other inducements: so as Mutius, out of a pure appetite of glory, undertook to serve Valeria. Submitting himself then to the Counsels of Spurius, he quickly gave him the opportunity of being received in this Noble societie; for Mutius was of quality to be received any where. Mutius, he had so deeply imprinted the love of Valeria in his fancy, that it became good earnest: so as after this he stood not in any need of counsel from Spurius, for his own passion advised him what to do: Not that he had so many Talents of Gallantry as Herminius had, whose spirit was even Gallantry it self; But it being the quality of Love to tame the fierceness of Lions, and cruelty of Tigers, Mutius, who till then had none but Heroick designs in his soul, was now capable of lesser thoughts of submission and complacency: So as he quitted the company of his old Seigniors, and a great part of his wisdom, to see Valeria and all her friends. Herminius, he was so assured of Valeria's heart, that at first, this new Rival never troubled him: but afterwards, it is so natural not to abide Rivals, and to fear lest they should make some progress in the heart of the person loved, that Herminius was disquieted at the passion of Mutius: so as upon divers occasions, they were very sharp upon one another, until fortune presented Herminius with a great occasion of glory in giving him an opportunity of saving the life of Mutius, when by the orders of Tarquin he was to be assassinated as he was going to the house of Racilia where Valeria was, and where Brutus and Herminius did that action which was so much spoken of at Rome, though Brutus was not known who he was. But as gratitude is often too weak to strive with hatred in the heart of a Lover; so, though Mutius was obliged unto Herminius, yet after that, he had many squables with him, wherein appeared much animositie: Spurius his Confident sided with him against Herminius: and being the most revengeful person on earth, you may be sure he never lost any occasion, great or little, that might make against Herminius: And indeed, I was told, that when the fair and unfortunate Lucretia lost that Letter which caused her marriage with Collatine, and made Herminius suspected of some confederacy which Tarquin could not discover, Spurius had a great hand in the banishment of Herminius. For knowing what suspicion was had of this illustrious Roman, he procured the Kinsman of Hostius to testifie many things which moved Tarquin to be so incensed, That Herminius was constrained to fly from Rome to save his life, and to leave his dear Valeria, unto whom he could not bid Adieu, but only by Letter, which she durst not answer, or hear any news of him, lest it should be discovered where he was, and so she contribute to the ruine of that man whom she loved above all the world. And yet, at the last, she wrote unto him: for the generous Sivelia hearing by a slave which Herminius sent secretly unto Rome, that he would not go at a farther distance, though he was not above a daies journey from thence, she went unto Valerius, beseeching him that he would desire his daughter to command Herminius to quit Italy, until the face of things changed: so as Valeria, both out of obedience and tenderness, commanded her dear Herminius by Letter, to seek a sanctuary in some other place farther off, where he needed not to fear the injustice of Tarquin, and lest he should send some of his ministers of cruelty to assassinate him.

And since Herminius was equally dear both unto Sivelia, Valerius, Domitia and Valeria, he received so many different Orders from all these persons, that he did resolve to go farther off: yet since there was an invisible Chain which tyed him to Italy, he contented himself with going to Metapont, where he thought to meet with more consolation than any where else, because he should there find the sage Dama, and all the rest of those friends which he had made when he was there: And indeed, Herminius was ravished with the society of these excellent persons. But Sivelia hearing where he was, she sent him orders to be gone from thence, because the place of his retreat being known, she could not think him in safety: And to induce him to leave that place, she sent him a Letter from Valeria, written after her intention: so as this unfortunate Lover was more exiled by his friends and lovers, than by his enemies, which made his heart exceeding melancholy: And also it was a double sadness of soul to see, that Valeria's Letters were less obliging, than those he formerly received from her: For since they were to pass through the hands of Sivelia, this discreet Ladie would not include all the tenderness of her soul in them: But Herminius, who knew not that to be the reason, he was extreamly disquieted at it: however, he had received so many commands to get further off, that he resolved upon it. 'Tis true, he had for his companion in his travels, the Son of a generous Roman, who was born in exile, from whose Society he found much consolation. And indeed this Roman, whose name is Emilius, is a man of much soul and very handsome, of a sweet disposition, a sociable spirit, a passionate soul, and a couragious heart.

Herminius and he then travelled together into Greece; after which they came to Capua, though Herminius was sure that if Sivelia did know he was there, she would think him too near Rome. But since Emilius fell sick, as soon as he came there, and since he had some reasons which kept him from making himself known in that place, he shared not with Herminius in many things which this pleasant City afforded. Nor did you see this friend of Herminius; who not being in a condition to be abroad, he obliged his friends not to mention him. So as you knew only in general that Herminius came to Capua with a stranger, who was sick and lodged in the suburbs, not knowing precisely who he was.

Mean-time, although Herminius loved Emilius very tenderly, and though they mutually received from each other many generous testimonies of Amity, during their Travels; yet Herminius out of a resentment of Fidelity to Valeria, he never acquainted Emilius that he was in Love at Rome. For, since he never had been there, though he was the Son of an illustrious Roman, he could not know any there. But Madam, to come unto the share which you have in the adventure of Herminius, you may remember, that as soon as the illustrious Roman came to Capua, he got a great share in the Amity of Clelius and your self: and that he was very much at your house: you know that he used to write unto you very often, and that you were wont to answer him: Also that he saw none but you with delight: That it was for him you drew the Famous Map of Tender: and that those, who did not rightly know things, had some ground to think that Herminius was in love with you, though indeed, it was only pure Amity. In so much, as many at Capua did put Herminius in Rank with Aronces, or Horatius, and thought him to be your Lover. The thought was grown so publick, that a young Physician, who had Emilius in cure, and who was one of those Gallant Phy-

Physitians, who have much practice amongst Ladies, he brought a Copy of this Map unto Emilius, not knowing that he knew him for whom it was made: upon this Emilius, who saw Herminius seldomer of late than usual, he thought indeed Madam, that he was in love with you.

Amilcar, said Clelia and interrupted, Consider well what you say, and do not mix Fable with true History.

No Madam (replied Amilcar) but let me tell you, that your Fine wit had like to have had the life of poor Herminius: But to proceed, Emilius beginning to tax Herminius with the passion which he thought was in his soul, Herminius answered him in such a manner, as perswaded him he did not deny the thing, but only out of his discretion. Herminius yet did all he could to undeceive his friend, but all would not do, nay, rather confirmed him. And Madam, since you then used to write very often unto Herminius, he shewed Emilius your letters, he shewed him his own, and let him take Copies of them: thinking that this would better perswade him there was no mistery in this affection, and that there was no intimacy 'twixt him and you, but only a Gallant Amity without any tincture of Love. But since all these letters whereof he took Copies, were exceeding Gallant and sweet; and since Herminius had such a kind of passionate stile, as would deceive any that did not know him very well, Emilius took that for Love which was only Amity. He thought also that the Map of Tender was a Map of witness Love, and in short, made no doubt, but that he was deep in Love, and also, that he was not a little loved.

Howsoever the Air of Capua being thought bad for his health, he was constrained to leave it, and was carried unto a little Town whose scituation was more healthy. Herminius followed him, and had the joy to see him much mend in his health: But at the same time, he had the sorrow to lose his company: for Emilius understood that he might now dwell at Rome: so as these two friends parted, and Herminius returned to Capua. When Emilius was ready to depart, Herminius had a mind to trust him with the secret of his Love, and to give him a letter for Valeria: but knowing the humor of that wise Lady, he thought she would not take it well, that such a man as Emilius should be the Confident of his affection, she being so scrupulous, and so wise as she was.

Therefore he only desired him, not to speak at all of his opinion, that he loved Clelia, lest such a report should unhappily come unto Valeria's ear: And for a colour, he told Emilius that the reason of this his desire was, lest Tarquin should have such a false report and hate him the more, for endeavouring to make any alliance with his most mortal enemy. But though this reason had great appearance of probability, yet Emilius did not give much credit to it: but thought that Herminius spoke it, only to perswade him that he was not in Love. Yet he promised he would not speak of it: and after many kind embraces, he left him, and took the way towards Rome: yet he came not there so soon as he supposed; For Tarquin having sent for him, he stayed a long while at Lavinium, until his business was compleated. During which time, Herminius was at Capua, and could not have Commerce with Emilius, nor durst he send to Rome, lest Sivelia and Valeria should command him into some Country further off.

Things then being upon these Terms, it so fell out that as Emilius was ready to depart from Lavinium, the same Physitian who knew him at Capua, and who was originally of Clusium, passed by the place where he was, and told him with much sorrow that Herminius was dead, and had been Assasinated.

But Madam, that you may know the ground of this report I must tell you, that Clelius being to be assasinated by the cruel order of Tarquin, and that Herminius interposing himself in this adventure, one of the Assasinates died of the wounds he had received, and the other died of Rage and despair. So as this sad accident being published with much confusion and incertainty: It was writ unto this Physitian by a wrong informed man, who told him positively, that Herminius was dead, adding many circumstances which might confirm belief of it: So as his heart being much moved at it, he could not chuse but tell unto Emilius, who grieved beyond measure, and so very much, that he went unto Rome without any delight; thinking the loss of his friend, greater than the loss of Liberty to live in his own Country. Emilius then, sighed as he entred into Rome, and appeared so melancholy unto all those that came to visit him, as every one asked him the Cause: for they saw that he was not melancholy by constitution, but by accident.

The next day after he came to Rome, he went to visit Flavia, who was his near Cousin, and with whom he had Commerce by letters, though he had never seen her. This Lady with whom Valeria was, when he entred, finding him more melancholy than she imagined he had reason for, she began to chide him, and to tell him she thought it strange he should have the pensiveness of an exile in his face, when he ought to be all joy in his heart. Did you but know the cause of my pensiveness, replied Emilius, I am confident you would excuse me, and since I have not yet had the honour to be known unto you, I think I ought to acquaint you with it, to justifie my sadness, to excuse my ill humour, and to oblige you to pity me. Flavia and I, are so naturally compassionate, replied Valeria then, That if compassion will comfort you, you shall not want it. Then Madam (said Emilius unto her) I beseech you pity me: For, I do not merit so great a misfortune as is fallen upon me: What is the misfortune? (said Flavia) The better to understand my bad, I must acquaint you with my good Fortune. During my Travels, I had got a friend, who had all the excellent qualities which a compleat man could have, and who had unto me abundance of most tender Amity and affection; and yet I loved him better than he loved me; for I trusted him with my whole heart; but he had a passion in his soul which he would never trust unto me. But for all that, I looked upon his reservedness, as part of his discretion to his mistress, and not as a defect in his Amity to me: Herminius was so dear unto me, as I would most willingly give half my life that I could revive him, and restore him unto Clelia, with whom he was deeply in love at Capua.

Upon these words, Valeria apprehended more than can be imagined, there being no sound so dismal, as to hear of the death and infidelity of a Lover. She had in her heart so great a Turbulency, as she could not retain her apprehensions, nor chuse but testifie her extream desire of knowing whether it was true, that Herminius was inconstant; and whether Herminius was dead; but anger and grief meeting in her mind both at the same time, she had not leisure to expel love, only asked Emilius very seriously, whether he knew of a certainty that Herminius was dead: Emilius to move more compassion in the heart of these two fair ones, and pity to himself, he told them that it was but too true, and told them more than indeed he was sure of.

After this, Valeria perceived that she could not be Mistress of her self, if she spoke any more; therefore she held her peace, with much ado to hold her tears. Anger was a help unto her in this encounter, for it kept her from lamenting the death of Herminius with despair. As for Flavia, she asked the same question Valeria did: but since she believed Emilius was much mistaken in saying, that Herminius loved a Lady in Capua, called Clelia, and desiring to justifie her friend, that his memory might be more dear unto Valeria, she told Emilius that most certainly he was much mistaken, in thinking Herminius was in love, it not being possible a man who had been in Rome, where he had seen so many fair and charming beauties, should love any else. Oh Flavia (answered Emilius) had you heard him make a description of Clelia, who is the daughter of Clelius, whom Tarquin so unjustly hates, you would not doubt of his being in love with her: for he spoke of her with so much admiration and tenderness, that he himself did not perceive how he commended her with extraordinary devotion: And had you seen the Copies which I have of their Letters, you would see I have good reason to pity the admirable Clelia, and much more the unfortunate Herminius.

Whilst Emilius talked thus, Valeria endured more torment than can be well expressed; Grief, Anger and Love, made such a disorder in her soul, that perceiving she was no longer mistress of her self, she arose up, and went out of Flavia's Chamber, who did not offer to stay her, because she thought that she went away only to hide her despair. As for Emilius, he was so taken up with his own sorrows, as he minded not the grief which appeared in the eyes of Valeria, that at the first, this Lady appeared unto him very amiable. But Valeria was no sooner out of Flavia's Chamber, but her face was swimming in tears, so not daring to walk the streets in that condition, nor return home until she had a little recollected her self, she pulled down her hood, and desired Flavia's servant to open her Ladies Closet, where she would stay until Emilius was gone, because she had forgot something, which she desired to say unto her before she went.

The servant seeing Valeria very familiar with her Ladie, she did as she was desired, so as Valeria after she had shut the door, had liberty to pour out her tears. Now, her imagination representing unto her both at once, Herminius unfaithful, and Herminius dead, she was sensible of as much sorrow, as love was able to inflict: This Ladie having a most tender soul, and loving Herminius most tenderly, her grief was stronger than her anger at the first. But when Emilius was gone, and Flavia came unto her Closet, this afflicted Ladie changed her thoughts. For being one who had heard Herminius swear a thousand and a thousand times, that he would be eternally faithful, her anger grew stronger than her grief. Come Flavia (said Valeria unto her, with as many sighs as words) what say you now of perfidious Herminius? I cannot tell what to think of his perfidie (answered Flavia) because appearances are very uncertain and deceitful; but I am much afflicted at his death: and I must confess, I am much surprized to see you more moved at his inconstancy, than it.

Oh Flavia (said she) I know not well what moves me most; for I am so full of grief, so full of anger, so full of confusion at my own weakness, so full of tenderness for unfaithful Herminius, so full of hatred for inconstant Herminius, and so full of confused thoughts, as I know not what I think, what I would have, or what I say. How can I think Herminius, whose thoughts I believed so generous, should be perfidious? he who I have heard say a hundred times, that honesty and sincerity ought to be in love, as well as in all other things of the world; He, I say, who promised to love me until death, he who swore unto me, that the loss of youth and beautie should not extinguish his love; he who protested unto me, that absence would augment his passion. And he who imagined, that he should be continually melancholy, as long as I was out of his sight: And yet he forgot all his Oaths: he diverted himself at Capua, he became unfaithful, and which is most strange, he did not only forsake me, but betray me: for the last time he wrote unto me, was with all imaginable tenderness. Judge then Flavia, if I be not the most silly person in the world, to lament the death of this ungrateful person, for whose sake I have so ill treated Mezo, during his absence. And I must confess to my shame, that maugre his inconstancy, maugre my anger, and maugre my reason, I would fain make a doubt of his perfidie, and lament his death. But what do I say (reprehending her self, and not giving Flavia time to speak) No, no, I will not lament him, but rather look upon his death as just punishment of his perfidie: and I ought to take all the pleasure that a sweet revenge can give a wronged heart. For Gods sake (said Flavia unto her) resolve with your self upon one of these thoughts which persecute you: either love Herminius, or else hate him; either only grieve, or be only angry; and do not pass so suddenly from one thought to another, lest this violent agitation should impair your health. No, no, Flavia (replied this afflicted fair one) I cannot do as you advise, nor at the present can I love, or can I hate Herminius; for as soon as I would hate him, my imagination represents him unto me, as he was when I was pleased with him, and in a minute after does shew him unto me in his grave: so as seeing him in that condition, I know not what I should think, nor do know whether I should wish him living, and unfaithful. For if he lived, I might reclaim him from his infidelity; he might repent it, and I might hope to see him upon his knees asking pardon for his error, and swear new fidelity, unto me. But alas, I cannot raise the dead, and lamentable destinie that has taken him from the earth, will never restore him neither unto Clelia nor me. But oh Heavens! (said she, and reprehended her self) can I pronounce the name of her whom the ungrateful Herminius preferred before me, and not hate him who is the cause of this injustice, and not rejoyce at his death? for though this person were the fairest woman in the world, though she had all the wit upon earth, and though she possessed all the vertues without exception; yet Herminius were worthy of my hatred, if he should forsake me for her. And yet my imagination never represents his death unto me, but I grieve extreamly for him, and wish I could raise him from death: But presently after, imagining, that if he were alive again, he would not wish to live, but to adore Clelia; then maugre all sorrows, I have not power to wish him alive again: but my only desire is, that I were dead as well as he.

After this, Valeria was silent, for the excess of her grief would not permit her to complain any longer. Flavia then said as much unto her as wit and friendship could invent upon such an encounter. For sometimes she accused Herminius, to see whether that would lessen the affliction of her friend: another while, she would justifie him, to make her grieve only without anger; but whatsoever she said, she cryed tears as well as she, and for a quarter of an hour, she did comfort her more by her Tears than her Reasons. But Love being a person full of odd devices, to torment those that are possessed with it, Valeria would sometimes accuse those very tears which did comfort her, and said it ill that Flavia should so much lament Herminius. Oh Flavia (said she) never lament the death of a man who perhaps was as perfidious a friend as a Lover: and let me have some share in those tears which you so prodigally shed. Herminius is culpable, but I am innocent and miserable, and more miserable than ever any was, since at one and the same instant, I suffer under two of the greatest pains that one can be sensible of: Yes, yes, my dear Flavia (added this fair afflicted one) I hate the Tyrant Tarquin, and all the Tyrants upon earth, to invent torments equal unto mine: For though Herminius were alive, yet the apprehension of his perfidie is enough to make me the most miserable person in the world: And though on the contrary, Herminius should not be perfidious, yet should I be the most unfortunate of my Sex in losing all that I loved, all that I ever can love. Judge then, if in having both these torments upon me at once, I am not excusable in giving my self over to despair, and in desiring an end unto my life, as the only remedie against all my miseries. I should never end, Madam, if I should repeat all the complaints of Valeria, who did nothing but complain until night constrained her to go home: but when she was ready to go, and was upon the stairs, pulling down her hood to hide her tears, a thought came into her mind, which made her go back into the Closet again, and beseech Flavia to grant her one favour. If what you desire, replied Flavia, be in my power, I shall not deny it. Then use a means, said Valeria, to get from your kinsman, all the Copies of Letters which are of Clelia's, and the unfaithful Herminius, and also the Map of Tender which he mentioned: for to lessen my grief, I would do all I could to augment my anger. But (said Flavia unto her) you do not know what you ask; and if I should do as you desire me, you would repent it. No matter, answered she, for as I am, I cannot do or say any thing which I shall not repent of within a minute after. Flavia seeing it was in vain to contest with her, did promise, that when she saw Emilius again, she would use her best endeavours to get all that he had, which belonged to Herminius: after which she went home, and was no sooner there, but feigning her self sick she went to bed, speaking not a word of the cruel news which she had heard. For though Valerius and Domitia had commanded her to look upon Herminius, as a man who was to be her Husband, yet she would not shew all the grandeur of that passion which was in her soul; so as she endured her misery to hide her tears. 'Tis true, she could not long hide and dissemble all her sorrow; for Emilius, who could not chuse but lament his loss before every one, he published the death of Herminius. He told it also unto Valerius, who was most extreamly troubled at it, and who made no question but the sickness of Valeria proceeded from the same news. As for Sivelia, when she heard of it, her grief was incredible; yet she comforted her self with a most Heroick courage, and had the consolation to see her illustrious Son lamented by all of any Rank in Rome, except the vindicative Spurius and Metius, though it was then very dangerous to grieve for any whom Tarquin loved not: He also was strangely incensed at all the lamentation which every one made, and at those testimonies of esteem which every one gave of this illustrious Roman, whom they believed to be dead, and who was his enemy; so as all his hatred of him reviving in his heart, he said aloud, that he was more sorry for the death of Herminius, than they that lamented him most, because he was deprived of his hopes, of having him in his power, that he might see him die before his face, by the rigor of a torment which he had invented for him.

This cruel expression of Tarquins, being horrid to all of any virtue, it was buzzed from one to another for some days, to make him hated; As for Valeria, none spoke unto her of Herminius, but Valerius and his wife, Sivelia and Flavia. But this sage Ladie having a great soul, she did not shew all her sorrow, and all her weakness, but unto the only person who knew the secrets of her heart.

Mean time, she had not forgot her request unto Flavia, but so pressed her to satisfie her curiosity, that this officious friend seeing the sorrow of Valeria to encrease, in lieu of diminishing, she thought it best to do any thing that would lessen her grief for Herminius. Therefore the first time Emilius came to visit her, she obliged him to lend her the Map of Tender, and all your Letters, Madam, also those of Herminius: After which, she went unto her friend, who knowing that she had brought them, caused the woman who waited upon her to with-draw: she shut the chamber door, and commanded that none should enter. She did not fear that Valerius would come and interrupt them, because Sivelia had entreated him to go unto her house. So as being safe on all sides, Flavia sat down by her, putting all that she had upon a little Table, Valeria began to take one of the Letters; and having much a-do to save it from her tears, she began to read the Copy of a Letter which Herminius had writ unto you, Madam, whilst he was with Emilius at Capua; and which indeed was so tender, to be only a Letter of Amity, that Valeria may be pardoned if she took it for a Letter of Love; I would not read the Copy of it which I have, if none but you Madam, were to hear me. But Madam, since Cesonia and Plotina never saw it, give me leave to read these lines.

Madam,

DO you ever think upon me? Do you love me as much as you promised? have you endured my absence with any sorrow? And to ask you many things in few words, is your Amity worthy the tenderness of mine?

Valeria had no sooner read this Letter, but crying out most lamentably, and looking upon Flavia in such a manner, as would turn a heart of stone into pity; Is it possible (said she unto her) I should ever see a Letter from Herminius in a style so tender, and not writ unto me? And is it possible that I should not for ever grieve for his loss? or receive any comfort of this? But (said Flavia unto her, seeing her sorrow to encrease, in lieu of diminishing) though Emilius be a man of much honour, yet this is but a Copy, not the hand of Herminius, for Emilius writ it, and therefore methinks, you should not absolutely conclude Herminius guilty. Ah Flavia, (replied she) I cannot be deceived in the Letters of Herminius; This indeed has not so much wit in it, as some which he writes unto his friends, but it has the same tenderness which he used when he was in love: And I heartily wish this Letter were more witty, and less tender.

After this, she opened another; which Madam, proved to be your Answer, of which Herminius took a Copy to give unto his friend, hoping thereby to let him see that he was not in love with you. So as Valeria seeing this Letter, and seeing it written with the hand of Herminius, this circumstance troubled her more than all the tenderness she found in it.

Pray Amilcar (said Clelia, and interrupted) do not read my answer unto Cesonia and Plotina: For it is not pertinent to the matter in hand; Yes, Madam, answered he, it augmented the jealousie of Valeria, and therefore it is so pertinent, as I conceive it necessary to the story: And therefore since it is short, I will read it distinctly unto you.

Clelia unto Herminius.

PErhaps I think upon you, more than you do of me; I do love you more than ere I told you: your absence troubles me more than you think: and if my affection be not worthy of the Tenderness of yours, you will never find whose it is.

Well Flavia (said Valeria to her) what think you of this Letter? Truly (answered she) I do so much wonder at what I see, as I think it prudence, never to trust any again. You are in the right, (replied Valeria) For this Herminius whom you thought a Saint, has doubtless, all the Faults of other Men: You see his perfidie towards me, and you may see his indiscretion towards his new Mistress, in giving Copies of her Letters, and under his own hand. And alas, I doubt he never values my honour: For it is more ordinary for a Lover to give the Letters of his first Mistress unto his second, than for a man in Love to give Copies of his Mistresses letters unto a friend. Thus I have reason to think that he hath sacrificed me unto Clelia, and that whilst I am looking upon her letters with most horrid Anger, she is looking upon those I writ unto that unconstant Man as the most sensible marks of Love that ever were given.

After this, Valeria never staying for Flavia's answer, began to look upon other Letters; and to afflict her self the more, she often saw the word Amitie in the letters of Herminius unto you Madam: And she saw it writ after the same manner he was wont to write it unto her when it was to signifie Love: For, Herminius by often use, had gotten such a habit of writing that word with a great Letter or a little, as it was to signifie, that he writ it very often unto his friends without any manner of design. So as imagining that he used the same invention unto you, Madam, as he did unto her, her sorrows encreased more, and she broke out into such lamentable expressions, as Flavia repented she had obeyed her. After she had read all the letters of this Gallant Amity, which unto miserable Valeria seemed Love, she opened the Map of Tender: But when she cast her eye upon that place, where at the departure from the new Amity, those that hold too much on the right hand, do go out of their way, and go unto Negligence, Inequality, Faintness, Levitie, Oblivion, and to the Lake of Indifferency: See, said she, all the ways by which he has passed unto me, and by which I cannot pass unto him: And I wish I could be unfaithful unto his memory, and not be constant unto one that is dead, and was inconstant.

Afterwards, looking upon the River of Inclination, by which one goes so swiftly unto Tender, she presently turned away her eyes, as if that object had upbraided the violent inclination which she had unto Herminius. Also finding some invention, and wit in this Map, maugre all her Grief and Anger, she had a spleen which augmented her jealousie, and consequently her despair: So as not being able to consider it any longer, she threw it away hastily, and turning to the other side, she seemed as if she would not any longer look upon the pretended marks of infidelity in Herminius. When Flavia would have taken the Map again, she would not suffer her; and not knowing her self whether she should restore it or no, or break it in pieces, she took it out of the hands of Flavia: and after she had confusedly surveyed it, she threw it again unto her friend, who folded it up, with intention to restore it unto him that lent it. After this, she harkned unto the complaints of Valeria, who did not find that Remedie which she looked for.

Alas!

Alas! said she, had I upon me but one of these two Torments, perhaps I should find out some kind of Consolation: For, if Herminius were not dead, but alive and unfaithful, then pity would not oppose it self against my hatred: I should have some kind of delight in hating him, or in being indifferent, if I could not hate him: I should do him some ill office to his Mistress, and be revenged some way or other. But what can I do unto a miserable Man, whom death only renders worthy of my Compassion? So as I can neither hate him, nor be revenged of his perfidie, since the Grave is an unavoidable sanctuary for all miserable people and Criminals. On the other side, had he not been inconstant, and I had nothing to lament but his death, there might be some consolation found in time, and one might hope to mourn more moderately. When the violence of Grief is grown a little more moderate by habitude, it is some kind of sweetness to talk of the person that is lost; one shall read his letters with a tenderness, which, as full of mourning memorandums as they are, yet there is some sweetness in it: one shall remember all the Testimonies of affection which ere they received; ere shall imagine that they had a share in the last thoughts of him that is lost; and one may perhaps have some far fetcht hopes of seeing him again, and that death will reunite that which it did separate. But alas! in the pitiful estate wherein I am, I can never think on Herminius without anger: the very sight of his letters incenses me: The past, the present, the future, all torment me and make me despere. I know, my dear Flavia that I trouble you with my tears, and do tell you no more than what I have told you a hundred times: But alas, I hope you will think it just to pardon me, since it proceeds from the object of my sorrows.

These Madam, were the thoughts of Valeria whilst Valerius was at Sivelia's house, who had sent for him, to know whether he had received any Packet from her Son: and consequently, whether all these reports of her Son death were true: by which it appeared, that all was false, because his Packet was of a very late date. Valerius was infinitely joyed to hear it, and commanded the news to be presently sent unto Domitia and Valeria. Generous Valerius, replied Sivelia; Let us consider seriously what we do in making this news too publick: For, when the Tyrant heard of his pretended death, he broke into such cruel expressions against him, as I conceive it best to conceal his being alive from all the world, lest Tarquin should send some to Assassinate him: And to write unto Herminius that he go presently into Africa. This, replied Valerius, is a very good reason, but methinks not very just, to let Valeria lament him always. Valeria, replied Sivelia, is very dear unto me: But if you consider the unfortunate condition of my Son, you will find, that it is better for Valeria not to know that he is living: For, as long as Tarquin lives, there is no hopes of his return to Rome, and consequently of his marrying Valeria, is it not better then to let her remain in the error, wherein she is? For the greatest part of her grief is past, and Time will so well cure her of affliction, as she will be able to obey you, when you command her to marry some other: For, as I said before, it is not probable my Son can ever be her husband: and though you should not intend to marry her unto another, yet you ought not to tell her that Herminius is alive: for she that cannot hide her sorrows, cannot hide her joys, when she hears the truth. And though I know it will much grieve my Son when he hears of Valeria's marriage: yet if he be just, he cannot blame her, since she thought him dead. You know also that absence, when it is Long, is a great remedy against Love: and therefore, since it concerns the life of my Son and the welfare of your Daughter, me-thinks we ought to lay hold of this occasion which fortune gives us for their advantage. This which you say (replied Valerius) is so generous, and so prudent, as I cannot chuse but admire your wisdom and virtue: For, 'tis true, I do not think Herminius can return to Rome as long as Tarquin lives. So as, it being not likely he will dy this twenty years, there is no thinking of a marriage betwixt Valeria and Herminius, and consequently, it were better to cure them of a Fruitless passion, since we have so good an occasion for it. But I desire one promise from you, that if Herminius do return sooner than we expect, you will tell him that it was you who made this proposition unto me. I promise it, replied Sivelia: and to the end this may be kept the more secret, I beseech you, do not tell it unto Domitia, lest she, to ease the sorrows of Valeria, should spoil our plot. After this, Valerius and Sivelia agreed unto Herminius, to make him not think it strange if he received no Letters from Valeria, and to oblige him to go speedily in Africa.

As for Valerius, he was very glad that Sivelia had given him liberty to provide a match for Valeria: For having none but her, he feared, that if he dyed she should then be left unto the disposition of Tarquins Tyranny, who would seize upon all her estate, and marry her unto some whom he would recompence for some crimes which he had caused him to commit: so as consenting unto Sivelia's Proposition, he gave it out so that he was certain Herminius was dead: so as now none making any question of it, Mutius conceived new hopes, not to be denied if he asked Valeria in marriage. But Valerius thinking that Tarquin would as much dislike this match as with Herminius, he did not give Mutius so favourable an answer as he expected: nor did he like to bestow his daughter upon one that was enemy unto Herminius. Mean while, as great as Valeria's grief was, she apprehended that the excess of her melancholy might blemish her reputation, she did so strive against it, as she forced her self to appear in the world as she was wont. Truth is, this constraint was very troublesome unto her, but yet in a little time she was able to hide her real thoughts, and to be in company. So as Emilius seeing her as others did, he fell most desperately in love with her; he being of a sweet and complaisant temper, he pleased the humour of Valeria, better than Mutius, who was a little too haughty for a Lover: so as Valeria in a little time had less aversion unto him, than unto any that came to see her: yet her soul was unsatisfied, and far from tranquillity: for grief and anger did always torment her in their turns, and oftentimes both together. Sometimes she would say, she had rather die, than engage her self again in any new affection: otherwhiles she wished heartily, she could love some body to be revenged upon Herminius. And she could hardly ever tell what to have, unleſs to be able to revive Herminius, and revive him faithful.

But whilſt her ſoul was in this humor, whilſt Mutius continued courting her; whilſt Emilius was engaging himſelf, and whilſt Flavia was a friend unto Emilius, Herminius was in a moſt miſerable condition: For receiving no more Letters from Valeria, and underſtanding by Sivelia, that he was to go farther from her, and that Tarquin hated him more than ever, he ſuffered moſt incredible torment.

However, Herminius highly reſpecting Sivelia, and knowing her to be very prudent, he thought it his duty to obey her, and go into Africa. Yet not being able to reſolve upon it, before he heard from Valeria, he ſent a man expreſly unto Rome, with Orders to ſee none but Flavia, unto whom he directed a Letter for her friend. But Herminius did not receive ſo much ſatisfaction as he expected: For, be pleaſed to know, Madam, that he whom Herminius made choice of to go unto Rome, and who was a very able man, he fell ſick at his Mothers, who lived not above ſix miles from Capua, and whither ſhe was going to live in; he therefore reſolved to ſend one of his Brothers to Rome, who was not ſo able as himſelf; and to ſend him without ever acquainting Herminius, leſt he ſhould loſe the recompenſe which was promiſed unto him: for he thought Herminius would not truſt his Brother as he did him, in ſuch a buſineſs. However, hoping that his Brother would well acquit himſelf in the buſineſs, he thought that Herminius could never know, but that he was at Rome: for he reſolved to ſtay at his Mothers until his Brother returned. Then be pleas'd to know further, that the man who carried the Letter of Herminius, loſing his way, and night ſurpriſing him, he came to a houſe which belonged unto Spurius, within ſix miles of Rome, where he requeſted lodging for that night: for being a ſtranger in the Country, and the night dark, he was not able to go any further: As he was talking unto one of Spurius his ſervants, Spurius himſelf came and asked him what Country-man he was: But Capua was no ſooner named, but Spurius being very deſirous to hear all the particulars of Herminius his death, he asked him if he heard of a Roman called Herminius, that was lately kill'd at Capua. The man hearing Spurius ask this, was at a great non-plus: For, ſince Herminius did not know, that at Rome they thought him dead, he did not forbid the Meſſenger to ſay he was not living, in caſe any asked: and therefore he whom Herminius ſent, never forbad his Brother; ſo as he anſwered Spurius, that Herminius was never killed: true it was, there was another Roman called Clelius, who was thought ſo; but as for Herminius, he was very well, and that he ſaw him ſo the day before he came from Capua. Spurius being ſurprized at this, asked the fellow a thouſand queſtions, and yet the fellow being well inſtructed by his Brother, he would never confeſs what his buſineſs was at Rome. But Spurius imagining that Herminius had ſent this fellow, and that perhaps he was plotting ſomething in Rome, which moved Sivelia to ſay that her Son was dead, he therefore deviſed an expedient, to give himſelf better ſatisfaction: which was, to command his men to make very much of the man, and to promiſe him that in the morning, one of his men ſhould conduct him to Rome: But to arrive at his end, he commanded one of his men to make a compoſition of the juyce of Poppy, mixed in drink, and to give this fellow: Spurius being obeyed, the meſſenger of Herminius ſlept ſo ſoundly as if he would never wake; at leaſt ſlept till noon the next day. Mean while, Spurius cauſed him to be ſearched for Letters: and they found in his Pocket one to Flavia, and another to Valeria: The firſt of theſe contained nothing but a deſire to preſent the other unto Valeria, and to procure an anſwer: But the ſecond contained theſe words.

Herminius unto Valeria.

HOw comes it to paſs, Madam, that you do not anſwer me? Is it becauſe my paſſion is troubleſome unto you? Can you not love one that is abſent? Do ye think it a ſhame to love one that's miſerable? And muſt you hate me becauſe the Tyrant does? I beſeech you let me know my deſtiny; for I cannot go into Africa, though Sivelia has commanded me, unleſs the fair Valeria command it alſo: Tell me therefore, I beſeech you, Madam, what you would have me to do, and what I muſt hope for: And in the midſt of my miſeries, let me have the conſolation to know, that I never need to fear the greateſt loſs of all, which is the loſs of you.

After Spurius had read this Letter, he made no doubt but Herminius was living: ſo as being as ſorry for his life, as he was joyed at his pretended death, his old hatred revived in his heart, and he promiſed himſelf to do ſome miſchief with this Letter. He ſent therefore ſpeedily to Mutius, who was at a friends houſe not above two miles from thence: Mutius imagining that Spurius had ſome earneſt buſineſs with him, he went as haſtily unto him: they no ſooner met, but Spurius told him that Herminius was living: he told him what he had done, and ſhewed him the Letter of this unfortunate Lover, which much afflicted Mutius. Do not think (ſaid Spurius unto him) That I put you unto ſo much trouble in coming hither, to make you only lament. But, replied Mutius, what would you have me do? Any thing replied Spurius, that will ſet Valeria and Herminius at odds: and I am much miſtaken if I do not bring it to paſs, ſo you will follow my directions. Alas (anſwered Mutius) you may be certain I will do any thing that may hurt my Rival. Write then a Letter unto Valeria, replyed Spurius, which may move her to give you a crabbed anſwer, and which may anſwer unto the Letter which Herminius writ; and leave all the reſt unto me. Alas, Spurius, anſwered he, I conceive your invention to be very doubtful: for perhaps Valeria will not anſwer at all, and though ſhe ſhould, how ſhould I make her anſwer ſuit unto the Letter which Herminius writ? Doubtleſs her anſwer unto you, will anſwer his alſo (ſaid Spurius) if your letter be rightly writ: Do you then write it (ſaid Mutius) for I cannot; I will, anſwered Spurius, ſo you will write it afterwards in your own hand: After this, Spurius began to write unto Valeria as from Mutius; and theſe were the words of that crafty letter.

Madam,

Madam,

WIll you never answer my affection? but leave me still in a most cruel uncertainty? Oh Madam, let me know my Destiny; I have ever entertained some Flattering hopes that Tarquins hatred would prefer me unto your favour: yet I was mistaken in my conjectures, and find my self so unfortunate, as I shall go into the utmost parts of the World if I lose all my hopes of happiness in you. And yet I will not go until you command me, for you only have the absolute power to make my destiny: Tell me therefore in two words, whether I shall stay where I am, or unto what part of the World shall I go to forget your cruelty: I give you the choice of Asia, or Africa: For if you be not resolved to make me happy, it is no matter what part of the World be the place of my exile and death.

After Spurius had writ this letter, he observed unto Mutius that he mentioned, Exile, Africa, departure, and command, as well as Herminius, and therefore her answer unto him would in all probability be an answer also unto Herminius: But replied Mutius, how shall she receive this letter: for as soon as the man awakes, he will go to Rome and carry his letter unto Valeria? Leave that to me, answered Spurius: So Mutius writ over this letter, and also another unto Flavia, desiring her favour in procuring an answer from Valeria.

The Letter unto Flavia, was in these terms.

FOr God's sake, sweet Flavia, have pity upon a miserable man, who at present desires no more but an answer from fair Valeria, which shall tell me whether I must depart from her, or die at her feet: Let me obtain this favour from you, I beseech you.

After this, Mutius sent a servant with these two letters unto Flavia. Mean while, Spurius the better to stay the Messenger of Herminius, who kept so soundly; he commanded his men, when he awakened to seem very busie and careful about him, and to tell him, that he had been above six hours in a swound: and accordingly when the cold vapours of the Poppy began to dissipate, and that the man began to give some signs of waking, Spurius his men, who had brought several things, which might make him think he had taken strong medicines, they told him all confidently that he was very like to die; that he was still sick: that by no means he should rise: that it was to be feared he would relapse into the like fit again, and that Spurius had sent for a Physician. So as the Man, who was really a little dizzy in the head with sleeping so long, he believed all that was told him, chastised the men, kept his bed still, and took all the medicines which a pretended Physician prescribed unto him.

Mean while, Spurius, to arrive at his intended end, he did not put the Packet of letters into his Pocket again: But whilst this man was perswaded upon a disease he never had, the servant of Mutius went to Rome, where he acquitted himself so well of his Commission, as he brought answers from Flavia and Valeria the same night.

Valeria's answer was in these words:

IT concerns me so very little in what part of the World you live, that so you will write no more unto me, nor ever let me hear from you any expressions of your affection, I will give you the choice either of Asia or Africa, for the place of your exile: Go therefore whither you will, so you will never trouble me again: for truly you will force me to hate you more than ever Tarquin did, if you will not let me alone in quietness.

The letter from Flavia was in these words.

I Beseech you send me no more letters to Valeria: For since you can never hope for any favourable answer from her, you will but augment your misery in writing to her: Try therefore if you can find more happiness in some other part of the world; For believe it, you can never be but most miserable here.

You may imagine Madam, how welcome these two letters were unto those who expected them, especially Spurius, whose plot had so happily taken, and whose hatred unto Herminius was greater than that of Mutius, who naturally was not inclinable to hatred as he. After they had read these letters two or three times over, they read those from Herminius, and found them so punctually answered, as they doubted not but they would pass for currant. But for a better reception of them, it was requisite either to make the man that was to carry them unto Herminius, of the plot, or else to delude him. Hatred being sometimes as ingenious as Love. Spurius found out a way to bring that about: For, be pleased to know, that this Envoy from Herminius, thinking at last upon the Packet which he brought, he began to look for it in his pocket; where not finding it he seemed to be much troubled at it: But being commanded to keep it very secret, he durst not tell the cause of his trouble, but only asked the servants of Spurius, whether during his sickness they found a Packet which he had in his pocket. But they all answering no, he resolved to impart it unto Spurius, that he might command them to make restitution of it. He therefore desired of Spurius, leave to speak with him, and told him, he was sure that he had it when he came into his house, and beseeched him to take such order, that he might have it again; Spurius promised he would; but was not so good as his word: but on the contrary, told him, that all his men swore they had it not, and that certainly it was not lost in his house. The man then grieving excessively at it, he told him plainly, that he durst not return to Capua without it, but that he was a undone man. Spurius seeing him in such a sad condition, most began to comfort him, and ask him if the Packet was of any great importance: so as in hopes that perhaps Spurius would keep secret, he told him all the adventure, and how he had a brother whom Herminius made choice of to carry a Packet secretly unto Rome to a Lady called Flavia: That this brother fell sick at his Mothers house, six miles from Capua, and that lest he should lose the Recompence which Herminius had promised unto him, he sent him in his room unknown to Herminius: adding further, that if he returned without any other answer but that he had lost it, his brother would never look upon him: his Mother would banish him her house, and Herminius would suspect he had betrayed him. Spurius then seemed to pity the fellow, and promised to make a more strict inquisition: And to be short, he tore the two letters of Herminius in pieces, and went with them to this afflicted fellow, and told him, that as he was walking in a Wood close by a Garden, he found those pieces of Paper under a bush, and that certainly some of his men had done it, but would not confess: the fellow was at first a little joyed, that they were the same pieces which he had lost; but presently after considering that he durst not carry them to Flavia as they were, he was as much afflicted as before; nay more, because the secret was known amongst the men. Spurius then seeing the man in such despair, and hoping to bring him unto his own desires, he bad him never trouble himself excessively: For, so he would promise never to tell Herminius, nor his brother of this accident, he would infallibly find a remedy against his disease. The man even ravished with joy to hear this, he promised any thing that Spurius desired. After this, Spurius told him, that he was intimately acquainted with Flavia and Valeria, and if any shift could be made, to read these torn pieces of the Letter, he would engage that they should never mention the accident unto Herminius; telling him also, that if he would rest himself at his house whilst he went to Rome, he would at his return get his business dispatched: The man finding so fair an opportunity, laid hold upon it; for the fellow not being so crafty as his Brother, he could not comprehend he had any further design, than only out of his goodness, to do him this good office: Therefore looking whether if the pieces of the Letters joyned together again, would make the meaning of them appear, and seeing they imported only matter of love, he easily believed, that Spurius spoke sincerely unto him. Yet the fellow had a desire to see Flavia; so as Spurius conceiving that he was not to render an account of his voyage unto Herminius, but only unto his brother, who knew not Flavia, he offered to bring him to the speech of her, with intention to let him speak unto a sister he had in lieu of her. But at last, the man referred the whole business unto him; and Spurius going next day to Rome, he returned the day following, and gave him two Letters which were really from Flavia and Valeria, for his brother, to give them unto Herminius: for there being ordinarily no superscription upon such Letters, those were as applicative unto Herminius as Manius, who though he was a Rival unto Herminius, yet had no mind to put this trick upon him: Not but that Manius did naturally love Artifice; yet upon this occasion he had some repugnancy against what his friend did: But being, as I may say, the Father of his love, he submitted unto him. Spurius then gave the two Letters to the fellow; he described Flavia unto him, to the end that if his brother asked any questions concerning her, he might be able to answer him: so as the man went away very well pleased with Spurius, and with the Letters which he thought would be very welcome unto them, unto whom he carried them; and the thing most particular in this cheat of Spurius was, that this fellow for his own interest, was obliged to conceal all that might hinder the effects of the fallacy. The fellow then returned to his Brother, who impatiently expected him, because he had stayed beyond his time.

But seeing him returned, and taking the Packet, he went to carry it unto Herminius, who was at Capua, after he had told him all that Flavia had said unto him. But I had forgot to tell you that Spurius being very subtil, told the fellow his brother, and bad him say that Flavia received him very faintly, and spoke but only three words unto him: adding further, that she was the most reserved woman that ever he met with, and spoke the least. Not, Madam, that she was so, but that Spurius proportioned her behaviour and language to the Letter which Herminius was to receive from her: and indeed his plot did take; for this fellow who never stirred from Capua, being well instructed by his Brother, he went unto Herminius, who received him with a strange expectation: for as he had not been to see Valeria, he asked him only how Flavia did, and whether she had written unto him. Sir, said he, here's a Packet which will give you an exact account that I have performed all your commands. Herminius then took the Packet and open'd it, finding therein two Letters, the one from Flavia, the other from Valeria, whose hands he knew very well; so as the sight of them being much joy unto him, he began to read them. You may imagine his sorrow, to see with what rigour Valeria writ unto him, and how kindly Flavia answered, and yet he knew the hand, and that both Letters answered punctually unto what he had written, so as he had not the least suspicion of any cheat in the business; yet he knew not what to think, but he conceived the silence of Sivelia proceeded from pity, because she would not acquaint him with the inconstancy of Valeria: yet all Lovers being naturally full of curiosity, he asked the fellow that brought these cruel Letters, what Flavia said unto him: but he answered that he found her so cold, and spoke so little unto him, as this confirmed his opinion, that he was the most unfortunate Lover in the world: indeed at that instant he was so, for the least thought of being hated by Valeria, made him suffer more torment than I am able to express. How! cruel Valeria (said this afflicted Lover, after he had satisfied and dismissed the fellow) does it not concern you, in what part of the world I live, so you be not troubled with me? Are the testimonies of my passion troublesome unto you? and do you threaten to hate me more than the Tyrant doth, if I continue loving you? Ah Valeria, if you can think so, you have neither any reason nor goodness, nor vertue, and you could not lose your affection to me, without renouncing them all: And you, Flavia, can you tell me I must never be happy at Rome, and advise me to get further from it? Have you as cruel a Friend, as Valeria is a Mistress, and banish me without telling me any cause of my misfortunes? However (pursued he) I must depart, since Sivelia commands it, since Valeria will with me such things as are able to make me seek a death in the utmost parts of the world, and since Flavia adviseth me unto it. Yet, did I but know what makes me thus miserable, I should be somewhat less unfortunate; but since it pleaseth my cruel destinies that I should be ignorant of it, I must die desperate.

Herminius uttered a thousand such sad expressions, without being able to resolve upon any thing: But at last he resolved to write unto Sivelia, that he would go unto Africa, though his design was to go unknown unto Rome, and learn the true cause of his misfortune: And to make it the better believed, he embarqued for Sicily, saying that from thence he would embarque for Agrigente, or Lilybeus, and so continue his voyage. Indeed, he departed from Capua a little before Arronces. But when he was six leagues from Capua, the Commander of the Sip wherein he was, was a man who being resolved to make himself Master of all the merchandize in it, and which were none of his, he made sail toward the Ionian Sea; so as say what Herminius could, obey he must. My discourse would be too long, if I should relate the whole passage of this Sea voyage, though it would be glorious unto him, if you did know it: But I will only tell you, that Herminius being an enemy unto all injustice, and since the interest of his love called him another way, he wrought so dexterously, as he sprung a faction in the Ship, wherein he was only a passenger: and telling some that they were going to be Pirats without any profit, and that the Captain would enrich himself with the merchandize they helped him to steal, they all became of his opinion. So as flattering them with fair promises, and the glory of doing a great Action, they began to seek occasion of quarrelling with their Commander, who not knowing how to dissemble with them handsomely did begin to menace them. So as civil war beginning in the Ship, and Herminius seeing the discontents to be the stronger party, he placed himself in the head of them: some ranging themselves to one end of thd Ship, some to the other, they came to handy blows. In the beginning of the combate, Herminius having gained the Mast, he caused him to sail about; and he that was chief of the other party not being able to endure it, the combate began with more fury, because none could run away, but must fight it out, either out of valour or despair.

But at last, heaven assisting the juster side, Herminius vanquished, the chief of the other side was killed, the rest laid down their Arms, and all acknowledged Herminius for their Captain: who thinking upon nothing but Valeria, they all made towards Capua, to restore the Ship and the merchandize unto the owners. But Herminius being wounded in the fight, it happened that his wounds being dressed by an ignorant Chirurgion, they became very dangerous. Truth is, his melancholy made them worse, so as he fell into a violent Fever; mean while, those whom he had incited unto this generous resolution, they took up a fresh one: for thinking that Herminius would die, they feared that if they should return unto Capua, they should be punished for their theft: so as they resolved to continue Pirats, and to divide amongst them all in the Ship, when they came unto any Port where they could make sale thereof. They altered therefore their course, and made towards Africa, for they were then near the the Cape of Lilybeus, being driven thither by the wind, but meeting there with a Bark of Sicilian Fishers, they resolved to put Herminius in it, and remove an object which might make them change opinion: The Fishermen at first were unwilling to receive Herminius: but being given something, and told that the man would recompence them very bountifully if he recovered of his wounds, at last they took him into their Boat with one servant only. As for Herminius, he was not able to dispose of himself, or oppose them: for he was fallen into a Lethargy, and knew not what was done until after the Fishermen had brought him unto their house. I need not tell you, how he was astonished, when he returned to himself, and in lieu of being in a ship, to see himself in a Fishers Cabin, and to see, that he was on Land in lieu of Sea. But for all his melancholy he recovered, after a long sickness: Then he wrote into Campania for some relief. Yet since the thought of Valeria would not out of his mind, he designed himself for Rome, though time had made no alteration in his love. Accordingly he imbarqued, and came by Sea with Artemidorus, Zenocrates, and me, as perhaps you have heard in your passage to Italy. But, Madam, if you will be pleased to reflect your thoughts upon Rome, and remember the condition wherein I was when I left Valeria; you will also remember how sadly she took the news of the death and inconstancy of her Lover: you will also remember that Emilius was deep in love; that Emilius was amiable, sweet and complaisant: that Valerius and Sivelia, would have all the world believe Herminius was dead: and how the fair Valeria sometimes wished she could love some or other, only to be revenged of Herminius, and forget him. On the other side, Spurius and his friend seeing the report of Herminius his death continue, they knew not what to think upon the adventure, and were much joyed to observe, that Valeria when any occasion presented it self, did not mention him with the same tenderness she was wont. For in the time when she did love him most tenderly, and believed her self loved again, she took much delight in talking of him, and could not chuse but so highly applaud him, as made it eminently apparent, what pleasure she took in the mention of him. Yet Mutius was not a jot the more happy: for having seen him in the time of Herminius, she could not now look upon Mutius, but she remembred him, and was so unjust as to wish him ill; and sometimes thought her self a little obliged unto Emilius, for being so much mistaken in Herminius. However, Emilius being of very good quality, and being both amiable and rich; Valerius, who observed the inclination he had unto his Daughter, was very glad of it, and wished heartily she were married unto him, lest if he should dye she should be left to the disposition of the Tyrant Tarquin. So knowing no man but Herminius, upon whom he would more willingly bestow her, he bad him very kindly welcome to his house, and commanded Valeria to treat him very civilly: on the other side, the Parents of Emilius, who being desirous to keep him in Rome, and thinking to marry him, they bethought themselves of another very rich young Lady: but they altered that design, by reason of his love to Valeria, who maugre all the supposed inconstancy of Herminius, did continually lament him: and though when she imagined him to be unfaithful, she was extremely angry against him, yet she heartily wished he would revive constant, or at least repent of his inconstancy. For though it is usual for death to efface or diminish injuries, yet it hapned otherwise with Valeria. Time did diminish her grief, but not her anger, and sometimes she thought, that since Herminius was inconstant, it was better for her that he was dead, than otherwise. At least (said she in talking of you Madam) my Rival has lost him as well as I; and I may well think that she is more afflicted than I am.

You may judge Madam, by what I have said, that Valeria still loved Herminius, when she thought she did not. But for all that, the sweetness of Emilius was not displeasing unto her. As for Mutius, that which most hurt him, was, she knew he followed the Counsels of Spurius whom she loved not, and that he often saw Salonina, whom in her heart, she could not endure. But as for Emilius, knowing nothing but vertue in him, finding him to be sweet, civil complaisant, full of spirit, amorous, and very assiduous and officious about her, if she did not love him, she wished she could: and did believe she either did, or should love him. Yet she did not live with him as she was wont with Herminius: There was no secret or mystery made of this affection, but she permitted him to tell her that he loved her, yet not before Valerius had told her his mind.

Mean while, Emilius was very well satisfied with her; she received him kindly, and hearkned unto him, she did not answer him sharply, nor ever forbad him to hope for her Love. But the strangest thing was, that Emilius never heard there was any particular affection between Herminius and Valeria. The reason of it doubtless was, that falling in love with her, as soon as he came to Rome; and never making any secret of his Passion, none would so far trouble themselves as to tell him a thing that was to no purpose. Also, he being a meer stranger in his own Countrey, he had not any particular friend, to give him an account of former passages. However Valerius fearing lest Tarquin should forbid him to marry his Daughter unto Emilius, as he had unto Herminius, he therefore told Emilius, that if he would marry his Daughter, he desired it might be done speedily, lest Tarquin should forbid the banes: So as Emilius without more consideration told him, that he wished nothing more earnestly than to have all concluded: and was the more earnest in it, because his Parents were desirous he should marry the Rich Inheritrix whom they had proposed unto him: but his Parents being neither a Father or Mother, or any such near alliance whom he was obliged to obey, he rejected their Counsel, and would follow his own inclination: So as having the consents of Valerius and his wife, it was resolved that Emilius should marry Valeria within eight days, and that they should be married in the Countrey, at a house which Valeria had, lest Tarquin should have intelligence of it.

Emilius was now as happy as a man could be, having no rubs in his Love, but the excess of his Passion. Valeria on her side, she was not much transported with any joy, nor was she very melancholy: and yet her converse with Flavia was very sad when she came unto the Country house where she was to marry Emilius the next day: For, beginning then to think upon the engagement unto which she was to enter, and calling to memory former passages, her heart was much disordered: they were both together alone in Valeria's Chamber: Emilius was not to come until night: So as they had the liberty of speech together. Alas, Flavia (said Valeria unto her) If any had heretofore told me that I should marry any but Herminius, I should never have believed them: but then I thought he would never have left me for any other whomsoever. I must confess, that had not Herminius been dead, I should never have thought upon any marriage: for my hopes of his hearty repentance, would have defended my heart against the passion of Emilius.

But he being both inconstant and dead, I must confess to my shame, that I have some tenderness towards Emilius, and look upon him as a man in whom I may be happy, or at least not very miserable, if I can forget Herminius. Yet (added she and blusht) to be exactly vertuous, and also prudent, I ought before I marry him, to sacrifice unto my revenge all that remains of the perfidious Herminius. I never could do't till now: but now both vertue and reason command it, and notwithstanding all the elegantness of his letters, verses, and tenderness towards me, I must deprive my self of them for ever. Oh Valeria (said Flavia) do not offer to lose such excellent pieces, but rather send them unto my discretion. If I should (replyed Valeria) it should be upon condition, never to be reproached with them again: for to discover the bottom of my heart unto you, I shall merit your compassion: for upon examination of my self, I find, that when I would hate the memory of Herminius, I cannot; and when I would love Emilius, I cannot bring it to pass: Yet at some time I think that I do hate Herminius, and love Emilius: But for all that I never can find that tranquility in my heart which is the effect of true joy, though I find not any thing to desire, but what I have. For Emilius is handsom, he has high blood, he has courage and wit, and a violent passion for me: He prefers me before the richest match in Rome: he is of a sweet disposition; and I know not what I can wish more in him to make my self happy. After this falling into talk of Herminius, Valeria with Tears in her eyes, took a little Cabinet, where she kept all his letters, and offered to tear in pieces all the Letters of her former Lover. But Flavia was so earnest with her, that at last she consented that she should have them, upon condition never to shew them unto her. So as Flavia taking the Cabinet, and all in it, she carried it unto the Chamber which was allotted her. After which, these two Ladies went to walk by the side of a Rivulet, which was very pleasant, and from whence one might see all the way from Rome thither. And Emilius was to come that way.

As for Valerius and Domitia, they thought upon nothing but taking all necessary orders for the next day: For, though the company was not to be great, yet would they have all things in handsom order and decency at this private Feast.

Emilius

Emilius for his part, his heart was so full of joy, that all the care he took, was to go betimes unto the place where he was to be made happy: So referring unto his servants the care of all things necessary for the marriage day, he departed with only one servant, to go unto his dear Valeria. In his going thither, he entertained himself with every thing that might flatter his passion; and his spirit thinking upon nothing but delights, he fancied the satisfaction Herminius would have to see him so happy, if he were alive; and also the pleasure he himself should have in seeing his friend. When this thought came upon him, he was not above two hundred paces from the house of Valerius. So as Valeria and Flavia, who were walking by the River side, might easily see him: entertaining himself in this manner at a place where two ways crossed, he heard the noise of a horse on his right hand which made him look that way. But as soon as ever he had turned his head, he espied Herminius; yet he never thought him whom he saw to be his friend: For his imagination being prepossessed with an opinion of his death, and being also at a good distance, he thought him only some man that resembled him. But Herminius, who had nothing in his mind which made him not credit his eyes, no sooner espied Emilius, but he went immediately unto him. Oh my dear Emilius (said he unto him) how happy am I to meet with you! Emilius was much surprised at these words: for believing two of his senses, he began to think that Herminius, was risen from the dead, since both his eyes and his ears told him so; they meet therefore each other, and lighting from their horses, which they left with their men, they embraced one other with abundance of joy and tenderness, for they loved one another most dearly. Is it possible (said Emilius unto his friend) I should have the happiness to embrace you, after all hopes of you were lost? and at the very same instant when I was thinking of you, and desiring your company, you should come to partake of my joys: For, truly my dear Herminius, if you still retain the same thoughts of your friend, doubtless you will be very glad to see me happy: Never doubt on't, replied Herminius; And to defer the pleasure of it no longer from me, pray tell me what happiness it is. You shall know it, replied Emilius, when you have told me by what miracle you are raised from the dead.

Herminius, who knew not that all Rome thought him dead, did think Emilius meant the length of his exile: so as making no great matter of what he said, he only told him that the relation of his fortune would be too long for that place; and that all he would tell him was, that being come to the Court of Italy with an African, called Amilcar, and two of his friends, the one called Artemidorus, and the other Zenocrates; he left them upon a promise to meet again at the house of Valerius, where he was to go to hear how squares went at Rome, and where he had much other business of great importance. But after this (added he) pray tell me, whither are you going at present, and of what nature is the happiness which you are to enjoy, and in which I must share with you? The place whither I go (answered Emilius) is the very same to which you go, and not to conceal my good fortune any longer from you, know, my dear Herminius, that to morrow I am to marry the fair Valeria, with whom I fell desperately in love as soon as I came to Rome, after I left you at Capua. How Emilius? (replied Herminius very sternly) are you to marry Valeria to morrow; Valeria the daughter of Valerius, whom Spurius once loved, and afterwards Mutius, when I went from Rome? The very same (replied Emilius, much surprised to see the astonishment and sorrow of his friend) But what's the reason this news in lieu of rejoycing, does trouble you? Oh Emilius (said Herminius, and recoyled space) what News have you told me? I have told you the truth, replied he, and a truth which I thought would have been joy unto you: and yet I am so unhappy as to see it trouble you, but cannot imagine the cause. For I am sure you loved Clelia when we were at Capua, and I never saw any appearance of your loving Valeria, or of her loving you: What then is the cause of this great alteration I find in your face, and this trouble which I see in your heart? For if my good fortune does any ways afflict you, I do declare unto you, that I cannot be happy.

Ah Emilius (said Herminius) Is it possible you should never hear in Rome that I loved Valeria? and that you cannot love her unless you become my Rival, my enemy, and unless you betray that Amity which you promised? I knew not that you loved Valeria, replied Emilius: And though I had known it, yet believing you to be dead, as all the rest of your friends did, nay Sivelia her self, I think I did you no wrong in loving her whom you loved. I never knew of your love to Valeria, for since I had no thoughts of it at Capua, I could not have at Rome; so as finding in this sweet and fair Lady, all the sweetness and complaisance that vertue would permit her to shew, I had no reason to think she intended the happiness of any more than my self. Oh Emilius (replied Herminius, and sighed) Valeria is a perfidious woman, and may withdraw her affection from you, as well as from me: But since it is thus (added he) and that I am so unfortunate as to find a happy Rival in the person of a friend whom honour will not permit me to use as an enemy; and that I am also so miserable as to have a Mistress, who does not only cease loving me, but can love another; my journey is at an end, I need know no more, I came only for Valeria, and since Valeria is to be yours, I have nothing to do but to die. In saying so, Herminius with abundance of sorrow in his eyes, would have left Emilius, to go and take his horse. But Emilius, whose heart was divided between Amity and Love, between his Friend and his Mistress, and who perhaps had some sparks of jealousie which he knew not of, he was very desirous to know a little more; so as taking Herminius by the arm, and speaking unto him with much generosity and tenderness; I beseech you (said he unto him) do not offer to leave me thus cruelly, but consider, I conjure you, my innocency towards you. For you know, that during all the time of our travails together, you never acquainted me with your love to Valeria; you never so much as named her unto me: as I often told you, I thought you in love with Clelia: 'Tis true, you would never confess that unto me: yet I had good cause to think you were: And I had reason to think, that if you had had any Mistress in Rome, you would have have imployed me with some Letter or service to her when I came thither, where I met with the Physician of Capua, who shewed me a Letter which imported your death: I published the news with incredible grief: It was confirmed by Sivelia, who also published the particulars of it to all the world: the Tyrant grieved you had escaped his cruelty; all your friends lamented you: I saw Valeria, I fell in love with her: I found her disposed to obey Valerius, who commanded her to entertain my affection: and I prepared my self to marry her by consent of all, even of your illustrious Mother who knew of it. What crime then have I committed? and wherein have I wronged you? In nothing, answered Herminius; but your innocence does only make me the more miserable: for indeed Emilius, if it had been any other but your self, either he or I should have died, rather than endured he should take Valeria from me, who as ungrateful and unfaithful as she is, yet is she so dear unto me, as without death, I cannot suffer another should enjoy her; Therefore, since I cannot with honour be your enemy, and since it does not please my capricious fortune I should have such a Rival whom I may ruine; I will even go and die in some place or other, where my passion shall not force me to any thing against my duty, For, let me tell you, that considering the humour I am in, I dare not answer for my self if I see you long. Go therefore, happy Emilius, and gather the recompence of all my services: and if you will, never tell the inconstant Valeria that I am living, since the term I have to live is so short, as I shall quickly confirm the news of my death.

Did I think the sight of me would afflict that ungrateful person, who is going to make you happy, and hath so long and so cruelly deluded me, I would go and upbraid her with inconstancy: But since now, she loves you better than ever she loved me, she will not startle at the sight of me, but rather triumph over my misfortune.

After this, he offered to disengage himself from Emilius, who held him by force, and gave him most obliging language, though his mind was much disquieted, for he loved Herminius most tenderly: he was infinitely obliged unto him: and he understood that Valeria had loved him, and he knew not what to think. Love on one side tormented him; friendship raised a thousand scruples in his heart: jealousie did mix it self amongst all these several sentiments, and he was no less miserable than Herminius, who could not conceive how Sivelia could come to so many particulars of his supposed death; nor why Valeria should write unto him as she did; nor how she could love Emilius so soon; nor how Valerius, who was a man of great honour, could break his word with him: for he could not fully perswade himself that he was thought to be dead, though his friend told him so, because looking then upon him as a Rival, he suspected all he said: but during this long contest, Valeria and Flavia, who were walking by the River side, they could not imagine who it should be that was talking with Emilius whom they knew, because they knew he was to come that way: But as for Herminius, they never dreamt of him, nor thought him living; and therefore knew him not; and besides, his back was turned towards them: they were a little troubled at their long discourse, which was with that earnestness, as made it evident they talked of something which did not please them; so as imagining it might be Spurius or Mutius, they feared some disasterous adventure. Then spying Valerius, who was walking to see whether a Fountain was rightly ordered, these two Ladies told him the cause of their inquietude: Valerius turning about, and seeing them, he went unto the place where those two men were in such earnest discourse: he was come very near unto them, before they perceived him: for they were so intent upon their discourse, that they minded nothing else. But Valerius no sooner saw Herminius than he knew him, and was not in any such amaze as Emilius, because he knew that he was not dead: he therefore stept nearer, and embraced Herminius, who was much surprised to see himself in the Arms of Valerius; but much more, when Valerius turned towards Emilius, and told him, that he must now revoke his word. For (said he) if my daughters heart be not changed towards Herminius, and if the heart of Herminius be not changed towards my daughter, she cannot be yours, since now he is returned. Oh Sir, replied Emilius, do not force me to grieve at the life of a friend who is so dear unto me: No, no, replied Herminius faintly, never fear the generosity of Valerius: the heart of Valeria is changed, and I am not so happy as to render you miserable. Valerius finding himself betwixt two men whom he loved so dearly, and who found it so difficult to please both, he thought upon nothing then, but how to carry them both to his house, lest they should be exasperated against each other. At first, their spirits did so boil, and they knew so little what to do, that they would not go with him: For Herminius said he had no mind to see Valeria, since she loved him not: Emilius on his side said, that since Valerius revoked his word, in all probability Valeria would revoke her heart: and Valerius not knowing well what to answer them, he heartily beseeched them to follow him.

Mean time, these two fair ones that were walking, seeing Valerius bring those he went out along with him, they went unto the door where Valerius was to enter, purposely to see who went with him: but in coming thither, they were strangely surprised to see Herminius whom they believed to be dead. Yet there was a great difference betwixt Valeria and Flavia: for the last of these went to him with abundance of joy, and Valeria in lieu of joy, went back, and was constrained to sit down upon a seat of grass which was near the door, for she was so troubled and astonished at the sight, that she fell almost into a swoond; yet she had so much prudence to dissemble as well as she could: but being very pale, and not able to speak, they feared she was very sick; so as Herminius for all his anger, was the first that went to hold her up: 'Tis true, Emilius went presently after him; but as these two Lovers were equally officious in helping her; but she having her knowledge perfect, though she could not speak, she pushed them both away, and holding out her hand to Flavia, she looked so, as it was easie to see the disorder of her soul.

Mean while, Domitia being advertised of it, she came and caused Valeria to be carried in a Chair to her her Chamber, where Flavia who knew the secret of her heart, said, that it were convenient to leave her alone: so as Herminius and Emilius, as well as Valerius, they all retired and left her with Domitia and Flavia. Domitia also left her as soon as she was a little come to her self, and went to hear how it was possible Herminius should be alive. She was no sooner gone, but Valeria began to speak: Oh Flavia, (said she unto her) what think you of my odd fortune and imbecillity? Do you think I will love Herminius and not Emilius? No, no, For I am resolved never to pardon the infidelity of the first, and never to forget my obligations unto the second: But truly it must needs be confest, that I am very unfortunate. You have formerly wished so heartily, replied Flavia, only for one of those misfortunes which tormented you, in desiring that Herminius were not inconstant, or that he were dead, that methinks you have reason for what you say; for you said, in those days, that if Herminius were living, you should be glad of it, only to revenge your self upon him, and upbraid him with his crime; so as if you be in the same mind still, you should be glad to see him, since now you are able to be revenged of his inconstancy, by marrying Emilius to morrow, and you may upbraid him with infidelity, since he is now in the same house with you. Oh Flavia (replyed she) I was much in the wrong when I wished so: for certainly the sight of a perfidious Lover, is much more horrid than the sight of a dead one: or at least, it seems so unto me at present. Take heed what you say, replyed Flavia, for I never heard that anger made any swoond: and I believe there is something in your heart more than you know of, which perhaps is more favourable unto Herminius than you imagine: No, no, Flavia, replied she, I am more Generous than you think me: and you shall never see me prefer an Inconstant, before a faithful Lover: And though I do find in my heart many advantageous thoughts of this perfidious Lover, which is quite contrary to all Reason; yet notwithstanding, I wish heartily that death would equally take me both from Herminius and Emilius.

Valeria had a thousand other passionate expressions unto Flavia, who having not yet talked with Herminius, she knew not what to say of him: For though she observed by the manner of his going to help Valeria, that he did still passionately love her; yet considering upon what terms Valeria was with Emilius, she durst not offer any office for Herminius, until she better knew both their minds.

Valeria, for all her perplexities, yet thought she saw some signs of Love in the behaviour of Herminius; but yet she kept it secret from Flavia, and would fain have thought that he did not love her. Whilst she was in this turbulency of mind, Valerius, who dearly loved both Herminius and Emilius, discourse unto them both in presence of each other with abundance of generosity and kindness: He told Herminius in presence of Emilius, that it was he who published the news of his death: He told him afterwards how great was the grief of all his friends, of Sivelia, of Emilius, of his own: Confessing unto him, that Valeria was sooner overcome than he could have believed, and that she appeared more angry than sad. After this, he told him how Sivelia and he confirmed the report of his death, to beget the same opinion in Valeria, and lest he should be exposed unto the cruelty of Tarquin, who was most horridly incensed against him. Yet, addad he, Do not accuse me of voluntary breaking my word, since I did it only to save your life, and also by the advice of Generous Sivelia.

Mean while, since you and Emilius are friends, since you have not done any thing to upbraid each other, and since my daughter thinking you dead, did not commit any crime in obeying me; Let reason determine this great difference: and let him of you two, whom Valeria loves best, obtain her: For in my opinion, as things are, he that shall marry her will never be happy, unless he be so chosen. For my part, (replied Herminius, dejectedly) I know the heart of Valeria better than you do, and will prepare my self to die with grief without asking any other favour than once to have the liberty of speech with that unjust person, who has thrown me out of her heart.

Valerius hearing Herminius say so, he begun to excuse his Daughter, for he knew not of those bitter letters which Herminius had received by the Artifice of Spurius, which made him think he quarrelled with her without a cause, further than because she loved Emilius. But after a long discourse it was resolved that the next morning if Valeria was any thing better, Herminius should speak with her without any witnesses but Flavia. That Emilius afterwards, should have the same freedom. That after this, they should both together see her in the presence of Valerius and Domitia; and then to let her chuse according unto her own mind. So as after this, every one retir'd into their Chambers. As for Valerius, upon pretence of Valeria's sickness, he sent to un-invite those persons who were to be at her wedding. Mean while, you may easily imagine how sad a night it was unto Herminius, unto Emilius, and unto Valeria. Emilius, when he was arrived at the very point of happiness, found himself ready to fall into a Gulf of misery, by reason of his friends misfortune, and out of fear that Valeria would not change her mind. Herminius on his side suffered most incredible torment, by reason of a thought that he was not loved; that he had such a Rival as he could not ruine him, nor charge him with any fault, and out of a most cruel thought that Valeria loved this Rival, that she would chuse him, and that Valeria would marry him.

As for that fair one, she was not a whit more happy than they: her heart and her mind was so full of love, anger, jealousie, and irresolution, that she could not sleep a jot all night, so as she spent it in talking with Flavia, who would by no means leave her in that condition. But morning being come, Valerius sent her a command to receive a visit from Herminius, and to hear all his reasons. At the first, she had a mind to disobey her Father; but presently after, desiring to chide and upbraid him for his supposed infidelity, she prepared her self to receive his visit.

But since it would require some time before her answer could be brought unto Valerius, who was walking in his Garden, and also some time before Herminius could be advertised of it, she thought him very long in coming, and imagined that he was ashamed to see her, and that he was studying studying what to say. For my part (said Flavia) since Herminius does still desire to see you, I believe that either he is not unfaithful, or that he repents of his being so. Though either of those two should be so, replied Valeria, yet should I still be very miserable. How? replied Flavia, would you think your self miserable, if you should find that Herminius did always love you, and still doth? Yes, answered Valeria, for if Herminius should prove innocent, I shall appear criminal unto him, and he will upbraid me with a thousand things. Then, replied Flavia, it were better for you, if it shall appear he has been inconstant, and that he repents. No, replied she, for I perceive that if he repent, I shall be so simple as to suffer my heart to melt, and perhaps so unjust, as to prefer a Repentant Criminal, before one that is innocent, so as my reason disagreeing with my heart I shall be still miserable. What then should he have done, replied Flavia, to have rendred you happy? Herminius, replied she, ought ever to have been faithful unto me; I should never have suspected him for an inconstant man; that I had never thought him dead, that Emilius had never loved me, or that I had ever scorned him, so as since it is impossible these things should ever be, it is impossible I should ever be happy. As she said so, Herminius entred, and saluted her with most profound respect, yet with so much sadness in his countenance, that if the spirit of Valeria had not been prepossessed, her heart had melted. Mean time, she took his signs of sorrow for signs of shame, and both her grief and anger redoubled. All the Letters of Herminius to Clelia, which she had seen, and all those of Clelia to Herminius, came into her imagination to incense her. She fancied the Map of Tender, to be a Map of Love, rather than a Map of Amity: and Herminius appearing unfaithful unto her, he did not appear amiable. She received him therefore at the first, with a coldness mixed with disdain; and if Flavia had not made him sit down she would never have offered it. But in fine, Herminius beginning to speak, I see, Madam, said he unto her, that you look upon me as an unfortunate man, who unwelcomly is come to molest your pleasures: and that now you loving the too happy Emilius, you hate the unfortunate Herminius. I do confess it (replied she sharply) And why should I not hate an ungrateful man, who has forgotten all the favours he has received from me, as soon as he is out of my sight: who loved another as soon as ever he was out of Rome, and who is so audacious now, as being but with his new Mistress, to come and torment me with his presence, and feigned complaisance? For I know you intend to speak unto me as formerly you used, but know, that now things look with another face: you are now out of my heart, and I have received Emilius by my Fathers command. Oh, Madam, (said Herminius) you are most unjust, and most cruel in saying so. I beseech you do not seek for any pretences unto your inconstancy, nor accuse me to excuse your self. Confess ingenuously, that looking upon me as an unfortunate exile, who durst never return to Rome, you had no mind to share in my misery, but to avoid the rigours of absence, have banished me out of your heart. Confess, I say, that to be the more handsomly unfaithful, you have seemed to think me dead, and that Emilius seeming more handsome in your eye, you have loved him both by choice and weakness.

For my part, Madam, I can most safely swear, that since I was out of your sight, I never enjoyed one minute of real pleasure. Indeed, I did meet with an illustrious friend in my Travails: but all his friendship did never ease me of the least torment which my love to you made me endure: but I have been always the most miserable of men, whilst you thought your self most happy in loving, and in the love of Emilius. Oh most perfidious (cryed out Valeria, and interrupted him) Can you be so impudent, as to say you have not betrayed me, and that you have not been in love? But to make you the more ashamed of your crime, and to let you see I deserve not to be quitted for another; Do not interrupt me, but give me time to tell you what I think, and what you should never know, but to torment you. Know therefore ungrateful wretch, that I have loved you more tenderly than ever any lover: you know it well enough, unjust man that you are: and did I think you had forgotten all those testimonies of affections which I have given you, I should never have rubbed up your memory of them: for I am much ashamed that I ever loved a most perfidious man. But once more, I confess, that I loved you better than ever I did my life, and that I still loved you with equal tenderness, maugre your long silence, untill that unfortunate day wherein I heard both of your death and your infidelity. But, Madam, replied he, since you see the news of my death was false, why will you not think the report of my infidelity to be so also? Because (answered she) I have such convincing proofs of your infidelity, that I can never doubt of it. However, Flavia knows very well, that had I not believed you dead, Emilius had loved me in vain; and as perfidious as you are, I should have been contented to have hated and scorned you, without ever loving any other. But believing you to be both inconstant and also dead; I must confess, I did what I could to love Emilius, and at last, I am — Oh, Madam (cryed Herminius, and interrupted her) you never did love me, if you be able to pronounce so cruel a sentence. But before you try, give me leave to ask what testimonies you have of my inconstancy, and who the impostor is, that has told you so great a lye? Valeria was now at a stand: for all her suspicions were grounded only upon the report of Emilius, who had innocently shewed all the Letters which had caused so much affliction unto her. So as being unwilling to bring him to the test, she would not at first give any precise answer unto Herminius, nor instance any particulars. Herminius upon this, thinking she had no cause for her pretended suspicions, and that all that she said was only to find an excuse for her weakness, he began to be very angry, and twit her with a thousand reproaches. For, Madam, (said he unto her, after many other things) can you make me believe, you thought me dead as others did, and yet with your own hand write unto me the most cruel Letter that ere was writ; and which certainly you would never have writ, but in hopes it would kill me, and so disengage your self from all those promises which you you have made unto me, or at least to pack me away unto places so remote, as I should never return to molest you. Neither can Flavia be ignorant of this truth, since she was as tart in her Letter almost as you. Valeria hearing Herminius say so, she looked upon Flavia with amazement: Flavia she looked upon Herminius, and told him that she never writ unto him, nor ever thought of writing, because since Emilius returned to Rome, she ever thought him to be dead. Herminius being out of all patience, shewed unto Valeria and Flavia, those two Letters which they had written unto Mutius, and which Spurius had sent unto Herminius, in answer to those which he had written unto Valeria and Flavia. Valeria no soooner looked upon them, but she knew them to be those which Flavia and she had writ unto Mutius. How was it possible (said they then unto him) that these Letters should come into your hands? For, ungrateful man that you are (said Valeria unto Herminius) these Letters were writ unto a man, whom for the love of you I ever scorned, and if you were just, you would think your self obliged unto me for the tartness of this Letter, since it was unto Mutius I sent it. I think Madam, replied Herminius, you would drive me out of my wits; For, as certain as I am living, the Man whom I sent from Capua into Rome, did bring me these two Letters in answer unto those two which I writ unto you and Flavia, and they do most punctually answer unto every thing contained in those two which I sent unto you: And it is also most certain, that this same answer is the true cause of my long silence, and of my exile: And yet Madam, the belief of your Inconstancy never moved me unto the least suspition of any Infidelity, and you have been always the only Saint whom I loved and adored: But I pray, who was he, said Flavia, that brought these two Letters unto you? he was a Gardner (answered he) unto one that is now my Servant.

For, it was very true, that he who was imployed in this voyage to Rome, was entred into the service of Herminius, when he came from Capua, and it was the same servant that was with him at the house of Valerius.

Mean time, Herminius, finding some sweetness in the thought that Valeria had no hand in writing those two letters; he desired still to justifie himself, and beseech her most earnestly to tell him, upon what cause she accused him: and she without once mentioning Emilius, did intimate, that it was, because he loved you Madam.

Oh Madam (said he unto her) you could never have had any such thought but only by my Rival, who is the only man in the World, from whom it could proceed, though he never so much as saw her, whom he accused me to love: and to speak sincerely, my punctual fidelity in keeping my passion secret, made him suspect me to love at Capua: He saw me very sad, and heard me sigh, and saw I received and writ Letters, wherein were some expressions of Amity, which appeared unto him, to be expressions of Love: and I make no doubt but that to ingratiate himself the more, he has shewed you all the Copies of those Letters which I wrote then unto that excellent Lady, and of which I made so little account, as I consented he should keep them: yet now he says, he knew not that I loved you, but I have reason to think, he said not truth. Flavia then beginning to speak, she told Herminius, that he had no reason to blame or accuse Emilius; And told him truly how he acquainted Valeria, with the news of his death, and Inconstancy: and lest this should move Herminius against Emilius, she told him, how sadly he took the news of his loss.

So as Herminius, now knowing whereof he was accused, he was very glad to see that, without all doubt he should one day make a clear Justification of himself. Oh Madam (said he then unto Valeria) thanks be to heaven I am most sure, that a little time will let you see my innocence. For that illustrious Daughter of generous Clelius, does love, and is loved by a Prince so great, that ere long this Love will be published over all Italy: Horatius, a Roman, and one you know, is Rival unto the Prince I speak of. And ten thousand Persons are able to testifie that Clelia is only my Friend, and never was my Mistress. When I first saw her, she was then engaged in the Love of Aronces, Son to the King of Clusium: I was and am still the Confident of this innocent Love: and if you could as easily justifie your self as I can, I should not be so unfortunate as I am: But alas unjust woman, though you had thought me dead and unfaithful; yet this was not enough to oblige you unto an engagement in a second affection. Indeed, had you been contented to hate me, and forget me, I should have been obliged unto you, for your hatred, and oblivion: but you have done worse in bestowing upon Emilius that same heart which you have sworn ten thousand times should never be any's but mine. One would think, as you have confessed you have used him, that you were most desirous to recompence him for acquainting you with my inconstancy and death: For to tell you truly, had you loved me, you could never have endured so much as the sight of a man, who brought you such cruel news: And yet you suffered him, you loved him, you do love him still, and perhaps you are so unjust, as to tell me that you will Love him always. Yet think upon't once more, too amiable Valeria, Remember what promises you have made me: bethink your self of what you have told me since I came hither, how that if you had not thought me inconstant and dead, you had not been unfaithful: And to be just unto your self refer it unto Time, to know the truth of what I say: I will engage my self that Clelius and Sulpitia, whose vertue and merit is known unto Valerius, shall tell you, that I was never the Lover of their Daughter: I will engage my self that Clelia shall confess unto you, that she loves Aronces: And I promise you, that before it be long, all Italy shall talk of the love of Aronces and Clelia, whom I love as well as ever I did, though I know she does love her dear Aronces, as well as I deserve to be loved by you. But Herminius, replied Valeria, the Letters which I have seen are so tender, and the Map which was shewed unto me so gallant, as I know not whether or no I should believe you. Madam, replied he, you may remember, that you upbraided me a thousand times with writing too much flattery, and in such a style, as those unto whom I writ, might think that Love which was only Amity: And indeed my tenderness of Passion to you, had infused such a passionate character into all my ſpirits, as made all my friends believe all the thoughts of my Soul to be love. And Madam, ſhould I have given Copies of Letters from the perſon I loved? or ſhould I only have ſhewed them? Alas, I was ſo far from any ſuch indiſcretion as I have carefully preſerved that cruel letter which I ſhewed unto you, although I cannot look upon it without anger and deſpair.

Be aſſured therefore Madam, that I am innocent, and you are culpable: For Madam, though I had been dead and inconſtant, yet ought you not to have engaged your ſelf in a ſecond affection; I ſhould have died of ſorrow; or if anger had kept me from dying, I ſhould have hated all women in lieu of loving any one, and perhaps as unfaithful as you was, in my belief, I ſhould have loved you in your Grave. However Madam, though you be criminal; though you have upon too ſhallow grounds believed me inconſtant, and though I have reaſon to think, that you do unjuſtly deny that cruel letter which I ſhewed you: Though I ſay you be unfaithful in loving Emilius, yet—Oh Herminius (ſaid ſhe and interrupted) I cannot endure you ſhould accuſe me of infidelity: For certainly, according to the common received opinion, the death and inconſtancy of the party loved does freely ſet the heart of the lover at liberty, and to be diſpoſed of as ſhe pleaſeth: and therefore thinking you to be inconſtant and dead, I ought not to be charged with inconſtancy. And yet I do conſent to be accuſed of infidelity, if thinking you faithful, I had committed any infidelity unto your memory: but as the Caſe is, I cannot endure any ſuch accuſation to be charged upon me: Then Madam, replied he, (and looked upon her with eyes full of Love) if you would not be ſo accuſed, you muſt reſtore unto me that heart which you took from me, ſince I am neither dead, nor inconſtant: For as unfaithful as that heart is, I am moſt willing to receive it upon my knees: I will begin a new obligation unto you; I will forget all my paſt miſeries: and I will love you as zealouſly and ardently as ever I did, ſo Emilius be driven out of that heart which is none of his, and unto which none has any right but my ſelf, ſince I am not dead, nor ever was unfaithful.

But if you cannot do ſo, then be ſo generous, I beſeech you, as not to deceive me: For, I ſhould be more unfortunate in having but half your heart, than if I had loſt it all.

Emilius is indeed my friend, and I do grant that he was innocent both towards you, and towards me until his return. But alas, am I Culpable towards any one? Am I any cauſe that Emilius believed I was dead, and that I was in love with Clelia? 'Tis very true, I did not make him the confident of my Love to you: but ought I to have done it? and would you have taken it well? Conſider therefore, I beſeech you, how innocent I am, and how unfortunate. But is it poſſible (replyed Valeria) that you ſhould be ſo innocent as you ſay you are? But is it poſſible, replyed Herminius, you ſhould make any doubt of what I ſay? for if I did not love you, what reaſon had I ſo earneſtly to court your affection? for you have furniſhed me with colour enough not to pretend unto it: Emilius loves you, you do not hate him: And were not my love unto you moſt violent, I had juſt reaſon never to ſee you again.

It is not ſufficient, replied ſhe, that you do love me now at preſent: but you ought to have loved me always. If I have not done ſo, replied he, may you never love me, but for ever love my Rival. But (added he, and ſighed) one may ſee a notable difference betwixt you and me: for had my heart been ſo weak as to receive the Image of any other into it, you would have rejected it; And yet, though you have ceaſed to love me, and though you have loved another, yet for all that, I am ready with all joy to receive that Treaſure which I had loſt.

Reſtore it then, moſt amiable Valeria, and to oblige you unto it, call to memory all the happy times we have paſſed together: your eyes have told me ten thouſand times, that you were concerned and troubled at my ſufferings: your mouth has told me, that I was not hated; and I was ſo happy, as to have reaſon to believe you made my felicity yours, and that you would eſteem your ſelf happy, if our condition were ſuch as we could never be ſeparated. Strive then to drive Emilius out of that heart unto which he has no right, ſince I told you I am neither dead nor unfaithful: for perhaps it concerns your happineſs, as well as the happineſs of unfortunate Herminius: And indeed, I am ſure that if you ſhould be ſo unjuſt, as not to reſtore that which belongs unto me, but ſhould beſtow your ſelf upon Emilius, you will be no ſooner his, but you will mourn for me: Yet, cruel Valeria, I ſhall defie all your cruelty, if you ſhall make me ſo miſerable, as I ſhall be if you do me that injuſtice. Think therefore both of your ſelf and me, and you will find all reaſon to be on one ſide.

Whilſt Herminius was talking thus, Valeria hearkned, ſometimes looking upon him, ſometimes upon Flavia, and ſometimes upon the ground. But at laſt, Herminius having done, ſhe began in her turn to ſpeak: Though all you ſay were true, replyed ſhe, and though you never did love Clelia, yet I cannot tell whether I ought to reſtore you my affection: you think you have reaſon to treat me as one inconſtant, and alſo have right to be inconſtant your ſelf upon the firſt occaſion: Yet I conceive that I cannot without injuſtice, be called unfaithful: for to diſcover the very bottom of my heart unto you, I had a mind to love Emilius, but never any inclination to love him as I loved you: Oh Madam (ſaid Herminius, and interrupted) I moſt earneſtly beſeech you to alter but one word, and in lieu of ſaying, As you did love me, ſay, As you do love, and then you will make me happy. Perhaps, replied ſhe, I could ſay ſo, for I perceive my heart is willing to believe you innocent, and I know but too well, that my tenderneſs towards Emilius, is not of that nature as it is unto you. But Herminius, I find my ſelf in a ſtrange Dilemma: For if you have not been inconſtant, I confeſs you have right to demand reſtitution of my heart: but I confeſs withal, that if you look upon me as a weak perſon, I ought not to reſtore it unto you, ſince moſt certainly I never did any thing which can be a reproach unto me: had I thought you dead, and not thought you inconſtant, I had then been to blame, if I had comforted my ſelf, and entertained the love of Emilius: I confeſs alſo, that if I had not thought you dead, but only thought you unfaithful, you might have have reproached me for being too obedient unto my Father when he commanded me to entertain the love of Emilius: for I do believe, maugre all I have said, that if one do love well, they cannot chuse but wish, and hope for the repentance of the person loved, though he be culpable. But, Herminius, Flavia knows, that if I did suffer Emilius, it was only because I endeavoured to drive you out of my heart: yet since I am sincere, I will confess unto you, that I have such tenderness towards you, as makes me think I ought to make you happy: And all that I can do as I conceive, is to protest unto you, that I will never bestow my self upon Emilius, nor any other.

By this means, I shall not expose my self unto your reproaches: I shall not give Emilius any cause to complain against me, since I am none of yours, and you have no reason to accuse me, since I am none of his.

Herminius then broke out into a thousand moving expressions unto Valeria: Flavia, she joyn'd her reasons unto his, and offered to make Emilius understand reason: but, say all they could, Valeria would not then fix upon any other resolution. For though she was fully convinc'd, that Herminius had not been inconstant, but that he loved her as well as ere he did, yet she could not make her self absolutely believe it; she could not bring her self to tell Emilius, that her passion to Herminius made her take her heart out of his hands; and she was ashamed that this second affection had partly cool'd her tenderness to Herminius: Yet being desirous to know by what adventure those Letters which Valeria and Flavia had written unto Martius, came into the hands of Herminius; Flavia desired him to question his servant, and to find out how his Letter came unto them. After which, Flavia making Herminius to understand by signs, that when he was gone, she would speak for him (for though Emilius was her Cousin, yet she loved Herminius better) he went away without making any alteration in the resolution of Valeria.

He was no sooner gone out of the Chamber, but Emilius entred, who in lieu of finding any hope in the eyes of that fair one, he saw in them nothing but sadness and confusion: so as his fears falling upon his spirits, he approached unto her in a trembling manner. I perceive, Madam (said he unto her) that you are not very well disposed to give a favourable hearing unto my reasons, though I cannot but think them worthy of it. But to obtain a more plausible Audience, I will confess that Herminius is more worthy than I am to be your lover, and to enjoy your heart: I do confess also, that if he had not been inconstant, he has good right unto your affection: I confess further, that being a man of honour as I know him to be, I am perswaded, though I am his Rival, that since he now saith he is not in love with Clelia, I believe he is not: I say again, that being so much a friend unto Herminius as I am, I will consent he should marry you, if ye be both consenting. But Madam, you know how the Tyrant hates him; how the generous Horatius to save his life confirm'd the false reports of his death: He is then an exile from Rome for ever; surely you will not abandon Valerius and Domitia to follow him: And though you would, yet Herminius, if he love you, will not desire you should follow his fortune: This being so, Madam, why will you not permit me to be happy, since my friend cannot? We will both love him if you please, and never fear I shall upbraid you with your affection to him: I know his merit, and your vertue, and I will never desire you to banish him your heart; but only since Herminius cannot be happy, not to change your thoughts of me.

When he came, I was in your good esteem; you did obey the commands of Valerius without any repugnancy: and though you never gave me any testimonies of love, yet I was contented: And however, I never did any thing since the return of Herminius which could displease you; I have not withdrawn my Amity from him, nor ever will, unless you put me out of all hopes; which Madam, if you do, I dare not answer that my reason will be stronger than my resentments. Consider, I beseech you, that the unfortunate Emilius would not court you, but that Herminius cannot enjoy you in peace: And therefore, I beseech you, be mine, since fortune will not let you be his: I do love you Madam, better than he can, and shall love you ten thousand times above my own life, if you will but resolve to make me happy. You speak so very well, replied Valeria, as I must needs commend you. But for all that, Emilius, this which you ask is not just: for you know that it was you, who told me of the death and inconstancy of Herminius, and indeed you have been the cause of that injustice which I have done him. But Madam, replied he, I was the innocent cause of it: I confess it, answered she, and I do pardon all the harm which unknowingly you did me: And to testifie how much I esteem you, I will ingenuously confess unto you, that I can never make you happy: I have as good an opinion of you, as any reasonable person can have. I know your vertue, your love, and your innocency; I know also the amity you preserve for Herminius; I exhort you to continue it. And indeed, I do confess that you do merit my affection.

But since, Emilius, this affection can never be given unto you, therefore you ought not to ask it. If I would bestow my affection upon any one, I ought to prefer Herminius before any other: But if my Father did give me the liberty to dispose of my self, I will never dispose of my self unto any.

Oh Madam, replied Emilius, that is not reasonable; And though you think to comfort me by telling me you will be my Rivals no more than mine: yet I assure you, I am not a jot the more happy. You think to lessen my grief, and will not in an instant throw me from the height of happiness to the depth of despair: This is the reason why you tell me not, you can never be mine, without telling me that you never be my Rivals: But Madam, I care not for any such kind of compassion; it is but a false pity, which will make me the more miserable: I had better dye suddenly than languish long: Pronounce therefore a Definitive sentence. But first consider I beseech you, whether Emilius will not be more miserable than Herminius, if you reject him.

Herminius is already accustomed to think himself not loved: He can live, and not see you, and think himself not loved: And though you should tell him you can never love him, but would love me always, yet he will be no more miserable than he was within this two days. But I Madam, who till yesterday did hope you would be eternally mine, think I beseech you in what a sad condition I should be, if you should assure me, I should never be yours. I have already told you my resolution, replied Valeria, and you cannot make me change it.

Upon this Valerius, Domitia, and Herminius entred.

Valeria blushed when she saw them, and was at a strange perplexity, especially when Valerius began to speak: Well Daughter, said he unto her, have you heard the reasons of Herminius and Emilius, and are you resolved upon their destinies? Sir, replied this sage Lady, you are so absolutely master of mine, that it better becomes me to advise with your will, than examine their Reasons. But if it be your pleasure I should tell you what I think, I would beseech you to let me live with you as long as I live, and not bestow my self either upon Herminius or Emilius.

Oh Sir, (said Herminius) I beseech you do not consent unto the request which Valeria makes: And I (said Emilius) do make the same Petition my Rival doth, though I am more exposed unto misery than he. Doubtless you are exposed unto more misery, replied Herminius, because my Right is better than yours: For the word of Valerius, and the word of Valeria had engaged me, before they ever knew you: And were it not that I know by my own experience, it is not possible to love Valeria, and preserve the use of Reason, I should accuse you of injustice in pretending still to marry her, after you know that I am living: Till then, I confess you were not to blame: But now you see me, and know what just pretensions I have unto Valeria, you ought to renounce all yours.

Oh most cruel friend, (replied Emilius) can one leave loving when they would: and could you let fall your design of regaining the heart of Valeria, if I had more right unto her than you?

I beseech you, said Valerius then, do not amuse us with any unprofitable contestations: I do esteem and love you both, and both of you ought to esteem and love me also; nor have you any reason to complain against one another: my Daughter has not given either of you any cause to wish her ill: Nor can I accuse her of any thing. The only thing to be done then is, to look at the future, and to compose this difference without doing any injustice. I conceive then (pursued he and spoke unto Flavia) that in all reason my Daughter and I should keep our first words unto Herminius, if he have not made himself unworthy by his inconstancy, and if the heart of my Daughter be not changed; Therefore my advice is, that both Herminius and Emilius shall keep at a distance untill it clearly appear that Herminius had never any engagement with Clelia: For if all be true, he says, the thing is out of doubt, unless as I said before, that Valeria has chang'd her mind. For in that case, I leave her to be mistress of her own destiny, not thinking it just to force the will in such things.

Speak then Daughter (said Valerius then unto her) and tell me sincerely, whether you retain the same thoughts still, which formerly you had of Herminius, and what thoughts you have of Emilius. Sir, replied she, if I had a mind to make choice of one, I should speak sincerely, but since I design to be no bodies but my own, I cannot say any thing unto you. Valeria blusht as she spoke these words, and could not chuse but look upon Herminius, who conceiving some hope from this favourable look, did speak so vigorously and tenderly both, that Emilius perceiving he was like to lose his cause, and fearing lest his destiny should be worse, he hastily said that he would accept of the motion which Valerius offered, which was to keep at a distance from Valeria, until Herminius had made his innocence appear. This fair one would then have opposed that, and desired to put both these Lovers out of all hopes: but she did it in such a manner, as made it evident unto Emilius, that Herminius was much more in her heart than he, and would ere long return into his first place, which did most sensibly affect him.

Things being thus, they had more cause to think that Tarquin had been advertis'd of Herminius his being alive, and that he was at the house of Valerius: for there came a Lieutenant of his Guard, accompanied with ten of his Souldiers, and asked to speak with Valerius: so as this conversation was interrupted in such a manner, as made it known unto Valeria her self, what rank Herminius had in her heart: For when it was told that the Lieutenant of Tarquins Guard was in the Court, and asked to speak with Valerius, she was most strangely troubled at it, and was the first that desired Herminius to hide himself; she also imagined a place very hard to be found out; And Emilius knew so well by this unexpected accident, that she loved Herminius very dearly, as it grieved him extremely.

'Tis true indeed, it was a generous grief: for after Herminius was gone into his close Cabinet, which was in a thick wall joyning to Flavia's Chamber, and Valerius gone to the Lieutenant of Tarquin's Guard, he summon'd up all his generosity, all his friendship to Herminius, all the justice in the pretensions of his friend, and small hopes he had that Valeria would break with him: so as at last coming to Valeria, who was in a melancholy study, leaning upon the window towards the Court where her Father was, he earnestly conjur'd her to open her heart unto him, assuring her, that if she would speak ingenuously unto him, he would never trouble her more, but leave her in peace. Tell me therefore sincerely (said he) whether you think I can ever hope to be happy. If you will promise me (said she) to wish no harm unto Herminius, I will with all possible sincerity tell you what you desire to know. Oh, Madam, replied he, I need not ask you any more, for you have answered me enough in not answering. After this he left her, and without speaking unto any, or staying to know what business the Lieutenant of Tarquin's Guard had, he took horse and rid away none knows whither. Mean while Tarquin hearing by his Spies, that divers persons were to be at the house of Valerius, he sent to see what kind of assembly it was, and whether any thing was suspicious against his Authority. But since the marriage held not, no company came, and Emilius was gone out at a back door: so as having no further order, the Lieutenant returned, as soon as Valerius had shewed him that there was no assembly in his house.

But after he was gone, Valerius concluded that it was not safe for Herminius to stay long in his house: they brought him out of the place where he was hid; and when Valerius asked for Emilius, he was much surprised to hear by his men that he was gone. Domitia feared lest his amorous despair should should move him to acquaint Tarquin that Herminius was there: But Herminius did not apprehend that danger, no more than Valerius, knowing Emilius had more generosity than to be capable of such a base action.

However, since his departure made it plainly appear, that he abandoned his pretensions unto Valeria, Herminius was extremely joyed; for he saw that Valeria had given him cause to despair in his good fortune. Herminius then asking leave of Valerius to stay at his house until to morrow at night, he made his peace so well with his dear Valeria, who protested that what e're she said, she had only thoughts of Amity for Emilius, that he esteemed himself most happy; yet he could not alter her from the proposition which Valerius had made: for as things were, it was not likely he should marry Valeria: Valerius also told him, that he would not send unto Rome to advertise Sivelia, lest some ill chance should happen which might discover him: and all he could do, was to get so much liberty as to spend one day with Valeria. 'Tis true, Valerius told him in private, that perhaps he would not be long an exile, because there were some secret plots against the Tyrant which would at last break out into a flame. However, Herminius told his Mistress so many particular passages concerning the love of Aronces and Clelia, that he did believe him innocent; but in restoring her heart wholly unto him, she conjured him to continue his amity towards Emilius. After this, Herminius being inquisitive into the matter, he made the servant confess how he came by those Letters which he brought unto him; so as Valeria understanding thereby, that Spurius and Mutius did know that Herminius was not dead, she apprehended the more danger unto him by being in her Fathers house, therefore Flavia and she did never let him rest until he was gone: He departed then as happy as before he came, he was afflicted; yet it grieved him to see, that Valerius should not make any positive promise unto him, and that Emilius had not renounced his pretensions before his face. But for all, seeing himself upon good terms with Valeria, it may well be said, that he went with abundance of satisfaction unto Artemidorus and Zenocrates, who expected him as well as I. Since that, we met with Aronces, with whom we joyned society. So that, Madam, I have no more to say unto you: for you know all that hapned since unto Herminius, unless that Emilius not appearing, Valerius would not let Herminius marry his Daughter, until his friend consented thereunto; so as this invincible Rival did much more trouble Herminius than Mutius did as brave as he was.

After this, Amilcar holding his peace, Clelia gave him thanks: Cesonia, and Plotina did the same, and the company parted, referring it untill the next day, to talk of the pleasant adventure which had hapned unto them, because it was too late to begin a story which contained so many particulars, as it was likely to be a long and pleasant discourse.

The End of the First Book of the Third Part.

CLELIA:

The Third Part.

BOOK II.

WHile the Adventures of Herminius and Valeria took up the memories of so many excellent persons, and that Clelia, comparing them with her own, wanted not a little envy to Valeria, who at that time seem'd to be in far greater hopes to arrive at happiness with much more ease than she, and who had always the comfort of seeing him by whom she was best beloved, and hooour him with thousands of expressions of affection, Titus and Tiberius were considering of the resolution they were to take. But after a large consideration, Honour and Nature getting the upper hand of Love, they repaired that evening to the place appointed them by Aquilius, absolutely resolved not to engage in the conspiracy. On the other side, Aquilius and his friends had manag'd Tarquin's interest so well, that they had cajoll'd into his party a great number of young Gentlemen of quality; so that they were with the first at the place where they were expected. There they found those envoys of Tarquin, to whom they gave an account of what they had done; adding that if they could but draw in Brutus his Sons, as such as had abundance of friends, they might be in a capacity to accomplish something more than ordinary. Nay, they came so far as to acquaint these Envoys that the main business was to engage Tiberius, it being then easie to bring in Titus, as one that rely'd very much on the others judgment, and was guided by him.

To this the Envoys reply'd, that they were sure of some of the Senate, though there were no such thing, so to enflame their hopes, and courage to the sudden undertaking of any thing they had a mind to put them upon; For, the posture of Tarquin's affairs at that time consider'd, there was nothing to be done by consultation. Things being at this point, and the young Gentlemen contriving how to get Tarquin's Troops into the City by night, Titus and Tiberius came into the place. But having no thoughts at all of engaging in the conspiracy, but coming hither meerly out of a fear that Ocrisia and Teraminta might take it ill, if they did nothing at all, the concernments of their loves put them into some trouble, and accordingly they were at first very cold as to the design. The moon shin'd very bright, so that it was not hard to discern very distinctly the air of the faces of some who were in a spacious walk which a high fence kept from the sight of such as out of the windows of the house of the Vestals, which stood on the other side of the Garden, might have looked into it. They were no sooner in sight, but the Envoys of Tarquin went to meet them, and Aquilius attended by ten or twelve of their common friends embracing them, asked whether they would not participate of the glory they were in hope to attain, telling them confusedly one after another, and sometimes all together, that they would be accountable to them for the life and fortunes of Brutus: adding withal, that in civil Wars, it was policy that families should be divided, that so where-ever the victory fell, it might be some way or other advantageous. To these and many other things, Titus and Tiberius made answer, that the power of Brutus, and the impossibility of the design proposed, were two invincible obstacles; and seconded it with all the reasons they could produce to excuse themselves from being engaged in that party. Aquilius seeing them so resolved, was so much the more importunate with them to change their minds, but to no purpose. So that being come to the end of the walk where they walk'd, and where there was a large Arbor, which had within it four lesser ones, one at each corner, he entreated Titus and Tiberius to withdraw from the Company, as having something particular to acquaint them with.

Brutus's Sons having followed him into the Arbour, he immediately broke forth thus: I desire once more to know, said he to them, whether you are unchangeable; and if it be not possible to draw you into the Kings party, which let men say what they will, is certainly the more just. It is not our business to examine whether he be a lawful King, or whether he be not; all we have to do, is only to keep off the people from becoming Masters of all the persons of quality. Nay, the safety of your Father, as well as that of a many more lies at the stake: for these very Romans who celebrate him to day, will discard him to morrow if the humour take them: endeavour then to prove a Protector to Brutus, by faithfully serving the Prince he hath so much exasperated. You ought, and you may do it without hazarding any thing, or if you will not do it, do but tell me what I shall say to Ocrisia and Teraminta, from whom I sent you Letters by Aquilius. For in a word I am to tell you, that if you engage not in the Kings Party, Tullia will not be perswaded but that it is their fault: and that by some indirect way or other, they have given you notice not to give any credit to the Letters I brought you from them; so that you may easily judge, that Ocrisia will be never the more happy for your standing out, and the fetters of poor Teraminta will never be the lighter. The Gods are my witnesses, says Titus, how far I would venture my life for Ocrisia; but to deal freely with you, it is against my judgment to undertake a thing as unjust as impossible. For my part, added Tiberius, though I am satisfied that honour would advise me to leave Teraminta a captive, rather than return Rome into slavery; yet must I needs confess, that it is not without abundance of difficulty, that I resolve to leave her loaden with chains, and that the absolute impossibility of the design proposed to me, is little enough to keep up my vertue in this emergency, and to be convinc'd that it is the advice of reason, that I should suffer my Mistress to be a slave rather than my Countrey.

At these words, Teraminta, who by the appointment of Tullia, was come with the Envoys, disguised in mans clothes, started out of one of the little Arbours I spoke of, and fixing her eyes on Tiberius, Ah, my Lord, said she, if it be true, that Reason advises you to be willing your Mistress should be a slave rather than your Countrey: it is as true on the other side, that if you will be advis'd by Love, you will rather see Rome in slavery, and Teraminta free. Tiberius surpris'd at the sight and voice of that excellent person whom he had so extraordinary an affection for, started back a little to take the better notice of her; whereupon, presently after breaking forth into an exclamation; Ah more than amiable Teraminta, said he to her, what dangerous tryal do you put my vertue to? Ah! Tiberius, replyed she with a languishing voice, to what posture do you intend to reduce my fortune! Titus perceiving Teraminta, presently imagin'd that Ocrisia was to come out of one of the Arbours, and turned about hoping to see her; but Tarquin's Envoy guessing at his imagination, told him, that she wanted the confidence to come along, though Tullia would have oblig'd her to do it. Whereupon giving Teraminta opportunity to prevail with Tiberius, as she had promised him, if she might but speak with him alone; he took Titus aside into one of the little Arbours, to repeat over to him all the inducements he made use of to perswade those he had any discourse with, to engage in Tarquin's party. So that Teraminta seeing her self at liberty, and being no longer forc'd to smother her true real sentiments, with a low voice spoke thus.

Think not my Lord, says this fair and vertuous slave to Tiberius, that the Letter you have received as from me, is any effect of my will: I writ it by the appointment of the cruel Tullia, and it is by her absolute command that I am here at this present. Do not therefore I beseech you, suspect me guilty of so much baseness, as to prefer my liberty and life before your interests, and imagine not, though I have the liberty to speak with you without any body by, that I shall dispose of the power you have given me over your heart, to perswade you to do a thing that's unjust. No, my Lord; Teraminta hath a soul too generous to do it; not but that I am satisfied, that if you engage not in Tarquin's party, I shall be the most unfortunate slave that ever was; for this cruel Princess told me as I took leave of her, That if I prevail'd with you I should be assured of liberty; but if I did not, I must expect a misery, in comparison whereof death were a mercy. However, my Lord, know, I ask nothing of you, either contrary to vertue, or your own concernments; and that I had rather a thousand times die crushed with the chains I carry about me, than to make an unjust propositon to you. Ah Teraminta, said Tiberius, you ask me all things when you ask me nothing; and you perswade me much the more, when you avoid perswading me, than if you imployed all your eloquence to draw me into the interests of Tarquin. Think not, I beseech you my Lord, replied that discreet Virgin, that what I say to you proceeds from any artifice; for I would have you confident, that though I am in a manner assured of death, if you do not what the cruel Tullia would have you, yet am I far from desiring you should. I am certainly born in such a condition, as makes slavery insupportable to me; but to be free with you, the Queens injustice hath wrought so much horrour in me for any thing that is unjust, that I would rather die innocently than live criminally. Give me then leave to entreat you, not to reflect on me at all in this adventure, and to do nothing but what your own reason shall advise you to, without consulting your Love. But Teraminta, replied Tiberius, you are now in Rome, is there no means to hinder your departure hence? The Senate hath not yet concluded the debate upon the proposition hath been made to it; so that these Envoys not leaving the City till to morrow, I may in the mean time endeavour to get you out of their hands. Ah my Lord, replyed Teraminta, offer it not, unless you have a mind to hasten my death; for he who is now in discourse with Titus, hath order to kill me, if any tumult should happen that might oblige him either to fly or stand upon his own defence. So that from the time I have been speaking, he hath about him the Poniard that's design'd to take away my life; and did he but know what I now tell you, I should not long survive. Ah! Teraminta (cryed he, with extreme precipitation) It is then in vain to deliberate.

This Envy hearing him speak so loud, came along with Titus to him, and asked him what resolution he had taken; but Teraminta preventing him, and desirous to enflame his generosity as much as might be, told him that Tiberius was resolved not to quit the Party he was in, and that she had no more to say to him. Pardon me there, replyed bluntly the Envoy, you have yet something to say to him, as much as a last farewell amounts to, for assure your self, the Queen is so far perswaded that you have an absolute power over Tiberius, that she will never believe you have done all that lay in your power: so that she being violent and mischievous, may be easily induc'd to make use against you, of that right whereby the life of a slave is at the mercy of the master. While the Envoy was speaking this, thus, Tiberius looked on Teraminta whose inviting eyes seemed to beg life at his hands. Insomuch, that the danger wherein he saw her, filling his mind with all the fatal images which the death of a person beloved might raise in that of a Lover; he presently yielded, and thought it better to hazard all, than to lose Teraminta. He thereupon told the Envoy, that provided they would secure his Father's life, he would be of Tarquin's party, and would do all that lay in his power to ruine the newly erected Common-wealth. Teraminta durst not for the present oppose Tiberius; besides that, notwithstanding her great generosity, she was not displeased to receive such an expression of affection from a Lover, she had so much tenderness for. In the mean time, Titus, who saw not Ocrisa as Tiberius did Teraminta, would not so easily comply with his Brother: but the other, who was wont ever to guide him by his judgment, spoke to him as a man that had taken a resolution which nothing should alter. So that Titus thinking it a dishonour to seem less tender of Ocrisa, than Tiberius was of Teraminta, submitted to him: Not but that Tiberius had a great struggling in his soul; but he was young, he was a lover, he saw his Mistress exposed to death, and he could not be perswaded, but that he who promised him his Fathers life, would be as good as his word. Besides, running over things confusedly; he thought, that if the design took, their Father should depend on him and Titus, whereas now they depended on their Father, whom they at first made some difficulty to obey. Tarquin's Envoy seeing things thus onward to the design, put Teraminta into the hands of an ancient slave, who had waited on her, and looked after her ever since she came to Rome, and carried back these two young Lovers to their friends. Tiberius would needs be the last, because he would have said something to Teraminta, but the other not desirous to leave him behind, suffered him not to deliver himself of all he had to say, nor Teraminta to answer what she could have desired: so that the best interpreters of their several apprehensions were their eyes.

The Envoy having brought Brutus's Sons among the Conspirators, they were received with inexpressible joy, they promised them what they would themselves, and thought those who were come from Tarquin, were resolved to begin the execution of their design, with the death of Brutus and Valerius, yet did they not discover their intention to all that were present: they told them, that the first thing to be done, was to secure the persons of the two Consuls; but as to the design of dispatching them, it was kept as a great secret: and the better to blind the Sons of Brutus, they said, that because Tarquin had been banished from Rome because he was charg'd with too much cruelty, care should be taken to avoid it where it were not necessary, so to perswade the people that he was now of another judgment. Tiberius and Titus being secure as to their Fathers life, soon digested that aversion which they had at first to engage in that party. Besides, that it being ordinary in young men unexperienced with affairs, to be glad of something to do, they did as the rest, and behaved themselves as young men whose hearts are full of their first love, and first apprehensions of ambition.

They therefore considered of all the courses they should take to execute their design, and for the space of three or four days, during which time the Senate were still debating the propositions put in by the Envoys, they met divers times in several places to give an account of what progress they had made. But the Senate having at last granted the Envoys the liberty to carry away whatever belonged to Tarquin and the Princes his Sons, they, to gain time, desir'd further the permission to give him notice that had sent them, and that they might send for Chariots and Mules sufficient to carry away such abundance of things as belong'd to a Prince, who had impoverished all the Families of Rome to enrich himself. So that this last favour being also granted, they imploy'd the time assigned them to accomplish their conspiracy. What was most remarkable, was, that there were a many of Brutus's kindred in it; and that Tiberius, whom Teraminta could never have perswaded had she endeavour'd it, was one of the most earnest of the conspirators, merely because he would save the life, and secure the liberty of a person that had a Soul great enough to give him an advice so generous, and full of vertue. Now the Envoys thought that Teraminta had really prevail'd with Tiberius, and thereupon permitted a little discourse between them sometimes; but the more she urged the things she had said before, the more was he strengthen'd in the resolution he had taken to deliver her. Tarquin's Envoys in the mean time prudently labouring the safety of that Prince, who was to come in the night, and with certain Troops, seize the City, as soon as they had secured the Consuls, and possessed themselves of one of the Gates, would needs oblige all the Conspirators to write to the Tyrant, to assure him of their fidelity. They at first made some difficulty at it, and the business came to so long and so loud a dispute, one night that they were at Brutus's Brother-laws, who was also one of the conspiracy, that a slave named Vindicius, seeing them ready to come to blows, hearkned at the Hall door what pass'd between people that seem'd to be so exasperated one against another. Besides, that his Master having commanded all his slaves out of the Hall, which assoon as they were out, he had carefully lock'd, Vindicius was guilty of so much curiosity as amounted to a desire of knowing what was done. There being a cranny in the midst of the door, he could the better both see and hear those that spoke. He heard then that the business was to serve Tarquin, to subvert the new Government, and to oblige the Conspirators to write to the Tyrant to assure him of their fidelity, that so he might the more securely approach Rome. Nay, he saw that, yielding at last, some began to write, others to dispose themselves to do the like.

Things being in this posture, Vindicius, a person that understood himself well enough, wearied with slavery, ill treated by his Master, and startled to see persons so near Brutus conspiring against him, imagin'd it would be a certain way to recover his own liberty, if he hindred Rome from returning into slavery. He therefore resolv'd to go secretly and acquaint the Consuls with what was in hand; but as he went, he bethought him that he needed do no more than acquaint Valerius with the business; for the Sons, Brother-laws, and Nephews of Brutus being engag'd in the Conspiracy, he was afraid he might proceed too slowly in it, should he have acquainted him with it at first. He went therefore to Valerius, whom he acquainted with all he knew, and being one that knew well enough how to deliver himself, he discovered the circumstances so particularly, that Valerius was satisfy'd of the truth of it. So that the business requiring expedition, in regard it might be fear'd lest the plotters might disperse themselves, and that the letters they had written might not be found for their conviction, he went streight to the place where they were, without acquainting Brutus therewith, taking with him such a number of people, that it was not possible for the conspirators to make their party good against him. In the first place, Valerius possessed himself of the main Gate of the house, which was open'd to him by Vindicius, as also that of the Hall where they were lock'd in. But because the windows of it were low, Valerius caus'd some of his people to pass on the other side, while others were breaking open the Gate; so that with little trouble, both the Envoys and Conspirators were secured; and what was most considerable, they met with all the letters had been written to Tarquin, nay, they found the order they were to observe in the execution of their grand design, which the Envoys were also to send to their Master. They had not shewn it to Brutus's Sons, but had it about them, intending to joyn it to the Letters, which they were to have, so to send all together to Tarquin.

Having thus taken them, Valerius, as a prudent man, made a distinction between the Tyrant's Envoys and the Conspirators; for the latter were bound as Traytors, the others only put under a strong guard; and having taken all necessary order in the business, he acquainted Brutus with all that had passed, who was extremely troubled that his Sons should engage in so wicked a design. But as he had sometime sacrificed his own reason in hope to deliver Rome, so now he resolv'd, if need were, to sacrifice his own children for the safety of his Country. All the hope he had, was, that their crime might not haply be so great as was said, and that there were some way either to justifie or excuse them. However he prepar'd himself to endure whatever were most insupportable, and, to do it, summon'd all his constancy. For, having seen the death of Lucretia, he thought himself able to overcome any misfortune whatever. Having therefore hardned himself for whatsoever his mind should represent to him as most deplorable after so deplorable an accident, he joyn'd with Valerius in giving order for all things. A Senate was call'd as soon as day appear'd, all publick places were guarded, they chang'd the Guards of all the City Gates, for fear of some treachery; and that they might do nothing injurious to the Law of Nations, they sent out of Rome these Envoys of Tarquin without doing them the least violence. So that being forc'd away in some disorder, they thought not on either the unfortunate Tarquinia, or the old Slave that kept her, who remain'd in the house of the Fecialis; for they were conducted out of the City, not having the liberty to return to the place where they had lodg'd since their coming to Rome. But for Tarquin's household-stuff, which they might have carried away, the Senate having well examined the business, thought it not so fit to confiscate them to the use of the Common-wealth, as that they should be bestow'd by way of plunder among the people, who after an action of that nature, would not be so easily induc'd to trust the Tyrant, if ever he should endeavour to lure them by false promises.

The business was no sooner said than executed, for in less than two hours space, there was hardly any popular house in Rome wherein there was not something that had belong'd to Tarquin. For the grounds between Tiber and the City, belonging to that Prince, they were by order of the Senate consecrated to the God Mars, to obtain his assistance in the War they were to undertake. So that it being not then lawful to take the wheat then ready to be put into the King's Storehouses, the people to express their indignation, cast into the Tyber, which at that time was very low, the whole harvest of that large tract of ground. So that that prodigious number of sheaves, crossing and knocking one against another, and so consequently being entangled, were stopp'd in one place where the Sand hindred their passage; and the first keeping back the second, they the third, and so fastning one in another, they made divers heaps, which also being joyn'd together, the Sun and the moisture did as it were cement, and so made a kind of an Island, which in progress of time became as firm and durable, as those Islands which had been from the beginning of the World.

But while the multitude thus expressed their hatred against Tarquin, the Senate thought fit to examine the conspiracy. To understand it the better, the Letters of the Conspirators were to be seen, which Valerius having deliver'd to him, who by his place was to read them in the Assembly, whereupon it was ordered they should be read. The first thing read was the order of the enterprise, which those agents of Tarquin were to send to him, without the knowledge of either of Brutus's Sons. But as this illustrious Consul could not divine that it was so, so he was extremely surpris'd to hear the following Paper read.

It is resolved the execution of the enterprise shall begin with the deaths of Brutus and Valerius: which done, we shall possess our selves of the Gate that leads to Tarquinian, so to make way for the troops which shall come on that side. We shall also do what may be to seize the Cirque, the Capitol, and the Sublician Bridge. An Act of Oblivion shall be promised the people, and we shall not trouble our selves to kill any but the most considerable persons of the Senate, so to deprive it of those which might prove the heads of Parties. Be you therefore ready, Sir, to send away the Troops that shall be expected from you, and to come your self in person, if you would be soon in a condition to re-ascend into the Throne. We send you the Letters of the chiefs of those who are of our party, that you may not doubt of what we say; as also that you may be more diligent in the execution of so considerable a design.

The

The perſon imployed to read, had hardly given over reading what Tarquin's Envoys had written, but a ſecret noiſe was heard in the aſſembly, proceeding from the horror they conceiv'd at ſo pernicious a deſign. Brutus, for his part, was aſtoniſh'd to ſee his Sons engaged in a conſpiracy which was to break out with his death. But it troubled him much more, when he who was to read, continuing his imployment, entertained him with the Letters of Tiberius and Titus, to Tarquin, which were in theſe words.

Tiberius to the King.

Sir,

THoſe whom you have entruſted your ſecret to, know with what earneſtneſs I engage my ſelf to whatever they ſhall think may contribute to and promote your ſervice: but ſince they would needs have me to give you this aſſurance my ſelf, I faithfully promiſe you not to ſpare either blood or life to reſeat you in your Throne.

Titus to the King.

Sir,

TO know my ſentiments, you need only be acquainted with thoſe of my Brother, ſince you may be aſſured I ſhall do whatever he hath reſolv'd to further your ſervice, and withal, that I ſhall look on all thoſe that are not for you as my enemies.

The reading of theſe two letters made more noiſe in the aſſembly, than what had been read at firſt; and there was not a Senator preſent, but did participate of the grief which Brutus muſt needs be in, to ſee his own Sons conſpiring his death: for theſe two letters being read immediately after what the Envoys writ to Tarquin, it muſt need be imagined that theſe unfortunate young men, whom only love had made criminal, knew ſomething of the deſign there was to diſpatch Valerius and Brutus.

In the mean time this great man, whoſe ſoul was undiſturbed in all accidents, being loth to condemn his Children, but in caſe it were out of his power to excuſe them, deſir'd the ſight of the letters, whereof he ſoon knew both the writing and the ſeals: ſo that being ſatisfi'd of their guilt, he was incredibly troubled at it. However, he maſtered his own Sentiments, and gave hearing to all the other Letters of the conſpirators. But at length all being legally proved againſt them, and they pleading guilty themſelves, Valerius asked Brutus what he thought fitteſt to be done, eſpecially as to what concerned Tiberius and Titus. As I am their Father, replied this illuſtrious Conſul, I pardon them the deſign they had to deſtroy me. But as I am a Roman Citizen, which I cannot but be, I cannot pardon them the crime they have committed againſt their Countrey, and am forc'd by the ſame vertue which obliges me to pity their misfortune, to leave them to the Laws of the Countrey, and not to deſire any favour for them. For ſince I have ever been ready to ſacrifice my own life for Romes ſafety, I may very well be engaged to offer up thoſe of my children, if the publick good require them.

Theſe words came from Brutus, not only with an accent of that deep melancholy he had not ſhaken off ſince Lucretia's death, but alſo with a certain fierceneſs which very much diſcovered the agitation of his mind: And indeed ſomething it was he felt, which cannot well be expreſſed, for though he had a horror for the crimes of his Children, yet had he ſtill a tenderneſs for them: ſo that Nature and Glory debating the buſineſs in his heart, his diſturbances were incredible. He reflected on the generous anſwer he had made, and thought it might contribute more to the ſaving of their lives than any thing elſe: nay, he was of opinion, that if he took any other courſe, it would but haſten their death: So that being ſilent after he had ſpoken ſo generouſly, there roſe a great conteſtation in the Aſſembly: for what likelihood could there be in ſuch a conjuncture of time, that a crime of that nature ſhould be pardoned, and that when ſo many were engaged in it; and what means was there to make any diſtinction between the Traytors, when they were equally guilty and convicted of a Treaſon which the Roman ſeverity had made impardonable, eſpecially after the Oath which Brutus himſelf had forced from the people, to put all thoſe to death who ſhould but propoſe the recalling of Tarquin? They were almoſt all young men, they were in a manner all of the ſame quality; they were engaged in the ſame deſign, according to the Laws they all deſerved to die; and conſequently there was no way to ſave two, unleſs it were done by an unjuſt favour. For to ſay they were the Sons of a man to whom Rome ought all ſhe had, would not amount to much; ſince that, on the contrary, look'd on as his Sons, they deſerv'd a double puniſhment. Beſides, upon that account, they muſt have ſaved the greateſt part of the Traytors for his ſake, ſince that he had amongſt them Brother-in-laws, and Nephews, as well as Children. Add to that, the danger of giving an example of indulgence in ſuch an emergency, was ſo great, that the ſafety of Rome was concerned in it; and the buſineſs was of ſuch conſequence, that there was not any Roman who thought not himſelf loſt, and that Rome would be reduced into her former ſlavery, if all theſe Conſpirators were not moſt ſeverely puniſhed.

Brutus wanted not that prudence that led him to the ſight of all theſe things, as alſo to a knowledge of the moſt ſecret ſentiments of thoſe who ſpoke moſt favourably on the behalf of his Sons. But this conteſtation taking up much time, the people weary with pillaging, and caſting the wheat out of Mars's field into the Tyber, came tumultuouſly to the place where the Senate was, and furiouſly demanded why thoſe were not puniſhed, who would have delivered Rome into the Tyrants hands. So that Brutus laying hold on that occaſion, ſaid it were but juſt the people ſhould be heard in that occurrence, hoping that when the multitude ſhould ſee the criminals, it would diſtinguiſh his Sons from the reſt, and would have ſaved their lives for his ſake. He had further the opportunity during this tumult, to ſpeak to Herminius and Amilcar, who made a ſhift to get near him; for while this confuſion laſted, no order could be obſerved. He therefore adviſed with them, to ſee if without doing ought againſt Rome, there were any means left to ſave the lives of his children.

But while he was speaking to them, a young man very fair and and handsome, but withal very sad, cast himself before Brutus, with the tears in his eyes, and directing his speech to him; My Lord, said he, I humbly beg a little discourse with you in private, for I have some things to tell you, which it very much concerns you to know, so to oblige you to some compassion on Tiberius and Titus, who are more innocent than you imagine. Brutus surprised at what he heard, looked earnestly on him that spoke to him; but though he was perswaded he had some acquaintance with that face, yet could he not discover it to be Teraminta, whom he had so often seen at Tullia's: for she being in mans clothes, he being extremely troubled, made no great reflexion thereupon, and only gave her the hearing; so that assuring her she might speak freely before those that were with him, he askt her what she would have. Alas! my Lord, replyed she, I would tell you that the unfortunate Teraminta who now speaks to you, is the innocent cause of Tiberius's crime. How, replied Brutus, are you Teraminta, Tullia's slave? I am, my Lord, said she, that Teraminta whom that cruel Princess hath sent hither to engage Tiberius unto her party, and who, though I have not had the least intention to do it, have nevertheless proved the cause that he is engaged therein, merely to save my life, and to break my chains: so that love is the occasion of his crime: But, my Lord, I protest to you, that when he engaged in that party, it was with provision made for your safety, and that you should not receive the least prejudice either as to life or fortune. And yet I did all that lay in my power to hinder him from being drawn into the interests of Tarquin; but I find, though too late, that my vertue hath surmounted his, and that his affection being inflamed by what I said to him, he would needs save the life of a person, whom he was told the merciless Tullia would put to death, if she prevailed not with him. But, my Lord, I protest to you once more, that he knew not in the least that there was any design against your life; and for Titus, the love he had for Ocrisia, and the friendship for Tiberius, drew him into the same party, and both being prepossessed by their passions were perswaded they did you service, even when they conspired against you, nay imagin'd they obliged their Countrey, in not suffering the Government thereof to be chang'd. Have therefore some compassion on your unfortunate Children, and do what you can to save their lives; for I swear to you once more, that they were very tender of yours: Not but that I know, continued this generous Captive, the people generally think otherwise, but knowing the whole truth, this sad report no sooner came to the place where I was, but I got away from the slave that kept me, to come and raise pity in your soul; and were it the pleasure of the Gods, O my Lord, that my death might purchase the lives of Tiberius and Titus: Not but that if the people knew me to be a slave of Tullia's, I should be immediately torn to pieces: But, my Lord, I can defie that danger; for I should dye satisfied, should your illustrious Sons but live.

These words fell from Teraminta with such a perswasive kind of grief, that there could no doubt be made of what she said; for there were in her eyes and face such visible marks of ingenuity, vertue, and despair, as might well have softned the hardest heart in the world. So that Brutus already yielding to that tenderness of soul he was much guilty of, felt his grief increasing upon him. He therefore spoke with much mildness to Teraminta, and told her he was resolved to do for his Sons, how guilty soever they be, whatever honour the interest of Rome, and the indeprecability of the people would permit. Whereupon, intreating Herminius to have a care of that fair and generous slave, who were she discovered would be in no small danger; he advis'd with Amilcar, Artemidorus, and Zenocrates, about what was fit to be done. But after a long debate of the business, they concluded that Brutus must not by any means endeavour to deliver his Sons by any absolute authority, because it might haply hasten their death, and expose Rome to a sedition, and that the best course they could take, was to divide themselves among the people, so to endeavour to perswade them, that it were but justice to save the lives of Brutus's Sons, out of a consideration of their youth, and the vertue of their Father. But it being the main key of the work, that many should cry out the same thing, that so the people might seem to close with the multitude; Amilcar took it upon him to go and find out all their friends, to disperse them up and down among the multitude, and to come and give Brutus an account of the inclinations of the people, that so he might act as he thought most convenient. So that refraining to come near the assembly till he were satisfied what to do, he spoke to Horatius as he passed by, and had some discourse with him about the present face of affairs.

But while he had been talking with Herminius, Teraminta, Amilcar, Artemidorus, and Zenocrates, and had some discourse with Horatius, the people sent in their demand to the Senate, that their Conspirators might be put to death, and that the Oath which Brutus had made all the Romans take, which was, that all those should dye without exceptions, who should but propose the recalling of the Tyrant, should be observed. Valerius at first would needs tell them, that they must not be so hasty, but this answer so far incensed those to whom it was made, that it was easily inferred thence, it could not but be dangerous to oppose that exasperated multitude. No, no, said some who were desirous those wretches might be immediately put to death, there's nothing to be debated in this case; these Conspirators must be severely punished, to keep the contagion from spreading to others, or we must set open the gates of Rome for Tarquin to come in, for it were better to entertain him willingly, than to stay till he become Master of Rome, through the treachery of some base Citizens. Hasten therefore the execution of those Traytors who would have cut your throats, and let the Sons of Brutus be put to a more cruel death than the rest, as being the most criminal.

In a word, added one of those people, if they have their lives given them, they would take away his from whom they have theirs, and would endanger the safety of Rome by destroying him. What more suitable than death for Traytors, who would be the executioners of their own Father, and enslave their Countrey to a Tyrants will?

This

This man having finished his Harangue, there was heard a strange noise of acclamations, and thousands of voyces crying out at the same time, Let them dye, let them dye, whereby Valerius and the whole Senate easily discovered that it was not in their power to pardon any one of the criminals. In the mean time Amilcar, and the rest of Brutus's friends having throng'd in among the people, to say something for the Sons of that illustrious Roman, met with so few to joyn with them, that they perceived it was impossible to save Tiberius, and Titus. So that fearing Brutus might endeavor to rescue them by his Authority, and to ruine himself, Amilcar came and acquainted him how things stood. But while he was with him, the people without any order, went and brought all those criminals to the place where all the Senators then were, and not willing to take the pains to conduct them to the ordinary place for such executions; this incensed multitude demanded they should be immediately put to death, since that their crime being proved, Sentence was given against them by the Laws, and by the Oath which Brutus had made them take. Valerius seeing things reduced to this extremity, would not have Brutus called, it seeming to him a thing that spoke too much cruelty, to desire him to be a Spectator at the death of his own Sons. So that leaving these criminals to the rigor of the Laws, they began, according to the custom of Rome, to punish them for their crime by a kind of punishment rather ignominious than cruel, which was to precede their death. But Amilcar coming thereupon to Brutus, and giving him an account of the disposition wherein he found the people; this great man feeling within him all that a paternal tenderness might make him feel, would needs try whether his presence might not raise some sentiment of humanity in the minds of that people. Doing therefore a more than ordinary violence on his own inclinations: yet after he had submitted himself to the disposal of fate, and offered up the lives of his Children to the Protector Gods of Rome, if the publick liberty required him, he breaks through the people, followed by Amilcar, Herminius, and the unfortunate Teraminta who would not be gotten from him by any thing could be said to her, and with much ado comes up to Valerius. But alass! he was no sooner gotten to him, but he finds some of the Conspirators dead, and his two Sons so near death, that he had not the leisure to think of what he had either to do or say; for one minute resolved him that he had no other course to take, than resolutely to undergo so great an affliction, or to betray a fruitless weakness. So that mustering up all the forces of his Soul, he kept his ground, and smothering the disorder he felt within, he seemed with abundance of constancy to look on the most deplorable object in the world. And yet it is certain he saw not what he looked on, for the first sight of those dead bodies putting him in mind of all his misfortunes, the image of dead Lucretia presented it self to him, and joining with that of his expiring children, filled him with so much affliction, that it made him seem insensible, and in a manner cruel to those who are not acquainted with what was within him.

On the other side, the wretched Teraminta seeing her dear Tiberius in so sad a condition, and so near parting with his life, would needs go up to him not knowing what she did. But he, notwithstanding the terrors of death, knowing who it was, made signs to her to go back, and so gave her occasion to imagine that he was more troubled for her than himself; though he were ready to receive Death's last blow. Teraminta went forward nevertheless, but offering to come yet nearer and nearer, those who were employed in this sad execution, gave her an unmannerly repulse, and finishing the last act of their office, took away the life of the unfortunate Tiberius. Teraminta had no sooner seen his head severed from his body; but she fell down, crying out aloud, yet so as nothing could be heard, but the name of Tiberius confusedly pronounced. Herminius and Amilcar, who saw her falling, went to raise her up and to cherish her, for they knew the cause of her affliction, but they found her expiring, and that the same blow which took off Tiberius's his life, made her acquainted with death. So that having a certain compassion on the sad fate of that beauty, they took a care to keep the people from coming to the knowledge of what she was, least they might tear her body in pieces, and so caused some of their Slaves to carry her to the generous Sivelia's, who was so charitable as to defray the charges of her enterment.

The Sons of Brutus in the mean time, having breathed out their last, and their Illustrious Father given that great example of constancy, which hath made him to be charged with an excess of severity by such as were not acquainted with the transactions within him, the Tumult was appeased, the people was astonished at the sacrifice Brutus had made to his Countrey, his Authority became thereby the greater, and that constancy raising terror in the minds of all the Romans, there was not any one that durst so much as think of Tarquin's re-admission. But what reputation soever Brutus might gain thereby, it brought him not the least satisfaction; on the contrary, he never had been so much afflicted. He was no sooner come to his own house, but all his friends came to him, yet knew not what to say to him, as not presuming either to commend or bemoan him. There hapned one thing that renewed his grief; for one of those under whose custody Tiberius and Titus had been, was come to tell him, that those unfortunate Lovers had charged him to assure their Father of their innocence, as to what concerned him, and that it was Tiberius's desire he should be acquainted with the generosity of Teraminta, that he might accordingly provide for so virtuous a Lady; giving him a punctual account of all she had said to him in the Garden of the Faciales, all which added very much to Brutus's affliction. However he seemed not to be much troubled while there were any with him; but when all were dismissed, and that there was only Herminius left with him, I was almost perswaded, said he to him, with a deep sigh, when the unfortunate Lucretia died, that I should never have known any other grief, but fortune hath been pleased to find out other torments for me. For my part, I am at a loss what to think, and it must be acknowledged, though to the confusion of humane reason, that the secret Counsels of the Gods are unsearchable, and that it is a thing very hard for men to arrive at such a condition as to be assured they do nothing that may displease them. And in a word, will it not be said that Fortune makes sport with all the designs that Prudence laies, and that all her business is to bring about unexpected events, without ever considering whether the things be just or not?

And yet it must needs be granted, that there is a Reason above ours which guides us with discretion, though we apprehend it not, and which by unknown ways makes the same causes produce effects of a different nature. 'Tis true indeed, replied Herminius, that all that hath happened to you is altogether extraordinary; But when all is done, since it contributes to the glory of the Gods, and the instruction of men, that there should be great examples of virtue; there must also be misfortunes, and unfortunate persons. I grant it, replied Brutus, but to speak freely, it is a sad thing for a man to be the model of constancy, and not to live, but only to suffer. For in a word, my dear Herminius, would you but take the pains to reflect on what ever hath happened to me, you will find nothing but a long series of misfortunes. The first of all, was to be born in the time, and under the government of the lewdest Tyrant in the World, and withall to be of his blood. The consequence of this you know was, that I was brought up in exile, that Tarquin's cruelty robb'd me of a Father and a Brother, that I was forc'd to conceal my reason to secure my life, and to wait the opportunity to deliver Rome. How have I been in love, yet durst not discover it; that afterwards I was not beloved again, but that I might be the more miserable? How have I been forced by a strange unhappiness, to see Lucretia in the embraces of my Rival; and what is yet more terrible, how have I seen her in those of Death? This once endured, I thought there was not any thing afterwards to be feared, and that to lessen my affliction, it might haply be the pleasure of the Gods, that her death and my love should prove serviceable to the Liberty of my Countrey. And yet it happens that the same passion that makes me undertake any thing for Rome, makes my children undertake all things against both Rome and me. So that by a sentiment, which I cannot but discover, I excuse them while I accuse them, and I am very much more sensible of their unhappiness than I should have been, had they been guided by any other motive. Not but that it grieves me to the heart to think that I have had Children that should endeavor to put Rome into her chains again, but when I reflect on their being in Love, I pity and bemoan them. Lucretia appears to me with all her inviting attractions to plead for them, and I suffer at this instant, all that a paternal indulgence, all that the tender resentments of Love can make me endure, and all that Nature and Reason, when they are contrary one to another, can make a man feel that is most harsh and insupportable.

You are so ingenious, and your complaints so just, replyed Herminius, that a man cannot well find what to say to you. But all considered, if you are the most unfortunate, you are withall the most illustrious of that Predicament, for your misfortunes contribute to your glory, and are beneficial to your Countrey, Lucretia's death caused Tarquin's removal, and that of your Sons will stifle all conspiracies, and settle Rome's liberty. It is my wish it may be so, replyed Brutus, but to be free with you, I am at a loss what to think of it, for who could ever imagine that Brutus's Son should conspire against Rome, and against him? and yet you have seen it, and consequently there is not any thing which we may not, nothing which we ought not to be distrustful of, even to our virtue, nothing that can for any long time secure any mans happiness. Nay, I am so far unhappy, that I am not happy in my friends. Aronces is where he would not be; Clelia is among the Rivals of that only person whom she loves; nor are you yet in such a safe posture as to fear nothing. But when all is done, the Liberty of my Countrey engages me to live, and struggle with calamities; and the revenge due to Lucretia's death, calls upon me to destroy those whom yet I have only driven hence. But that you may live, replyed Herminius, you must make a truce with your grief: on the contrary, replyed this afflicted, yet illustrious person, I must give it way till I have made it habitual, and for a man to suffer long, he must suffer without any intermission.

Whilst these two friends exchanged these sad discourses, the general talk of all was about what had happened. Some discoursed of the Conspiracy, others of the death of the Conspirators, and all of the constancy and great virtue of Brutus. The Prince of Numidia, sick and weak as he was, would needs have the story of this unhappy adventure exactly told him over and over, by Amilcar who came to visit him, and who to lessen the grief he might take at it, gave him a short account of the History of Brutus. So that this generous Numidian having heard Amilcar's relation, was for a while silent; then breaking forth on a sudden, Ah, Amilcar how far am I short of the virtue of your illustrious friend, how weak am I, or how much in Love! for he hath met with thousands of misfortunes, and he bears them, and I groan under no other than that of not being loved, and it is insupportable to me. I am indeed ashamed to be so little master of my self, and were it only that I might in some sort deserve Brutus's friendship, I will do what lies in my power to overcome the passion now predominant in my Soul. Till now was I never guilty of so much as any design to oppose it, so that it speaks not a little courage, that I am resolved to do what I can to conquer it. I have indeed sometimes said that I would do it, but must acknowledge I never have, and even in the very instant that I say I will do it: I am not very certain whether I shall continue in the same sentiments wherein I think my self to be. Amilcar, who thought it no hard matter to cure him of such a disease, assured him of his recovery, when he pleased himself, and so having comforted him, as he was wont, he went to Lucilia's, where were the more virtuous persons of Rome met to do their civilities to Hermilia, upon the accident that had happened to her Brothers Sept. For though she was very young, yet were Tiberius and Titus her Nephews. Clelia, Plotina, Cosmia, Flavia, Salomina, Valeria, and Collatina, as also Martius, Horatius, Artemidorus, Zenocrates, and Herminius, were in Hermilia's Chamber, when Amilcar came thither. But of all these, Hermilia and Collatina were the most troubled at that unhappy accident; for among the Conspirators that had suffered fered death there, were two of near kin to Collatina. What made them yet more sad was, that the interest of the two Princes, by whom they were courted, had engaged more into the Conspiracy, than any other motive, and consequently they might look on them as the innocent cause of that unfortunate adventure. Besides they were then in so little hope ever to see the Prince of Pometia, or Prince Titus, that they were sometimes glad of any occasion to weep which they might discover, so to mask the tears of love with those of friendship. They were therefore extreamly sad that day, and all that were present, complying with their humor, were no less. For Clelia, she had so much cause to be sad, that she never appeared otherwise. Horatius for his part, finding her ever cold and indifferent towards him, had no reason to be over joyful, though things were in such a posture as that he might entertain some hope.

Artemidorus had his fancy ever full of Clidamira and Berelisa. Zenocrates wanted not reflections, though more favorable than those of the rest. Herminius, by reason of the greatness of his affection, and the odd posture of his amorous fortune was also melancholly enough. Mutius was troubled that his Rival was so happy as to be loved, and the whole company excepting Plotina and Amilcar was not the least inclined to engage in any thing that were divertive, though it consisted of the noblest Souls in the World. And yet though their discourse were sad, sutable to the subject of it, Death; yet Plotina and Amilcar brought it at last to something that were pleasant.

In the first place, according to the custom upon such occasions, they spoke of the just occasion of grief which she had whom they came to condole with; that brought in some discourse upon the accidents, some were silent, others whispered, and all grew weary of it. But falling insensibly into other discourse and speaking lowder, they began to play upon Flavia, for that the very thought of death disturbed her reason, and troubled her almost as much as if she had been to dye a minute after her self. For though Flavia were a person of excellent endowments, yet had she that weakness of not commanding her own sentiments, so that she was subject to thousands of causeless fears. For my part, says Plotina, I have such an aversion for death, that for fear it should come too soon, I am resolved not to fear it at all; for certainly there is nothing worse for ones health, than to fear it too much. Nay, then says Herminius, I am happier than you; for I neither hates nor fear it. But for my part, says Plotina, I hate it most abominably, and I think I have reason to do so. For it is a rash inconsiderate thing, that ever comes before it is looked for, ever comes unseasonably, troubles all the enjoyments of life, separates friends and lovers, hath no respect of any thing, destroys beauty, laughs at youth, and is inflexible. All this is true replies Herminius, but it hath withall this advantage, that it makes all men equal, cures all diseases, puts a period to all misfortunes, and puts those it hastens on into such a condition. as not to suffer any thing afterward. In a word, it satisfies the ambitious, determines love and hatred, appeases all passions, and this evil that is so great and terrible, is the evil but of an instant, and such as for its infallibility ought not to be called an evil. On the contrary, replied Flavia, 'tis for that reason that death is the more terrible to me; for if it were uncertain, hope might take away some part of the fear I am in of it. But when I consider that one may dye every minute, and that thousands of several ways, I feel a certain cold at the heart, and I am almost at a loss of all reason. You are then very happy, replyed Plotina: Nay, she is such, beyond what you can imagine, says Collatina, for having a lively imagination, she sees dangers where there were never any. I am really of opinion, answers Plotina, that there is more prudence than is conceived, in being a little dull of apprehension; for when people search so much into the bottom of things, they many times get more hurt than good But you are not certainly always in fear, continued she, speaking to Flavia, for when one is well, is neither on a River, nor at Sea, nor yet in a Chariot, but in ones Chamber, in good company, and good health, methinks there's no such occasion of fear. Ah! Plotina, replyed Flavia, you know not what the fear of dying means, if you measure it only by the present dangers that wait on us. I remember says Horatius, that I saw Flavia much troubled at the death of a man that had lived almost an age. For my part says Mutius, I have known her lose her share of an excellent Collation, because it thundred. And to my knowledge says Salonina, I have seen her one day refuse an excellent walk, only because we were to cross the Tiber. For heavens sake, replyed she very pleasantly, take not so much pains to pump your memories for my fears, for I know them better than you do: and since you will needs have Clelia, and all present that know me not, to be acquainted with my weakness, I will tell my self all that I fear. I fear then all diseases in general great and small; I fear Thunder, I fear the Sea, and all Rivers, I fear fire and water, heat and cold, fair weather and foul, and I am afraid the earth should take occasion to shake at Rome as it does in Sicily. Besides, to my own misfortune, I know all that the Tuscans have said of presages, and I know it contributes to my torment, and to say all in few words, I fear what ever may directly or indirectly cause death. But cannot you imagine in your self, replyed Amilcar, that the fear of death causes deformity, sickness, and may occasion death it self, that you may be rid of so many fears. May it not come into your thoughts, added Clelia, that all these frights amount to nothing, that if the earth must shake, it will shake whether you will or no; that if a Thunder-bolt must fall, it will fall haply rather on that place where you take refuge, than on that you quit; and in a word, can you not submit your self to the disposal of the Gods? But can you not conceive your self, replyed Flavia, that if I could do otherwise I would do it? Do you think me destitute of reason, and that I do not many times perceive I am too blame? And yet after all, even at the same time that my reason condemns me, my imagination commands my heart, and makes it feel what she pleases. What I think most to be admired, says Herminius is, that all people find out some handsome pretence for the fear they have of death, for they confidently affirm that they are not subject to so much weakness, as to fear the pain that is suffered in dying, but they are afraid they have not lived well enough; and what is remarkable, is, that without growing better, so to take away the fear they say they are in, their thoughts are wholly taken up in the preservation of their health, and avoiding what ever may prejudice it. Ah! Of that kind of people, says Amilcar, the world is full, and you meet every where such as fear the punishments of the other life without any amendment, and whose actions are contrary to their professions, and easily discover that they simply fear death, since they make provision only against that. For my part says Flavia, I am no very bad liver, and trust much in the goodness of the Gods, and therefore do not so much fear what shall happen to me after death as before, for I fear pain very much, besides the darkness of a Tomb startles me. But when all is done, says Clelia, all your fears are fruitless, you will dye as well as those that fear nothing, and the surest way is to lead the most virtuous life that one can, to expect death without wishing it or fearing it, and to entertain it as a thing we have waited for all our life, and which cannot be avoided. For my part, added Racilia, I find it requires a greater constancy to support a long old age, attended by those inconveniences which it commonly brings along with it, than to receive death chearfully. It is indeed, says Plotina, very pleasantly, a very cruel thing to become old, sick and deformed, when one hath been accustomed to be young, handsome, and healthy; and I know not whether I hate death so far, as that I had not rather see it than my self in that condition. But for what concerns me, says Flavia, though I were handsomer than Lucretia ever was, should any one offer to raise me up again, were I in her place, so as that I must come into the world, ugly, old, sick, and troublesome, I should take him at his word, and I would rather live, though abominably deformed, than be dead. You consider not what you say, says Platina smiling, and you fear death something less then you imagine; for I thought you would not for any thing have been raised to life again, for fear of dying once more, and you affirm the contrary. It is a thing so ordinary to abuse my weakness, replyed Flavia, that I am never angry how satyrical soever people may be at it. But the misery of it is, replyed Herminius, that you are not cured of it, nor indeed curable; for do what you can you will find, that as a gallant man cannot prove cowardly and base, so a fearful person can never become valiant. Since fear does make some sleight the danger, says Horatius, I know not why reason may do as much. Those who sleight danger, out of an excess of fear whereby they become valiant, replyed Herminius, can never give a greater expression of their fearfulness, than by doing a thing so much contrary to their disposition, so that they may be said to be a sort of Hectors, yet are still arrant cowards, and have lost nothing of their natural inclination. The case is otherwise with those who imploy their reason to force away fear from their hearts, since it cannot do it but by working a change in the persons, and making them act contrary to their inclinations. Herminius is certainly very much in the right, says Flavia; but to comply a little with my imperfections, I would all the Ladies now present, were obliged to give precisely their thoughts of death. For my part says Herminia, take me in the humor I am in, I could without great intreaty wish it. I go beyond you says Collatina, and there are certain intervals wherein I should not be much troubled if I had never been. Assure your self, says Plotina, I am not of your opinion, for there are things pleasant enough in this place; and I know no other remedy to cure the pensiveness of death, than that of never thinking on it. But when it hapens, against my will, that I hear of the death of any one, I ever sift out some cause of that death, such as cannot be appliable to my self. For instance, if it be of an aged person, I simply say, he hath been a long time in the World, and secretly think my self as yet very far from that age. If it were of a young body, I say, he or she was of a weak and sickly constitution, sometimes that they took no care of themselves, sometimes, that they had done something that occasioned that misfortune; and whatsoever I may say, I still flatter my self with a hope of living as long as any one can live.

I have a Catalogue of all those who have lived an age, and so discarding those pensive reflections assoon as possibly I can, and I fix my imagination on whatever speaks any joy, and so find my self incomparably better than Flavia, who fixes hers on fear. For my part says Clelia, I am of another humor, for I think on death when there is occasion, but without any frightning; for since I must infallibly see him one day, methinks it is but fit he should not be absolutely a stranger to me.

No more for Heaven's sake, says Flavia, of this discourse concerning death, unless you would have me dye, besides the poor comfort you afford the afflicted when you entertain them with nothing but what is sad. Those who speak of things that require much wit and mirth replyed, Artemidora, are more importunate on the other side, and yet this is ordinary in the World. What you say is true, answered Zenocrates, and therefore am I an enemy to these mourning-visits, for I cannot endure to be sad when I am not troubled; and it is certainly a very unhandsome thing to go and laugh with those that weep. There are so many things disorderly done in the Word, replies Amilcar, that we must accustom our selves to them, and were there no other inconveniencies in humane life than what we suffer through the extravagancies of others, we should not be much unfortunate, for look on mens humors generally, they rather make sport, then are troubled at them.

While they were thus engaged, was news brought that Tarquin, understanding by the return of his Envoys, that those who had declared for him were taken, had sent word by a Herald who was at the City-gate, that if they were put to death he declared open war against Rome. So that they being alraedy dispatched, the war was as good as declared. To this news was added that Brutus and Valerius, to shew how little they valued that bravado, had answered they would accept the challenge, and that on the morrow they would cause Janus's Temple to be opened, which they had not shut since the departure of Tarquin, but to recreate the people with such a representation of peace as they had not seen during the Tyrants reign: For that Temple had not been shut since the time of Numa, during which there were 43 years of peace. This intelligence surprised not the enemy much, only Clelia was troubled at it, as imagining imagining it must needs be hard, if, the War continuing, the King of Clusium should not engage therein; and that Aronces should not be drawn into a party opposite to that of Rome. Yet did she not discover her resentment, nay, was forced to permit Horatius to entertain her for some time, after which the company dissolved it self.

The next morning the two Consuls went, and, according to the Ceremony, opened all the Gates of Janus's Temple, which was presently thronged with people to assist at the sacrifices offered on the twelve Altars, which were consecrated to the twelve months of the year, to the end, that when ever the Romans made war, they might get the better. Brutus made a publick Prayer for the people of Rome, which in few words, acquainted those that heard it, with the justice of their cause, and the respect they owed the Gods. Which done, and the presages proving all fortunate, and that that day was not any one of those that are thought fatal to the Romans, the people was generally in hope that the war might have a happy issue.

In the mean time, order was taken to put in execution who had been resolved on some dales before. Artemidorus and Zenocrates, went disguised from Rome to Clusium, there, with the assistance of the Princess of Leontum, to hinder Porsenna from engaging in the War, that Tarquin was going to make; but this was, after conference had with Brutus, Valerius, Herminius, and Amilcar, and after leave taken by Sulpicia, and her incomparable Daughter. On the other side, Celeres having sufficiently disguised himself, was not discovered at Tarquinia, but was witness of the fury Tarquin and Tullia were in, when the enterprize of their Envoys failed at Rome. However, they took a certain wicked comfort to hear that Brutus had the affliction to see the death of his own children. Cileres saw also the despair of the beautiful Ocrisia, who would needs die when she understood the death of her servant.

In the mean time, though Tarquin were implacably incensed against Aronces, because he was loved by Clelia, the Tyrant's ambition being then predominant over his love, yet durst he not treat him harshly. On the contrary, he was so careful of him, that he soon recovered of his wounds, but was nevertheless very narrowly looked to. The greatest enjoyment Aronces had, was, that the Prince of Pometia and Titus, both virtuous persons were permitted to visit him. So that from them he understood the transactions at Rome. Celeres therefore having observed that these Princes often visited Aronces, and not finding any other way to speak to him, but by their assistance, resolved to trust himself to the Prince of Pometia, a person of noble and virtuous inclinations. He therefore made acquaintance with him, and begged of him the favour to see Aronces, to bring him tidings from Clelia, assuring him he would not meddle with any thing but what directly related to the Loves of Aronces, without the least reflection on the concernments of Rome. In so much that the Prince of Pometia, sensible of Lovers misfortunes, promised Celeres to do what he desired, besides that, being infinitely in love with Hermilia, he in like manner would trust Celeres, and intreated him, that by the same way as he gave Aronces an account of Clelia, he would send tidings of him to the amiable Sister of Brutus. He made the Prince his Brother acquainted with this business, that Celeres might send from him to Collatina, whom he so dearly loved; for as things stood then, it would have been hard for them to send often to Rome, without being discovered. But by the means of Celeres, they doubted not the safe carriage of their Letters, so that having promised him not to write any thing but what related to their Love, and he on the other side engaged himself to them, not to meddle with any thing but what concerned that of his friend; those two Princes carried their business with so much prudence, that the officers that guarded Aronces, suffered some of their retinue to go in along with them, when ever they went to visit that prisoner. By this means Celeres, disguised like one of those Slaves, who wait on Princes in their Chambers, attended them when they went to see Aronces. The first time he came, that illustrious Prisoner was almost out of himself for joy, and the entertainment that happened between the Prince of Pometia, Titus and him, was the noblest and most generous in the World. So that from that time Celeres became the Confident of these three Princes, and went divers times to Rome to bring their Letters to Clelia, Hermilia and Collatina, whose answers he faithfully returned to these three Lovers, who found some ease in discoursing of their joynt misfortunes, For, the Prince of Pometia and Titus being great Lovers of Virtue, they had a horror for the wicked actions of those to whom they owed their lives; and if the same virtue that oblig'd them to abhorr their crimes, had not also engag'd them in their interests, they had been their enemies, for as to the Crown they had no pretence to it, Sextus being only look'd upon by Tarquin and Tullia, as fit to succeed them.

What was most remarkable, was, that this Prince, who, by the violence he did Lucretia, caused the ruine of his House, the insurrection of Rome, and all the miseries of the King his Father, the Queen his Mother, the Princes his Brethren, and himself, groaned under, did nevertheless mind his enjoyments in the little Town where he was retir'd, and whence he durst not stirr, because Tarquin could not in policy have been near his person. So that never reflecting on the death of that amiable person, or regarding the misfortunes which in all likelihood he must foresee; he led as voluptuous a life, as if he had been in Rome in absolute peace.

It was not so with Tarquin and Tulia, for they omitted nothing which they thought might contribute any thing to their re-establishment. Having thereforesent to Rome, and the Consuls having accepted the War they had declared, Tarquin went one morning to Aronces, to get him to write to Porsenna, to assure him of his noble entertainment, that so the person whom he intended to send to him, might the better be received. What I desire of you, saies Tarquin to him, contains nothing that is unjust, and savors not of the Tyranny which my enemies reproach me with. For having taken you in Arms against me, I might treat you as an enemy, and yet not be charged with any injustice. But since there is a very strict alliance between the King of Clusium and my self, I shall proceed with moderation. I am not to learn, My Lord, replies Aronces, without the least disturbance, that there hath been an alliance between Rome and Clusium, but but know not whether there will be any hereafter between Tarquin and Porſenna.

How it ever may happen, added he, all I can tell you, is, that you have taken me in Arms, and that accordingly, I expect no other favor than to be treated as a Priſoner of War. Look not therefore on me in this conjuncture, as ſon to the King of Cluſium, but as a friend to Clelius, Brutus, Valerius, and Herminius, and a ſervant to Clelia. Look upon me, I ſay, as an enemy, and expect not I ſhould write any thing to the King my Father, to enſnare him into your intereſts. He underſtands his own better, replyed Tarquin, than to refuſe his protection to a Prince, forced away by his rebellious Subjects, and conſequently not to joyn with me. If he do it, replies generouſly Aronces, I ſhall be the moſt unfortunate of men, as being reduced to ſuch an extremity, as that I cannot bear Arms againſt you; and if he do it not, I ſhall infallibly make one among your enemies. Tarquin obſerving with what conſtancy Aronces ſpoke, and attributing it to the ſtrongeſt paſſion he had for Clelia, was ſo much the more exaſperated againſt him, inſomuch, that though he ought in point of policy to humour that illuſtrious captive, yet could he not forbear to give him a bitter anſwer, telling him, that if he were treated any better than he ſhould, it was not for his own ſake.

However, he ſends to Porſenna, to acquaint him, that he had taken his Son in Arms, yet that he did not detain him as an enemy, but only to keep him from getting into Rome, where he might marry Clelia, who was then at liberty; That knowing it was not his intention it ſhould be ſo, he ſent him notice of it, intreating and exhorting him to take his part; that he would remember the alliance there was between them; and to conſider his cauſe, as ſuch as might be that of all Kings.

This done, Tarquin went in perſon from City to City, to beg aſſiſtance of his neighbors, taking along with him the Princes Son's, to raiſe the more compaſſion in the people. But Tarquin being rather feared than loved, he was not received favourably any where but among the Veientes, for which reaſon he took the more pains to win them into his party, than any other; beſides that Veie was one of the moſt conſiderable Cities of all Tuſcany. It was as big as Athens, extreamly populous, and very rich, the inhabitants were ſtout men, and the Countrey belonging thereunto, reached from the Janiculus to Tarquinia, and from thence to the Mountain Soracte, towards the County of the Faliſci, being ſeated high in a fertile Country, about fourteen miles from Rome, and conſequently, very fit for the commodious entertainment of an Army, and withal, ſtrangely to incommodate the Romans. Beſides which, Tarquin being confident that the people of Tarquinia, which was alſo a very ſtrong City, would be for him, thought that if he could but joyn the Veientes and the Tarquinians together, they would be ſtrong enough to reduce Rome. He therefore was extreamly deſirous to engage them into his intereſts, and being loath to truſt any one to perſwade thoſe whom he would gain, he provided to ſpeak himſelf. The Council whereby that conſiderable City was governed, met together, Tarquin being followed only by the two Princes his Sons, with a ſmall train, to raiſe the greater pity in thoſe whom he would make partners in his diſgraces,

And as men are generally moved at extraordinary accidents, ſo, how tyrannical ſoever Tarquin might have been, thoſe he ſpoke to being not his ſubjects, but his neighbors and allies, they heard him with reſpect, and had a great compaſſion for him. Tarquin was not certainly any of the handſomeſt men, yet had he, I know not what, that was great amidſt his fierceneſs, which was not unſuitable to his birth. Add to that, his being followed by the Princes his Sons, who were very handſom men, did as it were, ſoften the hearts of thoſe who ſaw Princes of ſuch high birth, become unfortunate in ſo ſmall a time. Tarquin therefore being placed where he was to ſpeak, doing his humour a certain violence, began now to intreat, who had never before but commanded

You ſee generous Veientes, ſaid he to them, what haply others never did, that is, an unfortunate King, that hath loſt a Crown in a moment, while he expoſed his life at the Siege of Ardæa, for the glory of thoſe who forced him away. I make no Apology for all the pretended violences which my enemies reproach me with, for the juſt limits of lawful authority, and tyrannical power, are not ſo preciſely deſigned by reaſon, but that men may ſometimes call that tyrannie, which is no more than an expreſſion of his vigor who governs: Without any examination therefore whether my Politicks have been guilty of too much rigor or not; I ſhall only ſay, that ſhould I have been unjuſt, yet are my ſubjects nevertheleſs criminal, and that my neighbors are obliged to aſſiſt me, You will haply tell me, That Monarchical States are more concerned in my protection than you are; but I may anſwer you, that it is no leſs your concernment than theirs, and that the conſequences of it may prove as dangerous in relation to your government, as to any other of a different nature. For in fine, to ſpeak properly, the King is not the object of the peoples hatred, but the power that keeps them in ſubjection. For he that would ſearch into the hearts of all Nations in the world, would find very often that thoſe who live in Republiques, would gladly live under Kings; and that thoſe that live under Kings, would fain live under a Common-wealth. So that it concerns you to puniſh the rebellion of my ſubjects, unleſs you would give an ill example to thoſe who at the preſent obey you, as being ſuch as haply are perſwaded that they cannot, but with expectation of puniſhment diſobey you. You know moreover, generous Veientes, that there is a natural antipathy between the Romans and you, which ſhould oblige you to embrace any juſt occaſion, to revenge your ſelves for the antient injuries they have done you. Embrace it then generouſly, and forſake not an unfortunate King, forced away not only by his ſubjects, but by his nearer kindred, who have ſnatched the Crown from him with their own hands, and who yet are forced to divide his power, becauſe there was not any one among them, that deſerved the ſole poſſeſſion of it to himſelf. Be not afraid to have to do with a ſort of men, who ſince they have proved rebellious to their King, will certainly prove traitors one to another. We ſhall triumph without trouble, if you will but aſſiſt me. But above all things, that which is of greateſt concernment, is expedition, ſo that my enemies may not have time to fortifie themſelves, by a conjunction of parties. Aſſiſt me then, generous Veientes, revenge your Troops heretofore defeated by the Roman Legions, and aſſume to your-

[illegible] the glory of having re-inflated a King in his Throne, who shall not otherwise employ the power he shall by your means recover, than to revenge you on your enemies, if there happen to be any that shall presume to molest you, when we shall be joyned together. The Tarquinians will be on our side, and if you will take my advice, you will not stay till all other Nations concern themselves in my disgrace, you will envy your enemies the advantage of having revenged the affront I have received, and in a word, you will behave your selves like generous neighbors, faithful Allies and able Statesmen.

Tarquin having given over speaking, withdrew, to leave them to the liberty of their suffrages. At first sight, he seemed to have moved the hearts of those that heard him, that all the voices were for him. But some of the Assembly having considered the business more narrowly, said, that the point to be debated was, whether they were Allies to Rome, or to Tarquin. For in fine, said one of those that were of that opinion, the union of two people, is that which occasions the conveniences of Commerce, and not the alliance of a dispossessed King, who is not to be considered otherwise by us, than as a private person. But if Tarquin get into the Throne again without our assistance, replyed another, what condition should we be in? would he not be our most implacable enemy, and this union of Nations, whence are derived all the conveniences of Commerce, could it subsist when we had forsaken him? It does not concern us to examine whether he hath been forced away justly or not; but it is our business to lay hold on an occasion, to make a War against our ancient enemies, since it proves advantageous to us. It is ever good to afford protection to fortunate Princes, and it were dangerous to refuse it: for in that, if we refuse to be of Tarquin's party, we must side with Rome, for whom we have been already resolved to declare: So that Rome being the place that is to be set upon, it will be in our Countrey, and at our charge, that the enemies Army will subsist, without discipline, and consequently with all the violences which attend the first eruptions of Wars of this nature. On the contrary, if we are of their side, who must set upon Rome, it will be easier for us to rescue our Countrey from all military hostilities.

This Velemin having spoken with much earnestness, hindred the other that opposed him to carry away the greatest number of voices, though he also debated the business with much obstinacy. So that it was resolved that they would assist Tarquin with all the force they could make.

This Prince returning thereupon to Tarquinia, the Inhabitants of the City chearfully prepared to take the field with as many Troops as could be raised, as thinking it a thing making much for their glory, that a family of their City should reign at Rome. On the other side, Brutus and Valerius left nothing unmoved, in order to a preparation for the War, and, causing all to be listed that were able to bear Arms, and that were not listed before, they were to think at the same time of mustering their Legions, modelling an Army, exercising the new raised Soldiers, fortifying their City, and transporting the War as far as they could from their own Walls. So that in Rome, Veia, and Tarquinia, all were in Arms, all ready to fight. However, Celeres passed to and fro between Rome and Tarquinia, to carry news from Aronces to Clelia, and from Clelia to Aronces. But when ever he went, he wanted not a Pacquet to Hermilia and Collatina, who were more than infinitely troubled, when they understood that the Armies were soon to take the field. For when Hermilia did but imagine that she saw her Brother and her servant fighting one against another, she strugled with a grief that was too hard for her reason to deal with, and not knowing what to wish, she wished nothing at all, and so remained in the most afflictive uncertainty in the world. Collatina was also extreamly troubled, and Clelia so far, that her grief admitted no comparison. What added to her affliction, was, that she had understood by Celeres, that Aronces was at certain times guilty of a strange jealousie, out of a fear that Horatius might undermine him in her esteem. Insomuch that she knew not what to desire, as things stood; for if she wished that Tarquin would deliver him up to Porsenna, she thought he might be clapped up at Clusium as he was at Tarquinia, unless he should promise the King his Father, never to think of her more, which would have proved the greatest misfortune that ever could have happened to her. On the other side, if he made an escape, and came to Rome, she saw him between two Rivals, and withal, exposed to all the hazards of a War.

In the mean time, Mutius left nothing undone that might please Valeria, and Herminius was still importunate with Valerius, who would start from his resolution; besides that, not thinking it fit to marry his Daughter in that troublesome conjuncture of time, Herminius was forced to give over pressing him any further. So that there were only Amilcar and Plotina, who were subject to no present misfortune; on the contrary, having abundance of good inclinations one for the other, they accounted themselves happy enough, and not foreseeing that their fortune was such as would not give them leave to imagine they should continue long together, the present enjoyment swallowed up the fear of what was to come, and was enough to satisfie them. So that amidst so many unfortunate persons, and a City where there was no discourse but that of War, all theirs was of Love, as not being troubled at any thing but the misfortunes of their friends.

Porsander, on the other side being resolved to serve Rome while the War should last, besides that, the waies were not safe, Cesonia took a house, and Plotina lived with her. 'Tis true, they so often visited Clelia, Valeria, Collatina, and Hermilia, that it might be said they seldom were asunder. For Horatius he left not a stone unmoved to curry favour with Clelius, who had a very particular affection for him, upon the account of his Mother, whom he had been a Suitor to before he married Sulpicia. But for Clelia, he observed such a respectful distance towards her, that she had not the least occasion to complain of him, though she had been ever so desirous of it. When ever he said any thing to her of Aronces, he did it with abundance of reservedness, insomuch that the manner of his carriage put her into a greater disturbance, than if he had spoken in any other way.

I easily

I easily perceive Madam (said he to her one day, that being come to wait on her, she was somewhat pensive) that your mind is not where your body is, and that you are more taken up with Aroncet than with Horatius. Nay, 'tis certain, Madam, that your heart is in prison with my Rival, and even at the very instant that I speak to you, you do not so much as give me the hearing. And yet would you but seriously reflect on the state of affairs, you would find it were not the pleasure of Fortune that Aroncet should be happy. His own birth is an unavoidable hindrance to his felicity, since that the King his Father would never permit him to marry you, and that in all probability Porsenna being likely to become an Enemy to Rome, Clelius himself will oblige you to give over all thoughts of Aroncet, besides that being Tarquin's Prisoner, his destiny, as to what may become of him, is yet more doubtful.

As I am not guilty of so great a presumption as that of prying into the secrets of the Gods, replied Clelia, so I leave what is to come to their disposal: but when all is done, Horatius, though I should never be Aroncet's, I will never be yours, and to satisfie you that I do not say so out of humor, I shall assure you that it ever hath been my faith, that it is for any one lawful to love once in his life, provided that Love be innocent, and that one love with an irretractable resolution of never entertaining any second passion, whatever may happen; for without that I look on the woman as fit to be slighted, and indeed unworthy to live. So that as I must needs acknowledge, that my heart is full of Aroncet, and that he hath the absolute possession thereof; so though thousands of hindrances retard the happy progress of our affection, you should be never the nearer happiness for it. But Madam, replyed Horatius, since it is certain that Aroncet cannot be satisfied, why are you not willing I should? because, replyed she, I am confident you never can. For, in a word, take it from me, as told you with all possible sincerity, I shall never admit a second affection: nay, though Aroncet were dead, or what were more insupportable, were he unconstant, and that I should love him no longer, I should not love any thing after him, and that out of a pure sentiment of glory, and I should die a thousand times rather than be engaged to affect any thing again. But things are not come to that pass, for Aroncet lives, and will not be unfaithful, and Clelius is so rational, that I am not in the least fear he will ever force my inclinations, even though his mind were changed.

As Clelia spoke these words, the Prince of Numidia came (this being his first visit) to Sulpicia's, who thought him extreamly altered; his wounds and his melancholy having brought him so very low tha he was hardly known. He was grown so pale, that he seemed not to be an African, besides that, by the change of Climate, he was so fallen away, that he could not well be distinguished from a Roman. Sulpicia, who knew his quality, whom he had spoken to with so much generosity when Clelius and she met him near Ameriola, and was not ignorant how gallantly he had exposed his life to rescue her incomparable daughter, entertained him very kindly. Even Clelia her self, who had seen him fight with incredible valor for her Liberty, must needs have a civility for him, and withal remember, that when she saw him hazarding his life for her in Tarquin's Palace, she took him for Aroncet. But the Prince of Numidia and Horatius having not seen one another since they had fought on the Lake of Toragmenes, they looked on the other with a little indignation, insomuch, that if Clelius had not come in, these two Lovers, who could not ruine Aroncet in the esteem of Clelia; nor be revenged on him, as being both obliged to him, would haply have made some quarrels. But such was the prudence of Clelius, that having heard the Prince of Numidia and Horatius were in his wifes Chamber, he came in purposely to send away Horatius upon pretence of publick affairs, giving Sulpicia and Clelia order so to deal with Adherbal, as he should do with his Rival. Clelia accordingly, willing to obey her Father, and submit to reason, spoke to the Prince of Numidia, with abundance of kindness, while Sulpicia entertained the virtuous Sivelia, who was come to give her a visit. She gave him thanks for the hazards he had exposed himself to for her sake; she commended in him the generous resolution he had taken to do what he could to conquer his passion, and entreated him not to entertain any longer the aversion he had for Horatius. You know, said she to him, that I speak not this out of any affection I have for him, but only to hinder two persons of extraordinary merit from engaging in any quarrel, at a time when Rome stands so much in need of gallant men, such as should think of nothing but how to defend her. Ah! Madam, replyes Adherbal, is it not enough that you take Aroncet, whom you love, into your protection; but you must also plead for Horatius, whom you love not? But since I love him not, replyes she, why should you hate him? Alas! Madam, replyed, he hastily, I hate him because he loves you, and that it is impossible but that a man should hate a Rival. However it be said she, I beg it as a boon of you, that you would not make it your business to quarrel with him. I assure you, replyed he, that all I desire is to dye, nay, I am so unhappy, as not to find what so many others meet with without ever looking after it. But Madam, till such time as I do die, deny me not one favor I am now to beg of you. All Lovers replyed she, are unreasonable, and therefore they must not be promised any thing; before it be known what is asked, and so you must tell me what you would desire before I answer you. My desire, Madam, said he, is, that you would favor me so far as to tell me, that I am not the most hated of all those that love you; I shall Aroncet the glory of being the best beloved, he deserves it and I am unworthy of it, and there are a many reasons I should undergo that misfortune: But give me leave to think my self much more in your favor than Horatius. I know he brought you back to Rome, but he it was also Madam, that carried you away at Capua, and all that can be said of him, as to his bringing of you hither, is, that he made a shift to resist the temptation of carrying you away a second time: but for my part Madam, I came to Rome purposely to deliver you, though I had not the least confidence of your love. Think your self therefore so far obliged to me, as not to deny me the favor I beg of you. I grant you more then you desire, replyed Clelia, for you shall not only not be hated, but I shall have abundance of friendship for you, if you will but be pleased to forbear all love to me. Ah! Madam, cryes he, you will never love me while you live, if you cannot love me till such time as I shall love you no longer.

Adherbal being at those words, Valeria and Plotina came in, followed not long after by Herminius, who was but in the room e're came in Cælonia and Plotina, and after them, their constant attendant Amilcar, e're the company was set down. But he being at that time not in so lively an humor as he used to be, Clelia asked him the reason of it. Though I cannot easily refuse any request made by a person of your worth, replyed he, yet I have no inclination to answer you; for if I tell you what it is, you will laugh at me. You so seldome run that hazard, replyes Plotina, that were it only out of curiosity, I would advise you to do it for once. I shall not certainly be believed, says Amilcar, if I tell you what troubles me. It will not be the first time that you were not believed, answers Plotina smiling, you should not so much fear our incredulity. Know then says he, I never was so tyred out with a man in my life; as I was this day for three hours space, during which, I entertained him with a hundred several things. It must be some man of no great understanding, replyes the Prince of Numidia. Not so, My Lord, replyes Amilcar; it is not his stupidity that I quarrel at: it must be then one of those who dispute all things, says Herminius, such as with whom a man must contest very much, because they ever contradict those that are present. On the contrary, replyes Amilcar; 'tis a man that never disputes any thing, who gives a man what he would have, says all you would have him, knows no opinion but what you put into his head, that never says No of any thing, but Yes of all, contradicts himself as much as you please, and by a base unworthy, and importunate complyance, murthers conversation every minute, puts a man to a loss what to say to him, and keeps one from making any sport, unless it be with him. You aggravate this so pleasantly, says Clelia, that I should be glad to know that man, who by being excessively compliant, turns a good quality into an imperfection. 'Tis a man, replyed he, of a pale countenance, of a mild disposition, in point of action careless, as to gate, very slow, and one that is given extreamly to say, 'Tis true.

As I word having unhappily engaged into his company, our first discourse was of War, but having presently discovered him to be one that said all a man would have him, I made him change his opinion above a hundred times. I made him commend both Brutus and Tarquin, say that Rome should conquer, and be conquered; that Sextus was a fool, and that the same Sextus was a wise man; that without virtue a man could not be happy; that with virtue a man is ever miserable: To be short, I made him contradict himself as I pleased. Upon this, I made the motion to him, to go to twenty several places, where I am confident he had not any thing to do: and yet he would needs tell me he had some business where-ever I proposed he should go, insomuch, that I was forced at last to tell him, I could very well be without him, and desire him there and come hither, where the greatest pleasure I can have, is to be contradicted; for I am so weary of compliance, that at the present, I look on the pleasure of disputing, as the greatest diversion in the World.

It is a thing so easie to afford you that pleasure, says Plotina laughing, that I undertake to maintain that compliance is the best, the most acceptable, the most convenient, and the most necessary quality that a man can have. For do but compare the man that never says No, with another of my acquaintance that never says Yes, that disputes perpetually, opposes all the world, who ceases to be of an opinion assoon as another man is of it, who quits his own sentiments, assoon as he hath perswaded any other into them, for fear of being of the same judgment with another; and who in a word, banishes out of all company where he comes, the quiet and enjoyments thereof, by his obstinacy in disputing with all he meets; and you will find whether your complaint man that wearied you so much, be not to be preferred before him that I speak of. Nor indeed can it be denyed, that Compliance is a good quality. No question but it is, replyed Herminius, but it must certainly be confined within its limits, and be guided by judgment: for it is of such a nature, that sometimes it is as serviceable to Vice as to Virtue. I could never have believed, says Clelia, that the two most compliant men in the world should speak so much against compliance. For my part said Herminius, I am not against it, when it is rational; on the contrary, I maintain, that it is necessary to all societies of men, that it contributes something to all enjoyments, that it is the cement of love and friendship, and that without compliance we should be always in discord and sullenness. But I must withall hold, that as sincerity is the principal virtue of all in relation to persons of quality; compliance is that of all the virtues which is most commonly abused by men of base and byassed inclinations, cheats and sycophants. In a word, I think it so dangerous, that I compare it to those subtil poysons that are put into flowers, and kill men unavoidably. On the other side, says Cælonia, when you would commend a woman, you say, she is of a compliant sweet disposition. 'Tis very true, replyes Amilcar, and I must confess, 'tis fit a woman should be so; but the difficulty is to know how far she ought to be so; and how far the true limits of compliance extend. For as liberality, that Heroick virtue, that makes men the most like Gods, becomes prodigality, when it is excessive and not limited by judgment; so compliance, which is a quiet virtue, acceptable and requisite to society, and very much to be esteemed, degenerates into a vice, when it hath no limits. And to speak truly, the case is not the same with this vice as with others, for there is but one kind of justice, one kind of generosity and wisdom, but there are a hundred kinds of compliances, whereof the greatest part are vicious. If you say a hundred, replyes Plotina, you say too much. On the contrary, replyed Herminius, were it my humor to say a thousand, I should not say amiss. I think you would very much oblige the company says Clelia, would you afford it your instruction in a business of such consequence. I very readily shall, says he, on condition that all the illustrious persons present will before hand acacknowledge, that they have all met with some compliant persons whom they have sleighted. For my part, says Adherbal, I have known some in Numidia, whom I have denyed whatever they have desired of me, without any other reason for it, than that they were guilty of a certain interessed compliance, which I could not endure. You were very much in the right, my Lord, replies Herminius, minius, for there is not any thing more insupportable, than a sort of people that affect compliance, whose wills are consonant to yours, meerly to oblige you to comply with theirs. And yet the world is full of this kind of people, in all conditions, and of all sexes; but there are withall such a vast number of compliances that I think it almost impossible to name them all. For there are compliances of interest, compliances of disposition, compliances of love, compliances of esteem, compliances of friendship, compliances of ambition, unworthy, base compliances, compliances derived from dissimulation, Court-compliances, City-compliances, serious compliances, merry compliances, eloquent compliances, mute compliances, true and false compliances, and thousands more. 'Tis true, there are of all those kinds that you have named, says Plotina; but in fine, what I would fain learn is, the true use of compliance, whether it be with our Superiours or inferiours, whether between persons of the same condition, whether between men and their female acquaintances, or between persons that are in love. I think says Herminius, it were an easier matter to say what ought not to be done, than what ought: But I shall briefly tell you, all I shall think fit, without any compliance. To speak then of compliance in general, I would not have it to be such as shall flatter vice, betray virtue, disguise truth, derogate from Religion. I would not have people to be less sincere, just, and faithful, that they may be the more compliant: I would have those that are related to great ones to respect them, but would have them study such a compliance, as regards only their quality, and not their own interest, and such as obliges them to commend that which they abhor in their hearts. Compliance does indeed very well in things indifferent, but it must ever be avoided in those that may be prejudicial either to him with whom a man complies, or any other.

You'll pardon me, that I interrupt you says Plotina, but I am so with child to know what you meant when you spoke of a mute compliance, that I cannot forbear entreating you to inform me. By a mute compliance, replyes Herminius, I mean those people, that for fear of saying any thing that might displease their friends, suffer them to run into indiscreet and extravagant actions, without giving them the least notice thereof, and know not, that the greatest expression of friendship, is to give faithful advice. I am of your mind, replyed Clelia, but with this proviso, that it is but fit, that those who give advice, should do it with mildness and prudence, for there are few love those that acquaint them with their imperfections. But to return to compliance, added she, I would fain know when people ought to have any, when not. It does always well, replyed Amilcar, when it is not unpleasant to those for whom it is had, nor to him that hath it. That's too generally said, replyes Herminius, for though it ought to be had for all indifferent things, yet were it not amiss to introduce into a society, a generous freedom, such whereby men may not be obliged to captivate themselves eternally, and never say any thing but as you please, for, at your service; to those who propose any thing of divertisement to them: for as to matter of I am confident business, there needs no great compliance, and that it is the part of reason to regulate it. Herminius does indeed speak very pertinently, says Amilcar smiling; for to speak properly, it might be said, that compliance is the Queen of Trifles, and that it is of main concernment, when there is a dispute, whether it be better walking in one place than another, to dance or not to dance, to sing or not to sing. But however saies Plotina, I hope you will confess there cannot be in love, any excess of compliance; and that the more compliant a Lover is, the more amiable he is. I grant it, replies Amilcar, but I question whether he will be as much beloved as he is amiable, if he continue to be excessively compliant; and whether it be not a kind of policy in Love, and consequently very fit, that a man carry himself so as to be a little courted into compliance. For my part says Herminius, I am not of your opinion, for I think it is not so true, that jealousie is the inseparable attendant of love, as that there cannot be true love without compliance, since it is out of all question, that there are some Lovers so confident of the fidelity of the persons they love, that they admit not the least jealousie, and that there never were any that wanted compliance. While a Lover is not loved, replies Plotina, I shall easily grant he may be compliant, but in my judgment, assoon as he is once confident of his Mistresses affection, he is sometimes as much inclined to do his own will, as that of the person he loves. How ere it be says Herminius, if he be not compliant, he ought to be so, nay I dare maintain he cannot forbear being such if he love truly. But if compliance in Love ought to be implicite, it must not be such in friendship, for there it must ever be attended with prudence and sincerity. Compliance is certainly the cement of civil society: but as I have already said, it should never either betray or flatter. Things absolutely indifferent, fall under its jurisdiction; in all other, it lies subject to circumvention, artifice, baseness or interest. Not but that a man may sometimes have a compliance even in things of consequence, though as it hath been said, it ought not ordinarily to be so. Yet is it allowable, when the person who hath the compliance is only concerned in the business they have in hand, and that generosity on that occasion supplies the place of reason, and guides it as the other would. But one of the most dangerous compliances of any, is that which applauds detraction, meerly to comply with the detractor, and is so far from vindicating innocence, that it suffers it to be oppressed basely and unjustly.

'Tis very true, says Clelia, that this happens daily, for the person traduced being absent, and the detractor present, such as make it their profession to be compliant, flatter those they see, and neglect those they see not. But says Cæsonia, I am yet farther to learn what you mean by Court-Compliances, City-Compliances, Serious-Compliances, and merry-Compliances: For as to the rest, the very names you give them discover what they are. For Court-compliances, says Amilcar, it is easily perceived that Herminius speaks of those who are ever telling you they will do any thing you will have them, and yet do nothing but what they will themselves. And for the City-compliance, I understand it not so well, I can only guess at what it is. What I call by that name, says Herminius, is properly a certain forced compliance, misconstrued, stuffed with complements, ceremony, and unſeaſonable commendation, and ſuch as is not a little offenſive to thoſe to whom it is directed. For ſerious compliance, it points at people of a cold diſpoſition, ſuch as are reſerved and diſcreet, ſuch as force their inclinations not without ſome violence to their nature, and ſo give their friends away with ſuch gravity and coldneſs, as if they denied what they grant them. For what I call the merry, it is the particular humour of Amilcar, and is ſo apparent in him, that there needs no more to diſcover it than to ſee him; for he ſeems to be ſo cheerful and glad to do what is deſired of him, that it might be ſaid he obeys his own inclinations, though he ſaies he only obeys thoſe of his friends. So that I dare confidently ſay, that he is never more compliant towards others than when he hath moſt compliance for himſelf. But, ſays Plotina, what muſt be done, and what muſt be omitted? You muſt do, replied Herminius, whatever reaſon adviſes, that is, you muſt expreſs a certain mildneſs, civility, and compliance; but it muſt be ſuch a compliance as is not incompatible with Liberty; that gives way without weakneſs, commends without flattery, accommodates it ſelf with judgement and innocence to times, places, and perſons; and ſuch as without affectation and lowneſs makes ſociety pleaſant, and heightens the conveniences and diverſions of life. It ſhould alſo qualifie a man to bear with the humorouſneſs of friends; ſo as not to be too ſenſible of thoſe ſharp familiarities that happen, ſo they be not over frequent, but to ſubmit ſometimes to the pleaſures of others, and to do a thouſand other little offices that may be done without injury to reaſon, or violence to juſtice, and conſequently ſuch as do effectually make men better. In a word, compliance is ſometimes able to diſarm wrath, and to bring a calm into an exaſperated mind. But all the skill is in knowing what it is good for, ſo it may not be abuſed, as certain remedies are, which men apply indifferently to all manner of diſtempers. For it is certain, that ſottiſh compliance is flat and wearifome, and diſtaſtful even to thoſe to whom it is directed. You muſt therefore, if poſſible, endeavour to get that which I mean, and that it may be ſeen I ſpeak not of a thing that is not in being, you need go no further to find it, than to the Ladies that are preſent, who are certainly furniſhed with all that honourable compliance that pleaſes, that offends no body, refines the judgement, ſweetens the diſpoſition, angments friendſhip, multiplies love, and cloſing with juſtice and geneoſity, becomes the ſecret charm of ſociety.

Herminius putting this period to his diſcourſe, the Ladies he had commended, looked very earneſtly upon one another, as if they would have ſaid one to another, it was fit they ſhould make ſome anſwer to Herminius civility. But at laſt Clelia perceiving that none of the reſt concerned themſelves ſo much in the praiſes given them by Herminius, as to return him any, anſwered him with abundance of wit and no leſs modeſty.

This put a period to that conference, for Mutius and Spurius being come into the room, brought news that the enemies horſe would be ſuddenly in the field, and that for certain, Tarquin would have a very conſiderable Army. So that diſcourſes of this nature being not ſo acceptable as what had paſſed before, the company was ſoon after diſſolved. Valeria, who had a particular diſ-affection for Spurius, and deſired nothing ſo much as to oblige Herminius, went along with Flavia; as ſoon as Mutius had told this news; Amilcar waited on Cærſonia and Plotina; Mutius and Spurius made but a ſhort viſit, and the Prince of Numidia perceiving it to be late, took his leave with the reſt. But e're he went, he ſaid to Clelia, whatever a conjunction of Love and Reſpect, might furniſh an unfortunate Lover with ſuch a one as would needs love while he lives, even with an aſſurance of being ever miſerable. He therefore went his way loaden with a melancholly, that found his ſpirits ſuch employment, that he ſaw not what he ſeemed to look on, ſo ſtrangely were his thoughts taken up with the deplorable condition he was in. For in fine, ſaid he to himſelf, What advantage is it to me to be a Kings Son, if I cannot avoid being Clelia's ſlave? What am I the better for my Reaſon, if it muſt ever be ſubject to my Love? What avails it me, that I am generouſly born, if I cannot forbear being ungrateful to Aronces; And what happineſs is it to me that I was born in Numidia, ſince I am not capable of the inconſtancy attributed to thoſe of my Countrey? 'Tis ſad I ſhould not have thoſe imperfections that were ſome way advantageous to me, and that I have thoſe virtues I am never the better for, ſince I cannot overcome my paſſion.

Adherbal, amidſt theſe reflections, was got to the place where he lodged, without taking any notice of an old man, a ſtranger, that had obſerved him very wiſh'dly, and had followed him. But being come to the Gate, this man, whoſe name was Donilcar, paſſing before the ſlaves that belonged to the Prince (for Brutus had ordered him to have ſome about him) preſented himſelf to him with a very ſad deportment, and ſpeaking to him, I know not, my Lord, ſaid he, whether you can remember the unfortunate Donilcar, who hath had the happineſs to bring you up; but this I know, that I had much ado to call you to mind, you are ſo ſad, and ſo much altered. Adherbal at theſe words, remembring him who had been the guide of his youth, and whom he had truſted with his life, embraced him with much affection, and leading him into his Chamber, Is it the King my Father that hath ſent you to look after me, ſaid he to him? Alas! my Lord, replied Donilcar ſighing, I know not whether I may preſume to tell you what hath brought me hither, and that I ſhall run the hazard of loſing your friendſhip, if I acquaint you with one of the ſtrangeſt things in the world. The poſture my ſoul is in at the preſent conſidered, replies the Prince very dolefully, I cannot apprehend there ſhould happen ſuch misfortunes to me in Numidia, as I might have more than an ordinary reſentment, for, if ſo be the King my Father be well. The King of Numidia, replies Donilcar, is in very good health, but my Lord, that abates nothing of your miſery. I prethee, ſays Adherbal, never fear to tell me what you know, for, as I have already ſaid, according to the poſture I am in, there can no misfortune fall to me, but what happens at Rome. Promiſe me then, replies Donilcar, that you will not be diſpleaſed with me when I have told you. I am ſo highly obliged to you, replies Adherbal, that I think it impoſſible I ſhould be angry with you, even though you should disoblige me: speak then boldly, and deliver me out of the uncertainty I am in. And yet, if I may guess at what you have to tell me, it is this; That it is upon my account that the Carthaginians have broken with the King my Father, and consequently, that the Subjects I should one day have had, are dissatisfied, and are haply, risen up against me. Alas! My Lord, you cannot guess at your unhappiness, and therefore since you must one day know it, 'twere best you had it from me. Know then, that there now stands before you, that unhappy man, who was desirous to bestow on you a Crown which my wife hath, upon her death, taken away from you whether I would or no. What you tell me, is to my apprehension so obscure, and so impossible, replied Adherbal, that you must express your self more clearly, if you would have me to understand you. Alas, My Lord, what I have to tell you, is, that you are not Son to the King of Numidia. How, replies Adherbal, am I not what I ever thought my self? No, My Lord, replied he, and if you will needs be acquainted with your fortune, it shall cost you but the patience to hear me. Make an end once, make an end, O fortune, says the unfortunate Adherbal, leave me not any thing, not so much as a noble birth; but when thou hast done thy worst, how great soever thy power and injustice may be, thou shalt never take away from me a Kings heart, though I should be so unfortunate as to have been born a Shepherd. Whereupon Adherbal recovering himself, look'd on Denilcar with an extream sadness, and intreated him to relate the truth, without the least palliation.

Since it is your pleasure, my Lord, replied he, you are to know, that the King of Numidia, whose Son you thought your self, being yet young enough, had very violent inclinations for a young Lady of the Court, a person of great quality; but the disproportion there was between them, being very great, the King his Father (then alive) told him one day, that he was not to do any thing as to that Gentlewoman, but what proceeded only out of Gallantry, and forbad him to entertain any thoughts of ever marrying her. But as it ordinarily happens, that the prohibition of things we are taken with, augments the desires we have of them; this young Prince fell so deeply in love, that he secretly married the person he so much affected, and had a Son by her: insomuch that the noise this secret marriage made, and the alarm it put the whole Court into, was so great, that the excellent Lady having but newly given life to a Son, dyed, out of meer grief. Whereupon my wife, having been chosen by the Prince of Numidia, to nurse up the Child secretly, he intreated us to repair into Sicily, till such time as the Kings favour were re-obtained. Thither we crossed, and took up our abode near Lilybæum, where having no acquaintance, we led a very solitary life. Being gone one day a walking into a small Wood, where the umbrage afforded much refreshment and delight; my wife sate down at the foot of a tree, and set the Child she had in her arms upon a Grass-plot, where she thought she might sleep more quietly than in her arms. But, as ill fortune would have it, she fell asleep her self, while I was walking alone in the Wood, whereof the umbrage was so delightful to me: So that a great Serpent coming, questionless out of the Thickets, roll'd it self about the Child; for as all Serpents love the smell of milk, it found there something that drew it thither. It was not long e're the Child waked, crying, whereupon my Wife waking also on a sudden, was astonished to see him incircled with a Serpent, whereof the dreadful folds were terible to behold. She had no sooner ey'd that sad object, but she starts up furiously, not knowing what she should do her self: but treading as she got up upon the Serpent, it stung the unhappy Child, and without staying for any punishment for the mischief it had done, it got into the Thicket from whence it came; so that my wife crying out aloud, I heard her, came to her, understood the accident had happend to her, and participated of the affliction it was to her, to see that young Prince expiring three days after. We in the mean time stood extreamly in fear of the Prince's anger, who had committed a Child to our trust, which, by reason of the affection he had for the Mother, must needs be very dear to him. However, we thought it would be our best course to return to acquaint him our selves with the death of his Son, yet so as to conceal from him the unhappy adventure whereby he had miscarried. We took shipping, being none but my Wife and my self in a Merchant-man, that stood ready to set sail from Lilybæum to pass into Africk. We were no sooner at Sea, but a Tempest overtakes us: yet were we much more fortunate than other ships, for we saw some sinking near enough to us, indeed so near, that the wind ceasing of a sudden, we could save some part of the wrack of one that had been cast away, and wherewith the Sea was covered. But what was a very strange thing, was, to see a great Plank floating on the water, with a Pack of Merchandise tyed to it, whereof the Cords that tyed it being half loose, had accidentally fastned on a Cradle, wherein was a little Child, much about the age of that we had lost. This object working much upon my wives heart, gave her occasion to intreat the Master of the Ship, to give order that it might be saved, and bestowed on us. Now the Child being fastned to the pack of Merchandise, assigned as it were for a reward for him that should save it, her desire was easily granted. Thus, My Lord was your life easily saved, for to tell you truly how things past, it was you that my Wife and I found in that sad condition.

Ah Denilcar, cries out Adherbal, if what you say be true, what an ill office did you do me when you saved my life, and what cruelty was there in your pity. Alas! my Lord, replyed Denilcar, it was far from our intention to do you any such; it was our desire, not only to make you live, but to make you live happily, nay, to bestow a Crown on you. 'Tis true, my Lord, it was not so much out of affection to you, as to avoid the indignation of the Prince, and to spare him an extraordinary affliction, that we put you into the place of the young Prince that we had lost. We were not as yet got far from Sicily, so that our Vessel was forced to return thither, as having suffered a little by the tempest: but when we were gotten ashore, my wife pretended such a fear of the Sea, that no intreaties could get her aboard again. We therefore returned to our old habitation, where we continued not six months, for news being come that the King of Numidia was dead, we returned into Africk.

and told the Prince, who then did, and now does raign, that you were his Son. This we told him, not only to divert his anger from our selves, and to prevent his grief, but also out of some thought, it might prove a means to raise our fortunes. We thought our crime so far the more innocent, in that we injured no body; for he, who should have succeeded the Prince, in case he had dyed without issue, is, as you know, one of the wickedst men alive. Upon these considerations, did we tell the new King that you were his Son, and he was the rather induc'd to believe it, for that the Princess your Mother, being of a complexion different from that of an African, he imagined you were like her. He accordingly entertained you with joy, he made much of you, and caused you to be publiquely acknowledged his successor; in a word, he hath brought you up as such, and you have ever since thought your self his Son, as he believed himself your Father. I shall not tell you what affliction your love to Clelia hath cost him, nor what displeasure he takes at your absence, and at your departure, disguised, to follow the object of your affection; but must needs tell you, that after your departure, having sent me to discover what way you had taken; my wife fell sick in my absence, but the disease proved so violent, that it soon deprived her of her reason. And whereas you were very much in her affection, she could not speak of any thing in her fits but of you. Sometimes she said, that God punished her for thrusting you into the place of the true Prince of Numidia; sometimes, that she was not sorry for it, that you was better than he that is dead would have been, and a hundred such things, amongst a many more that had no dependance on these. At first, those that heard her, made no reflexion thereon, but she often repeated the same thing, that at last a certain woman who visited her often, and was Mistriss, to his Secretary that should have raigned after you, took some particular notice of it, and acquainted her beloved therewith. This man told his Master, who seeing it a business that concerned a Crown, thought it not to be neglected. This woman thereupon received order to put several interrogatories to the poor sick party, and that before such people, as should testifie what he had said. The business was thus carried, and my wife told all she knew; nay, she did more than all this, for having the command of her reason some six hours before she died, and her conscience being strangely troubled at that subordination; she in her perfect senses and memory declared the truth, after a promise made her, that I should not be punished. You may imagine, My Lord, (for I shall still call you so) what grief this was to the King of Numidia, and what good news to the Prince that should succeed him. In the mean time, hearing all this upon the way, from persons that knew me not, and understanding that search was made after her Husband, who had revealed a secret of that consequence, I thought it no good course to expose my selfe to the indignation of two Princes that I have offended, and that I should rather find you out to see what course you would take; For, my Lord, it were an obligation put upon my Countrey, to hinder it from coming under the Government of a wicked man: 'twere to oblige the King of Numidia, not to deprive him of a virtuous Prince, that he loves as his Son, and it were to do you but justice to continue you in the condition into which I had put you. And therefore, my Lord, if it be your pleasure, I will expose my self to all torments imaginable, to maintain, that my wife had not recovered her senses when she spoke as she did; for we lived in a very solitary place near Lilybæum, and it would be in all probability, a very had matter, either to find any people that knew me in Sicily, or to meet with the merchants who saved your life at my wives intreaty; it being so long since, that this truth will not easily be discovered, besides, that King having an aversion for him that should succeed him, will gladly be over-reach'd, and so, my Lord, I am ready to hazard my life to make you King.

It should have been done without my privity, replied Adherbal very smartly, had you made it your business to get me into the Throne, and you must have deceived me first, before you had deceived others. But now that I know my self not to be what I ever thought I was, the Gods preserve me from purchasing a Kingdom by a cheat. Nor indeed do I take so much pleasure in life, that I should be over-sensible of the loss of a Crown which were not haply enough to make me happy. But alas! how am I afraid that my fortune is yet much worse than you imagine. Tell me then, added he, but in what place you found me when you saved my life? It was so near the Cape of Lilybæum, replied Donilcar, that we expected to have been cast away in it. But further, added Adherbal, In what year, what moneth, what day did this wrack happen? Donilcar having satisfied Adherbal very particularly, his colour changed; for having before understood all the circumstances of the Adventures of Aronces, he found that the very day on which Donilcar told him he had been found on the Sea, was the same with that whereon Clelius found Aronces, and had lost his own Son. He found it to be the same place, so that there was no question to be made, but that he was Son to Clelius. Insomuch that this very consideration raised more disturbance in his thoughts, than had done that of the loss of a Crown. But I pray, said he to Donilcar, could you not guess by the swathing-bands that were about me, what Nation I might be of, and of what birth? For your birth, replied Donilcar, it must in all likelihood be noble, for your swathing-bands were very rich; and for your Countrey, I think you were a Romane; for it was reported at that time at Lilybæum, that Tarquin was so cruel, that all the virtuous people was forced to leave Rome. Besides, I found a Ring tyed in a Ribband, such as they said the Roman Knights used to wear, which haply might have been your Fathers, and which, for what reason I know not, should have been hidden in the swathing-band you had about you. And have you this Ring still (replies Adherbal, infinitely desirous to find something that should confirm him.) I have, My Lord, replied Donilcar, and for what reason I know not, I took it the very day I came away to find you out, but now I find it was the good pleasure of the gods. As he said so, Donilcar shewed him the Ring, which Adherbal had no sooner looked on, but he knew it to be like that which Clelius had worn since his return to Rome: so that being in a manner fully satisfied that Clelia was his Sister, he felt such a distraction in his soul, that not able to master his own sentiments, he bid Donilcar stay with him, and locking his Chamber door, he walked a while without saying any thing, and indeed without being able to fasten his thoughts on any one object. But at last, reflecting on the sad condition he was in, he thought himself the most unfortunate man in the World, Love and Ambition strugling so with his Reason and Virtue, that they raised in his heart, the greatest irresolution that ever the heart of an amorous and miserable man was acquainted with. What shall I do, said he to himself, which side shall I take? Shall I follow the advice of Donilcar or not? One way I may still be a Lover of Clelia, and Son to the King, and another, I shall be Son to an illustrious Roman, and brother to my Mistress, and consequently must not entertain a thought, that I ever can be in love with her. All my Rivals will be glad of this change of my condition; 'twill be welcome news to Clelia; Clelius will be joyful at it, and I only shall be miserable, and that after so dreadful a manner as never any was before me. But yet I have this comfort, that my innocence will smother one great part of my disgraces, and Clelia, the cruel Clelia, will be obliged, even by Nature, to own some light resentment of compassion, since Love could never raise any in her. She will bemoan me, nay, will be forced to mourn for my death. But alas, continued he, doth it not signifie a vast decay of reason, to go and seek such weak and imaginary consolations beyond death it self? See we then, whether I shall be more happy on the other side: I may haply come to be King, 'tis granted; but alas, if I may not reign in Clelia's heart, a Tomb is fitter for me than a Throne. It shall be still lawful for me, to call my self Clelia's servant, and prejudice my Rivals what I can. But alas, to be a Lover and to be slighted, is a sad adventure. Besides, if to preserve the quality of Lover, as well as that of King, I shall commit divers enormous crimes, I cannot rationally ever be perswaded, I shall be any other than an unfortunate and uncar'd for Lover: so that if I take that unjust resolution, I shall add to my misfortunes, because the conscience I shall have of my crimes, will ever put me in mind, that I deserve my miseries. But can there be any thing more cruel, than for a man to go and tell his Mistriss himself, that he is her Brother? Let the ignorance Clelius is in, be eternal; for since grief will shortly take me hence, 'twere a kind of cruelty to let him know he hath a Son, whose death he must within a few daies bewail.

Let us then take a third course, let us generously write to the King of Numidia, that we pretend no Title to his Crown, and passing for an unknown wretch, let us conceal from Clelia what relation there is between us; that so we may have some light shadow of felicity, out of that only consideration, that she will ever look upon me as her servant. For as things stand now, if I do my self so much violence as not to entertain her any longer with my love, she will think her self obliged to me, and I shall be somewhat less miserable than I should be, if she knew me to be her Brother. But if I am look'd on as a meer stranger, added he, she will slight me the more, so that I shall not know how to dispose of my self. For this last consideration, it is certainly very weak, for what care should a wretch, resolv'd to dye, take? and for the other, Clelia is so generous, that I have reason to hope that my condition, as to fortune, will rather raise compassion in her, than contempt: So that without doing any thing against virtue, I shall have the comfort to dye in the quality of Clelia's Lover; and accordingly, after a distraction that lasted all night, he resolv'd only to say that he was no Kings Son, without discovering any thing of that adventure, or acknowledging himself to be the Son of Clelius, though he had withal made a resolution, not to mention any thing of his love to Clelia, and to do all that lay in his power to disburthen his heart thereof. In so much that Amilcar coming to see him the next morning, and giving him the respect he was wont, he told him that he ought him no more than he would do him as his friend, and in few words told him, that he was but an unfortunate and unknown person. Amilcar at first would hardly believe him, and asked who had brought him that strange news; to which he made answer, that he had it from one that had been related to him from his infancy, and whose faith he could not question in the least.

Upon this, Amilcar acquainting Brutus, Clelius, and Herminius, with this unexpected news, it was generally known the very same day, insomuch that Adherbal was visited thereupon by all of greatest quality in the City. Brutus told him in particular, that it was his desire he would adopt Rome for his Countrey, since he knew not which was his own, and assured him he should want for nothing. Herminius did the like, and Clelius generously offered him all his Estate. Sulpicia and Clelia sent to visit him, and the change of his fortune begat him more honor than he had received since his coming to Rome. Even Horatius himself spoke very discreetly of it, and Adherbal had reason to be glad he was no Numidian, and to know he was a Roman, were it only out of a reflection on the virtue of so many illustrious Romans.

In the mean time, being a person of a great and generous soul, he would not by any means permit the honors they were wont to do him, and went to acknowledge their civilities who had visited him, as a private person. But coming once to Sulpicia's, he felt such a heavy grief upon him, that if he had not done himself a great violence, he would have return'd when he was got to the very door. For, it coming into his thoughts, that if he were sad, Clelia would have the less esteem for him, out of a conceit that his soul was not strong enough to support that change of condition, he overcame himself, and went into the house with such a constancy, as put all that were there into admiration, and obliged Clelia to treat him with much more kindness than ordinary, not only, because she thought him more worthy esteem; but also out of a belief that he had given over all pretences to her, and was content to make one among her friends. But he had hardly been with her a quarter of an hour, e'r he let fall the Ring Donilcar had given him, and which he thought he had not had about him: so that Sulpicia seeing it, and not able to conceive how a Numidian should come by the Ring of a Roman Knight; she took it up, but she no sooner had it in her hands, e'r she knew it to be Clelius's, and the same that she had bid her Sons swadling-band, lost her Husband should be discovred as he fled from Rome: So that crying out for heavens sake, generous Adherbal, said she, tell me by what miraculous adventure you came by this Ring; for who ever gave you this, must needs have found at least, the body of my unfortunate Child, which I lost near Lilybæum, when Clelius and I were like to be cast away, and at the same time we found Aronces. At these words Adherbal changed colour, and not able to say that which was false, to a person he knew to be his Mother, he made her so punctual an answer, that it added to the curiosity of Sulpicia. She looked on him very earnestly, and was so importunate with him to tell the truth, that nature working on his heart, and his reason assuming at that time, part of her lawful authority, he resolv'd to discover himself, and so changing his design of a sudden, he told himself what but a quarter of an hour before, he had made a resolution to conceal. For Sulpicia being earnest with him to satisfie her: Alas, Madam, said he, you know not what you desire when you speak after this rate; for were it not much more satisfaction to you to believe you had lost a Son in the Cradle, than to know you have one living that is unfortunate; and such as you will happily think so far unworthy to be yours, that you will disclaim him. Ah Adherbal, replied Sulpicia looking on him, are you my Son, or may I be so happy as to have one like you. Do me but the favour to let me look on your left arm, for if you are mine, you should have a little above your wrist, a fine mark which a careless slave gave you some few days after you were born. Whereupon Adherbal being fully satisfied that he was Sulpicia's Son, was not able to conceal himself any longer; so that having shewn her what might perswade her he was her Son, he briefly related all that Donilcar had told to him: insomuch that Sulpicia being infinitely overjoyed, that she had so gallant and so virtuous person to her Son, embraced him with much affection, Clelia was also not a little glad to lose a Lover, to purchase a Brother: But Adherbal could not take well the loss of a Mistriss, though he got thereby a most generous Father, a most virtuous Mother, and the most amiable Sister in the World. Yet he still put on much gravity, and though he very civilly entertained the caresses of Sulpicia, and the kindnesses of Clelia; yet was it easie to see he was extreamly troubled.

Upon this, Clelius comes in, to whom Sulpicia had no sooner shewn the Ring, but he knew it. She also shew'd him the mark upon Adherbals arm, who having sent for Donilcar, absolutely satisfied Clelius that he was his Son, for he had been acquainted with Donilcar at Carthage. Besides that, the Ring, the mark on Adherbals arm, the particular day the wrack happened, and the place where, were such circumstances, as put the business out of all controversie. So that being infinitely satisfied in the recovery of a Son, and to find him withal, one of the most accomplish'd men in the World, he spoke to him with the greatest civility in the world. Take comfort Adherbal, said he to him, and be not troubled at the change of your condition; for to speak truly, it is better to be a Citizen of Rome, than Son to a King of Numidia: and it is better to be Clelia's Brother, than her Servant, since you cannot now be loved by her in the manner you desire. I grant what you say is true, replied Adherbal; but since it is impssible there should happen a change of sentiments to a man in an instant, without some violence done to himself; I beg your pardon, if I expres not all the joy I should, that I am Son to one of the most virtuous men upon earth. However, I hope, my Lord, the earnestnes I feel in me, to deserve that honor, will help me to overcome those remainders of weakness that hang about me, and that within a few days there shall not be any thing to be objected against me. Whereupon Clelius embracing his Son with extraordinary affection, spoke to him with all the generosity and obligation that could be, which stirring up in his heart those sentiments of Nature which lay there buried by the ignorance of his true condition, made him receive the caresses of his Father, with much more kindness than he thought he could have done.

This accident being strange and extraordinary, was in the space of two hours generally known, insomuch that the whole City came to Clelius to congratulate him, and Adherbal, whose condition was much beyond what it was the day before, when it was known whose Son he was, after he had thought himself a King's. The Ladies came upon the same account to visit Sulpicia and Clelia. Horatius for this part, was glad to see that he had one Rival the less, so that he came in all haste to Clelius's, whom he complemented as also Sulpicia; which done, coming to Adherbal, give me leave, said he to him, to express the satisfaction it is to me, that I am no longer your enemy, and to beg the favour to be numbred among your friends. Certain it is, I can be no longer your Rival, answered he, but that Horatius implies no obligation, I should be your friend, for looking on the concernments of my friends as my own, if I cease being a servant to Clelia, I must be the Protector of Aronces, who is my antient friend: and therefore expect no more from me, than you would from a man who can do nothing against his honour, and consequently not against him, whom of all the world he is most obliged to. This put a little fire into Horatius, for had he obeyed his own inclination, he would have made Adherbal some bitter reply; but looking on him now as Clelius's Son, and Clelia's Brother, he mastered his violence, and onely made him this answer. I am not to learn, generous Adherbal, that you and Aronces are antient friends; but I also know you to be Son to Clelius, by whom I am not hated, though he be more inclin'd to Aronces; and therefore I shall not dispair of your friendship. Adherbal would have answered Horatius, but Amilcar being come in interrupted them, for he made very pleasant reflexions on this adventure, detecting them to Clelius, Sulpicia, Clelia, and Adherbal, not forgetting Horatius. Plotina being also in the room, added to the mirth of the company; for she told Adherbal, that to make him absolutely happy, she would undertake to raise love in him, though it were only, says she; to raise a jealousie in Amilcar. Jealousie, replies he, is a thing that is not given when one pleases, and it is taken sometimes whether one will or no; but for my part, continued he smiling, I assure you, I give a great deal more than I take. You are much more happier than I have been, replyes Adherbal, for I have ever taken and never given any. Kings Sons, replyes

Amilcar, cannot ordinarily cause either love or jealousie, for their condition is much more considered than their persons. But now that you are an illustrious private man, you may cause any thing that it lies in your power to cause, and you will raise in me a jealousie, if Plotina be as kind to you to morrow, as she is to day.

At these words came in Brutus and Valerius, with whose advice it was resolved, that Adherbal should take another name, and re-assume that which was given him at his Birth. He was therefore called Octavius; that changing his name and fortune, it might also cause a change in him as to sentiments. However, it was resolved he should write to the King of Numidia, to acquaint him truly how things stood, and to intercede for Donilcar, who in the mean time was to remain at Clelius's, as a friend to whom he ought the life and education of his Son.

This done, and all being departed, Clelius assigns lodgings for Octavius, where he no sooner was at liberty to hearken to his own thoughts, but he felt what ever may fall on a Lover, when hope takes her last leave of him, and that his reason and his will combining against him, he, not without violence endeavors to subdue the passion that persecutes him. For Octavius being a great lover of virtue, innocence, and glory, and knowing it to be unlawful for him to pretend any longer love to Clelia, made a gallant resolution to subdue the passion he felt in his Soul, and to dye a thousand times, rather than to do or say any thing that should raise the least suspition that there were left any the least spark of that fire whereby he had been almost consumed. But as he made it, what did he not feel, and how did he bemoan the cruelty of his destiny, which exposed him to so insupportable an adventure? Had not the affairs of Rome stood as they did, he might have looked on banishment, as a remedy to cure his misfortune; but the War just breaking out, there was no just pretence to leave Rome, so that there was a necessity he should resolve to give a great and difficult tryal of his virtue. But to do it with greater ease, he bethought him to fill his heart with the love of his Countrey, instead of that of Clelia. This gave him occasion often to visit those who sat at the helm of affairs, and the melancholly of Brutus takinghim at that time, more than the merry humorsof the rest, he saw him as often as possibly he could. So that Brutus and Herminius being but the same thing, he made a third with those illustrious Romans, whose virtue strengthened his, and whose conversation smother'd part of that secret affliction which his reason was not absolutely able to master.

Among other times, Octavius coming one morning to Brutus, found him ready to get on Horseback, with intention to ride without the City, near the Sublician bridge, where he thought there needed something of Fortification. Herminius and Amilcar hapned to be then with him, so that makeing a fourth man, and Brutus furnishing him with a Horse, they went altogether to see what was fit to be done to fortifie that place. And indeed Octavius and Amilcar were not unserviceable to Brutus, for reflecting on the Fortifications of Carthage, which was then the strongest place in Africk, they gave him such good directions, that they were put in execution. But while they were discoursing upon this occasion, and while Amilcar was telling them as much as they could have expected from the ablest Engineer upon the like occasion, four Soldiers that had left Tarquin's Army, coming up to Brutus told him, that being unwilling to fight against Rome, they were come to defend it. Brutus commending them for their good intentions, yet not trusting them too far, ask'd them what condition Tarquins Army was in. No question very strong, My Lord, replyes the oldest of the Soldiers, and within a short time you may find it so from your walls, for assoon as the Horse are all joyned they will march hither. We do not intend, replyes Brutus coldly, to expect the enemies of Rome within Rome, we shall spare them the trouble of coming to find us at our gates. You must make hast then, replyes one of the Souldiers, for had it not been for an unhappy accident that hapned, that hath caused the Prince of Clusium to be kept close Prisoner, I think Tarquin would have been ere this time in the field: And what was that, says Amilcar? They say, replyes the Souldier, that there is discovered a certain friend of Aronces's disguised, that brought intelligence to Rome that he was there upon taken; and that it being suspected that the Prince of Pometia, and Prince Titus were privy thereto, a great stir is made about it. Yet is there no great fear that this will do Aronces any prejudice, because Tarquin stands too much in need of the King of Clusium, to treat the Prince his Son unhandsomly.

Brutus perceived he could get no more out of the Soldiers, caused them to be conducted by one of his own to Lucretius, with order that they should be listed in several Companies for more security. Amilcar and Herminius were much troubled at the unhappy accident had befallen Celeres, as well for his own sake, as for Aronces's and Clelia's. They also had pittied Hermilia and Collatina, whose concernment in the business they well knew. But at last taking their way towards Rome, they were no sooner come to the end of the bridge but they saw a very handsome man coming towards the place where they were, who seemed to be Master to four others that accompanyed him, and friend to another that was in discourse with him. Things at Rome were in such a posture at that time, that nothing happened which gave not some occasion of fear and suspicion, so that Brutus and his friends stayed at the Bridge-foot, to see the stranger come up, and to ask him what he was. But being come a little nearer, Amilcar knew him, as having seen him at Syracuse, when Artemidorus, Zenocrates, and he were there. So that being one he had a great esteem and affection for, he turn'd to Brutus, I beseech you give me leave to acquaint this illustrious stranger who you are, for he is a man of as great worth as any in the world. Whereupon Amilcar went and met him, whom he had spoken of to Brutus, who had no sooner known him, but coming up close to him, they embraced each other, as such as between whom there was much friendship and affection. What happy fate favors me, says Amilcar to Themistus (for so was he named) that I have the happiness to see you at Rome? It had been more pertinently spoken, replyes Themistus if you had ask'd by what misfortune it came to pass, that I am not at Syracuse; but how e're

...ld be, I am not a little glad to see you. Where-...Themistus presented one of his friends to ...Amilcar, whose name was Meleagenes; but Amil-... knowing that Brutus, Octavius, and Herminius, were staying at the Bridge-foot, he told Themistus who they were that he saw there: so that intreating him to present himself to Brutus, as a person whom his misfortunes forced to Rome for refuge, Amilcar gave him that advice in that obliging way he used, when he had a mind to do a good office. He therefore presented Themistus and Meleagenes to Brutus, who received them with much civility, he having before acquainted him that they were persons of quality, and withall of extraordinary merit. He also made them salute Octavius and Herminius, and got them to lodge where he did. And though the dignity of Consul required that all this company should have waited on Brutus home; yet would he not suffer it, for the house where Amilcar then lodged, being in a street called Iron-street, and in the way to that wherein Brutus lived: this generous Roman left the strangers there, after he had proffered them any civility that lay in his power. Themistus and Meleagenes were very loath to obey him, but having told him that he went not directly home, they stayed with Amilcar and Octavius, and Herminius followed Brutus.

But having brought him to the place where he was to go, they returned to Amilcar's to give these strangers a visit, whose complexion and deportment had rais'd in them a great opinion of them. Amilcar, having discovered by the complement, that Themistus had made to Brutus, that he lay under some cloud of misfortune, they were glad of the occasion to offer them any service that lay in their power. Thither they come, and find Amilcar, according to his manner offering them whatever he thought worthy their acceptance. I beseech you, says he to Themistus, tell me freely what you would have me to do for you; for certainly there are but few things which I cannot do here. In the first place, I have such generous friends at Rome, and among the rest, Herminius, that I dare offer you what is theirs, as if it were my own. Next if you are sad, and desire to be comforted, I shall not only offer you all the merry humors I am Master of, but there shall be at your service that of the merriest lass in the world; nay, what is more than all this, all the pleasures that Rome can afford. If you would drive away one affection with another, I will bring you to Ladies whom never any lov'd, but they carried love away with them; for if you are not enflamed when you see them, you will be when you leave them. If on the contrary you desire sollitude, I will bring you into the enchanted Grove, where the Nymph Ægeria inspir'd the wise Numa: nay, I will bring you to the foot of that tree where Remus and Romulus were found, and where your sollitude will be so great that you shall hear no noise but that of your own sighs, if so be you are in an humor to sigh. In a word, added he smiling, whatever may be your humor, I offer you friends that shall comply therewith, for there are a sort of gallant people here, some fortunate, some unfortunate. There are those that love, and those that do not; there are Lovers that are well treated, and others that are slighted; Lovers in mourning, and Lovers in mirth; and to tell you all in few words, what cannot be had in Rome, cannot be had any where.

You offer me so many things at the same time, replyes Themistus, that I know not what answer to make, you; and all I can say, is, that what I desire at the present, is your friendship, and the esteem of your Friends. I have friends of the other sex whom you must also see, replyes Amilcar, for if you desire only the esteem of such as are my friends, 'twere but fit I visited not so often some persons I am taken with, and whom you will be, when you are acquainted with them. Not but I very well remember, that when I knew you at Syracuse, you were called the indifferent and insensible Lover. Alass, replyed Themistus sighing, those names were not fit for me, though it be true they were given me, and if you were to go now through Syracuse, you would hear such things of me, whence you would soon infer that I deserved them not. 'Tis true, added Meleagenes, you had the art of concealing your passion, and so you might with more justice have been called the Secret-lover, or the close-lover, than the insensible or indifferent. How replyed Amilcar, were you in Love when I was at Syracuse, I was so, replyes Themistus, and I am at this present no more than I was then, though I am the most amorous of all mankind. Were it not unhandsome to raise matter of dispute with an illustrious stranger, replyed Herminius smiling, you would find here such as should pretend to be as amorous as your self. But it is in this case as it is in point of common sense, whereof every one thinks he hath as much as another. Octavius hearing Herminius speak after that rate, sighed out of the very thought that he could bear no part in this discourse, it being not lawful for him to speak of the flame had set him on fire, and whereof there were haply some embers left in the bottom of his heart, though he ever and anon did all that lay in his power to quench it.

As the conference that hapned between these four illustrious men proved very long, so had they thereby the time to know one the other sufficiently to ground an esteem; nay, there was such a sympathy between Themistus and Herminius, that they entred into a strict friendship that very day. They had some discourse of Artemidorus and Zenocrates, who were their common friends, and they spoke to one another with abundance of confidence ere they parted. The next day Amilcar and Herminius brought Themistus and Meleagenes to Brutus, to Valerius, to Sulpicia, to Valeria and Gaselonia; but by the way, Amilcar acquainted them who were in love, and who were not, that so they might the better disengage themselves from those several companies. Themistus and Meleagenes gained the esteem of all that saw them. And yet Themistus seemed to groan under a little Melancholy, which yet was guided by his reason; but all hindred not but that he was looked on as a very lovely person. For Themistus wanted not any thing that might recommend him to the Ladies; as being of an excellent good complexion, and having a certain gallantry and freedome of air in the face. He spoke as it were by weight, and he was naturally very inclinable to civility and compliance, and yet expressed with all his countenance somwhat that was great, nay, indeed something of fierceness. For these qualities were all the Ladies that saw him, much taken with him; so far, that they were infinitely desirous to understand the adventures of a person so excellently handsom. His language was not very pure, as having I know not what accent of half-Greek, half-African, which was not unpleasant. For Meleagenes though he were a very proper and very ingenious person; yet was not there so much curiosity of having any account of him, because his discourses discovered he was acquainted with no other misfortunes than those of his friends. Ottavius was for his part infinitely desirous to know the misfortunes of such as were in love, only to see whether there were any as unhappy as himself; for he thought all that time, that a man whom death had deprived of his Mistress, were less miserable than himself, that was become Brother to the person he loved. So that Amilcar was prosecuted by his friends of both sexes, for an account of the adventures of Themistus. For my part says Plotina one day, (there being in place only Valeria, Themistus, Meleagenes, Herminius, and he) if you do not order things, so that I may know what hath brought so amiable a Stranger to Rome, you shall never precisely know what I esteem I have for you. Nay then, I beseech you, says Amilcar to Themistus, be pleased to satisfie the curiosity of the excellent Plotina, and expose me not to a perpetual ignorance of what it so much concerns me to know. If Plotina could but guess at some part of my misfortunes, she would not desire the full relation of them, replyed Themistus, for being of a mirthful disposition, she will find no great diversion in my sadnesses. Anothers melancholly, replyes she smiling, signifies commonly so little to those that know it, that you need not fear I shall be too much cast down at yours. 'Tis not Madam, replyed Themistus, so much out of any fear of troubling you, but out of that of not diverting you; and to do this latter, I cannot imagine the relation of my life can contribute much. Ah! Themistus, cryed she, I see well you never had the pleasure to do your own will, since you are not sensible of the great satisfaction it were to me to be informed of a thing I am infinitely desirous to know. 'Tis indeed a great pleasure for a man to do what he pleases, replyes Themistus, but I wish your satisfaction were so limited, as that you would content your self with an account of Syracuse, and that you would oblige Amilcar, Meleagenes, and my self, no farther than to give you a discription thereof, without requiring any relation of my life. Not that it is at this day any secret in Sicily, but that I finding my self far from any inclination to do it. So you but give your consent, replyes Meleagenes, the fair Plotina may easily be satisfied; for you know I am acquainted with your life as well as your self. If it be so, says Valeria to Themistus, methinks you should not deny Amilcar a thing whereby he might come to learn what place he hath in Plotina's heart. And that so much the rather, added Herminius, for that your adventures are generally known in the place where it concerned you, more they should not then it does here. If I must comply with the desires of Plotina and Valeria, replyes Themistus, I shall beg it as a boon, that Amilcar may describe the most eminent persons of our Court, and particularly the Ladies: for since he knows not which I am in love with, as being of an opinion I was insensible of any when he was at Syracuse, I shall be extreamly pleased with the Character of the person that hath subdued my heart, and thence to convince you, that I am not prepossessed by my passion, it being impossible he should not describe her; that is, commend her proportionably to her deserts.

If you love a woman, replyes Amilcar, but without any hope of ever being regarded or acknowledged, it must certainly be the admirable Amalthea, who is the most attractive, the most amiable, the most virtuous, and the most accomplished woman in all Sicily, for I dare not say in the world, before two that now hear me. But if you love a widow, you must infallibly affect the Princess of Himera, who may justly pretend to whatever is excellent, whatever is inviting, whatever is gallant in this world. For Amalthea, replyed Themistus, he that would love her, must run the hazard of dying in despair; for though she own whatever can make a woman admirable, yet hath she not that whence a man can take the least encouragement to venture his affection upon her, esteem, respect, and friendship, being the infallible and ordinary effects of her desert. But in fine, without discovering my self, or telling you whom I love, do you describe the Ladies of the first magnitude, that shine in the Court of Syracuse, to see if those that are here present, will be able to guess which of them I am in love with, and so give me the satisfaction to hear the praises of the person I adore, without any suspicion of preoccupation. I shall obey you, replyes Amilcar, conditionally you give your consent that Meleagenes may relate your History. He must needs grant that, says Plotina; but first, be pleased to let us know what kind of creature this Amalthea is, whom he makes so amiable, and yet such as a man may not presume to love. For my part, I cannot see how a woman can have all those charms which you make her Mistress of, and that it should be impossible a man should have the confidence to adore her. If she be humorsome, severe, and melancholly, she is not to be so much commended; and if her virtue be civiliz'd, and that she really own all you attribute to her, she may be loved whether she will or no, for the inclinations of the heart are not to be diverted. If you would have a draught of her, says Amilcar, you must tell me whether you would have it for the Pocket, or the Parlour, that is great or small. If a small one will satisfie you, I should soon have done, but you shall not see her perfectly, but if large, you shall be as well acquainted with her as if you had seen her. For though I stayed but four months at Syracuse, I am as well read in that Court, as if I had spent my whole life there. For my part says Valeria, I am not for small pictures; nor I neither, says Plotina, and I wish, were my own to be done, it should be so exact, as not to want a certain little mark you see upon my cheek, and which I think adds not a little to my beauty. Begin then, says Herminius to Amilcar, for if you run through the whole Court of Syracuse, we must not this day expect the life of Themistus. Since it is not fit I should be an auditor, of my own History, repayed he, you shall stay for it till to morrow, when Meleagenes shall be at the trouble to give it you. Since it must be so, says Plotina, Amilcar must prepare himself to draw us as many Pictures as may serve to furnish a Gallery. And I expect farther, that he should chequer it with those of men as well as Ladies; for it is my persuasion, that as there is greater pleasure in company when there is a mixture, so Pictures, when there are many, raise greater delight, if there are men and women, than if there were only the Pictures of women without any men. You are very much in the right, excellent Plotina, replyes Amilcar, but I am to tell you, that my humor is such, that I am as extravagant in painting as in love, and that you are not to wonder, if being about the picture of a Lady, I will give you a draught of the situation of her house, if the humor takes me, or the description of her Garden. For that, says Plotina, I shall easily pardon you, for such kinds of descriptions do only fill the imagination with things that are pleasant and divertive: but what I should think unpardonable in you, were to be too punctual in giving us an account of their predecessors, whose Pictures you give us; for there is no great pleasure in opening all those ancient Monuments, to make a resurrection for a sort of people we have nothing to say to, and are good for nought. Fear not, fairest Plotina, replyes Amilcar, I shall trouble you with fruitless Genealogies; yet it is but fit you knew the quality of those that are spoken of. Very right, replied she, but you must not do as those who to acquaint you with the loves of some beauty, would keep you an hour with stories of the Heroick acts of her Predecessors. I have already told you, that I shall not be guilty of any such importunity, answered Amilcar, and for that reason I shall not raise up those prodigious Giants who were the first inhabitants of Sicily. Not but that, to deal freely with you, a man that makes a relation, is many times glad to take occasion to discover his knowledge in History and Geography; but indeed, all considered, you deserve a man should be reserved.

I am then to tell you, that the Court of Syracuse, is one of the noblest in the world, as well in regard it is the most chequer'd with several Nations, as that it is the most inclined to gallantry. But since Amalthea makes not one of those Ladies, among whom Themistus would have us to find him a Mistress, I think it but fit to describe her first, as a person that indeed admits no parallel. Amalthea then is a person of extraordinary perfections, and so meridian a virtue, that there cannot rationally be found any thing comparable to her: Her birth is certainly very noble; but she is so much to be celebrated upon her own account, that we need not run into any discourse of the Princes from whom she is descended, to look for any thing whence she might derive any advantage. So that for what concerns her, I shall easily follow the advice of the amiable Plotina. But the very memory of her being infinitely delightful to me, I cannot but celebrate her for some things, for which she defies all commendations, though she very much deserves it. For as her sentiments are extreamly above the ordinary sentiments of those of her Sex, so it is a part of her knowledge, that the mind is to be preferred before all beauty, but she also knows as well that the heart is above the mind. Were she to hear me her self, I durst not tell you she were excellently handsome, and infinitely amiable; nay I have such a reverence for her, that I durst hardly assure you that she is fair, and hath a good complexion. And therefore judge of it your selves, when I have in few words described her to you. Amalthea is tall, of an obliging countenance, at the first cast of your eye she hath a gallant presence, noble and courteous; yet a little reserved when she entertains persons that are indifferent in her esteem. But when she pleases her self, she is guilty of a certain mirth, insinuation, sweetness, complyance, nay gallantry, in her entertainment of persons that she is taken with. Not that she ever degenerates into that lowness, as to flatter any one: but there are certain charms in her gestures, such as so well express what she would have you to think, that you are sometimes absolutely satisfied with her, though she be not at the least pains to make you understand what she would have of you. But to return to her person; her Hair is of a light chestnut colour, the fairest in the World; her eyes grey, large, full of spirit, and that such as scatters abundance of sweetness. Nay upon some occasions, were it not that the high virtue whereof she makes profession, had not accustomed her eyes not to discover all those pleasant things with whatever is delightful in this world, gives her occasion to think on, they would haply betray the mildest and most ingenious malice that could be. For the compass of her face, it is in a manner Oval, a delicate skin, a smile infinitely inviting, and as I have said she hath the best countenance in the world, and the best grace that can possibly be. 'Tis true, I speak improperly there, for whoever hath a good countenance, hath infallibly a good grace, it being impossible but they should be together. And yet the excellencies of her person is not all I have to commend in Amalthea, for her great understanding, her great heart, and her great virtue, distinguish her much more from all other of her Sex. For the first, there is one thing in her, that is an infallible argument of the greatness of it, that is an universal curiosity for whatever she thinks good or excellent, from the least things to the greatest, whether they be such as it is allowable for Ladies to know, or such as concern the noblest Arts, Works, Architecture, Painting, Gardening, particular secrets, and thousands of other rarities, which it were too long to insist on. But what is best of all, is, that she will not pretend to the knowledge of any thing she understands not. On the contrary, she avoids the affectation of knowledge and wit; nay she makes a secret of her curiosity, and you find not in her chamber but such works as are ordinary with persons of her Sex. But what she hath been most earnest to learn, is, whatever might make her more virtuous; she was certainly born to a certain freedome of spirit, though her temperament seem to have a little ingredient of Melancholly, but it is a mild melancholly, that disturbs not the calmness of her disposition, and hinders her not from delighting in those ingenious things she either hears from her friends, or speaking abundance her self, when she will put her self to the trouble, and that she is among a few that she hath a greater esteem for then others.

Amalthea hath farther the happiness of having made early discoveries, that the greatest part of the pleasures that young people take, are but vain trifles, so far that she cannot be over-commended, as to that point; for without turning savage, or being severe towards others, she hath discarded magnificence in point of clothes, at a time when that passion is wont to be most predominant in the Sex. She hath given over going to Balls, she admits not fruitless and dangerous visits, how pleasant soever they may seem to those who have not their spirits ballanced as hers; and she professeth such a purity of virtue, and a generosity so Heroick, that she makes it her greatest pleasure to find out occasions to relieve the unfortunate. I know a Gentlewoman at Syracuse, who was no sooner known to this admirable woman, but she did her extraordinary favors, without any other reason than that of her unhappiness, and that she had haply goodness enough to deserve a better fortune. Amalthea's greatest pleasures consist in the regulation of her passions, in giving good example to those that see her, in doing all the good she can, in living with Anaxander, as the chastest wife in the World can do with a Husband, whose quality is that of the greatest, one that carries about him a thousand excellent endowments, and among the rest, generosity, goodness, magnificence, integrity, and an infinite affection for her. But to conclude, the pleasures of Amalthea, she orders her House with abundance of discretion, she looks her self to the education of her Children, and serves the Gods with admirable exactness. In a word, I do not think that the first Vestals that were established at Rome, were more careful to preserve the sacred fire; than Amalthea is to observe whatever Religion requires of her. Would you go from her business to her recreations; she is much given to reading, she is excellent good at all manner of Works; she designs, she paints Dishes to adorn her Closet, she makes mixtures of flowers in order to Perfumes, nay she diverts her self in putting innocent tricks upon her friends, but it is to surprise them into delight, and to oblige them. And though she is a greater lover of solitude than of company, yet is she not guilty of the least harshness towards those of her Sex that are her friends. Her company is infinitely pleasant, and the great liberality she exercises on so many unfortunate people, hinders not, but that she lives to the height of her condition, so to comply with custom. Hence is it that her house affords whatever magnificence guided by virtue, can pretend to that, is most stately. and the Palace of Anaxander, which lies upon the Port of Syracuse, is one of the most sumptuous things in the World. The apartment thereof which Amalthea hath for her lodgings, is so pleasant, that nothing can be more; for besides many rare things that are level with the ground, there are artificial Rocks, and Grots represented, as also magnificent Cabinets, and a Belcony, whence may be seen the Port, the Ships that ride in it, and the greatest part of the City: and yet Anaxander and Amalthea have a house about twenty miles from Syracuse, which blasts, as I may so say, the beauty of that, and is the most delightful and most incomparable thing in the world For to speak rationally, a man cannot well say, whether this House be in a valley, upon a plain, or upon a hill: for it hath about it Rivers large and magnificent, Moats full of running water, Currents, Meadows, Wood, and a vast extent of ground. On the one side it seems to be in a plain; on the other it seems to be on a hill, and yet it may most truely be said to be almost in the midst of a pleasant valley, drenched by a great and a small River, whereof the sight is very admirable. I shall not give you any large description of this house, for I should never have done, should I speak of the outer parts of this inchanted Palace; that is, should I represent to you the spacious walks leading to the great River: should I give you an exact account of the length and breadth of the Avenues; the largeness and beauty of the Orchards, the coolness and umbrage of the Wood, which lies within the compass of its walls, the magnificence of that first Court which is octangular, and hath two stately Gates, and the beauty of three sumptuous sides of the building, which are seen as you come into the Court. Nor shall I trouble you with a description of the Entry, nor the Stair-case, nor particularise the great number of noble and large Apartments that a man sees there, and which are so neatly disposed and contrived, that they are as remarkable for their convenience as their beauty. Nor shall I say ought of the largeness of the Hall in particular, of the magnificence of the Gallery, the handsomness of the Belconies, and a thousand other things worthy to be taken notice of, and which very much discover the neatness, the magnificence, and the conduct of those that are Masters thereof. But I shall only tell you, that this House, which as I said, is in a Valley, is nevertheless upon a little ascent, in regard of the prospect that lies on the Garden side, where there is a bridge to pass over the large and magnificent Moats I told you of. So that when a man stands in the Belcony, that is in the middle of this proud building, he sees beneath him those large Moats, full of excellent water, beyond which lies a pleasant green bank, out of which he comes into a spacious place, of a vast extent, enclosed by two great Currents, the one born up by Arch-work, the other running on the flat, beyond which, as well as beyond the spacious place, passes a small River, which having played the serpent among the Meadows fringed with Willow, seems to make another channel passing before the Garden, and those other Currents, for in that place it is as strait as an Arrow. And what's most remarkable, is, that assoon as it is passed that place it becomes a River again, if I may so express it, that is uneven in its course, till it disembogues it self into the great River which passes on the left hand, and makes a kind of an Island of the Valley, so that there being no Wall to the Garden on that side, as being enclosed only by the River, a man may with the same sight, see the Moats, the Banks, the Currents, the falls of waters beyond the Garden, falling into green Meadows; and beyond all this the little Rivers, Meadows, Hills, Cottages, Country-houses, Villages, and Mountains, which insensibly rising above one another, seemed to reach up to Heaven, such a confusedness doth distance cause in objects. But as the piety of Amalthea and her illustrious husband shines in all they do, so was it the founder of a Temple in their house, which is the noblest and most admirable part thereof. 'Tis indeed a Master-piece of Architecture, the charge was certainly great, but the Workmanship is so miracalous, that a man cannot say it hath been excessive. 'Tis true, that a punctillio of honor added much much to the perfection of this Temple, for the excellent Architect that did it, took his model from that of Epheſus, out of an expectation to be employed to re-build that magnificent Temple of Venus, that isat Ericium. But the late Prince of that place having preferred another Architect before him, and Anaxander having employed him, he engaged his reputation to do that in a ſmall compaſſe, which he ſhould have done in a great: So that I look on this Temple as the moſt miraculous thing I have ſeen in all my travel. For though it be but little, yet hath it all the advantages of the beſt architecture, and that without confuſion, but in order.

But to return to Amalthea, I am to tell you, that for thoſe Ladies that come to her houſe, ſhe gives them all the innocent freedom that may be, inſomuch, that they can hardly be perſwaded, but that they are at their own houſe. 'Tis true, thoſe whom ſhe gives this liberty to, are perſons choſen out, who are all ingenious, all virtuous, and of more than ordinary deſert. Among others, there is a Neece of Amalthea's that lives with her, who, as young as ſhe is, makes this pleaſant deſart, yet more inviting; for ſhe hath the freſhneſs of Aurora in her complexion, the innocency of the Graces in her Phyſiognomy, and I know not what of Diana in her eies; and what does very well with Youth and beauty, ſhe hath Wit, Diſcretion, and Goodneſs. Amalthea does alſo very often entertain ſome men of her friends, ſuch as deſerve that glorious quality, and whom I ſhall one day give you an account of: but ſince it is not among them, that we are to find Themiſtus's Miſtreſs, I ſhall not meddle with them at the preſent, and ſhall only ask you by the way, how you like Amalthea. She ſeems ſo lovely to me, replies Plotina, that I would go purpoſely to Syracuſe to ſee her.

And for my part, ſaies Valeria, I cannot but a little envy thoſe, who have the happineſs of her friendſhip. And for mine, added Hermiſius, I think there's no Prince in the world that may not repine at the happineſs of Anaxander, were it not that he highly deſerves it; for certainly there is no pleaſure like that of having ſuch a Wife. Were you acquainted with her your ſelf, replies Themiſtus, you would be more taken with her than you are. But it is Amilcar's buſineſs to deſcribe to you the other Ladies of our Court, for I am impatient till you have her deſcription that I love. But if I ſhould forget her, replies Amilcar, you were finely ſerved; I defie you as to that, replies Themiſtus, for I think it impoſſible a man ſhould ſee her once, and not remember her eternally.

Since it happens ſometimes, that a man falls in love with Queens, it is not impoſſible, but that you may have loved the Prince of Syracuſa's Wife, though you were his favourite; for Love, where he comes, is a little humourſome god, who laughs at all mortality, policy, and prudence; and ſuch as makes a man love in ſpight of his reaſon, and contrary to his own concernments. I ſhall therefore at a venture tell Plotina and Valeria, that Demarata is a fierce Beauty, yet hath withal a certain mixture of mildneſs, ſpirit, and diſdain in her eyes. Her hair is perfectly black, ſhe is ſomewhat of a duskiſh complexion, having Lips incarnated, very white Teeth, a very handſome Breaſt, a very neat Hand, and a noble Preſence. She is infinitely ingenious; but her Wit is not always of the ſame weight, and is a little inclining to ambition. She hath a Soul that is very paſſionate, whatever ſhe deſires, ſhe deſires violently, and ſhe knows as well how to diſguiſe her Sentiments, as any one whatſoever; for when ſhe will undertake to do it, a man will think ſhe loves thoſe ſhe hates, and hates thoſe ſhe loves: but, all this notwithſtanding, ſhe is very likely to raiſe love in any one. Yet do I not believe that Themiſtus hath received any from her, but ſhould rather think that a certain young Lady of my acquaintance at Syracuſe, called Beliſa, may have ſmitten his heart, for ſhe hath all the charms fit to engage a man into affection. She comes of a very noble houſe, though ill treated by fortune, and the changes introduced by the Wars, even into the nobleſt Families. She is flaxen-hair'd, fair as to complexion, and excellently well made; and though the lineaments of her face do not at all expreſs any extraordinary beauty, yet are they all pleaſant; and from the conflux of all thoſe lines, there iſſues a certain inexpreſſible air, which hath more charms in it, than the greateſt beauties have. For ſhe hath a thouſand pretty geſtures taught her by nature frome her infancy, which become her admirably well, and whence there is derived a certain ſprightlineſs to her whole body. Her eies are full of it, her ſmiles betray it, and it is viſible in all her actions. Nay, there is a certain gallantry, in whatſoever ſhe does or ſays, and by a certain conjunction of whatever is handſome and virtuous, there is made up a complacency that cannot well be expreſſed. For, whether ſhe ſpeak, or whether ſhe hearken, ſhe is ever infinitely pleaſant, and there is ſomething that is ſo delicate in what ſhe is pleaſed to beſtow her thoughts on, and what ſhe ſaies, and ſhe hath ſuch ſubtle apprehenſions of what others ſay, that ſhe is as it were a charm to all thoſe that are near her. Inſomuch, that though ſhe ſpeak againſt Love, ſhe is ever attended by thouſands of Lovers, who make all ſlaves about her. And yet ſhe ſeems to be unwilling they ſhould be ſuch, and deſirous to knock off their chains; for ſhe makes a particular profeſſion to be extreamly tender of her reputation; but while ſhe endeavours to knock them off, ſhe makes them faſter; Some ſay, it happens when ſhe never thinks on it; others, that ſometimes ſhe takes a certain pleaſure in making theſe miſerable wretches; how e're it be, it is but too true that ſhe makes a many unfortunate men; nay, at this hour all the world complains of her cruelty.

And yet it is the moſt lovely cruelty in the world, for there's nothing in it that is frightful, ſavage, or uncivil; Nay, ſometimes there needs no more in her, than but a ſcornful ſmile, to make a man more wretched than another ſhould, with menaces, injuries, and incivility. Beſides, that which puts all that love her into deſpair, is, that ſhe hath a certain friendſhip for thoſe Ladies that are of her acquaintance, not much unlike Love it ſelf, eſpecially for one called Meliſera, a perſon of extraordinary merit, ſuch indeed that I dare not give you a repreſentation of her. For in a word, ſhe hath all the wit in the world within her ſelf, if I may uſe that expreſſion, but I mean that illuminated wit, that is capable of all things, that merry wit that would be pleaſantly malicious, were it not bridled by reaſon; that diſcreet wit, which makes one never to ſay, but what one would, nor to do but what what one ought. Judge then, how a person of so much worth may be esteemed, who yet, besides what I have said, is of a noble birth, is a great beauty, hath abundance of virtue, and no less generosity.

For my part, saies Plotina, I think her as worthy to be Themistus's Mistress, as Amalthea to be his Friend. She is indeed a very admirable person, replied Meleagenes, but the conquest of such a woman, were a very hard business; but Amilcar hath not yet said all he hath to say. If Themistus could fall in love with a pretty coy Lady, that loves abundance of talk, replies Amilcar, I know one at Syracuse, that must infallibly be his Mistriss, for she is extreamly fair, hugely amiable, full of sweetness, and invitation. She hath a wit made suitable to her inclination; it is not guilty of too much solidity, for it is not ordinary for great talkers to have any of that kind; but it ever sparkles, it pleases, its full of mirth and insinuation, and this very persons who flatters flowers where ever she comes, and takes in hearts where ever she meets them, makes such pleasant sport with them, that a man never leaves her unsatisfied, though it be troublesome to him to be so long fool'd with a fruitless hope in so much company. You give us the draught of a very strange prattle-box, replies Plotina, but for change sake, let us have the picture of a gallant man of Syracuse, were it only to see whether I can guess at the Rivals of Themistus, as well as I pretend to have done at his Mistress.

You shall be obeyed, saies Amilcar, and that so much the rather, because it being unlikely you shall ever see him I am going to represent, I shall not need fear he will be my Rival. You are very cautious, replies Herminius. Believe me, saies Amilcar, a man cannot be too cautious in Love; and it is better be so too much than too little, even in point of Gallantry. But to return to him I am to speak of; Know there is a person of quality in the Court of Syracuse, called Meriander, a man that deserves so particular a character, as being master of an extraordinary virtue, that it were certainly much injurious to him, should a man simply say of him that he is nobly born, an understanding man, and an honest man. For certain it is, that he hath thousands of excellencies which may well distinguish him from, and set him above the most considerable in the Court of Syracuse. Meriander is a proper person, of a fair stature, and a good countenance; he is flaxen hair'd, hath a grey eye, mild, yet full of spirit. His Face is somewhat long, his Physiognomy sweet and noble, in a word, he wants not any thing requisite in a person of his condition. He hath not only a clear understanding, but also full of gallantry, civility, and compliance. All his inclinations are so noble and generous, that it is hard to find a person of more honour, more fidelity, more sincerity, more discretion, and more true virtue.

Besides, he is as it were, born Master of all the nobler Arts and Sciences. Yet would he perswade his semal friends, that he hath had no Tutor but the Court and Nature: But howe're it be, he knows all that others learn, and knows it equally with those that have studied it most. In a word, Meriander is acquainted with all those things that require wit, subtilty, gallantry, and civility. In the first place he is versed in that which they call the knowledge of the world, more than any other can be; and that decency wherein the civility of the Court consists, he is so well read in, that no man can be more. Were there an Art that should teach men the infallible way to joyn civility, wit, noble liberty, mirth, innocence, pleasure, virtue and gallantry, no man could undertake it but he; so true is it that Meriander is well instructed, in whatever may make up a noble Courtier. He is not like those persons of quality, who love those things that are handsom, though they neither know them nor can do them; no, he is versed in all, he writes a very excellent style in Prose, and that very natural; and he makes verses so good and handsome, that they cannot be over-commended: For he fancies things very neatly, and his expression is so gallant, that it is easily seen that there are few in the world could do what he does. All which hinders not, but that Meriander is serious enough, nay, he makes a great profession of wisdom, though that be no Court virtue: but his wisdom admits a mirth so full of spirit, that it might be said, he is made for no other end than to entertain, and be entertained by his female acquaintances. He knows Musick after Orpheus's his way, though nature hath not afforded him any good voice; and yet he makes such good Airs, and excellent Sonnets, that it may be said he hath in his head, whatever is most sweet and passionate in Harmony, and whatever is gallant and delicate in Poesie. He dances admirably well, he designes rarely, he hath studied Painting and Architecture, and he hath made the design of a Building, which hath all the beauties of others, and yet are they nothing like it. Among other things, he hath designed in it, a certain place arch'd coupelo-wise, which he hath made purposely for the Ladies. The Sun never shines into it, and being enlightned only by false lights, falling from the Apartments that encompass it, it hath a gentle light fit for beauties and private meetings. And it is so much the more convenient for the Summer, in that it is extreamly cool, having divers Hollows wherein the cool and the shade very much favour those that are desirous to meditate. To be short, Meriander is admirable in all things, for he loves Gardens, and understands them so well, as if he affected nothing but solitude, and yet when he is at Syracuse, it might be said he could not live one day in the Countrey without weariness. He sees whatever is polite, sprightful, rare, and gallant. There is no news, either of more or less consequence, but he knows it; all the excellent and virtuous of both Sexes are of his friendship, so that in all entertainments he makes one; nay, he is a particular friend, even to those women, who out of considerations of virtue, live as it were out of the world; he visits others that love nothing so much as tumult; and, not having the baseness to dissemble upon any mans account, he yet complies with persons of quite contrary dispositions. Add to this, that Meriander loves to deal freely, and acquaint those that he looks on as his true friends, truly with what he thinks; and yet there never was so great a hater of detraction, or more discreet, more obliging, more sweet-natur'd or more officious man towards all persons of worth, nor more unlikely to offend any one, and consequently, it were no easie matter to meet with a man more accomplish'd. This Meriander, says Valeria, would certainly be a very dangerous Bird. He is certainly a person of very much worth, added Plotina, but in point of gallantry, a little mischief does a great deal of good; and it is my opinion at least, that there are in love many cheats, that are as fortunate as these persons of worth and virtue. If it be so, I know one at Syracuse, replies Amilcar, that may pretend much to happiness, for he equally deceives those he loves, and those he does not. He abuses all he commends, and commends all he contemns. He puts truth into the Catalogue of imperfections, and thinks a man cannot be witty without lying; when he is at a loss for a story, he invents one; he fathers those he knows, on such as do not so much as think on them. He thinks none his true friends, but such as he stands in need of; he prejudices all that cannot hurt him, and serves only those that can serve him again. With all these good qualities, he sings well, dances well, is witty, importunate, and whether you will or no, must be one of your friends, i'th' humour I am now in, replies Valeria, he should never be any of mine. I assure you, saies Plotina, it would not trouble me much, if he were my neighbor: for such people make better sport than those, that are much more virtuous; but let us return to Themistus's Mistress. For my part, methinks she is long a coming, saies Valeria; and I am in some fear, added Herminius, that Themistus hath made an ill choice, if she be not one of those that Amilcar hath described. And yet I am satisfied she is not, for I have not observed in Themistus upon that emotion, which a man hath when he knows his Mistriss nam'd.

Then be sure now to look well on Themistus's eyes, saies Amilcar to Plotina, for I am going to represent unto you the Mother of all Loves, when I give you the draught of the Princess of Himera, who is the Prince of Syracuse. Lindamira is certainly a person fit to conquer, even those hearts that being hard to be taken, stand upon their defence, and when they are, it is done with twice as much difficulty as others. At these words, Plotina, Valeria, Herminius, and Amilcar, looking on Themistus, perceived his colour to change, that his eyes betrayed that pleasant emotion Amilcar had spoken of. Insomuch that Plotina cries out, Hah! Themistus, said she to him, you love the Princess Lindamira. Whether I do or no, saies Themistus, recovering himself a little, I am not to acknowledge, till Amilcar have said all he hath to say; for I would not have the praises, he shall give the person hath conquered me, be thought chargeable with the least flattery. For my part, saies Amilcar, I must needs tell you, I am weary of painting, and that I will conclude with the Picture of Lindamira. When you have finished that, replies Herminius, Themistus I believe, will desire no more of you. I will do it then with abundance of care, answered Amilcar, and yet assure your selves it shall be no flatter'd piece. It were no easie matter to flatter Lindamira, reply'd Themistus, and if you were not so admirable a Painter as you are, it would go very hard, but you would take away something from her. Howe're it fall out, saies Amilcar, this is the Picture of the Princess of Himera. Know then, that Lindamira is a Princess of much beauty, and such attractions, that the Goddess that is ador'd in the famous Temple of Eryx, was never more lovely than she. Loves and Graces are her constant attendants; nay, the gods have endued this admirable Woman with so many things fit to kindle Adoration, that if one were to be cured of insensibility, there needed no more than one minutes sight of her, to make him sensible for all the rest of his life. You speak of Lindamira with such a transport of passion, saies Plotina, that I fear me you are a little in love with her. Thanks to your attractions, and my disposition, replies Amilcar, I am not, but indeed I have been. And yet I dare assure you, without any pre-occupation, that the world affords not a person more likely to raise Love, even to the hazard of Reason. Tell us then briefly how she is made, replies Plotina, to see whether there may not be one amongst us may please, though it were meerly out of some slender resemblance to her. I make no answer to what you say, replies Amilcar, for you know whom I am taken with; but to know Lindamira well, imagine that you see a person of an admirable Presence, such as at first sight captivates all eyes and all hearts; so beautiful does she seem to be. For before you have the time to examine all I am to tell you, there are so many different charms present themselves to the sight, that your admiration prevents your knowledge of her. 'Tis true, Reason comes immediately, and acts its part; for the more one sees the Princess of Himera, the more amiable he thinks her. In a word, besides the presence which she hath, very excellent and very noble, her hair is of a flaxen ashy colour, the fairest that ever I beheld; nay, it betrays such a particular beauty, that to give it its due, a man cannot positively say it is of a flaxen chesnut, or ashy colour, but confidently affirm there never was any thing so handsome. Lindamira's face is almost round, but the compass is so pleasant, that there cannot any thing be more. She is of a very fair complexion, hath an excellent mouth, the eye-brows somewhat fleshy and brown, her cheeks fair, the teeth white, and a smile the most sprightly in the World. Her eyes are black, sending forth their inevitable attractions: and it may be said without flattery, that there never was any, whose eyes and looks were more fit to command victories. For they discover mildness, understanding, goodness, subtilty, modesty, mirth, and languishingness; and what is yet more remarkable in the Princess of Himera, is, That she hath the noblest, the neatest, and the most fortunate Physiognomy in the world. Besides, she betrays such an excess of youth, that there may be seen on her face a certain flower of innocence, which adds infinitely to her charms; but what augments her beauty, is, that sometimes she is guilty of a lovely negligence, that becomes her so well, that nothing can stand out against it. For what is observable, is, that let her do what she pleases, it comes with a gallant grace, and a chearful countenance, and that the most negligent action she may do, contributes something to make her appear more beautiful. In a word, if she bow down her head a little, she does it in such a way, as would make a man wish to have her so drawn. If she turn it towards you, you find in your self a readiness to give her thanks for that favour, though she look not on you; and if she be in a melancholy posture, there is I know not what in the air of her countenance, which forces a man to wish himself the occasion thereof. But if she speak, she ravishes raviſhes you; for beſides that, though all ſhe ſaies be full of wit, and comes off handſomely well; yet there is ſomething in her voice, which moves the heart as ſoon as it ſmites the ear. There is in it a certain ſweetneſs and harmony, and I know not what kind of careleſsneſs, ſuch as I cannot expreſs, ſo that I take a greater pleaſure to hear her but ſpeak, than to hear the beſt ſinging in the world. For matter of Breſt, Lindamira is there alſo excellently well made; in a word, ſhe is all over ſo gallant and lovely, that a man cannot forbear loving her.

And yet, all this granted, it cannot be ſaid that ſhe knows her ſelf to be handſome; ſo indifferent is ſhe for all ſtrange faſhions, which thoſe of her age are infinitely taken with; her Dreſs is commonly without any great curioſity, as needing no other ornament than that of her own beauty. The mere Graces of her perſon, are enough to prefer her above thoſe, who make it moſt their buſineſs to be gorgeouſly attired. Not but that when ſhe will be dreſs'd, it becomes her admirably, and knows the art of doing it in the beſt manner; but for the moſt part ſhe ſo far truſts her charms, that ſhe will not be obliged to Art. For matter of underſtanding, it is not enough to ſay, that ſhe is infinitely well furniſh'd; for 'tis no ſuch wonder to meet with women extreamly witty, but there are in her diſpoſition, in her ſoul, and in her converſation, the ſame charms as there are in her face. Further, Lindamira is fit for all ſorts of perſons, as having in her, as well mirth as melancholly, mildneſs, civility, an innocent malice, ſincerity, generoſity, virtue, fearfulneſs, modeſty, gallantry, and compliance, not only for thoſe that are ſo happy, as to ſerve or to pleaſe her, but even for ſuch as are ſo confident as to importune her. For out of a certain principle of goodneſs and juſtice, when ſhe thinks her ſelf obliged by any one, ſhe cannot poſſibly entertain any roughneſs for him, if he ſhould afterward prove troubleſome to her; and ſhe would rather bear with thoſe that ſhe does not affect, than to do that which might give her occaſion to reproach her ſelf, with having done any one an incivility. Not but that ſhe can well diſtinguiſh between thoſe ſhe ſees, but ſhe diſcreetly ſmothers the diſcontent ſhe takes at thoſe whom ſhe cannot affect. Yet it is eaſie for thoſe that know her well, to ſee whether her civilities are abſolutely ſincere or not, for there are certain accents in her voice, that weaken or add to the obliging ſenſe of her words, ſutably to the perſons to whom ſhe ſpeaks. She hath ſuch an Art in writing Letters, that thoſe that receive them, are more ſatisfied therewith, than they ſhould be, if they could ſift out the meaning of her that writ them. For friendſhip, ſhe pretends to be the moſt tender of it, of any in the world; hers is at leaſt moſt pleaſant and moſt convenient.

I have an hundred other remarks to make on Lindamira's Picture, were it not, as I told you, for wearineſs, and that it is time you ſhould gueſs at Themiſtus's Miſtreſs. I think, ſaies Plotina, we are to judge of it by Themiſtus's eyes; when the firſt mention was made of Lindamira: I am of the ſame opinion, ſaies Valeria, For my part, ſaies Herminius, I make no doubt of it, and now that I ſpeak of her, I ſee by Themiſtus's face, that you are not miſtaken. I muſt confeſs it, replied he; but do you alſo acknowledge that I am not blameable for loving ſo excellent a Princeſs. Why ſhould I not acknowledge what you would have me, when I maintain that no mans love is to be cenſured for a man loves not to pleaſe others, but himſelf; and the choice of a Miſtriſs ought to be as free as the choice of Colors. So that, as no body thinks it ſtrange, that a man ſhould prefer Sky color before Green, and White before Red; ſo is it no more to be wondered, that ſome love Beauty, others Wit, others a good Nature, others greatneſs of Birth, ſince at laſt it comes to this, that every one loves what he is pleaſed with. There is nothing at the preſent, ſaies Plotina, can pleaſe me ſo much, as the relation of the Hiſtory of Themiſtus. You are never the nearer having it to day, replied he, for I am not in an humor, either to go hence, to hear my adventures, or to relate them. Be it then put off till to morrow, replies Valeria: Be it ſo, if Meleagenes pleaſe, ſaies Themiſtus, for without him you are not like to know any thing that concerns me. If that be all, replied Meleagenes, the curioſity of theſe Ladies ſhall infallibly be ſatisfied: and yet can I not but be troubled, that ſo excellent an Hiſtory muſt paſs through my mouth; but I ſhall be a faithful Hiſtorian, and if I may be charged with want of Art, I will not be chargeable with any thing that is falſe.

Hereupon this little company ſeparated, promiſing to meet again the next day; but Valeria bearing a great affection to Clelia, and knowing ſhe wanted diverſion, brought her in, ſaying, ſhe ſhould take Themiſtus's place, who would not be there. And ſo Valeria having thus ordered things, Clelia, Plotina, Herminius, Amilcar, and Meleagenes, came the next day to her Chamber (Themiſtus ſtaying away) where as ſoon as they had paſſed their firſt complements, and every one taken his place, Meleagenes began his relation, directing his ſpeech to Clelia, becauſe Valeria, and Plotina would have it ſo.

The Hiſtory of THEMISTUS, and the Princeſs LINDAMIRA.

SInce my diſcourſe is directed to perſons that underſtand themſelves infinitely well, and have been already acquainted with the qualities and diſpoſitions of thoſe whom I am to give them an account of, as alſo with the manner and cuſtoms of my Countrey; I ſhall not trouble you with things not worth the relation. But whereas Themiſtus is not abſolutely known to you, I ſhall in few words, tell you, that he is come out of a very noble and very great Houſe, which yet fortune had in proceſs of time, deprived of the Eſtate belonging thereto; ſo that having a ſoul full of ambition from his infancy, he could not ſit down with his preſent fortunes, but reſolved to travel into ſtrange Countreys, where having ſhewn himſelf a gallant man, he might return into his own, to ſee if he could reſtore his Houſe to its former luſtre. He went at ſixteen years of age, but e're he went gone, had he made an innocent conqueſt, though he had not the leaſt thought he had done ſuch a thing. For Demarata, wife to the Prince of Syracuſe, being then but ten years of age, had ſo violent an inclination for him, that all the women that were employed about her took notice of it. Having look'd on her from the Cradle, as ſhe that ſhould marry the Prince of Syracuſe, and that ſhe was both Fatherleſs and Motherleſs: there was choice made of a woman of the higheſt quality, who proved to be Aunt to Themiſtus, to take care of her education: So that Themiſtus coming often to his Aunt, eſpecially when ſhe was in the Country, the young Demarata had ſeen him a thouſand times, and had received from him a many little ſervices. Thoſe he yet did meerly out of an officious nature, beſide that, looking on her as a young Gentlewoman, that was to be one day his ſovereign, a ſentiment of ambition made him eſteem her the more. But for Demarata, the love ſhe bore Themiſtus, proceeded from a natural inclination, whence it came, ſhe was more taken with him than any other; inſomuch, that when he went to travel, ſhe wept for him, though ſhe were then but ten years of age, and for ſome time before his departure, ſpoke always with him in private. What is alſo very conſiderable, is, That Demarata had as much averſion for the Prince of Syracuſe, whom ſhe was to marry, as ſhe had inclination for Themiſtus; ſo that ſhe was ſeventeen years of age e're ſhe could be prevail'd with to marry him. This averſion was kept ſo ſecret, that the Prince never had the leaſt ſuſpicion thereof. But at laſt Themiſtus's Aunt perſwaded Demarata, that perſons of her quality were not married by choice, and that there was no ſovereign Prince in our Iſland, whom it were more advantageons for her to marry, than Perianthus. So that this young Lady, who was apprehenſive enough, fierce, and ambitious, ſuddainly reſolving to marry the Prince of Syracuſe, reſolv'd at the ſame time to gain his affection; not out of any pleaſure ſhe took in being loved by him, but only to gain credit with him, and conſequently in his Court. She therefore diſſembled, and carried her buſineſs ſo cunningly, that ſhe fired the Prince with the greateſt Love that could be, and by that means came effectually to gain what power and intereſt ſhe deſired. During that time Lindamira, though ſhe were a year younger than Demarata, was married to the Prince of Himera.

But have I not heard, ſaies Clelia, interrupting him, that Himera is a River that divides all Sicily? 'Tis very right, replied Meleagenes, and 'tis from the ſource of that pleaſant River, that a proud Caſtle takes its name, belonging to the Prince whom Lindamira had married, meerly forced to it by her Brother, ſhe having not the leaſt love or averſion for him. Nay, the Prince of Himera was ſo young when he married her, that, as handſome as ſhe was then, it may be ſaid She was a Wife before ſhe was a Miſtriſs. So that being married before ſhe had been much in love, and the familiarity of marriage having hindred the growth of affection, he lived well enough with Lindamira, and ſhe with him, only becauſe reaſon would have it ſo.

In the mean time this excellent Princeſs, placed her greateſt pleaſures in the friendſhip of a Siſter of mine called Mericia. She often viſited Demarata, but as there was not a ſympathy in their diſpoſitions, ſo was not the friendſhip between them ſound and ſincere, though from all circumſtances it might be thought they loved one another. For Lindamira, out of the reſpect ſhe bore the Prince her Brother, was infinitely civil to Demarata; and Demarata, well vers'd in diſſimulation, and withal, deſirous to gain all ſhe could upon the Prince, was no leſs to Lindamira.

Things being in this poſture, the Prince's wedding-day was ſet, and all prepared themſelves at Syracuſe, for that great ſolemnity, whereof the magnificence was to laſt eight days. So that all related to the Court, were taken up about ſome pleaſant inventions, every one being, out of emulation, deſirous to honour the Prince and Princeſs, by taking the honour of being at the charge of ſome particular magnificence. About four daies before Demarata's marriage, the Prince of Himera getting upon an excellent horſe, which he thought to make uſe of in a Race, that was to be ſoon after, the horſe roſe up before of a ſudden, and fell down backward ſo violently that, being mortally hurt, he was the next day deſperate of any recovery, and died the day that the Prince of Syracuſe was to be married. It being but fit the Solemnity ſhould be put off for ſome time upon this accident, it was ſo; but the Prince's love being at the height of violence, it was only put off for eight daies, ſo that only the Princeſs of Himera was deprived of all enjoyments at that time. For, though ſhe had for her Husband, but an affection meerly grounded on Reaſon and Will; yet was ſhe troubled at his death, out of reſentments of humanity and decorum, and accordingly ſhe ſtaied at home, without any other comfort than what ſhe had from my Siſter, who pretended her ſelf not well, becauſe ſhe would not leave her, during the eight daies of the Solemnity. Yet was it ordered that the Court ſhould goe into Mourning for the Prince of Himera, as ſoon as thoſe eight daies were over.

I ſhall not trouble you with the magnificence of the Prince's marriage, which was ſolemnized in ſight of all the people, in the ſpacious place of Aeradina, at the foot of the Altar of Concord, which ſtands in the midſt of it, where the Articles of Peace are ſigned, when any War ceaſes. Not but that this Ceremony were well worth the relation and your hearing; but I have ſo many other things to entertain you with, that I ſhall not trouble you with this. I ſhall alſo go ſlightly over the greateſt part of Demarata's Wedding; but muſt, for your better acquaintance with this Princeſs, tell you, that the night immediately before the Solemnity, ſhe locked her ſelf in a room with a woman ſhe loved very dearly, called Amerintha, and that ſhe diſcovered her thoughts to her. It hath been known ſince that ſhe wept two hours, and confeſſed to her, that if ſhe could have but reſolved to die, ſhe ſhould have thought her ſelf happy, ſo great was the averſion ſhe had for Prince Perianthus. 'Twas indeed a groundleſs averſion; for he is a perſon, that, beſides his underſtanding and magnificence, hath thouſands of excellent endowments. But to be ſhort, ſhe could not o'recome that natural averſion, and ſo, as I have told you, ſhe wept two hours the night before her Wedding. However, ſhe forced her ſelf ſo admirably the next day, that the Prince thought she shar'd with him in all his pleasures, and that she was as well satisfied as he, so that there was nothing but continual rejoycing. The fourth day there was a Horse-race, the noblest in the World, but as they were ready to begin it, and that the Princess of Demarata, then called Princess of Syracuse, was upon a Scaffold attended by all the Ladies, who, according to the custom, were chosen to advise her when she should give the prize, there appeared a man of an admirable handsome Presence, mounted on an Isabella-colour'd horse with a black mane, attended by six Africans with Colors of Silver, who, staying without the Lists, sent to the Princess to desire leave to run, and to pretend to the prize as well as others: for the Prince being among those that ran, and the solemnity being intended for Demarata, all the honours thereof were directed to her. He that desired the permission, had red, white, and green Feathers; his cloathing was magnificent and gallant, and, it being then the custom to carry shields, for that after the Race there was a little skirmish to be, among those who pretended any interest in the prize, he had painted upon his, A Heart in the field, Or; with these words in the African Language,

I am his that shall take me.

In the mean time, a Gentleman that belonged to this lovely unknown person, came very submissively before the Scaffold, where Demarata was, which was covered with a magnificent pavilion, to desire in his Master's name the permission he was a suitor for: When you have given me his name that sends you, replied she, and his Countrey, I shall see what answer it will be fit to give you. Madam, replied the Gentleman, my Master hath the honour to be your Subject, and if you have not forgotten the name of Themistus, you know his. How, replied she, her colour changing, is he I now see, the same Themistus that left Sicily about seven years ago, and hath not been heard of since? The very same, Madam, replied he, 'tis he that desires your leave to participate of the glory of this day. Tell him, replied she, very resolutely, that I not only give him leave to pretend to the prize I am to give, but also wish that if the Prince ran not himself, that he might carry it.

Upon this, the Gentleman retires to acquaint his Master with what the Princess had said. So that Themistus thanking her very submissively, by bending to the very pommel of the Saddle, he came in among those that were preparing to run. I shall not Madam, trouble you with the particulars of this Race, but assure you, that Themistus carried away all the honour of it, and that he was the most able, and the most fortunate of all that ran. Nay, he carried himself with such judgement that he was never in competition with the Prince of Syracuse, who observed it, and thought himself obliged to him. So that at last, the race and the skirmish ended, Periantbus having discovered who it was, took him and presented him to Demarata, to demand the prize she was to bestow.

In the mean time, you are to know that this Princess had no sooner heard Themistus named, but that antient inclination she had for him in her infancy, began to take fresh root in her heart, notwithstanding all the oppoition she used. So that feeling an accustomed joy, she received Themistus from the Prince in the most obliging manner that could be. And without asking the advice of the Ladies that were about her, according to the custom she gave him the prize, saying, they had given him their consent, by their former commendations of him when he ran. Themistus on the other side, glad of the advantage he had over the young Courtiers, took on a more noble confidence, put on a certain majesty, and spoke more resolutely; in a word, he so carried himself, that he was thought worthy his birth, and a better fortune than he then had. Themistus was the subject of all the discourse that day; and there wanted not beauties, who made it their design to conquer his heart; he rais'd fear and jealousie in all that had Mistresses, and he had certainly all the reason in the world to be satisfied with what he had done that day.

He came that night to the Ball, where he expressed no less experience and ability, than at the Race, his company was infinitely pleasant to all that enjoy'd it, and Demarata her advantage of the antient familiarity, wherein they had lived from their infancy, made him relate some of the adventures of his Travels. But for my part, I shall not acquaint you with them, for it is sufficient I tell you, that he had been in Africk, Greece, and Asia; that he had by that means, learned abundance of excellent things; that he had done extraordinary things in the War; and that having gotten enough to put himself into a magnificent equipage, and to subsist on for one year, with a retinue proportionable to his high birth; his resolution was to see whether he could restore his House, through the favour of the Prince; and that if he could not do it, to return, and wander up and down the world, with a design never to return again into Sicily.

Now having understood at his coming into it, that the Prince was to be married, he ordered things so as not to appear at Court, till the day of the Race, then to do that piece of gallantry, which hath proved so fortunate to him: For Periantbus finding in Themistus what he could not in any of the young Courtiers, began to affect him from that day, and to assure him he would have a care of his misfortune. But for Demarata, when she was alone, she was in some sort troubled at the return of Themistus. Was it not enough (said she to her self, as she hath repeated it since) for me to be so unhappy as to club fortunes with a Prince, for whom I have an invincible aversion; but I must see again a man, for whom I have such inclinations, as seven years absence hath not been able to destroy? And yet these must I struggle with for my reputation sake; nay, for my quiet must overcome. Demarata therefore took this generous resolution, and omitted nothing in order to the execution thereof.

On the other side, Themistus minding on his fortune, and forgetting in a manner, the inclination, Demarata had had for him in her infancy, did her a thousand devoirs, meerly out of a consideration, that she had a great influence over the Prince, and his ambition advising him not to neglect any thing, he visited all the most considerable persons of the Court. Among the rest, he visited the Princess

Princeſs of Himera, whither he was brought by Meriander, with whom he had made friendſhip the very day of his arrival For my part, I was accidentally at Lindamira's when he came in, by which means I became a witneſs of their firſt enterview. It being not many days ſince that Princeſs became a Widow, and the firſt mourning being full of ceremony at Syracuſe, her Chamber was hang'd with black, all the windows were ſhut; it was enlightned by fifty Chryſtal Lamps, and in one corner of the Chamber, there was a Bed covered with a large Pavillion; ty'd up at the four corners with black Taſſels, upon which, the fair Lindamira negligently leant on Cuſhions, but in ſuch ſort, that without any affectation, one might ſee her hands, which were the faireſt in the world. So that Themiſtus perceiving amidſt ſo much black, a perſon that was young, beautiful, flaxen-hair'd, very fair, graceful, of a modeſt, ſad, and civil deportment, it is not ſtrange if he were taken with her, or that ſhe offer'd his heart ſome violence. Lindamira ſpoke very little that day; but all ſhe ſaid was pertinent: nay, ſhe ſigh'd ſo languiſhingly two or three times, that ſhe ſeemed the more lovely for it: and I muſt confeſs, though ſhe be extreamly inviting in what poſture ſoever a man ſees her, yet have I never ſeen her more fit to take a heart in an inſtant than that day. Nor indeed did ſhe fail of Themiſtus's, who being come to her Palace, only out of motives of ambition, left it with abundance of love. However, he kept this new born paſſion very ſecret, for the poſture his fortunes were in, gave him not leave to diſcover what he felt. Beſides that, though he doubted not but that the emotion of his heart was the effect of a growing love, yet was he in hope to be ſtill maſter of his liberty. For my part, I obſerved, that Lindamira had ſmitten the heart of Themiſtus from that very day, for he looked after none but her, he hearked only to what ſhe ſaid, he entertained himſelf with her ſight, and did a many things without conſidering what he did, whence I inferr'd, he was infinitely taken with Lindamira, and that he was a little at a loſs to find her ſo beautiful and ſo inviting.

Thus Madam, have you ſeen two originals of Love very different; Demarata was taken with Themiſtus, upon a day of publick rejoycing, and in a magnificent equipage; and Themiſtus falls in love with Lindamira on a day of ſadneſs and in mourning. This new Lover being deſirous to ſmother this growing flame, ſpent all his time in viſits, as well to men as to women. I brought him to the virtuous Amilthea, to the lovely Meliſera, to the amiable Beliſa, and a many more. He viſited alſo moſt men of quality, and made the beſt intereſt he could with the Prince: He was very much with Demarata, not thinking that the civilities he had then for her, enflamed in the heart of that Princeſs, an affection that ſhould prove all the unhappineſs of her life. During this time, he was ſeveral times deſirous to return to Lindamira; and ordinary, his reaſon prevailing with him, he did not. On the other ſide Lindamira, who had my Siſter ſtill with her, and had not, as I told you, had time to raiſe any extraordinary ſtructure of affection for the Husband ſhe had loſt, was in a ſhort time comforted: Inſomuch, that when there were not many about her, ſhe permitted any one to relate what had happened at the magnificent ſolemnity of Demarata's Marriage. And whereas, what was moſt remarkable in it, was, the arrival of Themiſtus, all the Ladies that gave her any account of what had paſt, entertained her with divers things of Themiſtus, celebrating him to the heavens, every one commending him according either to her inclination, or her capacity. For ſome commended the gracefulneſs of his perſon, others his activity; ſome his magnificence, others his dancing; and the moſt witty, his wit, his company, and his gallantry. Lindamira ſumming up all that others ſaid of him, and adding what ſhe knew of him her ſelf, entertained a good opinion of Themiſtus, and was very ready to afford him her eſteem. But he not having been to viſit her, ever ſince the firſt time, ſhe took notice of it, and asked my ſiſter one day, ſmiling, whom he was fallen in love with? Why do you ſuppoſe he ſhould be with any, replyed ſhe? Becauſe, anſwered Lindamira, that being a perſon of ſo much honour as he is, he ſhould have given me a ſecond viſit, if he be not extreamly taken up; ſo that I conclude, that he is either fallen in love with ſome Beauty of our Court, or that he hates me. That he ſhould hate you, ſaies Mericia, it is impoſſible, and it might be more probably ſaid, that he may ſtand in fear of you.

You ſee, Madam, how Lindamira ſtood affected towards Themiſtus, who abſolutely wedded to his ambition, thought he had daſhed out that light impreſſion which the charms of Lindamira had made in his heart. And indeed, the Prince of Syracuſe treating him with extraordinary civilities, and all others looking on him as a new Favourite, he felt a certain joy that made him reflect on Love as a paſſion that ſhould truckle under ambition, and ſuch as could not in him ſubſiſt with it, as what would not be croſſed by it, ſo that for ſome daies he knew not the leaſt diſturbance. But at laſt, about a month after his return into Sicily, the time of Lindamira's private mourning being expired, and ſhe at liberty to go abroad, ſhe, according to the cuſtom of Syracuſe, made her firſt viſit to Demarata, as wife to the Prince her Brother, being attended by a great number of fair Ladies, all in mourning. But to ſay truth, they were all eclipſed, in compariſon to her that day, ſuch charms did there appear in her perſon. For though her cloaths were but ſimple and negligent, and ſhe had only a large veile hanging carelefly down to the ground, whereof ſhe held one corner pleaſantly twining about the left arm, ſhe was a thouſand times more lovely, than any other could have been, with all the dreſſing imaginable. It being Themiſtus's fortune to be at Demarata's, when ſhe came thither, he perceived ſhe was as handſome in the broad day, as he had thought her in that night of mourning, when he had ſeen her before. So that he was more ſmitten than at the firſt time; and it happened ſo much the more fatally, in that Lindamira, having met his eies, made a little ſign with the head, obliging enough, as much as if it had been to ſay to him, I know you again, though I never ſaw you but once. Whereupon Themiſtus breaking the reſolution he had taken, ſought what he had reſolved to avoid, and the next day made a viſit to Lindamira. He came ſo betimes, that he found her alone, but he came thither with ſuch agitations, as his heart could not master. However, at his coming in, he carried himself so as nothing could be discovered, and saluted Lindamira very respectfully, but it was she that first spoke, for she had no sooner seen him, but breaking forth, I thought, said she to him, you had fallen out with me for that I was the occasion of your going into mourning, and that accordingly you would see me no more. Alas! Madam, replyed he, you have not only put me into a mourning, but you have also given me cause to mourn; for it is impossible a man can have the honor to be known to you; but he must be withall extreamly troubled that he cannot rationally merit your esteem.

I assure you, replyed she very kindly, that if you meet with no other trouble, you will be the happiest man in the World; for I do not conceive my self so lost to discretion, as that I can be the only person in the Court that does not esteem you. What you say, Madam, hath so much insinuation, and withall so much gallantry in it, replyed Themistus, that I fear me it is your design to make me forfeit my reason and something besides. This came from Themistus, with such a freedom, that Lindamira could not take any offence thereat; nor indeed did she answer it otherwise than as a gallantry expressed without design, and which she had deserved by the kindness she had expressed to Themistus, who thereupon staied three hours with her, but with such entertainment as he had never known before. For whereas Lindamira hath a certain goodness shining in her face, which discovers the inevitable charms of her mind, he was amazed to hear her speak; and that particularly when the fair Melisera, whose Picture Amilcar gave you yesterday, being come to see her, began ingenuously to reproach her for so easily admitting all sorts of people to visit her. Heaven be praised, said she to her, as she came into the room, for so great a happiness as that of finding but one honest man with you, when you were wont to have a hundred persons about you, such as you neither care for, nor any body else, and yet you endure them without giving any good reason why. When Themistus is in a manner but a stranger in his own Country, replyes Lindamira smiling, you will put him into a strange opinion of me, for he must needs believe that I make no distinction of people, and will think himself nothing obliged to me for all the kindnesses I have said to him before you came. Could I have guessed you had been so kind to him, replyed Melisera, laughing with her, I should have been far from saying what I have. But to do you right, added she pleasantly, I must acknowledge before him, that you of all the World, are a person of most clear apprehensions, and most delicate in the discernment of things, and than whom none ever did better understand vertuous persons. But what I am nevertheless startled at, is, to see you take so much pleasure with those that pretend to the excellencies of the mind, and yet are withall so little troubled at certain persons that are not known, because one will not know them, and who are so importunate, that I think they are such to none but you, so carefully are they avoided by all those that have ever so little tenderness to their own satisfaction, and love not to be troubled. Whoever, says Themistus owns great perfections, and withall a great goodness, is more than any exposed to the importunity of troublesome persons. For the great perfections, replyed Lindamira, I pretend not to them, but my quality is such, that it is not easie for me to avoid those that come to me. 'Tis very true, replies Melisera, but you may many times take such order as that you may not be found. For my part replyes Lindamira, I must needs acknowledge, I am far from that inhumanity of being rough to those that come to see me; for is it not misery enough, that they can neither raise love, nor receive any; and that they are shaken off every where, but I must also persecute them? and methinks I do better to let them alone out of pity, than if I should take the pains to send them to some other place where they would be more troublesome than they are to me. For when I have any such about me, I think on something else, as if they were not near me; I reflect no more on them, than if I saw them not; and unless it be that I find them Chamber-room, give them leave to speak when they can, and answer them when I please; that I do not beat them, or laugh at them I neither oblige them, nor disoblige them. But you consider not, says Melisera, that it is your inviting complexion that draws them about you, and which deceives them; that a single smile is entertainment enough for two hours; and that you are obliged much more than any other, to be a little scornful, because there are a thousand things in your carriage, which without any design in you, make people swarm about you. But if I should remedy all those things, replyed she, the effect of it would haply be, that I should scare away as well those that I am pleased with, as those I am not, so that I had much rather satisfie those I love, than displease those I do not. Besides, how would you have those miserable Souls disposed of, that are born to no merit, and cannot change their nature? They are ignorant of their having any, and you would have me by coyness and incivility, make them know so much: not but that I love as much as any one, to be private with two or three friends of my own sex; but say what you will, I have not the cruelty to force away even those that are importunate in their visits; nay, I am perswaded, it is an effect of goodness and justice. I must indeed acknowledge says Themistus, that what you say may proceed from some goodness, but I question whether it be always just that one should be always good to his own prejudice.

On the contrary replied Melisera, to speak truely, there is nothing so opposite to true goodness and true justice, than what this Princess does. For if she suffer any inconvenience, she derives it to all she loves, who must needs think it the greatest affliction that may be, to see her pestred with people that they care not for. Nay, she is the occasion that even these people take the less pleasure: for if all those that have any worth, would civilly disengage them out of their company, they would find out others that were more consonant to their humor, and to whom their conversation were more supportable. Would you but teach me the art of disingaging these people civilly, replyed Lindamira, it may be I should endeavor to do it, but I must confess I am absolutely ignorant in it. For my part, says Melisera, I think it no hard matter and conceive it a thing easier to be done, than to be her perſecuted by a ſort of troubleſome people. But how is it to be done, replies Lindamira? For all thoſe you eſteem not, replies Meliſera, you are to have only a cold civility, which as it hath in it nothing that's inhumane, ſo hath it not any thing that is divertive. You are not voluntarily to contribute ought to their enjoyments, and for virtues ſake you muſt forbear cenſuring them publickly. But when there is very particular company, ſays Lindamira, the leaſt can be ſaid of you, is, that you are very nice, that you are a little humerſome, or that you break forth into too much gallantry. This laſt reproach, replyes Meliſera, ſuits well with thoſe who are guilty of a certain tickliſh wit, yet live not as if they had any ſuch; for thoſe who make it their buſineſs to miſconſtrue things, imagine and affirm that one ſees an hundred people if he hath ſeen but one, and never ſuſpect they do any ſuch thing. And therefore ſince it is impoſſible, one ſhould not corrupt things that are moſt innocent when he is ſet upon it, the beſt courſe were to adviſe the ſide that is moſt convenient. Seriouſly replyed the Princeſs Lindamira, you would do me the greateſt courteſie in the world, could you but furniſh me with a little harſhneſs for three or four women of my acquaintance, that ſo I may be abſolutely what you would have me. If you were not ſo, replyed Themiſtus, the fair Meliſera would not be ſo much troubled at what you do. You are in the right, replyes that excellent Lady, but the Princeſs were leſs amiable than ſhe is, ſhe might be perſecuted by the multitude without my ladies quarrelling at it. You are yet a ſtranger, and the Princeſs in mourning, and therefore you know not what torment it is to ſee her, ſo as not to be able to ſpeak a word with her in private; but ſix months be paſt, you'll tell me more. Take ſhorter time, replyed he, for without knowing whether the perſons I hear in the outer room, are troubleſome or not, I ſit upon thorns till the company be broke up. Ah, Themiſtus, what affection do I owe you for being ſo much of my humor, replies Meliſera, and how ſhall I think my ſelf obliged, if you afford me your aſſiſtance to cure the diſeaſe of an exceſs of goodneſs and complyance.

Hereupon came into the room five women, though they came not at the ſame time into the Palace, and who ſeemed not to make that days viſit to Lindamira, to any other end than to ſatisfie Themiſtus, that Meliſera was not miſtaken. For there was no conſonancy between any of them, either among themſelves, or in relation to Lindamira. There was one that lived almoſt an age, and conſequently was very grave, auſtere, diſcourſing of nothing but the diſguſt people ſhould have of the things of this world, found nothing good of all that it afforded and could not endure thoſe of the new Court, and wore cloaths that were in faſhion in the time of Nabuzar, Tyrant of Agrigentum. On the other ſide, there was another that was young, thought her ſelf very pretty, looked very ſimperingly, and ſtudied nothing but how to keep on the redneſs of her lips, during a conference ſhe was extreamly weary of. There was a third that pretended much to news and intelligence, and conſequently had a privilege to be ever talking. For the other two, of whom I ſay nothing, they are ſuch a ſort of women as a man knows not what to ſay of, as ſuch as are neither handſome nor ugly; neither fools, nor yet very wiſe; and whereof the mediocrity keeps them from being aſſign'd any rank; for when there are none handſomer than themſelves in company, they are ſtrangely weary of it, and when they are with perſons that are pleaſant and ingenious; they are ſuffered, becauſe it is not perceived they are preſent. So that Meliſera whiſpering ſomething to Themiſtus, and looking on Lindamira, put her into a great diſtraction what to do; yet could ſhe not abſolutely reſiſt her inclination; for ſhe rayled at the World, with the antient Lady that quarrelled ſo much at the new Court; ſhe commended her Dreſſes, who underſtood not any thing but what was of that nature: ſhe ask'd news of her who loved nothing ſo much as to tell it; and ſhe had ſomething I know not what, to ſay to the two mean-witted perſons I told you of. So that when they were gone, it occaſioned one of the pleaſanteſt diſcourſes that ever was.

Themiſtus therefore finding no fewer charms in Lindamira's mind, than he did in her face, fell ſo much the more in love with her, inſomuch, that within a few days, not being able to reſiſt the violence of his paſſion, he delivered himſelf up a Priſoner thereto. Yet could he not avoid a violent agitation of mind; for reflecting on the deſign he had to be a favorite to his Prince, he thought it concerned him very much to conceal his love; and he knew, but too much for his own quiet, that the buſineſs he undertook was very difficult. Should he diſcover his affection, he muſt run the hazard of being baniſhed the Court by his Maſter, and ſhould he ſtill ſmoother it, he muſt run that of not gaining his Miſtreſſes love. Nay, he well knew, that Lindamira would prove no eaſie conqueſt, and conſequently there was the leſs likelihood he ſhould ever be happy. But, after all, it being not in his power to maſter his ſentiments, he loved that which he could not forbear loving, and was at laſt ſatisfi'd that his Love was not ſuch an enemy to the deſigns of his ambition as he thought it had. Nay, it happened that love and ambition, by conjunction, grew ſtronger and ſtronger in him; for being deſirous to ſhew himſelf worthy of Lindamira, it enflam'd his ambition: and in regard he was naturally ambitious, the quality of the perſon he loved added to his Love. So that he undertook at the ſame time, two very hard things, that is, to gain the favors of his Prince, and to deſerve the good inclinations of a fair Princeſs. Thoſe he looked on as his two main labors; the former he eaſily overcame, for Periantbus was ſo extreamly inclined to affect him, that in a ſhort time, he was his only Favorite: and for the ſecond, he went ſo far, as without any great difficulty to get into the eſteem of Lindamira, nay indeed, very far into her friendſhip. 'Tis true, that ſpoke no particular favor from Lindamira, for he had the eſteem and love of all the world, except thoſe who envyed his virtue, and repined at the favor he was in, yet durſt not openly diſcover any ſuch thing.

In the mean time, Demarata ſeeing what reſpects the whole Court had for Themiſtus, felt the ſecret paſſion ſhe had for him, growing ſtrong within her. And yet ſhe diſſembled it ſo well, that Amerintha excepted, none ever knew any thing of it, nay even Themistus himself, whose imagination was full of the excellencies of Lindamira, had not the least suspicion thereof. However he waited on her very diligently, not only for the Prince's sake, who thought himself concerned in all the civilities done to Demarata, whom he still extreamly loved, but also to elude the notice might be taken of his frequent visits to Lindamira, and consequently that it might be thought that he had no other designs than those of ambition, that is, courted all those that might any way further them. Towards all the other Ladies, he behaved himself civilly, officiously, and like a gallant, but seemed not to have any particular inclinations for any one, whereat Demarata was extreamly well pleased. In a word, should her secret sentiments be examined, it would be found she imagined to her self a certain pleasure to do things, so as that Themistus might not love at all. So that to keep him from it, she thought fit to advance a discourse concerning the qualities a Favorite should have, to continue long in favor. Lindamira was present at that debate, which was occasioned upon a change that had happened at the Court of the Prince of Hercles, that made a great noise in the Court of Syracuse, upon pretence that the Favorite, who was fallen into disgrace, had lost himself by making his Mistress acquainted with some secrets of his Master.

For my part, says Demarata, I would never advise a man that were guilty of ambition, and would be Favorite to a Prince, to be engaged in Love. For these two principal passions require either of them a whole heart, and it is not possible to be fortunate in both at the same time. For my part, replyes Lindamira, I do not think those two passions so incompatible as you conceive. For when a man is a Favorite, it is so much the more easie for him to prevail, and if his addresses amount to any thing, there will be those Ladies that will sacrifice themselves to his desires, and will spare him abundance of pains. Take me in the humor I am in now, replyes Themistus, were I Favorite to a Prince, I would not care for that Mistriss whose good inclinations I should gain but conditionally with the favors of my Master. And therefore, if I propose to my self the conquest of any Beauty, I am confident I shall pick out such an one as shall consider nothing but my affection. The question is not to know what a man should do when he loves nor yet when he should love, replyes Demarata, but only to examine whether I have not reason to affirm, that a Favorite, who would advance his fortune, should avoid being in Love. But if he be a Favorite to a young Prince, replyed Lindamira, will you have him to be barbarous? or will you not allow him to concern himself in the pleasures of his Prince, and that if he be in Love, the other should be so too? I allow him to be civil, replyes Demarata, to be a Gallant, to be generous, nay to be a Lover in appearance, if the Prince by whom he is favored condescended thereto: but I maintain, that all his actions should relate to his ambition, if he be desirous to be happy; and that he should always be disposed to follow the inclinations of his Prince, and to renounce his own. Hence it comes, that sometimes he must mind Hunting, other times Court-ship, other times Bravery, acording as the humor of his Prince leads him; but he must never come to that extremity as to betray his Master to obey a Mistress. He must never come to that forced point, as to persecute his Prince with perpetual petitions for the friends of the Person he is in love with; he to whom he is a Favorite, should never fear he might reveal any secret of his; and a man must never put himself into such a posture, as that it may be in his power to deny that Prince any thing, whom he would have to repose an absolute confidence in him. For this reason must his Love-adventures be such, as that he shall not refuse to acquaint his Prince therewith, nor yet to make him privy to the favors he receives from his Mistress if in case he have any. For my part says Themistus, were I a Lover, and that a fortunate one, I am confident, I should rather sacrifice my fortune, than acquaint my Master with the favors I received from any Lady, how inconsiderable soever they were, if secret. What you say is doubtless very generously said, replyes Demarata, but when all's done, it clearly demonstrates that a Favorite ought not be in Love; for a young Prince that should trust you with all the secrets of State, would not take it well you should conceal ought from him that he is desirous to know. Besides, to be fortunate in ambition, a man must be disposed to lose all, to forsake all, when Policy requires it, and he must not admit diversity of interests to bring any one to effect. There are two kind of Favorites, added she, for there are some who love the Prince and the State, and others who mind only their own advancement, and would as gladly sacrifice the Prince and the State, to raise their own fortunes, as they would do their particular enemies. But whether the Favorite love his Master, or only himself, it is still equally convenient he should be unacquainted with Love. If all the Ladies of the Court heard you speak after that rate, replyes Lindamira, they would look on you as a person who had a design to hinder them from conquering the heart of Themistus, whom all begin to look on as the Favorite of the Prince my Brother. I am so far from deserving that honor, answers Themistus, that I think none looks on me as such an one. However it be, added Demarata blushing, it hath been my endeavor to give you the advice of a faithful friend. I am extreamly obliged to you for your good wishes, Madam, replyed he, and to let you know how far I submit to you, I promise you here before the fair Lindamira, that neither of you shall ever see me in love with any one of all those Ladies that are not present; which as he said, Themistus looked on Lindamira, who laughing, said to him, e're she was a ware, that to make him a positive answer to what he said, he must needs be in Love in Africk, Greece, or Asia. If I had discovered my secret, replyes he, smiling with her, the Princess might reproach me, that I had done that for you which ought not to be done for a Mistress. And therefore I shall tell you no more.

Hereupon the Prince coming in, dissolved the company, and carried away Themistus along with him, so that Lindamira, being also gone, and Demarata left alone, she went into her Closet, whither she called Amerintha, who knew all the secrets of her heart. Could you believe, said she to her, that I should spend the whole afternoon in endeavoring to perswade the only man in the world that that I love, and cannot but love, that it is not fit he should be in love himself. Not but that I must acknowledge, though to my own confusion, that it were an incredible joy to me, that he were in love with me, conditionally that he neither told me so, nor knew that I knew so much. But since it is not so, nor can I wish it were, I must confess it is some pleasure to me, to think that Themistus is not in love at all, and minds nothing but his ambition. And yet methinks Madam, replyed Amerinda, since it is your design to disburthen your heart of the violent affection that torments you, it should be your wish either that Themistus were in disgrace or in love; for having so great a heart as you have, you would not be able to continue your affection long to a man that were in love elsewhere: and if the other happened, absence would haply cure you. For absence, replyes Demarata, 'tis to me a fruitless remedy, I was but ten years of age when Themistus went hence, he stayed seven years out of Sicily, and yet at his return, I no sooner saw him but I blushed; nay durst I say it without confusion, I loved him. The other way you propose is no better, for my condition, and the posture of Themistus's fortune considered, though he should love me, he durst not discover it, so that I have no reproach to make to him that he loves me not. He is very liberal of his civilities towards me, he sees me often; and though he should engage his love elsewhere, it were no injury to me, and yet it would afflict me beyond all remedy. To find out therefore an innocent ease in my misfortunes, all I have to wish, is, that Themistus, be not in love at all: for if it be so, I shall love with some satisfaction, though it should be my desire to love him eternally without his knowledge, and without ever being loved by him.

These, Madam, were the transactions that passed in Demarata's soul, who had the satisfaction to see that Themistus was not engaged to any of the Ladies of the Court, and the pleasure to see him so much in the esteem of Periantus, that it would not be long e're all the favors of the Prince were at his disposal. Yet was he still in a very unfortunate condition; for the passion he had for Lindamira was so violent, that he hardly had one minutes rest. However, he durst not discover what he felt, to her who was the cause thereof; for though he could do any thing with the Prince, yet was there no likelihood he should make any pretensions to the Princess of Himera; since that the same favor that had raised him up so high, and had found him the opportunities to approach her, advised him to avoid all inclinations towards her, out of a consideration that the Prince might have accused him of ingratitude, should he have been guilty of a presumption to lift up his eyes so high as the Princess his Sister. In the mean time he was in love, nay he would love contrary to the suggestions of his reason: for the Princess Lindamira seemed so amiable to him, that he thought it as unjust as impossible not to love her. But all considered, he smothered his passion with abundance of care, yet not omitting ought that might any way gain him the esteem of Lindamira, he did very considerable services about the Prince her Brother, he saw her as often as he could; and when she was out of her first mourning, he found her a thousand several sorts of diversions and entertainments. In all the great and noble things he did, he directed his thoughts to Lindamira, and he never met with any occasion to relieve some illustrious unfortunate person, but he did it with a particular satisfaction, out of a confidence that Lindamira would have the greater esteem for him; and indeed that confidence met with its reward in her. But all this notwithstanding, since he had never acquainted her with his affection, he was still dissatisfied with his fortune.

Being therefore one day at Lindamira's in that disturbance, though there were four or five Ladies present, I came in and told a piece of news I had newly heard, that concerned a person of the Court whom all the World knew. He I speak of would marry a Woman he was extreamly in love with, though one very much below his condition. This bringing about the discourse to the business of love, it was put to the question, whether a man did more oblige a woman by loving her, though she were infinitely below his condition; or by loving her sincerely and constantly, when she were infinitely above him; that is, when there was such a distance between them, that he could not pretend to the least hope of ever obtaining her. At first, those who had not made the proposition, thought there had been no question in it; and that he who loved a person much below him, put a greater obligation upon her, than he should have done on another of higher quality than himself, whom he durst not pretend to. But having considered the business more narrowly, they saw it might very well come into debate. For my part, said a Lady of the company, I cannot apprehend any comparison between these two things; for is there any thing more satisfactory to a handsome woman, than to see her beauty and desert esteemed as highly as nobleness of birth and riches; and to find at her feet a person of great quality, sacrificing for her sake, his fortunes; incurring the displeasure of his kindred, and the censure of his friends, and one that notwithstanding a thousand obstacles, makes her happy by making himself such? What you say, (replyes Lindamira, not thinking of any advantage that Themistus might make of it) does doubtless speak abundance of obligation, but to consider things more narrowly, and to search into the depth of the question, there is no comparison between these two kinds of love now in dispute; the love that is most perfect, is certainly that which hath least of self-interest; and to speak freely, I do not think that the inequality of conditions, when there is nothing dishonorable in the birth of a person a man is in love with, is one of the greatest obstacles that love can conquer. For a man that loves any thing violently, may easily imagine, that that difference of quality introduced by fortune among men, is a thing of no real consideration, and that the true distinction that wise men allow among them, ought to be no other than that of desert. And as for Riches, when a man is once in love, he troubles not his thoughts about them; and if he were able to forbear Marrying the person, he should love because she were not rich; it must needs follow, that he is no richer than she, and that the meer fear of making her miserable, should prevail with him, not to satisfie his love. But if the thing be, as we have presupposed, I think it no miracle a rich man should marry a poor Woman, and shall therefore therefore never number that amongst the greatest expressions of love. On the contrary, when ever I shall see a person of a higher condition and more rich, applying himself to one below him, and will not marry her, I shall say he either love her not, or very little.

Your Sentence is very just, Madam, replyes Themistus, when you speak after that rate: for I am perswaded when love is weaker than reason, it is no perfect love, especially in emergencies of that nature. And so Madam, it is not to be wondered, if the love of a man of a higher condition than the person he loves, continues and is fortified to that degree, as to oblige him to marry her. For hope being that which enlivens and augments love, he wants not any thing whence he may derive any confidence of his happiness when he pleases himself. So that I am much more astonished to see there are some Lovers who can forbear attaining to what they desire, than I am to see who slight all considerations of interest to satisfie themselves; and therefore to speak justly, a love that grows without hope, and subsists without it, and meets with no obstacles but what are invincible, is much more obliging, and accordingly more resolute than that which cannot but hope, even though it would not, and may arrive to whatever it hopes. What you say is very subtilly spoken, replies a Lady that was present; but when all is done, I conceive that what hope doth in the heart of other lovers, glory does the same in those we speak of; and that the secret satisfaction there is in loving a person of great quality, that hath beauty, wit, and virtue, entertains the passion of the Lover. Besides, added I, to speak sincerely, though there be a great disproportion between the lover and the person he loves, yet does he still flatter himself, and that if he have not a real hope, he hath at least something that's near it, and like it, that bears him up and comforts him. For my part, reples the Princess of Himera, I easily conceive there may be such a lover as cannot really hope any thing, and I imagine at the same time, that there is not any thing speaks more obligation than a love of that nature.

But Madam, replyed I, a man may have at least a hope to be pittied. That's but a sad kind of hope, replyed Themistus. Nay, added Lindamira, it's possible there may be such a Lover as cannot rationally hope ever to see the liberty to bemoan himself, and consequently much less to be pittyed by another. Ah, Madam, replyes Themistus, there you go too far; for I cannot conceive it possible for a man to endure a great affliction without ever complaining of it. For my part, added I, I am of Themistus's opinion. Howe're it may be, replyed that secret Lover, you must needs acknowledge, Madam, that a man who lovrs a person infinitely above himself, and loves her with a resolution to love her eternally, though he cannot rationally hope t o be happy, must needs have a more elevated love, than he who loves a person whose condition being inferior to his own, affords him an easie hope of being satisfied, even when he pleases himself. I grant it, says she, yet not out of any perswasion that a woman can ever be obliged to a Lover, since that when a man is in love, he is such whether he will or no, and that he does but what he cannot forbear doing. Very right replyes Themistus; I acknowledge a woman should not lie under any obligation, provided you confess she ought not to be without pitty. As a woman hath not love when she pleases her self, replyed Lindamira, so no more can she have pitty when ever the wretches she hath made expect she should, nor yet as often as she would her self: our will for the most part, having so little predominancy over the secret sentiments of our hearts, that we cannot without temerity give an account of our own thoughts.

Having so said, Lindamira rises up to go and walk in those spacious Gardens that lye at the end of the Hexapila, so they call one part of the City that lyes to the Land-side, as the Acbradina lyes to the Sea-side. Themistus walking along with her, went on still, having his thoughts taken up with the discourse that had passed. He thought it some pleasure to think that the Princess of Himera, allowed the love of a man whose affection derived no encouragement from hope, to be more considerable than that of those Lovers who have thousands of occasions to hope. So that Themistus being wholly intentive to that reflection, Lindamira, whom he held up as she walked, as soon as they were come into the Gardens where she intended to walk, perceiving it, asked him the reason thereof. What you desire to know, Madam, replyed he, is of greater consequence than you imagine: for in a word, though the Prince to whom I owe thousands of obligations, and for whom I would sacrifice my life a thousand times, should ask me the same thing, I should not tell him, and yet you are the only person in the world to whom I might tell it, if you lay your absolute commands upon me to do so. What you say, seems to me very obliging, replyes Lindamira, but as I am not very forward to burden my self with the secrets of my Friends, without any necessity, so shall I not press you to acquaint me with yours. You shall never know it then, replyes Themistus, for it is of such a nature, that I cannot have the presumption to tell it you, if you do not command me to do it. It must needs be a very odd secret it seems, replyed Lindamira, looking on him. On the contrary, Madam, replyed he, his colour changing, 'tis the noblest secret in the world, and were it less Noble, it were a less secret than it is, and so more easily guessed at. Not but that I am a little amazed, added he, that you who have so clear a wit, and understand those that come to you so well, have not already found it out. Assure your self, replyed Lindamira, I have no skill in Divination, but as I find there is something more than ordinary in having a secret that's never to be communicated to any one, I shall not command you to acquaint me with yours. But Madam, replyed Themistus, since you think there's something extraordinary in having a secret that is not to be told any one in the world, I have a great desire to tell you mine; for I am confident you will never tell it any other, and that you will be the only person upon earth that knows it; when I have told you, That I am an unfortunate wretch that loves you, without hope, and to pretend to love you so eternally. Ah! Themistus, replyed the Princess, blushing for very anger, do you consider what you say? Do you speak in good earnest? Do you know me well? Or have you forgot your self? I am in good earnest Madam, replyed he, I consider well what I say. I know well who you are, and have not forgotten my self, but in ſpight of Reaſon and my Will, I adore you, and ſhall do ſo eternally. But are you not afraid, replied Lindamira, that I ſhall acquaint the Prince my Brother with your preſumption? No, Madam, replied he, for as you have put me into a condition not to fear death, and only to tremble at your indignation, I cannot be afraid of diſgrace. Were you afraid of my indignation, added Lindamira, you would not tell me what you do, and you would not force me to forbid you my ſight. Ah! Madam, replyed he, if you will not allow me to ſee you, no queſtion but I ſhall die, and you will haply be troubled at my death; for, Madam, if you obſerve, I have not had the preſumption to tell you that my paſſion was guilty of any hope; on the contrary, I declare I have not any; nay, I pretend not to the poor comfort that proceeds from pity, and that I deſire nothing but the glory to love you, though none know it, nay, if you pleaſe, without my ever telling you ſo much. Were it poſſible, replies the Princeſs Lindamira, you could have the leaſt ſhadow of hope in your madneſs, I ſhould treat you otherwiſe than I do; but ſince that cannot be, and that I have a certain eſteem and friendſhip for you, and cannot ruine you, without doing my ſelf ſome prejudice, I give your Reaſon time to bring you to your wits again. I would not therefore you ſhould ever preſume to expoſtulate with me any thing of your indiſcretion; I would have you very carefully avoid being alone with me; nay, I would have you ſee me as ſeldom as you can poſſibly, till ſuch time as you ſhall be in condition to ask me pardon for your extravagance, and come and declare that you love me not otherwiſe than you ought to love me: For if you do not what I tell you, though I abhor nothing ſo much as noiſe and diſturbance, I ſhall acquaint the Prince my Brother with your preſumption, and ſhall infallibly ruine you. Your commands, Madam, replied he, are certainly very hard to be obſerved, and yet I ſhall obey you in all, unleſs it be, Madam, that I ſhall never tell you that I have ceaſed to love you.

Lindamira coming hereupon to certain Green ſeats, ſate down, and obliged the Ladies that came along with her, to do the like. But being extreamly troubled at the adventure that had hapned to her, ſhe ſtaid not long in the Garden, nay, ordered things ſo, that Themiſtus led her not, and ſo ſhe returned home very ſad and melancholly. She was no ſooner in her chamber, but calling my Siſter to her into the Cloſet, ſhe acquainted her with what had happened to her, expreſſing a great indignation at Themiſtus's boldneſs, and withall, abundance of affliction, that they could not have ſo much of his company as formerly. For in fine, ſaid ſhe to Mericia, I looked on Themiſtus as a perſon I ſhould have made the chiefeſt of my friends, becauſe he not only wanted, not any thing that might recommend him, as to his perſon, but was alſo very ſerviceable to me in my affairs. 'Tis certain, he hath a great influence over the Prince my Brother, he is an underſtanding man, diſcreet, reſpectful, divertive, and methought there was no danger to enter into a friendſhip with him. In the mean time he is fallen into an impertinent paſſion, that ruines all my deſigns, and puts me into no ſmall diſtraction. For I will not give him any occaſion to conceive the leaſt hope, nor on the contrary, give any other cauſe to ſuſpect any thing of his temerity. You have ſo much prudence, replied Mericia, that you will do what you have a mind to do; but certainly 'tis great pity that Themiſtus's fortune does not juſtifie the paſſion he hath for you; for that allowed, he is worthy your love. I grant it, replied Lyndamira, and that is it that torments me, for not being able to admit him as a Lover, I ſhould have been very glad to have had him while I lived for my Friend.

While this entertainment paſſed between Lindamira and my Siſter, Themiſtus, not able to becalm the ſeveral ſentiments, wherewith his heart was toſſed, deſired He and I might have ſome diſcourſe. I at firſt ſaw him ſo ſad, that I thought ſome ſecret diſcontent had happened between him and the Prince. Inſomuch as perceiving after he had ſeemed willing to ſpeak with me, that he ſaid nothing to me, I asked him what it was that troubled him. I ſhould not indeed, added I, much wonder to ſee you diſturbed, for I think it impoſſible that ever ambition ſhould be without diſquiet. Ah! dear Meleaganes, cries He, were I only ambitious, I were the happieſt man in the world. But alas, I ſtruggle both with Love and Ambition at the ſame time, and not being well able to diſtinguiſh whether my Love proceeds from Ambition, or my Ambition from my Love, all I know is, that my heart is rack'd with all the diſturbances that are the attendants of theſe two paſſions. I would fain be at this very inſtant, that I ſpeak, both near the Prince, and near the Princeſs Lindamira. How, ſaid I, are you in love with the Princeſs of Himera? I am, replied he, and what is moſt deplorable, I love her without hope. And yet I am reſolved to act, as if I did hope, and to ſee whether that Proverb which ſaies, that Fortune favours the Confident, be true or no.

Upon that, he gave me an account of the diſcourſe he had had with Lindamira. But when I would have told him, that I thought his condition not ſo ſad, in that ſhe had not treated him worſe, he told me that I was miſtaken, and that he had been leſs miſerable, if ſhe had expreſſed a greater violence towards him. But, to be ſhort, added he, ſince as an ambitious man I cannot love more nobly, and that as a Lover, I muſt be withal ambitious, I reſign my ſelf equally to theſe two violent paſſions, and am abſolutely reſolved that they ſhall either mutually aſſiſt one the other, or combine to ruine me.

Tell me therefore my dear Meleagenes, whether what I intend to do be rational, for my thoughts are in ſuch a tempeſt, that I dare not truſt my own reaſon in this accident. But, ſaid I, what can you do to ſatisfie your ambition more than you do? The Prince affects you, you follow him every where, you participate of all his pleaſures, and he cannot live without you. Ah? Meleagenes, repled he, a peaceful Favourite goes on but ſlowly, and great fortunes are never found but in great affairs. When I have followed the Prince a hunting, or to Demarata's, to Lindamira's, to the Revels, to the Walks, I ſhall never be the more powerful; and ſo the eaſe of the Grandees will at laſt give them an opportunity to ruine me. Beſides that, doing no more about the Prince, than what a many others could do as well as I, it will be eaſie for my æmulators to undermine me, feeling therefore within me, something that aims at greater matters, I would stirr up some War, that might contribute as well to my Ambition as my Love. This is my only way to arrive at great employments, wherein I am sure to meet with either glory or death. By this means shall I come to a nearer distance from Lindamira, and more approach the rank and quality of my Ancestors. Tell me then that I am in the right way, my dear Meleagenes, if you would advise me as I would be advised. On the other side, trouble not your self for the War I intend to raise, for the Prince may justly declare one against the Prince of Messena, and were he not taken up with the love of Demarata, he had haply been already in Arms. If it be so, said I to him, I think it the best course you can take, provided you be in some sort confident of the happy success of this design; for it is a most deplorable thing to be the occasion of a War that is not crowned with victory. Victory, replies Themistus, is commonly the reward of those that assault, rather than of those that are assaulted, because the former voluntarily seek it, the latter do but as it were entertain it out of necessity. Besides that, in all great designs, wherein both Love and Ambition are concerned, much must be left to hazard, and a man should as much resign himself to Fortune as to Prudence.

Themistus being thus resolved for the War, began to act with so much policy, that in the space of three months, the interest of the Princes of Syracuse and Messena were so intangled, that nothing could unravel the differences but a War. In the interim, Themistus behaved himself towards Lindamira with the greatest respect in the world; he exactly observed the command she had laid upon him, of not speaking to her alone; and carried himself so discreetly, that though she could not be perswaded his sentiments were other towards her, than they had been, he gave her not the least occasion to take ought ill at his hands. For Demarata, considering only the great influence she had upon the Prince, he humoured her as much as lay in his power, not knowing that he was but too much in her favour; for as I have told you, the world affords not another that can so well disguise her sentiments as this Princess. And since it was her design to overcome the passion that tormented her soul, she was not troubled at a War that should rid her of a man whom she would not love, and a Prince she could not endure without doing extream violence to her self. So that she furthered Themistus's design, though she knew not so much. For, Lyndamira, the hope she was in, that absence would contribute much to his recovery of Themistus, she was also glad of the War, though naturally a great lover of peace. Periantbus for his part, being courageous, young, and desirous of Fame, was easily perswaded to embrace the War, though he still doted on Demarata; so that all things furthering Themistus's design, preparations were made for the execution thereof. Troops were raised, an Army was modelled; and Periantbus being to command it in person, went to take his leave of the Princess Lindamira, attended by the greatest part of the Court, and among others Themistus, who had the gallantest Presence in the world, being in a military equipage. While she spoke in private with the Prince, Themistus had his eye fixt on her, as if it had been to give her occasion to guess, that his intention were still the same towards her, insomuch that Lindamira told my Sister that very night, that she was much in fear that Themistus was not yet fully recovered of his extravagance But I had forgot to tell you, that Periantbus taking his leave of her, she very obligingly turned to all those that came along with him, and without distinguishing Themistus from the rest; she told them, that she recommended the Prince her Brother to their care; and that it was her wish to see them all returned home again covered with Laurels. In the mean time Themistus, who sought his own comfort, found a particular satisfaction in the words Lindamira had said in general, though she had not afforded him so much as a look, which he might rationally conceive directed to him.

I shall not trouble you, Madam, with the particulars of this War, which was over in six months. It sufficeth that I tell you, that as it was begun by Themistus, so was it also gloriously concluded by him, since that through his courage and prudence, a battel was gained, that decided the differences of the Princes of Syracuse and Messena, and introduced a peace between the two States. For Themistus commanding the Reserve, brought it into the fight so seasonably, that his side gain'd the victory thereby. Accordingly, was the sole honor of this War, even in his Masters judgement, due to him: for it was undertaken by his advice, he had given very fortunate directions while it lasted, and he had contributed more to the gain of the battel than any other. Add to this, that he had the happiness to save the Prince of Syracuse's life, who had his Horse killed under him, when Themistus being come up to the Prince, dispatched one of the enemies, that would have either killed or taken him, and furnished him with his Horse, so that he relieved him in the greatest hazard that he could be in.

Hereupon the Prince of Messena being an ancient man, and fearing, if the War continued, he might lose his Estate, resolved to send such indifferent propositions, in order to a Peace, as Themistus could not but hearken to. So that within three daies the Articles were sign'd, and for more security of the performance thereof, it was agreed, that the young Prince of Messena should remain a hostage at Syracuse, till some fortifications were demolished, wherein consisted part of the difference between those two Princes. This done, Periantbus, to reward Themistus with the first honors of the advantage he had gained, would needs dispatch him before to Syracuse, to acquaint Demarata and Lindamira with the first news of Victory and Peace. Themistus, overjoyed at this welcome Commission, accepted it with great satisfaction; and, having received Letters from the Prince to those two Princesses, returned to Syracuse. But as he went, he felt, whatever hope hath of insinuation, and fear of disturbance; for the glory he had acquir'd, put him into hope to receive some acknowledgment from Lindamira, but having not seen her in private from the day that he had acquainted her with his affection, he was strangely afraid to see her alone. Yet Love and Ambition growing stronger than his Fear, his Heart sided with Hope. However, he was obliged to go first to Demata, went to Lindamira. He did so, and was received by her with abundance of civility, and a many expressions of joy, wherein he thought not himself at all concerned. For he thought that Demarata would not receive him so kindly; but considering him as a person, of whom Perianthus spoke with abundance of obligation; so, if I am not mistaken, the Prince's Letter to the Princess, was to this effect.

PERIANTHUS to the Princess DEMARATA.

IF you have any affection for me, Madam, entertain Themistus as a person, to whom I owe all things, and whom you are obliged to for the life of a Prince, who loves you beyond himself.

Demarata blushed as she read this Letter, and felt within her an agitation which she had much ado to calm, Yet at last she overcame it, and looking very kindly to Themistus, she intreated him to relate the particulars of the Fight; but he did it with such modesty, that if the common report had not inform'd her of the great things he had done, she could hardly have inferr'd from his relation, that he had been there. So that the esteem she had for Themistus, encreasing thereby, the flame she would have quenched, increased also. Insomuch that Themistus having left her, she got into her Closet, and speaking to the person that was privy to her secrets; Well, Amerintha, said she to her, what think you of the strangeness of my destiny? I would not love Themistus any longer, and he becomes daily more and more worthy to be lov'd; I would have him go to the Wars purposely to forget him, and he does there such extraordinary things, that it is impossible not to remember him eternally: I wished he might have dyed there, so to rid my heart of him, and he saves the Prince's life, so to fasten himself for ever to the Court of Syracuse. This granted, what would you have me to do, Amerintha? or have I not reason to think, that it is the pleasure of my destiny, that I should love Themistus in spight of my virtue? I were as good, added she, love him voluntarily; and since Reason and Virtue, joyned together, cannot resist fortune, nor oppose my inclinations; let us love Themistus whom we cannot hate; but lest he might slight us, added she, let us endeavor to do it so, as that he may not know any thing, and that he be not any way engaged in love. For my part, Madam, replies Amerintha, I think it would not be amiss, should you not so directly oppose the inclination you have for Themistus; for Love is enflamed by resistance, and that passion increases many times more easily of it self, than it would if it were wished: Do not therefore any violence to your own sentiments, and you will haply see, that within a few daies, you will find rest when you do not seek it, and your heart will be at liberty. But while Demarata was thus entertained, Themistus went to Lindamira, whom he found alone. I know, Madam, (said he to her, very respectfully, delivering Perianthus's Letter) that I transgress your commands, but Madam, you will haply find my excuse in the Prince's Letter which I give you. At these words, Lindamira, without making him any answer, took the Letter, and opening it, found these words;

PERIANTHUS to the Princess of HIMERA.

IF you desire to put a sensible obligation upon me, entertain Themistus as a person, to whom I owe Life, Victory, and Peace; for by the friendship you shall have for him, I shall measure that you have for me.

Lindamira having read the Letter, looked very kindly on Themistus, and speaking to him, I beseech you, said she, hinder me not from doing what the Prince my Brother would have me. And what would he have you to do for me, Madam, replies Themistus? He commands me to have a friendship for you, replied she, and if I have not it shall not be my fault. Your friendship, Madam, replies Themistus, is a thing so precious, that no man ought to receive it otherwise than on his knees. Receive it then, saies Lindamira, interrupting him, and without speaking any more of it, I pray tell me what I have not from report, but very confusedly; for I shall credit you more than I do her, and shall trust the account you give me of the fight, more than I do what she hath told me. No doubt, Madam, but I ever speak truth, replied he, and were I not afraid, you should think that the Victory wherein the Prince is pleased to have me so much concern'd, had encouraged me to any presumption, I should haply tell you once more e're I die, that that you have gained over me, is much more absolute, than what the Prince hath gained over his enemies. But since I would not be thought a person so presumptuous, as to have turned bankrupt as to all respect, but on the contrary, desirous to express much more towards you than I have. I shall obey you, and employ these precious minutes, wherein I have the honour to be alone with you, to acquaint you with what you would know. Whereupon Themistus, not giving Lindamira leisure to make him any answer, related what had passed, with such Eloquence, Wit, Modesty and Art, that though he said nothing advantageous to himself, yet was she satisfied, that Fame had not flattered him. Being come just to to the closure of his relation, there came so many into Lindamira's chamber, that it was impossible for him to say any thing to her in private.

In the mean time was this Princess in no small disturbance; for, as it was but just to commend a person that had done the State such considerable service, so on the other side was she troubled to do it with any earnestness, knowing what inclinations he had for her, lest he should make any advantage thereof. So that to take a mean betwixt these two extremities, she read aloud what the Prince her Brother had written concerning Themistus, so to do justice to the valour of that secret Lover, yet not to heighten his confidence by any excess of commendation. But, Themistus perceiving the company to encrease, and finding himself burthened thened with the flatteries of those that were about Lindamira, his own modesty forced him to leave the Princess. Nay, he thought that the interest of his love and ambition advised him to do so. So that being returned to his own House, I went to wait on him, for I came to Syracuse along with him. As soon as I saw him, I asked what posture his affairs were in, as well in relation to his love as his ambition. For what concerns my ambition, replies he, they go very well, for after the service I have now done the Prince, there are few places I may not pretend to. But for my love-affairs, the case is otherwise, for the Princess may haply have a greater esteem for me than she had, but I do not believe she will ever venture to love me, even though she should cease to have an aversion for me. I know well enough, added he, that my birth is noble, but my fortune was in such an ill equipage when I left Sicily, that I find it a kind of madness to love Lindamira. But since your courage, replied I, will soon make your fortune equal to your birth, why may you not aspire to the affection of that Princess? Because, saies he, there is a fantastick humor in the world, that will hardly let people remember the high births of such as are fallen into poverty; nay, that ever reflects on their former poverty, even when they are become rich. This may hold, replied I, in such as enrich themselves otherwise than by the favour of their Sovereign, not in those that are Favorites to some great Prince. For, in a word, favour covers whatever is not advantageous to those that are in it, with oblivion. No, no, replied Themistus, forbear these fruitless flatteries; Lindamira will never love me, or I must expect no more from her than what a bare friendship amounts to. Nay, I am in some doubt, whether my love to her may not procure me her aversion. That seldom happens, replied I, and I cannot imagine your fortune will prove so fantastick, Come what will, replies Themistus, I will love her eternally, and I will do so many things to preserve the Prince's favour, that I shall haply play my Cards so well, that I may be the greatest man in the Court.

Nor was he less than his word, for Perianthus being returned, he was absolutely looked on as his Favourite. He bestowed on him the most considerable employment in the State, he enriched him, and lodged him in the Palace; nay, all the favours of the Prince passed through his hands. However, Themistus was so good a Steward of his favour, that envy it self had a respect for his virtue; he did all the good he could, he was a Protector of the unfortunate, he was liberal, his conversation with his antient friends was such, as before he came into favour; he was an eager assertor of his Master's authority, he was not wedded to any interest, and it was evident in all his actions, that he loved the Prince and the State. But none knew of his being in love, but Lindamira, Mericia, and my self.

In the mean time, at Perianthus's return, all was full of divertisements, besides that, the Prince of Messena being a gallant and our proper person, his presence added something to the gallantry of the Court. Nay, he fell so strangely in love with Lindamira, that all the world soon after perceived his passion. But among the rest, Themistus was one of those that first discovered it, and was so much troubled at it, as if some great misfortune had happened to him. 'Tis certainly a thing not easily digestible by a Lover, that dares not mention his love, nor give the least expression thereof, to see a Rival that discovers all his, yet so, as he is not to be called to account for it. Yet did Themistus make his advantage of this adventure; for Lindamira observing him very narrowly, soon perceived the disturbance and melancholly, which the Prince of Messena's love caused in him. She spoke of it to Mericia, who had also taken notice thereof. Yet were there not any but these two persons and my self, that observed it; for, as to the Prince of Messena, he was so far from suspecting Themistus to be his Rival, that he did all that lay in his power, to court him, to be one of his intimate friends. But as Themistus found much ado to suffer it, and that the Prince of Messena came at last to perceive, that he avoided his company as much as he could with civility, he endeavoured to find out the reason of it. So that he imagined, it proceeded from his two frequent discourses of Love and Gallantry. For seeing him not particularly engaged to any Beauty, he drew that consequence, and was wont by way of raillery, to call Themistus sometimes the indifferent, sometimes the insensible Courtier, and that became so general, that Themistus was sometimes forced to answer to these two names, which he so little deserved. Demarata on the other side was somewhat satisfied, to think that Themistus was not in love at all; and Lindamira was not displeased to find that his passion was kept very secret; for that having a very particular friendship for him, she would have been troubled to be forced to forbid him coming to her. In the mean time he did not any action, nor scattered the least word, whence Themistus might raise ever so little hopes he might ever give her heart the least assault; nay, not so much as that he might oblige her to admit his passion, though without making any return.

'Twas upon such an occasion, that she had a very long discourse with him one day; for it happening that Themistus was alone with her walking, and that they leant over a rail that looked upon the Sea, she saw him so much taken up with his own thoughts, that forgetting at that time the love he had for her, she immediately asked him whether there were any discontent between him and the Prince. Alas, Madam, replied he sighing, were I as much in favour with the Princess of Hetruria, as I am with the Prince of Syracuse, I should not be so much troubled in my thoughts, or if I were, it would be so much to my satisfaction, that I should be nevertheless happy. I assure you, replies very courteously Lindamira, you have received greater expressions of friendship from me, than you could have from the Prince my Brother: for in my judgement, one cannot do those he loves a greater obligation, than to forget the injuries they have done him. Ah, Madam, replies Themistus, if it be an injury to adore you, and if my submissive passion be the affront you mean, you cannot do any thing more unjust or more cruel than to forget it. But alas, added he sighing, I daily and hourly perceive that you have not done me that kind of injustice, for you make it so much your business, to avoid even the meeting of our eyes; you so obstinately shun my company, and you take so great pleasure to persecute me, that I am in no doubt but you remember the love I have for you.

Themistus said these words with so much resentment, that the Princess, who had an infinite esteem, and withal a real friendship for him, resolved not to stand out so against that unfortunate Lover, to afford him some inward pitty, and to endeavor to recover him by reason. So that speaking to him with all the kindness that can proceed from friendship, you are, said she, so virtuous a man, that it would be the greatest trouble to me in the world, to prove the only cause of your unhappiness. Besides that, being obliged to you for my Brothers life, I think my self concern'd to be tender of yours. Nay, you are so considerable to the State, that the interest of my Countrey requires further, that I should not suffer you to run into an extravagance, which might make you unserviceable to the Prince, the State, and your friends. Give me leave then, Themistus, to discover my heart to you, and tell you, that though there were no disproportion between us, you should not entertain any love for me, because it is evident I cannot have ought beyond a friendship for you. Ah, Madam, cries out Themistus, is it not enough I know, that being of the quality you are of, you will not love me, but you must withal tell me, that though fortune had put no rub in my way to happiness, yet I could never be happy. I beseech you, Madam, be not so ingeniously cruel and give me leave to flatter my self into this poor consolation, as to think, that if you had been born in a cottage, I might presume to love you, and that it were not impossible I might gain your affection. Give me leave, I say, Madam, to attribute some part of my unhappiness to Fortune, and not all to your aversion. In matter of aversion, replies Lindamira, I have not any for Themistus, on the contrary, I ingeniously declare that I esteem you, and that I have a real, solid, and sincere friendship for you. But with this declaration I must also tell you, that I never have, or ever shall have any love for you. But Madam, replies Themistus, are you so particularly acquainted with what is to come? I am, replied she, for it is my perswasion, that when one is to entertain love, it is never ushered in by friendship. Besides, my Humor and my Reason, are two such faithful sentinels about my heart, that I do not fear they will ever betray it, either to your Merit or your Love, and it is out of that confidence, that I speak to you as I do, that is without indignation or severity. I therefore tell you once more, that I have a very great friendship for you; that I shall never love you otherwise, than according to that, and that you cannot put a greater obligation upon me, than by resolutely strugling with the passion now so predominant in your soul. If it be true, Madam, added he, that you cannot have ought beyond a friendship for the unfortunate Themistus, grant him one favour I beseech you. If it be a favour that may stand with friendship, replies Lindamira, I promise it you. Alas, Madam, said he, what I desire is so considerable, that you must be very unjust to denie it. For all my request at the present, to remit the torment I feel, is only to intreat you to make use of one word for another, though the sence be ever the same in your intention the very same. For instance, Madam, continued this afflicted Lover, it will be no small satisfaction to me, if, instead of saying you have a friendship for me, you would be pleased to make use of certain words, which, because they are sometimes employed to express sentiments that speak more tenderness, have, I know not what that is more satisfactory, more inviting, and more proper to keep up the spirits of an unfortunate man, than such as are particular to friendship: Your wits are at such a loss, replies Lindamira, that I pity you much more than I would do. For, in fine, what pleasure do you take in making your self unhappy, when all things seem to contribute to your felicity. Nature hath furnished you with all she could, that is, a high birth, and a proper person; you want neither gallantry nor understanding, and you have no reason at all to complain of her: Fortune for her part hath done all she could for you: your valour hath been fortunate, the State is obliged to you, your Master owes you his life, you are upon the establishment of the greatness of your House, and all the world loves you — you only excepted, Madam, interrupted he, — Nay, on the contrary, replied Lindamira, I have told you already that I am your friend, and that I will be ever so, provided you promise me, and that sincerely, you will do all that lies in your power, not to own any thing towards me but friendship. I shall do so, Madam, replied he, if you in like manner will do me the honor to promise, that, for your part, you will do what you can, not to have an affection for me, for it were a great presumption to say it, but only to be perswaded to entertain my passion, in case I cannot overcome it. 'Twere very pleasant indeed, replies Lindamira (who would not always speak in good earnest of Themistus's love) if it happened that when you should have subdued your passion, I, at the same time, were resolved to admit it. It were much better I should not resist my sentiments, and that you should only endeavour to reform yours.

Besides this, Themistus had abundance of other passionate discourse with Lindamira: but at last he promised her sincerely to do all he could, to subdue his passion, conditionally she would also do what lay in her power, to resolve to continue her friendship to him, in case he could not forbear loving her. For she had one day threatened to deprive him even of that, if instead of being her lover, he became not her friend. Since that, Themistus did really all he could to reform his sentiments; for there were so many things to perswade him, that Lindamira would never have any thing but a bare friendship for him, that he, in a manner, despair'd of ever exalting it into love. And yet, as the most unfortunate do most easily derive comfort from inconsiderable things, because they cannot hope for any greater consolations; Themistus was so sensible of those expressions of friendship he received from Lindamira, that there wanted not some intervals, wherein he was ready to entertain joy, though he was satisfied Lindamira had no love for him, and still wished that he had no more for her. Nay, when Lindamira freely spoke to him of any concernment of her own, he felt somewhat, that it is impossible to express; if he were indisposed, and that she sent to see how he did, he was extreamly satisfied; and that so far, that he never received any expression of esteem or friendship from her, but he was as glad of it, as another Lover would have been, of what they call signal favours. Not but that assoon as he was out of Lindamira's sight, he

he was troubled at the same things whereat he had rejoyced before, out of the very consideration that Lindamira had only a friendship for him. But after all, when he found her kind and obliging, he suspended his grief, and love ensnaring his reason, made him forget that Lindamira had only a friendship for him, and find unconceivable pleasures in the least kindnesses he received from her.

In the mean time, from the first day they treated together, Lindamira asked him ever and anon, what progress he had made towards friendship, and Themistus asked her on the other side, what progress she had made towards Love, and yet Lindamira had still the cruelty to tell him very often, and very seriously, that he should take heed he were not deceived by appearances, and not look on those kindnesses she had for him, as proceeding from any thing but friendship. And indeed, Themistus was so far satisfied, that Lindamira had nothing else for him in her heart, that she knew it not better her self.

While things stood thus, the Prince of Messena, addressed himself openly to this Princess, who having neither inclination nor aversion for him, treated him with a civility suitable to a person of his quality and merit. For Demarata, her soul was still persecuted with the same secret passion, which added to the aversion she had for Periander. So that she was forced eternally to stifle two sentiments the hardest in the world to be dissembled. Yet did she in time overcome them, for it was believed about the Court, that she did not treat Themistus well, but out of a meer reflection that he was the Princes favorite; and the Prince, who sometimes discovered some light indifference in her, imagined it was to put a sharper edge on the love he had for her. Themistus on the other side, minding only his ambition, as what should further his love, neglected nothing that contributed ought to the aggrandization of his fortune, so that being at the same time to obey both a Master and a Mistress, he wanted no employment.

Things being in this posture, it happened that Lindamira being a little indisposed, Demarata came to give her a visit, and met there the Prince of Messena, Meriander, and Themistus. For the Ladies that came in, I shall not name them, for it were to no purpose, because the entertainment I am to give you an account of, passed principally between the fair Melisera, Meriander, and Themistus, having been begun by Demarata after the manner you shall hear. This Princess being come into Lindamira's Chamber, told her in a flattering way, as having naturally no great affection for her, that it was not possible she could be sick, and that she had too fair a complexion, and too much sprightliness in her eyes, to denote any want of sleep. Lindamira answerd this flattery with another; whereupon every one being seated, they began to abuse Meriander, for talking something more than ordinary with a handsome Court Lady, that had gotten such a reputation of being incapable of love, that she never ran the hazard of the least suspition of being guilty of any. So that Lindamira seeing they fell so foul upon Meriander, told him very freely, that he must expect to find it a very difficult enterprise if it were true, that he was in love with that person. For my part says the fair Melisera, I do not think Meriander is in love, with her you speak of, or if he be, it is come to no great height. For I find him so sensible of the trivial expressions of friendship that he receives from her, that I cannot believe he would value them so much if he were in love. But do you consider well what you say, replyes Demarata, when you speak in that manner? I do Madam; replies Melisera; and if you will but take the pains carefully to examine what I say, you will find that I have reason to imagine that a Lover cannot receive with so much satisfaction simple expressions of friendship. For my part, says Meriander, I must confess I am not in love with her you hit me in the teeth with, but if I were, I believe I should entertain the expressions of her friendship with much more joy than I do; for it is the property of love to make the sentiments more lively, and to multiply the value of things that come from the person beloved. This doubtless is the judgment of all the World, (added Themistus, who was too much concerned in this question not to say somthing thereto) and whoever hath a sensible heart, will never speak as the fair Melisera does. On the contrary, replyed she, whoever will take the pains to sift more narrowly things of this nature, shall easily conceive what I say. For my part, says the Princess Lindamira, I must confess my thoughts are so distracted between these two opinions, that I do not well perceive the difference there is between them, so as to give you my judgment of them.

And yet I affirm, says Melisera, that a man that is servant to a woman, in whom he finds nothing but a bare friendship for him, whence he may infer he will never be otherwise loved by her, can never have any real joy when he receives any expression of that friendship and that if he hath, it is an infallible argument of the indifference of his passion. And for my part, replyes angerly Themistus, I maintain that the greatest and most unquestionable mark of a great passion is to see a Lover, that notwithstanding all his sufferings, receives with joy the least expression of friendship that his Mistress can give him. What Themistus says, is so rational, replyes Meriander, that I think the fair Melisera, with all her wit, will find her self at a loss to maintain her opinion. For what concerns me, said she, I find no such difficulty in it: you will then so much more oblige the company, replies Demarata, to instruct us in a business which is very particular, and which haply hath not been yet well understood. Yet is the understanding of it not very hard, replyes Melisera, for if you reflect on the manner wherein love is spoken of, methinks I very well conceive what it is, so as to comprehend that the more one loves, the more one desires to be loved; that the highest degree of a Lovers felicity, is the love of his Mistress; and his greatest misfortune, the assurance that he can never make her heart sensible of the same passion that possesses his.

I farther conceive, that the desire to be loved is the source of all other desires, if I may so express it, and that that desire never forsakes him, but fills his heart with perpetual disturbance, which increases and becomes insupportable, when ever his Mistress does any thing that gives him occasion to believe he shall never be loved, in the manner he would be lov'd. I grant what you say, replyes Themistus, and affirm with you, that the desire of being being loved, grows proportionably to the love, and cannot dye but with it, even though a lover should love without hope: for it often happens, that love which scorns and slights reason, maks a man desire things impossible. But since you agree to what I say, replyes Melisera, acknowledge withall that I have reason to speak as I do. For is there not, added she, some reason to think that a lover does not love over-earnestly, when he entertains with joy, simple expressions of friendship, which he should receive with dissatisfaction if his love were violent, there being no disposition that stands at such a distance from love, as friendship; and there's an easier passage from indifference to love, than from friendship to passion. So that when a lover that hath a tender and delicate soul, receives an expression of friendship from his Mistris, and that with a consideration that that friendship will grow up into love, he should be extreamly troubled at it, extreamly disturbed, and account himself most unhappy and uncapable of the joy I speak of, or it may be inferred, that that lover desires nothing farther. For in my judgment, there is but the hope, or the fruition of what a man desires, that either might, or can afford him any joy. And for my own particular, I think if I were a lover, and that my Mistris to requite my love, should afford me only some bare expressions of friendship. I should be extreamly troubled, nay, much more than if I were to endure her severity, cruelty, indignation, unkindness, and inconstancy.

Were you but well acquainted and well read in love, replyes Themistus, you will soon find him to be an humorsome capricious thing, that is sometimes appeased with a trifle, and even at the same time it covets all things, is satisfied in a manner with nothing; and were it my business to give an infallible mark whereby to know a great passion, I should say it is when a Lover in spight of his reason, notwithstanding the impetuosity of his desires, and the violence of his passion, feels his affliction becalmed by the bare sight of the person he loves. Whence you may judge what that Lover should feel, who sees in the fair eye of the person he adores certain kindness, passion, and goodness for him. If he there find, that passion, mildness, and goodness, together with a hope that affection may change its nature, replyed Melisera, I very well conceive that lover may entertain joy; but I presuppose he hath not that hope, and that he never can have it. Ah! Madam, cryes out Meriander, you presuppose a thing absolutely impossible. For though a Lover should affect a person that had an extream aversion for him, and had haply a reason to abhor him upon some interest of family, he must hope whether he would or no, because hope increases with love, and dies not but with it. For my part, replyes coldly Themistus, I believe it possible to love without hope of ever being favored. I grant it, added, Meriander, but not without a hope of being loved. Nay, I am perswaded that hope hides it self from him that hath it, and that there are certain lovers that hope, though they think not so much. For when all's done, it is impossible to love without desires and without hope. So that as probability is here not inconsistent with impossibility, how could you have a poor Lover, who discovers in the eyes of his Mistress, a certain kindness and tenderness for him; not hope that that affection may change its nature; nay sometimes imagine, that though his Mistress know it not, she hath something beyond friendship for him. For it is so natural to love, when it is great, to flatter and deceive those that have it, that I think it impossible a lover should receive expressions of friendship without pleasure. For my part says Melisera, I thought fear as great an argument of love, as hope. It is so, replyes Themistus, but their objects are different; for hope is sometime the issue of an excess of love, amidst the greatest occasions of despair; and fear on the contrary, through the same excess of love, seises a Lovers heart, notwithstanding all the assurances a Mistris can give him. So that to return to the present business, it is easie to comprehend that a Lover cannot give a greater demonstration of his love, then when, notwithstanding the affliction it is to him, that he cannot be loved as he would, he must needs express his resentment of the kindnesses of his Mistress. Not but that those kindnesses are insupportable to him, when she is once out of his sight, but I think it so far impossible, when one loves passionately, to see a Mistress without pleasure, especially when she is kind, that I could defie all the lovers in the world, to maintain they have no pleasure when they receive an expression of friendship.

But to make it yet more clear, that a Lover, who is capable of that joy which the fair Melisera, attributes to the indifference of his affection, loves more eagerly than another that were insensible of the expressions of friendship he should receive; We are to consider love in its own nature, and grant, that the most perfect love is that which is most passionate and most permanent, and that the Lover, who desiring much, is yet capable of loving eternally, though he obtains in a manner nothing of what he desires, is much more accomplished than he, that through the impatience of his constitution, rather than any excess of passion, says alwayes he will either have all or none, and who is over ready to break his chains, if he be not over burthened with favors, that scorns those trivial things, which ballance the great afflictions of those who know how to love and enable them to prosecute their loves without being happy.

I could never have believed, says the Prince of Messina, that an insensible man could have discoursed of love so well. There is certainly abundance of wit in what he says, replyes Melisera, but it is easily perceived that he does not speak out of any experience, since he is perswaded that a man may be guilty of a great deal of love, and be satisfied with a simple expression of friendship. I beseech you Madam, replyes Themistus with a little precipitation, alter not the sense of my words, for I do not say, that a Lover is satisfied, when he receives only expressions of friendship, but only, that he cannot forbear, be he never so unhappy, feeling a certain ease, nay, a joy at the instant that he receives that demonstration of friendship: and I hold that a man must be insensible, if he can receive any kindness from his Mistris without pleasure. And I hold, on the contrary, replyes Melisera, that a very lukewarm lover, that entertains a kindness of that nature without affliction; since that in my opinion, there is not any thing one should be more troubled at, when you receive that you desire not, and are ever denyed that which you do. It is very evident, Madam, replyes Themistus, that you care for no more than only to raise love, without receiving any, nay that you have not permitted any one of your Lovers to entertain you with the sentiments you have put into their hearts: for if any had had that priviledge, you would have found, as I have already told you, that Love is sometimes content with so little, that it may be said he is content with any thing. 'Tis out of all question, added Meriander, that a Lover desires the fruition of his Mistriss, and yet it is an inexpressible joy to him, if he can get but her picture, even though it were taken by stealth. Will any one say that this joy is an argument of the indifferency of his affection? Why therefore will you not allow an unfortunate lover to look on the friendship his Mistriss hath for him, as an imperfect draught of the love he desires from her? To be short, add but one degree of heat to tender friendship, and you will raise it up to a love: so that I hold the picture of a person that one loves, when it is not bestowed by her, ought not to cause so much joy as the friendship of a person that one adores; for you may have that Picture without any part of her heart whom it represents, but for friendship, a lover looks on it as a greater favor than it is, if he be deeply in love. He is at least confident that he is esteemed, and that he is loved, which hath ever something of satisfaction in it. Not but I acknowledge, that the greatest friendship in the world cannot afford a pleasure and satisfaction equal to that which proceeds from the most inconsiderable expression of love, that can be imagined. But after all, whoever loves well, cannot but be infinitely sensible of whatever comes from the person he adores, and which seems not to be the effects of hatred and aversion. Nor indeed does the greatness of love ever discover it self better than when a man hath some happy intervals in the midst of his torments, and other unhappy ones even at that time when he lies in the fairest way to happiness. For it is the property of love so to order things, that lovers should never be without pleasure, nor ever without affliction.

Of a person that is insensible, says the Prince of Messena, once more, you speak so well of this passion, that it is impossible you should have been so always. Themistus hearing what his Rival said, pretended he had not heard him, as being not able to affirm before the Princess of Himera, that he was free from love; and unwilling on the other side to acknowledge it, for fear of displeasing her, and prejudicing himself. For Demarata, the secret passion she had within prevailing upon her, she imagined that Themistus was certainly in love, and that she was haply the object of that passion, for he was not engaged to any Lady in the Court, and constantly visited none but the Princess of Himera and her self; so that inferring from the discourse that had passed, that Themistus could not be in love with Lindamira, because she perceived he was sensible of those expressions of esteem he received from her, she was very glad of it, not but that the opinion of Meriander and Themistus was the more maintainable: but being not consonant to her desires, she thought fitter to follow the sentiments of Melissa, though she at first opposed them. She went away therefore from Lindamira's very well satisfied: but with Themistus, it was otherwise, for not being able to forbear the discoveries of his joy, when Lindamira honored him with any marks of the friendship she had for him, he was afraid he had not sufficiently persuaded her, and that she should imagine his love was too light. And this certainly was without some reason, for the Princess of Himera, made an hundred reflections upon that meeting, speaking of it the same evening to my Sister.

She at first told her, she was glad, it was part of her persuasion, that, according to what Melissa, had said, Themistus was not so much in love, as he pretended. But Madam, replyed Mericia, I conceive the tenant of Meriander and Themistus to be more probable than that of the fair Melissa's, whose main business certainly was to shew the greatness of her wit. Though it were so, replyed Lindamira you would have obliged me not to have said it, for at the present, I should be very glad Themistus loved me not. For in fine, added she, Meriander hath so well proved that love cannot be without hope, that I am in a manner fully satisfied that Themistus flatters himself, and imagines I shall one day love him. Believe me Madam, replyes Mericia smiling, I think it would not be amiss, if you did imagine it as well as he, for to be free with you, I think that when a woman hath a very tender friendship for a highly virtuous man, struggling with a very violent passion, which destroys not her friendship whom he loves, it is easily inferred that in process of time, that friendship will become a little more passionate. Ah, Mericia replyes Lindamira did you speak seriously, I should have a strange quarrel to you. I never spoke more carelessly, Madam, replyed she, and time will haply convince you, that what I say, is true. If that misfortune ever happen to me, replyed the Princess, 'tis more than you shall ever know, or Themistus either. It may be we shall know it before you, answered Mericia laughing, for if we measure things by your humor, you must be even extravagant in love, before you believe your self to be in any at all; but in a word, Madam, the sentiments that a virtuous love inspires, are so much like those that proceed from a tender friendship, that when one will be deceived, it is easie to be so. But Mericia, replyed she, I will not be deceived, you do not believe it, replyes my Sister, yet it happens otherwise.

Lindamira made no reply, and Mericia leaving her to her own thoughts, began seriously to believe that the friendship she had in her soul, might at last be enflamed into a love. And indeed, from that day Lindamira carried her self otherwise towards Themistus, she was distrustful of her self, and to her own sorrow, she thought that Themistus loved her not so much as he pretended. But what troubled her most of all, was that, whether she would or no, she took it not well that Themistus should love her less than she had thought. And yet she concealed her sentiments from him with abundance of care, and gave him no other answer for a long time, but that she had not, nor could not have any love for him. Themistus on the other side ever told her that he was, and ever would be, the most amorous of men. But she, instead of telling him, as she had done before, that she was sorry he should be so, and that she intreated him to endeavor the conquest of his sentiments, would now tell him, that he loved her not so well as he conceived, and that that certainly he knew not what transactions passed in his own heart. But she at the same time avoided him, was so melancholly, and treated him so ill for some days, that Themistus was like to dye of meer grief. At last he fell into such a deep melancholly, and grew so sick, that the ablest Physitians were doubtful of his recovery.

The Prince, who had an extraordinary tenderness for him, was excessively troubled to see him in that condition; Demarata conceiving that the secret passion he had for her, had brought him to that extremity, groan'd under an affliction that had discovered her secret thoughts, had she not been a great Mistriss in the Art of dissimulation; and Lindamira being then fully satisfied that she was the cause of the danger Themistus was in, was so sensibly moved thereat, that she was forced to keep her chamber, and to pretend her self indisposed, so to conceal her grief; for I had forgot to tell you, that the day immediately before that wherein Themistus fell so very ill, Lindamira had said some things to him, which he resented so deeply, that he her self was sorry for it a quarter of an hour after he had left her. So that looking on her self as in a manner the murtheress of the most virtuous man about the Court, and one for whom she had so tender a friendship, one whom the Prince and the State were so much obliged to; nay one to whom she her self was, whether she considered him as her servant, or as her friend, she accused her self, though she knew not precisely what she charged her self withal.

In the mean time Periambus visited Themistus every day; the Prince of Messena did the like, nay, Demarata came to see him, and was so troubled at the sad condition she found him in, that she had almost been overcome by the violence of her affliction; after she had opposed her passion so long, and given some assurance of her love to Themistus, whom she thought reduc'd to that condition, meerly because he durst not acquaint her with his affection, as well out of the respect he bore her, and the faith he would observe to the Prince his Master. So that Demarata was almost tempted to tell him, that he was much more happy than he thought himself, but at last she was content only to give him thousands of expressions of esteem and friendship, by the grief she discoverd, both in her eyes and words. The sick Lover seeing himself bemoaned and visited by all, and not seeing the Princess Lindamira, knew not what to think of her carriage towards him. She indeed sent to see how he did, but since Demarata had been to visit him, he thought she might very well have born her company. So that being unwilling to dye till he knew what Lindamira thought of his death, he did himself an extream violence to write three or four lines, which he trusted to my conveyance. He made me seal the Letter which I was to carry to Lindamira, whom I found alone. She blushed when I told her that Themistus had written it to her, whereupon opening the Letter hastily, yet with a certain fear, she found therein these words.

I Have not been able to obey your command, that I should not love you any longer, but I shall do it if you command me to die. Be pleased then, Madam, to lay your commands upon me, that I may have some satisfaction when I dye, and deny not this fatal favor to the most wretched, yet the most amorous of men.

Lindamira read it twice over, but not without tears in her eyes. Yet did she what lay in her power to hinder me from seeing them; and having recovered her self a little, she asked me whether it were true that Themistus was so ill as it was reported, and he pretended himself. Madam, said I, Themistus is so ill and weak, that if you will favor him with any answer, you must do it immediately. At these words, Lindamira going into her Closet, left me in her Chamber, and a few minutes after, brought me her answer; desiring me with the tears in her eyes, if Themistus at my return were not in a condition to read it, to restore her the Letter, without ever making the least mention thereof to any one. I promised to do what she desired, and so returned to my sick friend, to whom I delivered Lindamira's Letter, and whose spirits I very much rais'd, when I told him she had read his with tears in her eyes. He thereupon opened the Princesse's, and set himself to read it, though with much trouble, because of the extraordinary weakness he was in. But love multiplying his strength, he at last made a shift to read these words.

I Ive Themistus, live, and if there needs no more to oblige you thereto, than to promise you that I will not forbid you to love me. I shall resolve to do so, to save that Man's life, who of all the world is the deareſt to me.

Themistus was so over-joyed at this Letter, that a kind of Lethargy which accompanied the fever he was in, and that seemed an inevitable symptom of death to the Physitians, began to be dispersed, and as if his sickness had proceeded from enchantment, he recovered in an instant, insomuch, that those who had him under cure, being come to see him that night, were in some hope of his amendment. So that sending this news immediately to the Prince, Demarata, who had visited Themistus that morning, and had said so many kind things to him, thought that her visit had cur'd him, and thereupon loved him much more passionately than ever she had done before. For Lindamira, she had reason to believe that she had restored Themistus to life; but she almost repented her of it, when she came to consider the consequences which what she had done might have. But after all, having a greater love for him than she thought to have had, she kindly received another Letter that Themistus writ, the next day when he was a little recover'd. It was but short and to this effect.

THEMISTUS to the Princess LINDAMIRA.

I Shall live, Madam, since it is your pleasure I should, but I beseech you, let it never out of your memory what you have promised me, unless you would have me to loose the life which you have preserved, and which I value not but out of a consideration that you have bestowed it on me to adore you eternally.

What was most remarkable, Madam, was, that when Themistus was fully recovered, Lindamira would not be perswaded to see him. Upon that account was it that she went into the Countrey for fifteen days, nor could she be brought to speak to him till the very minute of her departure. But not able to avoid him at her return, Themistus saw her at her own Palace, and that alone. I shall not give you a punctual account of the entertainment happened between them; for I have so many things of greater consequence to acquaint you withall, that I shall pass by that. But at last, Themistus spoke so passionately to Lindamira, that that fair Princess, whose heart is naturally very tender, and who had been enraged in love through friendship, confirmed the permission she had given him, and so did as good as encourage him to believe, that the tenderness she had for him, amounted to something beyond ordinary friendship: but she withall, laid her absolute commands upon him, never to require any other demonstrations of it than simple assurances, and not by any means pretend to ought but the glory to know that she preferred him before all men in the world. Themistus, who was much more happy than he expected to be, promised to do all she desired, and was so well satisfied with the change of his fortune, that he soon recovered his perfect health.

Demarata in the mean time, was more and more perswaded that she had prov'd the Doctress, and restored him to it; for he growing a little better the very day she came to visit him, told her, at the first visit he made her, by way of complement, that he came to make his acknowledgments for that the honors she had done him, had saved his life. So that taking this positively as he said it, she was afraid she had told him too much, for she had as yet some remainders of modesty in her, and her love was not grown too strong for her reason. However she behaved her self with so much discretion, that Themistus did not so much as imagine what she had within her, so that the satisfaction it was to him to be in good terms with Lindamira, was not clouded with any thing but the love of the Prince of Messena, as also by the small likelihood there was he could ever be absolutely happy. For this Princess scattered not so much as a word, whence he might gather the least hope that she would ever be perswaded to marry him; so that knowing her virtue, and the disposition of her soul, his happiness was still in some hazard.

But this hindred him not from believing himself the most fortunate lover in the world, because he valued the least favor he received from Lindamira, beyond all the kindnesses that others could receive. 'Twas then he understood the difference there is between the greatest expressions of friendship, and the most inconsiderable assurances of love; for though he had sometime been satisfied, when Lindamira had put a thousand obligations upon him, which convinced him that she had a friendship for him, it signified nothing in comparison of what he felt when he but met with Lindamira's eyes, and saw in them certain languishing glances, that assur'd him she approved his flames, and desired the continuance of them. The Prince of Messena was still in love, and his addresses were equally troublesome to the Princess Lindamira and Themistus, who to get him off handsomely, made the Prince of Syracuse, press the execution of the treaty of Peace, that the young Prince, who lay there as a Hostage, might be obliged to return home.

On the contrary, the old Prince of Messena, while his Son was at Syracuse, endeavored nothing so much as to find out delays, for having concluded the peace meerly out of necessity, he spent that time meerly to find out occasion to renew the war. And indeed, thinking he had found them, he sent a secret Messenger to the Prince his Son, to advise him to leave Syracuse, writing to him (though there were no such thing) that he knew he was to be secured there. This young Prince, who knew that the policy of the Prince his Father, proceeded rather from a Fox-like craft than any true prudence, credited not what was said to him; besides that, bearing a noble mind, he would rather expose himself to be secured by injustice, than to be suspected by a breach of his parole, to endeavor an escape. Besides that, being infinitely in love with Lindamira, he thought nothing more horrid than to get away from her, by doing a base action which might occasion a war between him and the Prince her Brother. He therefore never disputed the business, and taking advantage of this occasion to discover his passion, he came to Lindamira, he shewed her the Letter from the Prince his Father, he assured her he would not obey it, and that he had rather be a slave at Syracuse, than free at Messena. Being a Gentleman of very handsome parts, he said this in an extream obliging way, so that Lindamira not interpreting what he had said, to have any relation to his love, as a thing that had any real being, answered him only as to the generosity that appeared in his proceedings; assuring him that the Prince her Brother had no design to secure him; and that she should not fail to give him an account of his generous carriage towards him. Upon which Perianthus being come into the room, attended by Themistus, Lindamira, not hearkning to the entreaty of the Prince of Messena, which was that she should not say any thing of what he had acquainted her with, briefly told the Prince her Brother, what that Prince had discovered to her, adding that he had made choice of her to give him notice of it. Themistus was at first troubled a little to see Lindamira acquainting Perianthus so hastily, with so geneſtrous an action of his Rival; but coming to conſider that it might prove an occaſion of renewing the War, he found it was more to his advantage than he thought, and was more prejudicial to his Rival, than haply he imagin'd: So that his thoughts being abſolutely becalm'd, he commended the Prince of Meſſena's action, to whom he ſpoke with abundance of generoſity. Whereupon Periandus, to convince him that he had not the leaſt intention to ſecure him, aſſur'd him he would take no advantage of this diſcovery; for, ſaid he to him, there's nothing ſo clear, as that the Prince your Father endeavours to renew the War. And yet I now declare, that if he break the Treaty, I will ſet you at liberty to go and maintain his injuſtice. To theſe words the Prince of Meſſena made anſwer, That if the Prince his Father were ſo unworthy as to break the Articles, he would remain at Syracuſe as a priſoner of War.

Upon that Themiſtus came into the diſcourſe, which was concluded with proteſtations of friendſhip between Periandus and the Prince of Meſſena, who made anſwer to the Prince his Father, that he was miſ-inform'd, if he thought the Prince of Syracuſe had any deſign to ſecure him. That conſequently, ſince there was no ſuch thing, he intreated him not to take it ill that he ſtayed at Syracuſe till the Articles of Peace were fully put in execution. So that this old Politician, ſeeing he could not get away his Son, carried himſelf more circumſpectly, and ſeeking out pretences apparent enough to delay the execution he had promis'd, he ordered the War to be begun by the Prince of Heraclea, with whom he held a ſecret intelligence, that had not been diſcovered at the Court of Syracuſe. So that it was no ſmall ſurpriſal, to hear that the Prince of Heraclea had made an irruption into the frontiers of this State.

Themiſtus, making all things contribute to his love and ambition, preſently look'd on it as his work, to put a glorious period to this War alſo; and though it were a great affliction to him to be far from Lindamira, and to leave his Rival near her; yet as things ſtood, it was not to be diſputed, whether it ſhould be ſo or no; that he muſt of neceſſity command the Army in perſon, and that Fame would ſpeak much more advantageouſly of him to Lindamira, than the Prince of Meſſena could for himſelf. He therefore iſſu'd out all neceſſary orders by the Authority of Periandus, and having gotten together ſome of thoſe Troops that had ſerv'd in the War of Meſſena, he prepar'd for his departure. His Army was not very conſiderable, becauſe he thought it no prudence to weaken the Frontiers towards Meſſena; So that Demarata, and Lindamira had each of them their particular fears, that Themiſtus would not haply be ſo victorious in this ſecond War, as he had been in the firſt. Nay, the Prince himſelf was in ſome doubt that the ſucceſs of this enterprize would not prove fortunate, and there was only Themiſtus himſelf, who was as confident of Victory now as he had been before.

Accordingly, when he came to take his leave of Lindamira, and that he perceiv'd ſhe was in ſome fear this expedition might prove unfortunate to him; No, no, Madam, ſaid he to her, fear not for Themiſtus, for ſince he was able to overcome the enemies of his Prince, when he was in a manner indifferent to you, he cannot now be overcome himſelf, that he is in ſome hope of your addreſſes to Heaven for him. But, Madam, while I ſhall be employ'd to defeat the enemies of the State, be not you ſurpriz'd by the love of my Rival, for if I am once forc'd out of your heart, I am conquerable every where. Were it the pleaſure of the gods, replied Lindamira, that my fears were as groundleſs as yours, and that I were as confident to ſee you return a Conqueror, as you ought to be, that no man ſhall diſplace you out of my heart. Themiſtus hearing theſe obliging words from the mouth of his Princeſs, return'd her whatever the tendereſt love can do, that is moſt reſpectful, and moſt paſſionate, ſo that this adieu was infinitely full of paſſion. And indeed it happened in a place fit to ſpeak obliging things in. For Demarata and Lindamira, being gone to the Rendezvous of the Troops with Periandus, lodg'd that night at a fair Houſe of Meriander's, within eight miles of Syracuſe. So that it was in one of the Walks of that pleaſant Wilderneſs, that Themiſtus took his laſt leave of that excellent Princeſs.

For Demarata, in regard ſhe had a great influence over Periandus, Themiſtus, to lay yet greater obligations on her, entertain'd her with abundance of affection and reſpect as he took leave of her; ſo that the Princeſs, confirm'd in the opinion ſhe was of, that he lov'd her, though he durſt not diſcover it, felt the paſſion ſhe had for him doubled, out of the conſideration of the hazards he whom ſhe lov'd was to be expoſed to: but at laſt Themiſtus departed, and went to find out his enemies. After his departure, the Princeſs of Himera, deſirous to avoid the Prince of Meſſena's entertainments, and to conceal part of the affliction ſhe was in, by reaſon of Themiſtus's abſence, went very often into the Countrey: but in regard ſhe could not go to any of her own houſes, becauſe they lay on that quarter where the ſeat of the War was, ſhe was forc'd to borrow one of Meriander's, which he, being a generous, obliging, and gallant ſoul, furniſh'd her with, and that with ſuch ſatisfaction, that he caus'd an Arbor that lay in one corner of his Garden, then not wholly painted, to be finiſh'd for the greater diverſion of her ſolitary entertainments. And indeed Lindamira, was much more pleas'd with that place than any other, repairing thither often without any other company, than that of her Women, and my Siſter, whom ſhe made the Privy Counſellor to all her ſecrets.

But to ſhorten this relation as much as may be, it was no ſooner heard that Themiſtus was upon the Frontiers, but news was brought that he had routed the enemy, and forc'd them to flie into their Countrey. This firſt advantage gained by this fortunate Lover, filled all hearts with hope, and that of Lindamira's with joy, who received withal a Letter from Themiſtus. But Madam, I had forgot to tell you, that they had agreed before hand to write under a feigned name, that Themiſtus was to go under that of Daphnis, and Lindamira under that of Iris, that if the Letters ſhould miſcarry, it might not be diſcovered whom they were directed to. It was alſo reſolved between them, that there ſhould be nothing in thoſe Letters, whence might be inferred the inequality of their conditions: So that Themiſtus being at liberty to write as paſſionately as he pleaſed himſelf, writ to his Princeſs in theſe terms,

DAPHNIS to IRIS.

GIve me leave, most fair and accomplished Iris, to give you thanks for the advantage I have gained, for I am not obliged for it so much to Fortune, as to the desire I have had to please you. Be you therefore pleased to accept the honour of my Victory, and assure your self, I shall do all that lies in my power, to conquer with the greater expedition, that I may come and ask you whether you have defended your heart against my Rivals, as well as I have done the frontiers of this State, against the enemies of my Prince. Farewel incomparable Iris, bestow now and then a thought on the unfortunate Daphnis, if I may so call a man, for whom you have sent those addresses and vows to Heaven, that have gained him an advantage he durst never hope from his own courage.

Lindamira, having received this Letter by a faithful Slave, who delivered it my Sister, and who knew not it was directed to the Princess, answered by the same way, as you shall hear.

IRIS to DAPHNIS.

YOu do not certainly owe your Victory to any thing but your own courage; but my dear Daphnis, you are in my debt something, you ought to be infinitely more sensible of, since you owe me thousands of fears, thousands of afflictions, thousands of disturbances, that your absence, and the hazard you are in, put me into. Hasten therefore your Conquest, but I would not have you to purchase Victory with too much danger to your life, which is dearer to me than my own.

You may judge what pleasant entertainment a correspondence so full of affection, afforded the persons between whom it was, and what great satisfaction Demarata conceived at the Victory gained by Themistus, one she so passionately loved, and who she thought had a secret affection for her. For Periander his joy was extraordinary, to see that the designs of his enemies proved so abortive; nay, the Prince of Messena was glad of Themistus's good success, out of hope, that the Prince of Heraclea being worsted, his Father would at last be induced to execute the Treaty, and not renew the War So that the joy was universal, yet not so, but that it met with some affliction and disquiet in Lindamira: for Love, of all things, cannot brook absence, especially, when one knows well how to love. Accordingly, she was never better pleased than when she was alone, or had only Mericia with her, with whom he might discourse of Themistus.

And as this Princess is indeed a great Wit, so does she sometimes write Verses, such as Themistus (who, for a person of his quality, is excellent good at it) might not blush to own. So that it being impossible to be in love, and to be able to write Verses, and not to do it. Lindamira and Mericia made it sometimes their employment to do something of that nature, when they were at Meriander's fair house in the Countrey. Nay, it is imagin'd that he had from this Princess certain verses, which he hath set up in an Arbor, whereof I shall have something to tell you. In the mean time I will give you a great demonstration of my Sisters Fidelity. You are then to know, that when the Princess writ any Verses, wherein there was any reflection on the love of Themistus, she caused Mericia to write them over, as being out of prudence, unwilling they should be seen under her own hand. Being therefore gone one day a walking together, in a Walk where she had sometimes seen Themistus; she in a quarter of an hour made three Couplets of a Song, to an Air which my Sister sung excellently well; so that she repeated them to her, purposely to oblige her to sing them. But since it is hard for one to sing well, that is not very perfect in the words, Mericia writ down the three Couplets the Princess had made, which though they are not highly witty, are yet worthy the recital, because there is something in them that is very passionate. They are these.

I Labour to resist in vain,
The woes that would my heart devour, Caus'd by the absence I sustain.
Who, Love, would think under thy power
we should endure such pain,
When we both love, and are belov'd again?

Perpetual fears my Soul invade,
To see the person I adore
Amidst a thousand hazards laid;
Who, Love, would think under thy power,
we should endure such pain,
When we both love, and are belov'd again?

I often fear, but am too blame,
(Unjust to's Love can I be more?) Another may his heart inflame;
Who, Love, would think under thy power,
we should endure such pain,
When we both love, and are belov'd again?

Mericia having written these three Couplets, sang them to the Princess, who in the mean time had her thoughts filled with all the satisfaction, that a person, who fears not to discover her most secret sentiments to a true friend, can have. My Sister by this means, got the Song so perfect, that the next day being returned to Syracuse, she sung it, not thinking of any thing, before the Prince of Messena, who asked her from whom she had it.

Mericia

Mericia remembring her self, blushed, and made no direct answer, so that the Prince wes still at her to know, and knowing, she was able to do any thing of that nature, told her that he was very happy, for whom she had made that Song. Mericia perceiving that the Prince of Messina's suspicion was far from the truth, suffered him to believe what he pleased, and craftily confirmed him in the jealousie he was in, chooling rather to be suspected of a thing that was not, than to give any occasion to suspect the Princess of Himera, of a thing that was: for considering the extraordinary friendship that Lindamira had for Mericia, as also that they came up out of the Countrey together, and that there were few Women at Syracuse that could write such a Song, it might at last have been thought to come from the Princess of Himera, if my Sister had not discreetly started the occasion of suspecting, that she had made those verses. Not that Lindamira does any way pretend to be a Wit, but it is nevertheless known that she can do what she hath a mind to. and so it might have been imagined, as I have already told her, that she had made that Song, if my Sister, who could not affirm she had it from her, had not suffered people to believe that she, for diversion sake, had written it her self. But what made the Princess Himera the more obliged to her, was, that the whole Court concluded these Couplets, were made for one in the Army, that was very deeply in love with Mericia. He wanted not friends to send them, insomuch, that he was so far perswaded they were directed to him, that he writ a very obliging Letter to my Sister, to know whether he ought to return her his thanks for such a Favour.

This adventure, no question, troubled Mericia very much, but such was the affection she had for Lindamira, that she willingly suffered for her sake. So that this endeared her so much the more to the Princess, who still preferring solitude before the Court, during the absence of Themistus, returned to Meriander's house, taking my Sister along with her. While she was there, news came that Themistus had given the enemy another overthrow, and that the Prince of Heraclea had desired a cessation of twenty daies, so that Lindamira looking on this cessation as a thing that would retard Themistus's return, if it produced not a Peace, was so melancholly, and cast down at it, that she could not endure any to be near her but Mericia. Nay, there were some intervals, wherein she would rather walk without her than with her, and wherein she went and sate in the pleasant Arbor which Meriander had caused to be made up a little before. One while she spent the time in thinking, another in reading Themistus's Letters, and sometimes desirous to stay some of her thoughts, she took her Table-book and writ something in it. Sometimes taking her Black-lead which she always carried about her, she would design something, or write some gallant, yet passionate expression upon the squares of White and Red Marble, that were in divers parts of the Closet, but dash'd out all immediately, if she did not forget to do it. When she had done, she gave my Sister an account of all she had either done or thought, as if she had been return'd after a long journey, though commonly she had not been an hour alone. For, Madam, I dare assure you, that there never was any affection so passionate. and withal so innocent, as what Lindamira had for Themistus, who yet loves beyond what he is lov'd, if it be allowable to make comparisons between two things that are extream.

This fortunate Favorite, in the mean time making his advantage of the cessation, and pretending out of policy to come and advise with the Prince about the Articles of the Peace, if any were made, left the Army to be commanded by his Lieutenant-General, and came for Syracuse. But understanding that Lindamira was at Meriander's house, he would needs surprise her with a visit. He left four men that came along with him, being all the retinue he had, at a little Village, and attended only by a Slave, he alighted at a house where Meriander's Gardner lived, that is a Cottage which lies without the Park, within which the house is. This fellow being simple and necessitous, it was the easier for Themistus to oblige him, by Presents, to do what he pleased. But he desired no more of him, than that, taking no notice of his being there, he would let him into the Garden where the Princess of Himera was wont to walk. The Sun was about an hour high, so that he might easily hide himself where he pleased in the Garden, so as to discover himself of a sudden to Lindamira, who was not yet stirring: For besides that, it was as yet early day for a Lady to get up, the Princess of Himera had walked so late by the Moon-light the night before, that she could not rise very betimes. However, the Gardner assured Themistus, that she would take a walk before dinner, and therefore saies the poor fellow, out of his natural simplicity, if you would see the Garden, do it before she comes, for she is no sooner dressed, but she comes and sits in an Arbor, where my Master hath caused abundance of things to be written on Marble, which are past my understanding. Themistus was extreamly taken with the simplicity of this Gardner, who knew him not, though he had been divers times before in the Garden, and the reason was, that he had only minded the Prince and the Princesses, with whom Themistus came, so that he bid him leave him to himself, and go to his work.

The Gardiner accordingly, who was very busie about a hedge of Myrtles, whereof there were abundance in the Garden, as also a many Orange-trees, left him, and went about his work. Themistus was no sooner come to the midst of the Garden, and saw the windows of the Chamber where his Princess lay yet asleep, but he felt a strange agitation in his heart. He was transported with joy, and, not able to master his own thoughts, he made a thousand contradictory wishes: for he would fain see her asleep, he would fain speak to her, and he would see in her eyes the demonstrations of love. But the Gardener having told him, that when the Princess of Himera had taken her walk, she commonly went, and rested her self in a magnificent Arbor, which I told you Meriander had caused to be finished since his departure thence, which is no question, very noble, and excellently well fancied, so as to deserve to be the treasury of Lindamira's thoughts.

For you are to know, that at the end of a spacious pav'd Walk, very pleasant to look on, lies this great quadrangular Arbor, whereof the Architecture is very exact, The roof of it is upheld by by sixteen Columnes of White Marble, whereof the Bases and Chapters are of Red Marble. There are four large bow-windows, breast- high, with Curtains within, which may be drawn of any side, to avoid either the Sun or the Wind? The door of it is made Grate-wise, and the Frizes on the out-side have a certain Imagery upon them, where may be seen divers little Loves, that make chains of Roses, and intangle one another in them, as pleasantly as may be. For the inside, the Frize, which is of Marble as without, hath divers inscriptions, that is, so many amorous Maxims put there by Meriander's order.

But though he be excellent good at a copy of Verses, yet is it much suspected that the Princess of Himera had made those that are in this Arbor, which hath all about it, very convenient and handsome seats. For the upper part of the roof, there is very ingeniously represented a Heaven, whence a many little Loves seem to shoot Arrows, to cast Flowers, or shew their Torches. But I had forgot to tell you, that on the top of the covering without,, there is a Figure of Cupid, the noblest in the World, who having loos'd his fillet, which seemed to be tossed by the Wind, looks, or seems to look towards the spacious paved Walk, as if he would not have any one to enter into that place, till he had wounded him. And to that end, having his Bow in his left hand, and an Arrow in the right, his intention may be perceived by his actions, and in his eies, where it is so admirably represented, that it is impossible any thing can be better; Themistus approaching this Arbor, perceives a large Oval reversed in the middle of the Frize, under the Cornish, and just above the Door, wherein these two Verses were engraven'd in Golden Letters.

Who Love's commanding Scepter does not fear,
Let him not enter here.

Themistus surprized at this Inscription, read it with much satisfaction, and saying to himself, that he had a priviledge to come into that Arbor, since that there needed only Love to give one entrance, opened the door, and went in hastily. He was no sooner in, but he finds over against him engraved upon the Frize, in an Oval-Emboss'd Work, these two other Verses.

'Tis vain for to resist Love's mighty sway,
Who does not love, a time will come he may.

Then Themistus turning to the right hand, finds these two other Verses.

When Lovers pleasures undisturb'd shall be,
The Spring shall neither Flowers, nor Zephyrs see

Then turning to the left he found these two.

A Lover and Content, must ne'r be friends,
But who loves not unhappiness attends.

Then at last, turning to the door, he finds over it the two Verses I am going to repeat to you.

While there is hope, be sure you do not yield,
For soon or late a Lover wins the field.

Themistus having given over reading these Inscriptions, was extreamly pleased with them, and had a secret satisfaction, to find that his Mistriss came so much to a place, where the very Marbles, if I may so express it, entertained her with Love, and where he thought she could not be without thinking on him. Nay, he thought she must needs be the Author of the Verses he was much taken with, and began to bethink him what he should say to her when she came into the Arbor, In the mean time being extreamly well pleased with those Love-Maxims, he learnt these eight Verses immediately by heart, and going to repeat them over, to see if he had them perfect, he looked another way downwards; but as he looked, he casually espied something written with black Lead on a white Marble Table, which I had forgot to tell you was in the midst of the Arbor. So that being desirous to see what it was, he came nearer, and knew it to be the writing of his Princess. Reading it over hastily, he found the eight Verses I shall repeat to you, which the Princess of Himera had made; and, having written them there, had forgot to dash them out.

Fair Grove, to thee alone I do impart
The secret sufferings of my wounded heart
Receive my amorous sighs, and let them out,
Be mix'd with winds, the waving Air to cut Preserve the sad expressions of my Love, Till Daphnis coming to your shades may prove,
By your assurances, I die here for grief,
While all your pleasures find me no relief.

You may easily imagine, Madam, what joy it was to Themistus, to find Verses so amorous written by the hand of his Princess, and which he could not doubt but were made for him, Nay indeed, he was so transported with joy, that the disturbance it raised in his thoughts, hindred him for some time, from reading them the second time. 'Tis true, he found it no hard matter to remember them, for they made so strong an impression in him, that he found he had them by heart when he went to read them again. He could have wished it possible to take those precious characters out of the Table on which they were drawn; yet durst he not so much as kiss them in the transport of his passion, for fear of blotting them, and he knew not in a manner what he did, such a pleasant agitation were his thoughts in.

But knowing the Princess to be a considerate and discreet person, he easily imagined that it must be her forgetfulness that those Verses, he was so much pleased with, were not dashed out, and he thought himself so much obliged to her for that act of oblivion, which he attributed to the greatness of her affection, that he would have thought himself happy to die a thousand times for her sake. Whereupon, the same sentiment of Love which made him afraid to blot out those Verses, put him also into a fear they should be seen by any other than himself. But at last, considering that the Princess had but few people about her, and these coming into his thoughts a fancy that pleased him, he recollected himself for a quarter of an hour, and taking the Lead which Lindamira had left upon the Table, whereon she had written the eight Verses I have have repeated to you, he writ under them these I am now to repeat,

Vain Laurels, wrack no more my labouring mind
May I my only fame in Iris find.
Might I, without all noise from dangers free,
Under these Orange-trees and Myrtles be,
With am'rous Myrtles crown'd to pass away,
As if one minute were the longest day;
To hear th'incomparable Iris sigh,
To crown desire with true felicity,
To live with Iris on perpetual joy,
And what e'r else the world affords, defie.

Themistus having written these Verses, which certainly speak abundance of passion, went out of the Arbor, and hid himself behind a hedge of Myrtles, that lay on the right hand of that place, to see when the Princess came: resolved, if any other came thither, to discover himself, that none might see the Verses he had written; and to dash them out if it were requisite.

It was not long e'r Lindamira came, for having called to mind, as she awoke, that she had written certain Verses upon the Table in the Arbor, and had not dashed them out, she was so extreamly troubled at it, that she rose up in haste, pretending that she would take the Air before the Sun were too hot. She dressed her self therefore after a negligent manner, that she might the sooner have done, and went to the Arbor, followed by my Sister, whither she was no sooner come, but she went to wipe out what she had written. She did it in such haste, that she had almost done the like, unknown to her, to the Verses Themistus had made; but perceiving of a suddain, something written under those she had already half blotted, she blushed, and was strangly troubled to find, that some body must needs have come into the Arbor, and consequently that her verses had been seen. But presently after, knowing the writing to be Themistus's, her trouble was turned into joy. Yet could she not avoid a certain slight confusion, that he should see the verses she had made for him. And yet, all considered, she was so glad, that none but Themistus had seen these eight Verses; she was so well pleased with those she had made, and she conceived so much pleasure in the hope of seeing him suddainly, that not able to conceal it from Mericia, she caused her to read what she had read her self before, commending particularly, as what she could not forbear, the passion expressed in the two last Verses. Whereupon, speaking to her, you may easily perceive, said she, that he who hath written what you have read, must needs be in the Garden. He is indeed Madam, (answered Themistus, coming into the Arbor, and saluting her very submissively) and is come hither to assure you with all truth and sincerity, that what he hath taken the boldness to write under those admirable Verses you have made, expresses the pure sentiments of his heart. But Madam, may I believe that what you have written is equally real? I beseech you, added he, all me not any thing that may disanull what I have said. You know, replied she, smiling, that sometimes the cadence of a Verse, makes one say somewhat more than he would; but, in fine, you may be safely confident, that some are very glad to see you, that you have been very much wished here, that we concern our selves in your Fame and in your Life, and that we desire your happiness. I am happy, divine Princess, replied Themistus, if I have your affection, and I shall defie fortune to contribute any thing to my felicity, since it is impossible I should be happy, if you will not have me to be such. For, Madam, if I seek after Fame, I do it only to deserve you: if I seem ambitious, it is not so much to raise my self to the rank my Fathers have lived in, as to come nearer that you are in; for without that, I swear to you by all that is most sacred, that I should be content if I could but while I live,

Hear the incomparable Iris sigh,
And crown desire with true felicity,
To live with Iris in perpetual joy,
And what e'r else the world affords, defie.

Themistus repeated these Verses, with an accent so full of passion, that Lindamira thought them much better in his mouth, than they were when she had read them. Whereupon, desirous to fall upon some other discourse, she spoke of his good successes in the War. But whatever she said, he some way or other brought it about to Love: he asked her whether the Prince of Messena had done him any injury in his absence, looking on Mericia, as if he were to read in her eyes, whether the Princess spoke truth or no,

From that they came to other discourses, and so to other, till at last he began to abuse my Sister about the Song she had sent to the Army, as conceiving it to be hers, which engaged him in two quarrels instead of one. For the Princess took it not well he should not have discovered that she had made it; and Mericia took it very ill he should believe that she had made it for the person, to whom he thought it directed. However, this little contestation was concluded with a very affectionate accommodation between Lindamira and Themistus; but, after all, though he were loved, yet was he not without some disturbance, out of a certain diffidence, that he should never be absolutely happy; and so his own happiness contributed somewhat to his sufferings.

In the mean time, the Princess being a very discreet person, would not have Themistus's visit, to have been thought gotten by stealth; he therefore walked with her all day, in the presence of those who were about that Princess, and in the evening, took his leave to go to those that came with him (for he brought thither but one slave with him) and so to reach Syracuse, which he did before the Prince was abed. He saw also Demarata, for Periauthus was in her chamber when he came to the Palace, where he was received by both, with the greatest expressions of joy imaginable. Now Themistus, carrying in his face all the satisfaction that a person equally favoured by Mars and Venus, could have, never appeared so lovely to Demarata before. Besides, he spoke so well, that the secret passion she had within her, encreased after so strange a manner, that, three daies after, she could not forbear disburthening her thoughts to her, to whom she made privy to all her secret sentiments. What made them the more lively was, that she doubted not but Themistus loved her, though he durst not discover it. She had some time thought it a great satisfaction to know that he loved her, but according to the present posture of her soul, that was not enough. So that making her complaint to Amerintha, that Lady told her she could not apprehend what her design should be. For in fine, Madam, said she to her, you have told me heretofore that you would not have Themistus know that you loved him. 'Tis very true, replyes Demarata, but at that time, I thought he had not loved me; but now that I imagine he does, I am in such a fear he should cease loving me, that I should not be haply very much troubled he should be thus far confident that it were not haply impossible he should not be hated; and if I may presume to acquaint you with the strange fantasticknes of my thoughts, I almost wish he had discovered somewhat of his passion to me, though I am resolved if he mention it to me, to forbid him ever to speak of it again. I know this is a proceeding which speaks not much reason, but whoever is in love, is not troubled with much of the other. Besides, were I guilty of nothing but love, I should be less miserable, but there is in me a remainder of glory, which makes me absolutely unhappy, and that is neither strong enough to overcome my passion, nor so weak as wholly to yield to it. So that I must, in spight of my teeth, bethink me of some fantastick consolation amidst the torments I endure, and to that end I shall haply my self, give Themistus some occasion to discover the love he hath for me, though I am resolved, as I told you, to lay my commands never to speak of it more. For in fine, what love soever may possess my heart, I had rather dye than be infamous. And though the aversion I have for Periantbus be very strong, yet I will not be chargeable with any thing farther, but since it is the pleasure of my fate, that my heart be not for Periantbus, it does not concern him much, whether I keep it to my self, or bestow it on Themistus, provided my soul be free from those horrid sentiments, that are not the infallible demonstrations of a real love.

Demarata had a many other things to entertain Amerintha with, till word was brought that Themistus was at the door, desirous to know whether he might wait on her. She looked upon Amerintha, without saying ought to her, during which time thousands of several sentiments passing through her heart, she seemed unresolved and unquiet, then at last determining of a sudden, she commanded he might have admittance. Themistus, not suspecting any thing of what Demarata was disturbed at, came out of civility to wait on her, as wise to his Master, and consequently one for whom he was glad to have all the complaisance in the world, out of considerations of love and ambition. Lindamira had that very day advised him to use all the endeavors he could to preserve himself in the good thoughts of Demarata, for she was returned that morning from Meriander's House. So that he went into this Princesse's Closet, as a person whose design was to humor her. He was no sooner in, but Amerintha withdrew to the other side of the Closet, which was a very large one, to give Demarata and Themistus the liberty of private discourse.

At first the War, the reputation he had gained, and the cessation were the subject of their discourse, Themistus all the while never perceiving the Princess to be in any disturbance, so excellent is she in the art of dissimulation. Nay she did her work so handsomly, that without discovering any thing of affectation, or design in what she said, she insensibly brought him into a discourse wherein he was extreamly put to it. For after a many indifferent things, she asked whether he had visited many Ladies. Themistus, not knowing to what end she put that question to him, made answer, that he had seen only the Princess Lindamira, the fair Melissera, and two others that he nam'd. Then changing the discourse, she asked him whether he still minded the advice she had sometime given him. I have so great a respect for you, that I can never forget any thing you say to me; and that you may know what memory I have for your Counsels, I am only to tell you that your absolute commands were, that I should not entertain any love, if ever I pretended to be favorite to the Prince. And yet I know one, replyed she, who thinks you are very much in love with a Woman of high quality, and conceives you somewhat in her favor. Themistus hearing Demarata speak so home, was a little surprised at it, for a Lover that loves truly, ever thinks he is discovered, or at the least fears he should be. But at last, having done himself a little violence, Methinks Madam, said he to her, I see so few Ladies out of your Palace and presence, that I cannot imagine who should bring you such a piece of news. Demarata perceiving Themistus moved at what she said, was confirmed in the imagination she had that he was in love with her. So that to bring about her design the sooner, believe me Themistus, said she, a man should make it no miracle that people know what is, and speak what is not, for all may be discovered, and all may be feigned. But in a word, I have heard for certain, that you love a Woman of the highest quality, one all the World thinks handsome enough, one that hath raised love in others, that hath a great Wit, loves you, and that you would not have it known that you are in love. And to shew you, continued she blushing, that I am not misinformed, you have seen her this day.

Themistus surprised at what Demarata said, was almost out of all doubt that his love to Lindamira was discovered, for all she had said might very well be meant of that Princess; she was of high quality, handsome, had a servant of the Prince of Messena, had a great wit, he loved her, she affected him, he was unwilling it should be known he had any affection for her, and he had seen her that very day, and of the Ladies he had seen none but her and Demarata, whom he could not imagine concern'd in this discourse, though it were the secret drift of her that spoke it; so that he was at such a loss, that he knew not what to do. Demarata on the other side, seeing the uncertain posture he was in, had a secret joy to imagine that she was not mistaken. In the mean time Themistus, running over a hundred things in an instant, told her that he could not devise who might have brought her this news, nor who they could imagine he should be in love with —— And if it should happen to be my self, said she somewhat hastily, looking on him very earnestly, though with some disturbance —— Then I

I should say, Madam, (replyed he, not suspecting as yet any thing of the truth) that these people were a little at a distance with their wits, for though you are one of the noblest Princesses in the World, and the fittest to raise love, yet is there not any thing so far from probability as this Story; for knowing what you are, and what I am my self, if the respect I owe you had not hindered me from presuming upon your affection, I should have left Sicily at the very instant, and the meer fear of doing you any injury by loving you, and of betraying my Master by pretending to be his Rival, would have perswaded me to prefer exile and death before all things else. But farther, Madam, added this Lover, who would now be curious out of design, I would fain know who could be guilty of the presumption to tell you a thing of this nature. Demarata perceiving that Themistus, avoided the opportunity she had given him, entertained on the sudden other imaginations, and considering the countenance wherewith Themistus answered her, was satisfied he had no affection for her. So that inclining to indignation, she immediately applyed her self to the art of dissimulation which she was so well versed in; and putting on another countenance, how, said she to him, with a strange confidence, can you make a serious answer to what I have said, you do not perceive that I had not spoken as I have, but to discover the progress of ambition in your heart, which it seems, is such that you imagine it possible that people should report that you love me and I you. Ah Themistus, added she, of an understanding man as you are, have you not answered me well, nay I could not conceive you should have made me that answer, but for your punishment, know, that no body hath said any thing to me, that I do not think any one loves you, or that you love any thing but greatness and glory.

This put Themistus into another disorder, but all considered, he was not a little glad to see that Demarata knew nothing of the affection he had for Lindamira; he therefore made Demarata the best answer he could, telling her, that never presuming to make the least doubt of what she said, she was the occasion of his confidence, or to say better, his simplicity, he craved her pardon, and so got off as well as he could out of so troublesome a business: but though Demarata were sufficiently Mistress of her self, when she was resolved to disguise her thoughts, yet could she not in the sequel of the discourse, avoid divers things whence Themistus might take occasion to suspect something. He was more satisfied as to that point an hour after, for diverse Ladies being come to the Princess, among whom came also the Prin e of Messena, (who detained Themistus there, though he were desirous to be gone) they fell into a discourse of generosity, honesty and love; and it was put to the question, whether a person that were tender of his honor, might without ceasing to be such, receive any expressions of affection from the wife of a man whom he loved, and by whom he was loved: At first it was generally thought there could not be any thing so unworthy, or so opposite to honesty. But after a while, Demarata took occasion to make it a question whether it ought to be so generally affirmed; for in fine, said she, I know not when a woman begins to love a man, and gives him occasion to imagine as much, whether that man be not more obliged to that Lady for her love, than to his friend for his friendship, and consequently whether that circumstance would not take off much of his crime, and make him less blameable, than if he began to love first, and should make it his main business to cajoll his friends wife. No question but he were less censurable, replyes Themistus, though yet a virtuous man would think himself very unhappy to be in so dangerous an adventure; but when all's done, added Lindamira, he were still blameable enough, and must needs pass for a base and perfidious person in their judgments who are acquainted with the true rules of honesty; for a man must not upon any pretence whatsoever, either betray or be ungrateful.

Themistus having accidentally met the eyes of Demarata, discovered in them a certain disturbance, wherein he thought might be read love, indignation, and shame; nor indeed was he mistaken, for Demarata, notwithstanding her natural dissimulation, could not hinder Themistus from perceiving that she had within her, whatever those three sentiments can inspire that is most cruel; and to make her affliction the more insupportable, she imagined she saw something in the eyes of Themistus, that signified he understood well enough what hers meant, and that he would make no answer thereto. So that night being come, she was extreamly afflicted: How said she, am I so unhappy as to love, yet not to be loved again; nay I am so unfortunate, as to be in a manner satisfied, that the ungrateful man who loves me not, knows my weakness, and will not bear any part thereof. No, no, I am not able to bear with this injury, and let people say what they will, I am perswaded that the most horrid of all crimes, is that whereby a man makes no return to a womans affection, being in such a condition as I am in. Let me then tear from my heart the unjust passion that tyrannises there; but alas! added she presently, I have loved Themistus from my infancy, 'tis a natural inclination which I cannot overcome, nay, which I cannot find so far guilty, as that it deserves to be condemned; for all I desire is, only to love and to be loved, without either giving or entertaining any criminal expressions thereof. In the mean time, the ambitious Themistus, who prefers his Masters favor before any Mistress, triumphs over my weakness, and slights me as much as I love him. But though I should die for it, I must do my self an extraordinary violence, and not thinking it enough to pass from love to indifference, I must know no mean between love and detestation, and be revenged on him that makes me unhappy, because he minds not his own happiness. Had he loved me, and afterwards betrayed me, I should not be so much incensed as I am, now that knowing I love him, he makes no return to my affection. This resentment is haply somewhat unjust, but I know not how to remedy it. Love is it self the reason of all the imaginations that proceed from it, and revenge is so natural to love, that I should not think it much to be pardoned, though people came to know the cause why I now do, or hereafter may hate Themistus. He must certainly have a horrid aversion for me, that he makes no return to the tenderness I have for him; he is ambitious, and I am of a quality to satisfie his ambition; I am young, I am not unhandsome, I dispose of his Masters heart, I can ruine him when I please, and all this notwithstanding, he guesses at my sentiments, and pretends he understands them not. No, no, Demarata, this injury is insupportable, and thou must banish Themistus thy heart, or at last thrust him out of the Court.

These, Madam, were the sentiments of Demarata, whilst Themistus was sufficiently troubled on the other side, for he had but too well observed whatever Demarata had either done or said, and was absolutely satisfied that she loved him. Then reflecting on the inclination she had for him even in her infancy, and a hundred things she had done since his return, he was convinced of the truth, so that he was extreamly afflicted, for it was easie for him to foresee that the consequences thereof might prove very fatal, as well in relation to his fortune as his love. He knew the Princess to be violent, passionate, and bold, and that she had a great influence over the Prince of Syracuse who still was as fond of her as on the day he married her. However, he thought it discretion not to acquaint the Princess of Himera that he thought himself loved by Demarata, nor any way endeavored to make her party good against her with the Prince, but only to avoid the opportunities of having any private discourse with her. But what he thought he did with prudence, proved prejudicial to him; for Demarata looking very narrowly into his actions, took notice of his carriage, and was more offended at it than before. For Themistus, he thought the best course he could take, was to dispose things in order to his return to the Army, either to prosecute the War when the cessation were expired, or to conclude a Peace with the Prince of Heraclea. But there being many rubs in his way, he was forced to have patience for some time.

In the mean time, Demarata made it her business to insinuate into Perianthus more than she had ever done, and dissembled so well, that only Themistus could look into her soul. Thence he inferr'd, that Demarata's love would soon be turned into hatred, and was the more confirmed in it, by a discourse whereof I have gave him an account, as having made one in it. I doubt not but you remember that Themistus is very excellent at a paper of Verses, since I have repeated some of his to you, you are now to imagine that Demarata being with some few about her in her Closet, they fell to discourse about Musick, and thence they fell to talk of Painting and Verses, every one commending Poesie, Painting, or Musick, according to their several inclinations. For my part says Demarata, I look on these three things as such as contribute much to the entertainments of all virtuous persons, but that they are so far from being requisite in a person of quality, that he may be infinitely such, though he can neither sing, draw, or write verses. 'Tis true, Madam, replyed I, these three excellent qualities are not so necessary in a person of honor, but they are requisite to make a man pleasant company, especially Musick and Poesie, and that above all things in what relates to matter of gallantry. I must needs confess replyed she, that love in Musick, and love in Verse is a gallant thing, but it is very hard for a person of quality to be very excellent at either of these two qualities. Besides, as to singing, I see no great difficulty in it, but for a person of great quality, to play the publick Poet, it shews him commonly a very strange kind of man. There is indeed Madam, replied I, abundance of difference between a person of worth, that writes Verses well, and a meer Poet. Believe me said she, there's more danger than is imagined for a man to expose himself to such an adventure, for if he makes ill Verses, 'tis a pittiful thing, if good, he shews them, is much pleased to be commended, and in a trice he becomes a Poet by profession; then you are desired to repeat your Verses, people beg copies of them; nay they give you Subjects on which you must make others; you must take it as an honor you are desired to do it, and at last you are treated as a person to whom men may not well presume to speak in Prose. It must therefore needs be a troublesome thing for a person of quality to be exposed to such odd inconveniences. I grant Madam, said I, that there must be judgment to make good use of a Talent so precious, as that of Poesie, but it is not only requisite in that, but indeed in all things, for a Hector that should ever be talking of combats and quarrels would be yet much more troublesome than a great repeater of Verses. For that matter, cries out the divertive Melisera, I am of a different opinion, for I assure you there is not any thing more importunate than those people that make ill Verses and know not so much, yet thinking others take as much pleasure in them as they do themselves when they recite what they have done, persecute you with perpetual repetitions. For my part added she, an humor came on me the other day, to go to one of those troublesome people, to ask him whether he had not that pretty Song which had raised so much talk of Mericia; but I think I paid for it, I no sooner asked but he gave it me, but afterwards without any intreaty, he gave me another of his own, as ill as the other was handsome. That done, he repeated another, and so falling insensibly, whether I would or no, from one repetition to another, and from one paper of Verses to another, after he had begun with a Song, he concluded with a large serious work of above a thousand Verses, which he told me he had made an imitation of Hesiod, if my memory fails me not, and to recommend the work the more, he assured me that he had shewn it to very knowing persons, who had recommended it extreamly. But his comparisons signified little with me, for I only gave it an ambiguous commendation, nothing at all to his advantage, if he would have understood it aright, for I was never so tired out with any thing in my life.

He you speak of, replied I, must certainly be very importunate, for he is in a word, one of those who ever lie lieger to be the first to make Verses upon any accident, and who belabor themselves with equal violence upon all subjects. Give them a battel to write upon, they are ready to celebrate the Conqueror; if a City be taken, they shall do no less for him that hath taken it. If a person of any consideration die, they furnish him with Epitaphs; if a Beauty, she carries away, if you believe them, love and the graces along with her into the Tomb, though they were never acquainted with her. If some young Prince be born, they presently erect a Poetical Scheam of his Nativity, which which promises him Conquests and Victories, whereof there will never happen any thing. If there be a marriage, they provide Epithalamium's, though not so much as invited to the wedding. If some great Ladies dog chance to dye, they promise him immortality; nay, so busie are these mercenary Poetasters, that they take it very ill there should any thing more than ordinary happen in their time, on which they should not exercise their foolery in verse. But Madam, when I speak of Poetie as a thing worthy commendation, nay necessary for the absolute accomplishment of a gallant person, I would not say that such as I have now described ought to sit on Mount Parnassus, no, these are only the weeds and excrescencies of a fair and fruitful Garden. There they have their growth and nourishment with the fair flowers, but to no other end but that they may be plucked up as soon as they are perceived; so that I conclude, Madam, that as far as civility permits, we should banish from the society of persons of worth and virtue, all these troublesome Poetasters, who take pains only to their own shame, and to importune those, who know them whether they will or no. I would have also banished such Poets as are over-satyrical, that write by the inspirations of envy and detraction, and cannot commend any thing but what all the World blames, that is, when they commend their own works.

But however, says Demarata, before you tell us how you imagine a person of quality make may his advantage of Poesie, grant before hand, that there are divers who do very handsome things, who yet are not fit for a Court-conversation. I grant it, Madam, replyed I, for there are some excellent men that are framed only to study, insomuch that having no great acquaintance with the world, their works are many times more acceptable than they themselves. However, I hold that there ought to be a respect for such as have worth in them, and men should laugh at their ignorance of punctilioes of complyments and fashions, instead of commending them for doing these things very well that they undertake, and are versed in. But after all, it is not thus that I expect a person of quality should make verses. Would you have it done as a person of my acquaintance does, says Melisera, who though he be satisfied that what he does is very handsome, makes as if he believed it little worth, and cares not what is said of it. However, something he does and communicates it, but after a slight manner, as if it were but a trifle, never speaking of it but by way of raillery. He that you speak of replyed I, must certainly be a person of much worth, but this is not yet the way wherein I would have Poesie treated when a man will meddle with it; for a man should never make sport with what he hath done himself. Would you then have it, says a Lady that was in the company, as a certain person of very much worth, known to all the world, one that does very excellent things, and yet is so far from giving them away, that he will hardly shew them, not even to a small number of persons; nay with abundance of trouble that he is persuaded to it. But what end is there in doing those things, if they are not seen, replyes Demarata? —— For my part, Madam said I, I would have a person of honor do it for his own satisfaction, or for his Love, and that he should not think when he is about them, that he labors for the multitude. Nay, I would not have him make any publick profession of what he does, and I would have him at first hardly persuaded to acknowledge it; but afterwards when it is known, he should not make it so much a secret: and when a man hath friends that understand things of that nature, he may make these part of his diversion with them, without any affectation either to shew or conceal them; but above all things, he must have a great care not to communicate them to a sort of young men, that are ignorant and obstinate, and think that a Poet and a Fool are the same thing; for with such people a man must be short; nay sometimes uncivil, but for such as have sound understandings, and know the world well, a man needs not be so reserved, he must not only shew, but bestow such things on them. For good verses are not made that they should not be seen, and persons of quality were very unfortunate, if it were not allowable in them to have wit and to discover it, when they can do it with judgment.

However, says Demarata, I would not allow in a Courtier any other species of Poetry than what they call the Gallant. It is indeed of all the most proper for him, replyed I, but Madam, since Poesie is a natural inclination, we are not to pitch on any species but what nature leads us to, for we should never do well in it. It is enough therefore only to affirm, that a person of quality should not trouble himself with the making of Verses, if he be not naturally inclined thereto, and if he be not fortunate therein; and it is the poorest excuse in the world for a person of quality, to say that it is not his profession; for if it be excusable not to make any verses at all, it is not so if a man pretends to do it, and cannot do it well. But must not a man make bad ones, replyes Demarata, before he comes to make good ones? right Madam, replyed I, but those who shall one day be excellent at it, have I know not what, something that is ingenious and handsome amidst their imperfections, which is an infallible argument of the future excellency of him that hath made them; for which reason we must not discourage those that begin to write, provided there be more good than ill in what they do: but when all is done, it were very hard to give precise rules whereby a person of quality should make Verses, and I shall sooner have done, by saying that if he make them as Themistus does, he will acquit himself as a person of worth. For he is not the first person that speaks of them, when his friends say any thing of them, he is neither troubled nor over-pleased; he neither blushes at what he does, nor places his greatest honor in it: he looks on Poetry as an inviting and pleasant diversion, that heightens the gallantry, love, nay the reputation of those that are excellent at it. He discourses thereof with such as are well read in it when reason requires; he never mentions it to those that are unacquainted therewith; he neither commends nor censures what he hath done, and looks on the Talent of Poesie, as a handsome present from nature, which he thinks he ought to improve, and such as makes him a more lovely and more accomplish'd person.

No question but Themistus makes excellent good verses, replyes hastily Demarata, but I know not how he makes a shift to find them, for I am of opinion, that it is Love that teaches the art of making them well, that ambition contributes not much thereto, and that Themistus does what is very extraordinary, that he can make so good ones, and be so little in love as he is. Demarata blushed as she said this, and notwithstanding her art of dissimulation, I perceived some secret quarrel against Themistus. So that being come away, I went and told him what I had observed; but he guiding all his actions by discretion, would not tell me any thing of the occasion of Demarata's quarrel against him. However, methought he was very much troubled at what I had told him; but I thought, looking on Demarata, as predominant over Perianthus, the concernment of his fortunes made him be troubled at what I had told him.

In the mean time Demarata, whose heart was big with desires of revenge, and who looked on the Prince her Husband, as the only man, by whose means she might compass her design, omitted nothing, as I have already told you, to bring him more absolutely to her devotion; but to say truth, it was impossible that she should do more than she had, for his affection for her, was as violent as ever it had been, so that she was in a capacity to perswade him to any thing she desired. Insomuch that Themistus, not ignorant of her power, was extreamly disturbed at it. However, he imagined that the same passion that inclin'd her to ruine him, might divert her from from it, and hoped that the services he had done the State, those he was now doing, and those he might do, would give check to her violence, though he were still satisfied, that there is nothing more dangerous than a Woman who loves, and is not loved, when she hath given any expressions of affection, to one that makes no return thereto. So that, do what he could, Themistus was still melancholly; nay, he divers times avoided waiting on the Prince to Demarata's, and he pressed his departure, as much as lay in his power, though to be far from Lindamira was the greatest affliction in the world to him: And in fine, he gave Perianthus so many reasons, that he received his last Orders to depart betimes the next morning. But having a design to visit the Princess of Himera, after he had done all his business at Syracuse, it was very late e'r he got away.

As he went he met the Prince of Messena coming thence, he staid him for some discourse in the spacious place of the Achradina, somewhat near the Altar of Concord, that stands in the midst of it. The Moon shined very bright, and having each of them but two slaves apiece with them, they took two turns about the place; for though Themistus had no great affection for the Prince of Messena, yet durst he not discover his jealousie, for fear of betraying his love. As they were walking, three men that were also there upon the same account, having cryed out very earnestly, 'Tis the Prince, 'tis he, drew their swords, and came to seize on the Prince of Messena. Themistus, being not to consider what he had to do upon such an occasion, rescued his Rival, no less than if he had been his best friend.

Their slaves in the mean time, having no Arms, cried out that Themistus was murthered, hoping that at that name, two several knots of people that were walking upon the place, would come to the relief of those that were set upon; but in stead of doing that, they joyned with those that had given the assault. 'Tis true, they did not behave themselves as such, as would have kill'd the Prince of Messena, but only as people that would have carried him away; for the former who had drawn their swords, had done it only to secure themselves from him they would have taken, and to hinder Themistus from crossing their design. But my friend not able to guess at the intentions of those he saw, fought with incredible valour, it being not in his power at that time, to observe that the Prince was set upon as he was. Upon this, the slaves that belonged to him, seeing what danger he was in, went with all speed to the Palace, whence there came so many men in Arms, that those who had made it their business to carry away the Prince of Messena, seeing they could not compass their design, quitted the place, and cast themselves into a Bark that waited for them in the Ports. Themistus, and the Prince of Messena pursuing them, followed by those that were come to their relief, Themistus advanc'd 15 paces before the rest, to seize upon one that fled. But coming near the Port, those that were in the Bark, that entertained such as were forced to fly, shot divers Arrows, whereof one unfortunately met Themistus quite through the Arm, and another gave him such a wound in the Leg, that he fell down. This accident so much surpriz'd those that saw it, that they that had hurt him, had by that means an opportunity to save themselves; for rowing away with all diligence, before order was given for their pursuit, and that order put in execution, they were so far, that they could not be overtaken.

There were divers judgements of this adventure, but the most common opinion was, that the old Prince of Messena would have gotten his Son away, that he might renew the War, by joyning with the Prince of Heraclea, who to that end, had demanded the cessation, which was not then expired. However it was, this adventure made a great noise in the Court; it was at first reported at the Palace, that Themistus was dead, insomuch that Perianthus was so troubled at it, that he came to the place where the accident happened. For Demarata, the hatred which her love had bred, ceas'd at that instant, and she entertained that false alarm with such grief, that it happened very well for her, that there was none but Amerintha by, when the news was brought. But what was most strange, was, that being presently after undeceiv'd, she felt no great joy; nay, she was not far from desiring that Themistus had been dead, at least, she accused her self of unworthiness, for being afflicted.

In the mean time Themistus being carried home, whither the Prince went along with him, the Chyrurgions affirmed, that if nothing happened extraordinary, his wounds were not dangerous, but that in all likelihood the cure would be tedious. The Prince of Messena spoke with abundance of obligation to this illustrious wounded person, and to Perianthus, and they both answered him with no less generosity, though Themistus could not do it without some trouble. For Lindamira she was extreamly cast down at this misfortune; yet was it some comfort to her, to understand that Themistus's wounds were not very dangerous: but the noise of such accidents being very swift, the Prince of Heraclea hearing that Themistus, whose valour was was the fear of all the enemies of the Prince of Syracuse, was not in a condition to reassume the command of the Army, gave over all thoughts of peace. So that news came to Perianthus, that he intended nothing but War, and that he would take advantage of Themistus's absence, assoon as the cessation were expired.

While things stood thus, there was a certain seditious humor gotten into the people of Syracuse, whereby the presence of the Prince was thought but necessary. Perianthus was somewhat at a loss to find a man to supply Themistus's place, for fear of raising any discontent, for there was no small division in the Court. But the Prince of Messena being a person of a gallant and generous nature, came to Perianthus to tell him, that having been the occasion of Themistus's not being in a capacity to serve him in so dangerous a conjuncture, he desired leave to expose his life in his service. I am sir, said he, from desiring the command of the Army; for being Son to a Prince, that gives you many occasions to believe, that he is not sincerely reconciled to you, I think it not just it should be given me. All I desire, is the permission to go and fight for your service, for I declare it to you, that excepting the Prince my Father, all your enemies are mine.

Perianthus very generously entertained what this young Prince said to him, and assured him, he had so great an esteem for him, that he would put all things into his hands, and that he thought it impossible he should betray him. But, added he, do you not fear the Prince your Father might be incensed against you? Ah, my Lord, replied the young Prince, when, what I do is contrary neither to the Laws of Honor, nor to those of Nature, I fear nothing, and I ever do what reason and glory advise me to. However, Perianthus made him no positive answer at that time, though he thought that expedient the best to avoid the grumblings of those who expected to be chosen; for the quality of Prince of Messena took away all matter of contestation. Neither would he for that day, speak any thing of business to Themistus, for that having had an ill night, because of the affliction it was to him, that he could not return to the Army, those that waited upon him, permitted not any to discourse with him. So that in such time as he might acquaint him with his design, he communicated it to the ablest of his Council, who, knowing the Lieutenant-General of the Army, to be an able and trusty person, told Perianthus, that they could not imagine there was any danger to give the command of it to a young Prince, who having no interest in the Army, could not abuse the command he might have thereof; that by that means he would smother the complaints of the male-contents of his Court, without exposing himself to any danger; besides the improbability there was, that a Prince in love with Lysamira should betray him, and that the Prince of Messena, having the reputation of a gallant man, would doubtless do him very good service, he being so much concern'd to do it, Perianthus being thus confirm'd in his design, communicated it that night to Demarata, who being very glad, that the command of the Army was bestow'd on a man from whom they durst not take it away, while the War lasted, because he was of a higher quality than to obey Themistus, fortifi'd him in the design. So that coming the next morning to acquaint Themistus therewith, he spoke of it, as a thing already resolv'd, asking him only, whether he did think the Prince of Messena would do him faithful service. Here Themistus was extreamly at a loss, for on the one side, he saw that it concern'd the Prince his Master, as things then stood, that the Prince of Messena should command the Army. On the other side he saw it very much concern'd his Love, that this occasion should not make his Rival famous, and gain such credit with the Prince, that at his return, he might get the Princess of Himera. However, being perswaded of the virtue of his Rival, he sticked not at what he was to answer, and so generously told Perianthus, that he was very much satisfied, that if the Prince of Messena accepted of the employment, he would acquit himself with faith and courage; but that nevertheless, there might be some danger to bestow it on him, telling Perianthus all that policy could suggest to dissuade him. But the Prince on the other side alledging what he could to take off his reasons, added, that the business having already taken air, and the cessation being ready to expire, there was no other way to be resolved on. So that Themistus seeing there was no remedy for this inconvenience, stood out no longer, but gave Perianthus way.

This Prince having given that of Messena all necessary Orders, he prepared for his departure; but as he took his leave, he intreated Perianthus to promise him, that if he returned with conquest, he would do him all the service he could, in a business wherein he was infinitely concern'd. Perianthus promised him what he desired, without diving into his intentions, and brought him to take his leave of Demarata, who wished him all the glory War could give him. That being done, he came to take his leave of Themistus, who was extreamly afflicted, that the respect he had for the Princess, permitted him not to tell the Prince of Messena, that he was his Rival, and not his friend as he thought. I know well, saies the Prince of Messena, embracing him in his bed, that I expose my self to be, haply, as unfortunate in War, as I have been in Love; but though I should not overcome those that you have, I shall think it no dishonor, for there are many degrees of glory, below that of Themistus. My Lord, replies he, that the Arms of the Prince of Syracuse, have been fortunate in my hands, I am obliged to Fortune; but if they prove such in yours, you will be obliged only to your valour and your conduct. Upon this, the Prince of Messena went out of his Chamber, to go to the Princess of Himera, who knew not well how to keep her countenance; for looking on him as a Prince that had been the innocent cause of Themistus's wounds, she could not avoid a little trouble to see him, especially out of a fear she was in, that, if he should prove fortunate in the War, he might, at his return, make his Victory advantageous for his passion. However, she took leave of him with much civility: about an hour after he was gone, she received a Letter from Themistus, who, sick as he was, could not forbear writing to her in these terms.

THEMISTUS to the Princess LINDAMIRA.

I Beseech you, Madam, make not the same obliging wishes for the Prince of Messena, as you did for me, when I took my leave of you to go to the Army: for as I am perswaded, that I had not been fortunate, had not it been your desire it should be so, it may well be pardoned me, if I fear he should be more fortunate than I have been; not that I wish he may be overcome, but only that I would have him owe his victory to Fortune, and not to you.

Lindamira having read this Letter, made him this answer thereto.

LINDAMIRA to THEMISTUS.

IT is clear that my wishes are fruitless to those for whom I make them, since you have been wounded; for I assure you, I wish not any thing with so much earnestness, as to see the State engaged to you for part of her glory; and to be truly free with you, I at the present send up so many addresses to heaven for your health and recovery., that you ought not to fear I have any left for other things.

This Letter dissolved much of Themistus's melancholly, but after all, when it came into his thoughts, that his Rival had a very fair opportunity to render himself famous; it was such an affliction to him, as he was not well able to buckle with. It must needs be acknowledged that I am very unfortunate (said he to himself, as he hath told me since) for I have defeated the enemy to no other end, but that the Prince of Messena may the more easily subdue them, and that he should haply enjoy the fruits of my labours. I have further, the unhappiness to be more loved by Demarata than I would be, who having so much power with the Prince as she hath, will infallibly do me all the ill offices she can, and make me as unfortunate in ambition as in love. 'Tis true, I have this happiness, that I am not slighted by the person I love; but alas, what will be the effect of the affection she hath for me, but to make me more miserable than I am? For when all is done, she confines the expressions of her affection to such narrow limits, that I dare not so much as hope ever to see my self absolutely happy. She still is guided by considerations of Prudence, State, and Glory, and because I am no Prince, and that I have sometimes been unfortunate, my Birth, Love, and Services shall signifie nothing, and there's a necessity I should ever be the object of misfortune. However, since the incomparable Lindamira ordains it should be so, I must submit, nay, admire and reverence the virtue that makes me miserable.

You see Madam, how Themistus entertained himself, while Demarata was examining what resolution to take, for she could not be at rest any where. Nay, she made it her complaint, that ever since Themistus's return, she past not an hour, but she heard some discourse or other of him. While he was in the Army, the reputation of his great actions, was the general discourse; while he was in health at Syracuse, either she could not, or haply would not be without his visits; and now that he lay hurt, Perianthus spoke to her of him perpetually, nay, all that came to her, thinking they did well, were constantly bemoaning him. How, said she one morning to Amerintha, being violently transported by that exasperated passion that made her abhor what she loved, if I may so express my self, Shall Demarata, in whom the world finds something that may raise love, undergo the shame of loving, without being loved again; nay, be so base as to be troubled of a suddain at the pretended death of him who does her this affront? Must I ever see him dividing Perianthus's heart with me, and being the object of all his friendship? No, no, said she, it were too rigorous a punishment, and the best course I can take, is to banish him my presence, since I cannot my heart, who will not entertain me into his. But this must be done by circumvention, I must calumniate and impose false crimes upon Themistus, and I must cease to be what I have ever been.

But Madam, said Amerintha to her, how shall this be effected, in case you are resolved to do it, for you cannot perswade the Prince, that he holds any correspondence with the enemy, since he hath defeated him. You cannot accuse him of having inriched himself prejudicially to the Prince, from whom he many times refuses new favours, because of all men he is the most dis-interessed. So that I see not what you can probably charge Themistus with, That he loves me, replies Demarata, blushing. This no doubt, is the highest suppossition in the world, added this revengeful Princess, but the easiest thing in the world for me to make Perianthus believe, if I but undertake it; and since it is the only way to remove Themistus from my presence, and to be revenged of his insensibility, I must needs embrace it, Nor shall my revenge be cruel, since he shall lose no more than what fortune would not haply have bestowed on him without me. For had not I confirmed the Prince in the friendship he had for Themistus, he would not have affected him so much. But, Madam, replied Amerintha, if Perianthus ever discovers the Truth, you would ruine your self, by endeavouring to ruine Themistus, How, said she, do you imagine Friendship more powerful than Love? That Perianthus can avoid jealousie, when I would have to be jealous, and that imagining Themistus in love with me, he can do it to my prejudice? No, no, Amerintha, that were to invert the order of things; indeed it is impossible it should be so. Besides, the resolution I take, is haply much more innocent than you conceive, for if I should not banish Themistus my presence, I could not forbear loving him, as insensible as he is, nay, haply I should not be able to conceal my affection from him. I must therefore so husband the hatred I have for him, as to make it contribute to my reputation. No question but I hate him at the present, first, but I am not confident I shall do as much when I see him; I must therefore, while he is a prisoner to his wounds, and cannot come to see me, make the best use I can of such precious minutes. I must flatter Perianthus, I must invent, I must forget all honesty, and I must do all that is requisite to punish an insensible person, that so I may no longer love a man, that neither does, or ever can love me.

Accordingly, Madam, Demarata being at that time absolutely resolved to have Themistus banished, bethought her of what ever might further her design. She therefore took very great care never to speak first of Themistus, especially before Perianthus, and to answer very coldly, when ever he spoke of him to her. She never sent to know how he did, and avoided saying, or doing any thing, whence it might be inferr'd, he was in any favour with her. For some daies Perianthus minded not this change, but Themistus recovering, and very fit to admit discourse, Perianthus perceived that Demarata concerned not her self so much in Themistus's welfare, as she had done some time before, when Themistus was like to die. However, he would not at first say any thing to her of it, for being still extreamly fond of her, he was afraid of having any contestation with a person that had all the power over him that Love could give her. So that having observed this coldness for some daies, without being able to discover whence it proceeded, or knowing that Demarata had not sent to see how Themistus did, he asked Themistus himself, who was very much surprised at the question, and therefore answered not precisely thereto; for being the most reserved man in the world, he would have dyed, e're he had told Perianthus the true cause of Demarata's change. He therefore told him, he knew not but that he was in her favour; that if he were not, it proceeded from some malice of those who envied his good fortune; but this he told him with such an accent, that the Prince could not but judge there was something more in his mind, than he was willing to discover. He for some time pressed him to speak sincerely, but seeing Themistus would say no more, and loath to prejudice his health, by too much importunity, he left him, and went to the Princess Himera, to see if she knew of any thing that had happened between Demarata and Themistus, for having an extraordinary affection for those two persons, he was extreamly troubled to see any thing of discord happened between them. But Lindamira not knowing any thing, and that the love of Demarata was the only secret Themistus had concealed from her, she assured him that she knew nothing that had passed between them: so that Perianthus returned to the Palace infinitely afflicted.

As he came along, news was brought that the Prince of Messina was no sooner got to the Army, but he understood that the enemies were overjoyed at the accident had happened to Themistus, whose valour they stood in fear of, and that, not desirous to hear of peace, out of the hope they were in, to be more fortunate in the War than they had been; they slighted the propositions of it, and broke the cessation assoon as ever it was expired. That thereupon two parties meeting, that of the enemy had been defeated, so that Perianthus, who could entertain nothing of joy which he did not communicate to Demarata, went and acquainted her with what he had heard. It seems then, (said she in a scoffing way, to prosecute the secret design she had) Victory is not the absolute slave of Themistus, since she sometimes waits on the Prince of Messina. This was so maliciously spoken, that Perianthus was absolutely satisfied, that she had entertained other thoughts of Themistus; insomuch, that this putting his thoughts into a strange disturbance, he would needs guess at what it should be; but the more he thought of it, the farther he was from the truth. Being therefore no longer able to brook this uncertainty, the first time he was alone with Demarata, he conjured her to promise to tell him sincerely, one thing he should ask of her. Provided it do not concern Themistus, replied she, I promise you the knowledge of any thing I know, ask what you will. Ah, Madam, said Perianthus that is it I desire, 'tis concerning Themistus that I would know something, and therefore I beseech you, Madam, answer me not ambiguously, but tell me truly whence it comes, that your thoughts are not the same they were towards him. You have so great an affection for Themistus, replyed the Princess, and I owe you so much respect, that to do rationally, I ought to disobey you. Perianthus's curiosity increasing at this, he pressed her more than he had done, and whatever the most violent and passionate Love can suggest, or speak, Perianthus made use of to obtain from her what he desired.

But the Princess seeing her self upon the point of executing the design of revenge, she had carried on so craftily, felt in her heart an extraordinary agitation. Love, that had seduced her Virtue, did all that lay in its power to divert her from committing the crime, and she seemed to Perianthus to be so much at a loss, though she dissembled as much as she could her irresolution, that his curiosity was much increased thereby. So that urging her still more and more, she found her self in a great disturbance, and felt a certain horror to ruine the only man in the world that she could love. The desire of revenge encouraged her, and she was in so many minds, that she knew not what to resolve on. But at last imagining, that as things then stood, if she did not ruine Themistus, he might ruine her, ambition siding with indignation, against that little remainder of affection that ballanced the business within her, she absolutely determined and made it her main business to effect the unjust design which a violent passion had bred in her.

However, if she would not presently yield to Perianthus, the more to enflame the desire he had to be satisfied. For heavens sake, my Lord, said she to him, force me not to tell you what I know of Themistus: you love him, you think the State cannot be without him, and it is my duty to have that consideration of you, as not to acquaint you with any thing that may trouble you. Be pleased then to give me leave to disobey you, and ask me no more what Themistus hath done. It shall suffice, added she, if, when he is recovered, you lay your commands on him, never to see me but in your presence. But I beseech you, replied Perianthus, very much surprised, tell me what Themistus may have done, that should oblige you to cease loving him. Once more, I beseech you, my Lord, said she, ask me no more, nor indeed are you at the present preſent (added the incenſed Princeſs) in the condition you ſhould be in to think him guilty, for you have ſo great a friendſhip for him, that though you were told he would deprive you of the ſovereign power, you would not believe it. I muſt needs confeſs, ſaid he, that I ſhould not lightly believe Themiſtus guilty of an unworthy action, and would therefore intreat you to examine well, whether thoſe who accuſe him are well informed; Urge me then no more, my Lord, replied ſhe, and ask me no more what Themiſtus's crime may be, ſince I am only ſhe that of all your State, can both accuſe and convince him.

Perianthus was extreamly aſtoniſhed at theſe words, for from what ſhe had ſaid, it might be inferred, that Themiſtus had done Demarata ſome affront. So that as jealouſie ſoon takes root in the heart of an amorous man, eſpecially that of a Husband, that is ſtill in love, ſo he reflected on that which Demarata would have had him; inſomuch, that his colour changing, and he looking earneſtly upon her, I beſeech you, Madam, ſaid he, put me once out of pain, and tell me clearly what you have but hinted at. And the more to oblige you to do it, added he, I will tell you the preſent poſture of my thoughts. Know then that if Themiſtus hath laid any plot againſt the State, I find in my ſelf Love enough to pardon it, if he repent him of it; but if he have wanted the reſpect he ought to have for you, I will never ſee him again. Prepare your ſelf, then replied the Princeſs, never to ſee him while you live, for aſſure your ſelf, that Themiſtus is the moſt preſumptuous man in the world. But, my Lord, added ſhe, you ſhall never know his crime more preciſely, if you promiſe me not to make that advantage thereof that I would have you. I promiſe any thing, replied he, provided you tell me what I would know. I ſhall do it, my Lord, anſwered ſhe, but you ſhall promiſe me before hand, that you will not diſcloſe what I ſhall tell you, that you will not ſpeak of it even to Themiſtus; that, to prevent that, you will baniſh him without ſeeing him, and without giving him any reaſon why, in caſe you think I have cauſe never to deſire his ſight again, and that if you have juſt occaſion to baniſh him.

Perianthus, who had a curioſity as great as friendſhip, love, and jealouſie could give him, promiſed Demarata what ſhe would have: whereupon, this ſubtle Princeſs aſſuming the diſcourſe, I know not my Lord, ſaid ſhe to him, whether you can remember, that while I was yet a child, a certain Aunt of Themiſtus's had the care of my education, and if your memory fails you not, Themiſtus, as young as he was, was at that time continually with me. I remember it very well, replies Perianthus, but ſee not what this may add to his charge. On the contrary, replied this crafty Princeſs, I tell you this, to let you underſtand, that I ſhall not make Themiſtus's crime worſe than it is: for to be free with you, I believe that though I was then but ten years of age, and he but ſeventeen, he had at that time a violent inclination for me, nay, ſo great, that he would make me apprehend as well as I could, that the only reaſon of his departure, was to avoid the increaſe thereof. Howe'r it be, you know, my Lord, in what a gallant manner he returned to Court. For my part, I little thought to make any proviſion againſt his madneſs, I entertained him with abundance of kindneſs, particularly, becauſe he was preſented to me by your ſelf. Since that, perceiving that you loved him, I would not be diſconformable to your ſentiments, and by way of excuſe ſaid, that I had thouſands of kindneſſes for him, which have haply encouraged him in his boldneſs and extravagance. 'Tis indeed very ſtrange to think that an ambitious man, who was infinitely obliged to you, and was nothing without you, ſhould be at the ſame time ungrateful, temerarious, and indiſcreet. And yet I had ſo much goodneſs for him, that I gave him advice how to preſerve your friendſhip; for perceiving your inclinations for him, and withal, that he was advantageous to you, I thought I could not do any thing better, than to faſten him as much as might be to you, and I remember, one day above all the reſt, I ſpent two hours to perſwade him, that it was not fit, that a perſon who had a Maſter to humour, ſhould engage himſelf in love, encouraging him, as much as lay in my power, not to ſuffer himſelf to be drawn into love, for fear it might cauſe him to neglect your ſervice; but to my unhappineſs and his own, he made no great advantage of my advice. Nay, I remember, he made me a very ambiguous anſwer, which might very well give me occaſion to ſuſpect he was in love with me, if my mind had not been bent upon ſomething elſe. But I would know, (ſaies Perianthus, who heard this relation with a ſtrange impatience) at what time it was that Themiſtus had the impudence to give you any expreſſions of his affection. I am haply in ſome fault, my Lord, replies Demarata, with a faint mildneſs, that I did not give you notice from the firſt minute that I diſcovered Themiſtus's extravagance, but to deal truly with you, 'tis a thing cannot be eaſily expreſs'd. Beſides, that while Themiſtus ſpoke nothing of it, and that I only gueſſed at his thoughts, I was in hope he would o'rcome himſelf. Nay, I know not whether I thought my ſelf ſomewhat obliged to him for the affliction I ſaw he ſuffered, and have accordingly had ſome pitty for him. But I am ſure, my thoughts all along were that I ſhould cauſe a great deal of trouble, if I diſcovered any thing, and haply ſhould not have been believed. But at laſt deſirous to reduce Themiſtus to himſelf, and to prevent him from having the boldneſs to acquaint me with the ſentiments I ſaw he had, as having done a thouſand things, wherein I eaſily diſcovered them, I prudently avoided, without any bodies taking notice of it, the opportunities of ſpeaking with him alone. Which he obſerving, was ſad and melancholly, as you may well remember, and at laſt fell ſick, whereat you were extreamly troubled. You know, my Lord, added ſhe, that being very ſick indeed, you would needs have me to ſee him, wherein I was content to obey you, though with much ado, and you are not ignorant how that he grew better that very day, and ſent me word that my viſit had cured him, and that he came afterwards to give me thanks, as a perſon whoſe life I had ſaved. I remember it very well, ſaies Perianthus, but if Themiſtus never mentioned his love to you, I will baniſh him, yet without hating him. How my Lord, replies the Princeſs, do you think me one that ſhould upon ſuch groundleſs conjectures, accuſe a perſon ſo dear to you, and ſo conſiderable to the State? No, no,

Demara-

Demarata is more discreet, and less revengeful than you imagine; for were it no otherwise, I should have prudently avoided the conversation of Themistus, without ever troubling you with it while I lived: but my Lord, the case is much otherwise and I cannot doubt, but he hath in his heart, for me, whatever the most violent passion that is, can make that man think, who knows no other reason or interest, than that of his love, and that thinks virtue and generosity too weak to resist it. For, my Lord, as to his coming hither during the cessation, he had certainly no other end in it, than to continue the expressions of his extravagance towards me, had I given him any occasion For you may very well judge, there was no great necessity he should leave the Army, and that a man, ambitious as he is, would not have come thence, but that some secret reason obliged him thereto.

Perianthus, hearing Demarata discourse in this manner, under-went such a conflict of grief and indignation, as he had not known before. What added to his disturbance was, that he could not doubt of the truth of what Demarata said; she never had discovered the least ill-will towards Themistus; he could not imagine she should have any affection for him; he thought her a good and vertuous Woman; all the things she said, had certain appearances of truth; it was not known that Themistus was in love with any Lady about the Court, and Perianthus was still so much in love with Demarata, that it was easie for me to imagine, that another might be in love with her also. Had Themistus been charged with any intelligence with the enemies of his State, he would not have believed it, but he could not doubt of what Demarata said, as being one he could not think guilty of such a piece of sycophancy. So that jealousie gaining ground in his heart, and there meeting with indignation, he gave over pressing Demarata to discover any more, and so easily granted the request she had made, that Themistus should be banished his Court, and he did it the sooner, for her saying, that if he did not banish him, she would have it immediately. She also intreated him not to tell why he removed him; but my Lord, added she, that it may be done with more secresie, a course must be taken, that the audacious Themistus may not tell why you banish him; for there is something that is not handsome in a report of this nature: nay, it will be easie, continued she, to assign some other cause of banishment, in the present conjuncture of affairs, for it will be thought it is for something relating to the Army, whereof he hath no longer the command.

Perianthus aproving what Demarata said, sent immediately order to Themistus, to cause himself to be carried out of Syracuse the next morning, and convey himself within a set number of days to a certain place that was at a great distance, as it was assign'd him, and to continue there till further order, for this unfortunate Lover was not yet able to stand, by reason of the wounds he had received in his Leg. Yet could not Perianthus but feel an extraordinary disturbance in himself, as he issued out this Order. He had an infinite love and esteem for Themistus, ho ought him his life, and the greatest part of his fame; and if Love had not dash'd out of his heart, all the obligations he had cast upon him, he would not have been so hasty in a design of that importance. But the same things which might plead for Themistus, were those also that incensed him the more, for that the more he had loved Themistus, the more he should have been loved by him, and accordingly the more reason he had to hate him.

In the mean time Themistus submitted to the Order, with a courage as great as his affliction. He did well comprehend that his disgrace might some way reflect on Demarata, but he was far from imagining she had had the unjust presumption to impose a crime upon him, which for his own satisfaction, he was but too far from being guilty of. Besides that, having had for some time, a many that envied him about the Court, he was not over-confident that Demarata contributed ought to his banishment, for if the bottom of his heart were examined, he thought himself obliged to her, for the affection she had for him, and at the same time that she caused him to be banished, he would have ventured his life for her, if there had been any occasion, though he loved only Lindamira, and could not possibly love any other. But considering himself as a Lover, and an ambitious man, and that all his designs, as well of Love as Ambition, were equally ruin'd by his disgrace, the Order he had received, troubled him extreamly. However, he spoke very generously to him that brought it. You may tell the Prince, said he, that I shall obey him, but as soon as I shall be able to stand on my legs, I will come and ask him, as a recompence of all my services, only the honour to let me know what crime I am charg'd with. In the mean time, assure him, that what nature soever it may be of, I am absolutely innocent, and shall ever be his most faithful subject.

This done, Themistus, who knew Perianthus's humour to be such, as that he was never sooner appeas'd, than when it met with compliance, made preparations how he might be carried to the place assigned him, without making any stay about Syracuse. But e're he went, he writ to Lindamira, for he was not in a condition to see her. You may judge, Madam, how this Princess was surprised, and what affliction she must needs conceive at that unhappy adventure, whereof she could not imagine the cause. She was no better satisfied the next day, for Perianthus being unwilling to tell her, took her up a little roundly, when she would press him to discover it to her: insomuch that he grew so untoward, that he could not be quiet any where. Only while he was with Demarata, he was a little better, for she was so full of kindness and insinuation, and seemed to be so much troubled, that she caused him the loss of a person he loved, that he endeavour'd nothing so much as to forget Themistus, who then suffered more than ever any Lover did; and had he not met, about the place of his abode, persons of a transcendent virtue, who took a care to comfort him in his disgrace, the great heart of Themistus might have haply put him upon some violent resolution. But, among others, a generous friend of the virtuous Amalthea, contributed much to smother the resentment of a man, who might look on his Master as an ungrateful Prince.

For my part, saies Plotina very pleasantly, interrupting Meleagenes, I cannot suffer a friend of Amalthea's to pass by, and not make acquaintance with him; Tell us then, if the company be pleased to give way, who that friend is that hath such a remedy against ambition. For my part, saies Clelia, I shall be very glad your curiosity were satisfi'd, I say as much, replies Valeria: I leave it to you to think, says Herminius, whether I can refuse the acquaintance of a wise man; and you may judge your self, saies Amilcar to Meleagenes, whether, having an extraordinary veneration for Timantes, and all his illustrious friends (for I know, 'tis of them that you intend to speak) I shall oppose what is desired of you. On the contrary, I make it my request, that you would acquaint the Audience, with what you know of those illustrious Solitaries, among whom Themistas met with, what incouraged his virtue in so dangerous a conjuncture. The whole company approving Amilcar's proposition, and pressing Meleagenes to do what was desired of him, he re-assumed the discourse in these terms.

'Tis not without reason that you have the curiosity to know, what kind of life is led by these illustrious Solitaries of whom Amilcar hath made mention. I shall therefore endeavour to satisfie it, for it were not possible for me to acquaint you with all that I have yet to tell you, if I should entertain you, from the beginning, with the virtue of those admirable men of whom you would have me to speak to you; yet must I needs give you a short description of the place they have made choice of for their retirement, that you may the better comprehend what a pleasant life they lead. Know then, that not far from the Sea, between Ericium and Panorma, there rises up a fertile mountain, which is cut steep down of all sides, and by reason of its extraordinary scituation, passes for one of the noblest parts of our Island, which is one of the noblest in the world. But what is most remarkable, is, that when you come to the highest part thereof, you discover a pleasant Plain of twelve miles compass, which takes up the whole height thereof: and to make this place yet more extraordinary, there is an eminency in the midst of this Plain, which serves for a Cittadel to all the rest; for you may discover thence the three waies by which people come up to the mountain, which is compassed with Rocks and Precipices, as well towards the Land as Sea, that it is easie to keep the space that lies between both. There are accordingly but three waies to go to this pleasant Solitude, whereof two are very troublesome and difficult. The place is nevertheless furnished with Springs, and there is a very fair Haven at the foot of this famous Mountain, which hath a priviledge, that there was never seen upon it any venemous creature or wild beast: and the excellency of the place is such, that because men could never find out a name excellent enough for it, it hath not any one in particular, and the Haven it hath, distinguishes it from the other mountains.

This then is the place where is retired a small number of wise men, who having experienc'd the vanities of the world, will needs disengage themselves from it. But among others, Timantes, a particular friend of the virtuous Amultheus, is an incomparable person. He is tall, and of a good countenance, and hath a noble Physiognomy, such as so well discovers the freedom and sincerity of his heart, that it may be almost said, he is known before a man hath the leisure to know him. All his actions are so many expressions of the vigor and vivacity of his spirit, for he ever acts with force and agility; insomuch, that the caresses he honors his friends with, are arguments of the earnestness of his disposition. Timantes, hath doubtless a very vast understanding, and besides the great advantages he hath made of study, as to what is requisite to make a man both wise and acceptable, he is born to a great genius in Poetry, and makes such Verses as Hesiod and Homer would not be ashamed to own, were they alive again.

But I shall not make what is within him, the main subject of my commendation of him, though he have such an admirable wit, that hath such fire and lustre, that he cannot but discover it upon some occasions, wherein he would not make it appear. His heart, of all that is within him, is the most noble part, as what hath such an extraordinary freedom and openness, that it might be said, that he had never so much as heard it said, there was such a thing as dissimulation in the World. He speaks truth, without any fear or evasion, he maintaineth it with courage, and makes use of anger to defend justice, when he cannot do it otherwise, and he hath a goodness that savors of the innocency of the first age,

For his humor, it is divertive enough, but withal so natural, that he finds himself employment out of things most inconsiderable. He hath also a particular gift of inspiring his friends with a certain innocent joy, and teaching them the art of diverting themselves, without any prejudice to others. Timantes is farther a man, that of all the world is the most sensibly moved at the works of others, when they are excellent, and loves very much to do justice, where there is desert. In a word, he hates nothing so much, as what is opposite to this great virtue, and the freedom of his disposition is so contrary to all manner of Tyrannie, that he sometimes saies merrily, that he deserves no great honor for shaking off the yoke of all the passions, because it is much more easie to obey reason, than to be led away by the fantastick humors of five or six frantick passions, who would be implicitely obeyed, and yet many times require things contradictory. Timantes therefore having only that one Mistriss to wait on, is never from her, but consults her in all things. Yet it might be said, he thinks not on her, but that though the agitation of his humor makes his body often change place, his mind is ever quiet; and that fire which enflames and animates it, makes it more active, yet not more unquiet. Farther, having got the mastery of his passions, he hath distilled them all into one, which is to him instead of all, and which he will never part with. He maintains, that friendship, in his heart, is incomparably a more violent passion than love is in other men's: and he is perswaded that no Lover loves his Mistriss so well as he does his friends. Nay, he confidently holds, that Love is a defective affection, such as is to be numbred among the enjoyments of infancy, and consequently to be discarded as soon as reason takes place: whereas, on the contrary, friendship is an absolutely perfect affection, equally consistent with Virtue and Reason, and should last as long as life does. So that being fully perswaded of the perfection of friendship, he is the most earnest, and most accomplished friend in the world. Nay, though he stands dis-engaged from all things that obliged him to that, yet the obligation to his friends is effectual, and stands firm by indissoluble ties. What makes his friendſhip moſt acceptable, is, that having a ſincere heart, and loving without intereſt, he ſerves his friends without any fear of hazarding any thing for them; and that being naturally merrily diſpoſed, his virtue hath nothing in it that is ſavage, nothing harſh, nor any thing that hinders him from having an innocent compliance for thoſe he loves. He makes them more ſenſible of the tenderneſs of his friendſhip by ſmall things, than divers others can do by great ſervices. For not only his countenance, the accent of his ſpeech, and the things he ſays demonſtrate the joy he conceives to ſee his friends, when he hath been ſome time from them, but even all his actions, though he mind it not, are expreſſions of his affection. I ſhall never forget one day, that he came to a place where he was expected by ten or twelve perſons whom he affected much, and they him no leſs; for though it ſems impoſſible a man ſhould in an inſtant acquit himſelf of all that civility and friendſhip required of him upon ſuch an occaſion, yet he came off admirably well, and what by his actions, what by his words, what by his careſſes, what by his obliging earneſtneſs, and what by his joy, he made them all underſtand that he was very much obliged to them, that he was glad to ſee them, that he loved them, that he had a hundred things to tell them, and in a word, that he had for them all the ſentiments they could wiſh he ſhould have. He ſpoke a word to one, a word to another, embraced two or three together, he reached his hand to one Lady, whiſpered to another, ſpoke aloud to them all, and it may be almoſt ſaid, that he went and came without changing place, ſo much did he endeavor to give all that were about him ſatisfaction.

Thus have you a Character of Timantes, who for friends in his retirement, had ſome few virtuous men, equally excellent with himſelf, ſuch as having been well acquainted with the World, had forſaken it as a place, where it was hard, as well for thoſe that had gotten Wiſdom to preſerve it, as for thoſe that had not to get it. They are therefore reſolved to ſeparate themſelves from the commerce of other men, and have choſen this Mountain, which is as it were a leſſer World divided from the greater, where they live innocently, and in a miraculous tranquillity. Not that they admit idleneſs, for amidſt this great quiet, they all labor both in body and mind. For their morality, tis no doubt ſevere enough, yet it is withall full of humanity, for they have cull'd out what ever was moſt excellent in the Philoſophers that went before them, digeſting it into the Laws they now obſerve.

Vice hath not the leaſt footing among them; they have among them neither Maſters nor ſlaves; ſtrict juſtice is their rule; envy they are unacquainted with; peace is their perpetual friend; and their continual imployments make them glad that they have not the leiſure to be idle. Some ſtudy things purely celeſtial, others Morality, others Poetry, and all, together things virtuous and profitable. Now theſe particular ſtudies ſoon become general; for meeting every day at certain hours to confer together, they gave an account of all they have learnt, as alſo of the reflections they have made on the things they read. So that what any one hath ſtudied, turns to the advantage of the Society, and by that innocent contribution of Science, they become the learnedſt men of their time, and withall the moſt virtuous; for one of their greateſt Maxims, is, that men ſhould not endeavor the attainment of thoſe things that make them acceptable, till they have found out whatever may make them better. Beſides, they profeſs equality among themſelves, as life and death puts among all men. So that they are all skilled in ſome Art neceſſary to the ſociety. Timantes for his part, is ſo admirably well ſeen in all the ſecrets of Agriculture, eſpecially whatever contributes to the beauty and goodneſs of Orchards, that he hath found out the way to reduce into one Garden, all the excellent fruits that all the ſeveral parts of the World affords. So that Africk and Aſia have not any, which he does not make grow and ripen in that excellent part of Europe.

He knows which require only the Sun-riſing, which his ſtrongeſt rayes at noon, he knows which require a fat ſoyl, which a drie; he knows how to plant, and to water them ſeaſonably; nay he corrects the nature of ſome fruits, by tranſplanting them after ſuch a manner as that they grow milder; in a word, it might be ſaid that the Sun hath taught them all the ſeveral degrees of heat whereby he produces indifferent Climates, fruits that are accordingly different, ſo to know how to make them grow and ripen in the ſame place, and that the ſame raies that nouriſh Orange-trees in Sicily, and make Palm-trees grow in Aſia, may produce theſe ſeveral effects in the ſame ground.

Timantes hath moreover this advantage in his retirement, that no man can charge him with chooſing that kind of life, becauſe he was not able to manage great affairs; for while he was yet young, he was put into glorious and difficult employments, wherein he made equal diſcoveries of prudence and integrity. Whence coming to learn the inconſtancy and ficklenes of Fortune, and the tumultuouſneſs of Courts, he was more fit than any other to comfort and keep up the ſpirits of an illuſtrious though unfortunate perſon, whom Fortune ſeemed deſirous to forſake. He accordingly viſited Themiſtus ſeveral times, during the firſt days of his baniſhment, and my illuſtrious friend hath told me ſince, that he thinks, that if Timantes had been acquainted with all his affliction, he had haply recovered him as well of the griping afflictions of his heart, as he did thoſe of his mind. But knowing nothing of his love, all the remedies he gave him, were only againſt ambition, I beſeech you, ſaid he to him one day, be not ſo extreamly caſt down at the exchange of your fortune; there needs no more than to be content to be unhappy, to be ſo no more, ſubmit your will to that of the Gods, and you ſhall be beyond all pity. Were you baniſhed for having betrayed your Country or your Maſter, I ſhould adviſe you to be troubled at it while you live, but ſince you are innocent, you gain more than you have loſt by loſing your fortune, your misfortunes will raiſe pity, whereas being in favor you were the object of envy, and were you wiſe you would comfort your ſelf for the loſs of a happineſs, which depending always upon another, was never truly yours. Believe me Themiſtus, it argues weakneſs in any man to build his happineſs upon his intereſt with great ones, and it ſpeaks injuſtice in him to think himſelf unhappy, when he is ſo well reconciled to himſelf, that he is not chargeable with any crime. Solitude hath its ſatisfactions as well as the Court, and though peace and innocence make no great noiſe, theſe undiſturbed pleaſures are incomparably beyond thoſe which a man muſt divide with an infinite number of people whom he would not be like. I know well you have a great and noble ſoul, but it ſometimes ſpeaks as much glory to contemn honor, as to court it. All the world is ſatisfied that you can conquer others, but it is not yet known whether you can overcome your ſelf. It is no leſs known that you exerciſed moderation in your good fortune, but it is yet doubtful whether you can undergo a bad one with conſtancy. Make it therefore your endeavor to convince your enemies, that you deſerve not your diſgrace, and that notwithſtanding their envy and malice, you can find your ſelf thoſe pleaſures which they cannot diſturb. For in a word, all the power of thoſe that baniſh you, and all the ſpight of thoſe that perſecute you, cannot hinder your complyance with reaſon and virtue. They can never while they only force you into the Countrey, added he ſmiling, hinder our Gardens from affording you their flowers and fruits, our Brooks from murmuring, our Birds from ſinging, nor you from quietly enjoying all theſe innocent entertainments of ſolitude. And therefore, Themiſtus, ſince they cannot deprive you of what a wiſe man is ſatisfied with, repine not if they only take away from you a many things which can never ſatisfie an ambitious man.

But generous Timantes, replyed Themiſtus, do you account it nothing to be diveſted of the power of obliging thouſands of people, to whom now I am grown unprofitable? I muſt needs, replyed he, have a great eſteem for that inclination of well-doing, whereby you made good uſe of the favor you were in, but it rather concerns thoſe that have loſt you, than it does your ſelf, to be troubled at your diſgrace. For in fine, true wiſdom conſiſts in an abſolute reſignation of our ſelves to the diſpoſal of the Gods, and in acting with equal virtue what condition ſoever we are in. While you were a favorite to your Prince, you were obliged to be a Patron of the unfortunate, to be liberal, and to do virtue juſtice; but now that you are out of favor, you are diſpenſed from part of thoſe things, and all you have to do, to be glorious is to be conſtant. Be ſo then, Themiſtus, if you value my advice; for a man ſuffers leſs, when he is reſolved to ſuffer, than when he endeavors to ſtruggle out of a misfortune which he muſt of neceſſity endure.

This Madam, was the effect of Timantes's diſcourſe with Themiſtus, whoſe great heart digeſted it to ſuch advantage, that he ſeemed not to be the leaſt troubled at his diſgrace. But to ſay truth, when I went to ſee him, and that he could ſpeak to me without any body by, the paſſion whereof he complained not, perſecuted him after a ſtrange manner. His ambition was eaſily chain'd up by the good counſel of thoſe wiſe and virtuous men; and ſo he minded not the raiſing of a faction in the State, or making a diviſion in the Army, as he might have done if he had endeavored it, but the love he had within him, which he made the greateſt ſecret in the World to all but to me, afforded him not one minutes reſt. When he conſidered that his diſgrace removed him both from the preſence and rank of Lindamira, he could not maſter his own thoughts, and had he not been comforted by the Leters he received from that Princeſs, he had certainly been overwhelmed by the exceſs of his affliction. What was yet very remarkable in the change of Themiſtus's fortune, was, that even thoſe that were the occaſion of it, were as unfortunate as himſelf, for Perianthus was ſo troubled about it, that he could not endure to be ſpoken to of any thing; and for Demarata, ſhe had need of all her diſſimulation to ſmother the horrid grief ſhe conceived thereat, as ſoon as the deſign, ſhe had with ſo much policy carried on, was put in execution. Nay, ſhe had no ſooner heard that Themiſtus had obeyed, but Love, reaſſuming all its force, made her to conſider him as a perſon without whom ſhe could not live.

In the mean time, ſhe ſaw not any way how ſhe could propoſe to Perianthus, that he might be recalled, nor indeed could imagine how the Prince could conſent thereto, if the neceſſity of his affairs did not force him to it, ſo that her preſent deſires being contrary to what they were formerly ſhe wiſhed the Prince of Meſſena overcome, that there might be a neceſſity of having recourſe to the valor of Themiſtus, to the end ſhe might but ſee him again.

Things being in this poſture, Themiſtus recoven of his wounds, ſo that being fully reſolved to ſpeak to the Prince, he came ſecretly near Syracuſe, and lay hid at a friends houſe, where having underſtood that the Prince was to go a hunting on a certain day, with very few about him, he reſolved to ſpeak to him, though the Prince had denyed all Themiſtus's friends the liberty ſo much as to ſee him once. He therefore got on horſeback, and followed only by one ſlave, he went to a place where he thought the Game would come, as indeed it afterwards did, and was ſo fortunate, that the Prince hunting that day more to give his thoughts a little liberty, than for any pleaſure, got purpoſely from his company, and paſſed near by the place where Themiſtus expected him. The Game being by that time quite out of ſight, and he coming to a freſh ſhady place, alighted; ſo that Themiſtus who yet lay behind the buſhes, alighted alſo, and came with an action full of reſpect and confidence together, towards Perianthus, whoſe thoughts were ſo employed, that he perceived him not, till ſuch time as he could not avoid ſpeaking to him. I beg your pardon, my Lord, ſaid he to him, for preſuming to take the liberty, to aſk you what crime I have committed, for I protest to you, that I have never done, ſaid, nor thought any thing that you can reproach me with. It argues indeed a great preſumption in you to ſee me, replyed Perianthus, and withall to ſpeak as you do. Let it ſuffice, added he, that the ſervices you have done me have ſecured your life. but pretend not to perſuade me you are innocent. I ſee my Lord, replyes Themiſtus, that the ſervices I have had the happineſs to do you, have made no great impreſſion in your heart, ſince you deny me the favor of acculing me. I neither deſire to be pardoned, nor yet to be recalled, but only to know what I am charged with: for I profeſs to you, I cannot imagine what it may be, and cannot comprehend prehend how you can thus perſecute a man that ſuffers the unjuſtice you have for me, with the ſame patience as if it were impoſſible he could do any thing but ſuffer. And yet, my Lord, I aſſure you, that if I would have hearkened to the propoſitions have been made to me, I might have made my ſelf guilty, and deſerved my diſgrace. And to ſhew you, my Lord, that I entertain you with no fiction, you may ſee by the Letters which I put into your hands, what proffers the Prince of Heraclea, and the old Prince of Meſſena have made to me I had forgot to tell you, that it was indeed true that Themiſtus had refuſed to ſide with either of theſe two Princes.) Periandus ſurpriſed at what Themiſtus ſaid to him, looked on him and ſaid nothing: ſo that not perceiving in his eyes that confuſion which he thought he ſhould have found there, he was very much at a loſs about it, ſo that though he had promiſed Demarata not to tell Themiſtus why he had baniſhed him, yet could he not forbear endeavouring to convince him of perfidiouſneſs; how ſaid he to him, you imagine then, becauſe you have held no correſpondance with my enemies, that you are innocent? And you think you have done nothing contrary to the reſpect you owe me by entertaining in your heart a mad and preſumptuous paſſion. Themiſtus was very much amazed to hear Periandus ſpeak in that manner, for he never reflected that he could be charged with loving Demarata, and thought only that Periandus had diſcovered the affection he had for the Princeſs his Siſter, and was offended at it. Not knowing therefore what anſwer to make, he ſeemed to be much at a loſs, for he knew not whether he ſhould deny or acknowledge his paſſion. So that Periandus attributing the trouble of his mind, to the confuſion it was to him to ſee his crime diſcovered, looked on him very earneſtly, and aſſuming the diſcourſe; you ſee ſaid he to him, that it is much more eaſie for me to accuſe you than you imagined. Alaſs, my Lord, replyed Themiſtus, you ſhould not think it ſtrange to find me ſurpriſed, for without telling you whether I am in love or not, I can only truly ſwear, that my heart never entertained any thing at which you might take any offence; for if I love any thing, I do it with ſo much reſpect, ſuch purity and innocence, that it were a horrid piece of injuſtice to charge me with a paſſion that is at ſo great a diſtance from all manner of crime. How, interrupted Periandus, you think, becauſe I owe you my life, that it is lawful for you to diſhonour a perſon whoſe concernments I muſt needs make my own? Not but that when I well conſider your crime, I muſt needs have ſome pity for you, ſince it cannot otherwiſe be than that your paſſion was much ſtronger than your reaſon, when it made you forget your reſpects towards me. For to be ſhort, Themiſtus, I declare it to you, that though I am your Sovereign, had you loved any perſon, I would have dyed e're I had been your Rival, and if you had had a wife, I would never have looked on her, if I had thought it could not be done, but I muſt have lov'd her. But for your, your virtue and friendſhip have not been ſo ſcrupulous, and you have thought it lawful for you to love Demarata, and ſhe muſt take no exceptions at it. You ſay, my Lord, replyed roundly Themiſtus, that I have had the boldneſs to love Demarata. I do, replyed Periandus, and you have in a manner confeſſed it your ſelf. Ah my Lord, replyes Themiſtus, if I have any love for the Princeſs, I am content you ſhould put me to all torments imaginable. Ah Themiſtus, replyed Periandus, add not falſhood to your preſumption, acknowledge your weakneſs, repent you of it, and go and ſeek cure for your extravagancy in ſome place ſo far from Sicily, that the name of Demarata may not entertain ſo much as in your heart the mad paſſion that hath ſeized it.

This put Themiſtus to a very ſad extremity, for his own generoſity would not permit him to tell the Prince that he was himſelf loved by Demarata, beſides that, if he had, he would not have been credited. Nor durſt he, on the other ſide, diſcover the true paſſion he had in his ſoul, which would have juſtified him, for fear of diſpleaſing Lindamira. However, he reſolved to ſay he was in love, the better to perſuade Periandus that he did not love Demarata. Could I be perſuaded, My Lord, ſaid he, to acquaint you with the only ſecret which I never yet have, you would ſoon find, that I am far from loving Demarata. For, My Lord, I muſt confeſs, that I have for an admirable perſon, ſo violent a paſſion in my ſoul, that it affords me not one minutes reſt, and which ſo fills it, that all other beauties in the world move me not. But for Demarata, My Lord, I ſwear by what ever is moſt ſacred, that if I had ſurpriſed in my heart any ſentiment too paſſionate for her, I ſhould have plucked it out, rather than run the hazard of deſerving the title of a perfidious and ungrateful perſon. But Themiſtus, replyed Periandus, whence comes it then, that Demarata thinks you love her? Ah, my Lord, replied he, it is impoſſible ſhe ſhould believe any ſuch thing; ſhe ſo far believes it, replyes Periandus very innocently, that ſhe would never be quiet till I had baniſhed you. I am therefore as unfortunate as innocent, replyes Themiſtus, for there is not any thing at ſuch a vaſt diſtance from truth; and if there be any one that can affirm, I have either ſaid or done any thing, whence it might be inferred I had any love for Demarata, I would have you look on me no otherwiſe than as the baſeſt of your ſubjects. So that my Lord, added Themiſtus, the Princeſs muſt needs proceed upon ſome light imaginations that I loved her, and miſinterpret my actions, or I muſt think, that for ſome reaſon unknown to me, it hath been her deſign to ruine me in your thoughts. Might it pleaſe the Gods, replyed Periandus, that you were innocent, and that an over-ſcrupulous virtue had obliged Demarata to think you had forgot the reſpect you ought to her. For in a word, Themiſtus, Demarata, excepted, I have not had ſo great an affection for any one as I have had for you, and I alſo owe you as many obligations as a Prince can do a ſubject. For if my firſt favors have preceded your ſervices, your ſervices have ſince very much exceeded my favors; and therefore I would give half my ſtate that you were innocent. If you ſpeak truly, added he, you may eaſily in ſome ſort juſtifie your ſelf, ſince you have no more to do than to tell me whom you are in love with; but be ſure you tell me no lie, for if you do I ſhall eaſily diſcover it, I ſhall conclude you guilty, and ſhall never pardon you.

I muſt

I must needs confeſs my Lord, replyed Themiſtus, that I am in a very great diſtraction, for I have confeſſed unawares that I was in love, and I ſhall not retract it. But my Lord, to tell you with whom, is a thing I cannot do, and I beſeech you command me not to do it. No, no, replyes hotly Perianthus, there is no mean, you muſt either ſpeak ſincerely, or be found guilty in my judgment, and leave my Dominions immediately. This put Themiſtus into an expreſſible diſturbance; for to leave Sicily ſo as never to return thither, and never to ſee Lindamira more, he thought the moſt inſupportable thing in the World. Thence he felt a temptation to tell Perianthus the truth, but conſidering the thing well, he ſaw he ſhould not be credited; yet as wretched as his condition was, he could not affirm that Demarata loved him, much leſs diſcover the affection he had for the Princeſs of Himera, not only for fear of provoking him, but out of a fear he would not be much leſs blameable, as to Perianthus, for Lindamira than for Demarata. He therefore fell to intreaties, that the Prince would be ſatisfied with the aſſurances he gave him of his innocence, not to force him to diſcover whom he loved, and to grant him the favor to go and dye in his ſervice; for though I have had the honor to command your Army, yet will I now fight as a private Souldier, conditionally you give me encouragement to hope that you will hearken to what ever may tend to my juſtification. The way I propoſe is ſo eaſie, ſays Perianthus, that if you will not be tryed by it, you muſt be guilty. For I promiſe you an inviolable fidelity, if you tell me whom you are in love with. In a word, do but convince me you are in love, and I ſhall not imagine that you have ſo much as thought on Demarata; for the poſture of your fortune conſidered, it was not a thing to be pretended. If therefore you are innocent, be not ſo obſtinate againſt your own intereſts. I have already told you, that I would obſerve an inviolable fidelity towards you, and I tell you ſo again. Ah, My Lord, replyed Themiſtus tranſported with grief, all this is not enough, for though I love not the Princeſs, yet haply am I nevertheleſs criminal. Ah Themiſtus, provided you do not love Demarata, I pardon you all other affections, even though you ſhould love my Siſter. Pardon me then, my Lord (ſaid he, overcome with his affliction) for there is nothing ſo true, as that ſince my return into Sicily, I have had, whether I would or no, the moſt violent, the moſt pure, and the moſt eager paſſion for her that ever any man had. This my Lord, is the great ſecret which I beſeech you to preſerve ſuch, ſo as not to communicate it to the Princeſs Demarata, or the Princeſs of Himera; unleſs you would have me dye with deſpair. That done, my Lord, puniſh me as a preſumptuous perſon, I am content; but I beſeech you look not on me as a baſe and perfidious man.

Perianthus was ſo glad to underſtand by Themiſtus's manner of expreſſing himſelf, that he really had no love for Demarata, that he eaſily excuſed him for being in love with the Princeſs of Himera. He therefore very kindly embraced him; I know, ſaid he to him, that there is a great diſproportion between my Siſter and you, but Themiſtus, your merit equals you with all the world, and your deſires are at liberty for any thing but the affection of Demarata. But you have a Rival in the head of my Army, and he made a requeſt to me at his departure, which certainly will much trouble me: but however, I am ſo overjoyed, that I can afford you my friendſhip again, that nothing can henceforth cauſe me any diſturbance. And yet, added he, I muſt return, I muſt humor Demarata, and undeceive her, by aſſuring her that you love her not, and that ſhe is maſtaken, upon ſuch conjectures as an over-ſcrupulous virtue hath cauſed her to miſinterpret. Themiſtus who knew the ſecret of Demarata's heart, eaſily perceived that this would not reconcile her to him; but not knowing what to oppoſe to what Perianthus ſaid to him, he recommended all to fortune. So the Prince having left him, he returned to the place of his retirement, whence Perianthus aſſured him he ſhould ſoon be ſent for.

Now this interview of the Prince and Themiſtus, ſeeming very ſtrange to thoſe that accompanyed him a hunting, one of them came and told the Princeſs of it, before Perianthus had ſeen her, ſo that her mind was in a ſtrange diſtraction, out of the fear ſhe was in that Themiſtus had told Perianthus the naked truth. But when ſhe ſaw him come into the Chamber with an undiſturbed, free, and flattering countenance towards her, her fear was diſperſed, and ſhe was convinced that Themiſtus had been ſo generous as not to accuſe her. So that being aſhamed of her crime, ſhe repented her ſelf ſo much the more, that ſhe had been the occaſion of his baniſhment. In the mean time aſſoon as he was at liberty to ſpeak to her looking on her very kindly, my hunting to day hath proved more fortunate to me, ſaid he to her, than I expected, ſince it hath proved the occaſion of my meeting Themiſtus, nay Themiſtus innocent. For he hath told me ſo many things, whence I infer that you have been miſtaken, that I have undertaken to be his interceſſor to you, and to oblige you to give me leave to ſend for him again. Demarata, whoſe ſentiments were ſuch at that time, that ſhe was glad Themiſtus might be recalled, carried her ſelf very craftily, that is, my Lord, replyes ſhe, Themiſtus's love is cured by his ambition; and ſeeing his fortunes over-turned, he repents, or ſeems to repent him of his extravagance. And yet, added ſhe, having obſerved you ſo much troubled at his abſence, I am abſolutely reſolved not to meddle with any thing that concerns him, and therefore do what you pleaſe with him. Demarata ſpoke this with a certain coldneſs, and withal ſomewhat of anger, that Perianthus thought ſhe was troubled at the return of Themiſtus, and therefore thinking he did very well in order to a reconciliation between them; he told her, that upon promiſe of ſecrecie, he would immediately convince her, that Themiſtus loved her not; for in fine (continued he after ſhe had promiſed him what he deſired) I know whom Themiſtus hath been infinitely in love with, ever ſince his return into Sicily. Demarata ſurpriſed at what Perianthus ſaid, felt a great tempeſt within her. However, endeavoring what ſhe could to diſſemble her ſentiments, ſhe pretended ſhe could not believe what Perianthus ſaid, whereupon importuning him to tell what he knew, he told her at laſt that he was in love with Lindamira.

To tell you Madam, what ſhe felt at that inſtant when ſhe heard that Themiſtus, who ſhe thought, had had never known any love, was so much in it, were impossible for me: insomuch, that jealousie combining with the trouble already within her, she had much ado to dissemble it. But it being not in her power to forbear considering that Themistus had not accused her, she stifled her thoughts, and notwithstanding the distraction within her, she betrayed no disturbance in her countenance, and durst not change sentiments while she spoke to Perianthus, lest he should at length discover what was in her soul. So that not saying ought positively, she stood to her former resolution, which was not to meddle with ought that concerned Themistus, adding withall, that if he would oblige her, he should not be recalled for some days. Perianthus perceiving Demarata inclining to peace, was very glad of it, for it confirmed him in the opinion he was of that she was angry without cause, and that conscious of it, she would comply by degrees.

He therefore left her, to go and send Themistus word, that he should be recalled within a few days; but Demarata being alone with Amerintha, and having related to her what had happened between Perianthus and Themistus, and between Perianthus and her self, what did she not say in the extremity of her affliction? It must now be granted, said she to her, that I am very unfortunate; for it is not enough to incur the shame of loving, and not being loved again; but I must withall have the misery to understand that Themistus is in love with another, and to know that it is impossible but he must have an aversion for me. For looking on me now as the occasion of his disgrace, he must of necessity hate me. And yet it is the pleasure of my destiny, that I should be exposed to see Themistus whom I cannot but affect; nay to see him in love with Lindamira, and favorite to the Prince, whom he may tell when he pleases, that I love him, and that I have given him some expressions thereof. But what troubles me most of all, is, that in all probability he will triumph over my weakness when he speaks with Lindamira, for since he loves, 'tis infallible he is belov'd.

But Madam, says Amerintha to her, since he hath been so discreet as not to tell it the Prince, he will keep it from the Princess of Himera. Ah, Amerintha, replyed she, a Man tells his Mistris what he would not his Master: but as I have begun with imposture, so I must end with it; and if it be possible, raise a jealousie in Lindamira, since I cannot love in Themistus. Accordingly Demarata went the next morning to visit Lindamira, with whom she desired some private discourse. She no sooner saw her, but all the melancholly of her heart rose up into her face, so that Lindamira asking her the reason of it, Demarata behaved her self so subtilly, that she was forced to be intreated diverse times to tell what it was that troubled her. Woe is me, said she, when I came hither, it was my intention to disburthen my heart to you; but now that I am come I have not the power. Lindamira renewing her intreaties thereupon, Demarata, the better to compass her proposed end, told her as a great secret a meer fiction. She told her, that Themistus had loved her from her infancy, that at his return into Sicily, he had given her divers expressions of his love, but that she had slighted them so far that he durst not continue them. And he hath told me since, added this subtil Princess, that he did all that lay in his power to fall in love with you, and that he had given you occasion to think he loved you. How, Madam, replyes Lindamira, blushing, hath Themistus told you that he had given me any cause to think him in love with me. Methinks you may easily see, replyes Demarata, that I could not have invented what I tell you, nor yet imagined it.

But this is not all I have to tell you, added she, for you are to know, that Themistus forgetting the respect he ought me, I, not able to endure the sight of him, prevailed with the Prince to put him out of favor. Now meeting him yesterday as he was a hunting, and speaking to him, Themistus hath made his peace, and persuaded him he never had any love for me: So that he hath made you the excuse of his extravagance, and therefore I am very glad, I have had the occasion to give you notice of it, that if the Prince speak to you of any such thing, you may know what answer to make him. But to deal freely with you, might I have my will, the presumptuous Themistus should never see the Court again. However, I beseech you, do not expose me at the same time to the indignation of the Prince and his favorite, and therefore let them not know any thing of what I have told you; and lest a long discourse in private may raise any suspicion of me, I shall leave you assoon as you have told me how you will have me to behave my self. Your own prudence is such, Madam, replied Lindamira very much amaz'd, that it is not for me to give you advice. Demarata perceiveing the Princess of Himera would not discover her self to her, departed with some light satisfaction; but she was no sooner gone, but Lindamira received a Letter from Themistus, wherein were these words.

I will not be long e're fortune give me leave to wait on you; I shall haply seem somewhat blameable to you, but I have still the confidence, that if I am guilty, it proceeds meerly from the excess of my love.

Lindamira summing up Demarata's discourse, and Themistus's Letter together, knew not what to think of the discretion and fidelity of her Lover. She could not absolutely convince him of infidelity, but she thought there was some reason to charge him with indiscretion. She had not spent a quarter of an hour in reflecting on this troublesome adventure, but jealousie disturbing her reason, she concluded him both indiscreet and unfaithful; for Themistus having not acquainted her with any thing had past between Demarata and him; and that she never had observed any signs of aversion for him in the carriage of that Princess, she could not apprehend why she should impose a crime of that nature upon him. So that not knowing Themistus to be naturally ambitious, she began to suspect, that he loved in general, whatever was above himself. You may judge, Madam, how she was netled at it; Moricia, whom she acquainted with her her affliction, would oblige her not to condemn Themiſtus before ſhe had heard him; but ſhe could not forbear writing to him in a manner diſobliging enough, for ſhe only ſent him theſe words.

IF you are as guilty as you ſeem to be to my apprehenſion, you are for ever baniſhed the heart of Lindamira.

Themiſtus receiving this Letter, was extreamly troubled, and withall much ſurpriſed at it; for the Prince had promiſed to be faithful to him, nor indeed had Perianthus ſaid any thing of what Themiſtus had truſted him with to Lindamira, and thought that to tell it Demarata was to tell it no body. At laſt this Prince, being extreamly impatient to ſee Themiſtus, ſent for him to Court. And having to that end written to Timantes, and all thoſe illuſtrious Solitaries whom I have ſpoken to you of, they were troubled at his return, to a place where it was hard to preſerve honor, and adviſed him by their Letters to reaſſume it, ſo as that he might looſe it again, and to look on fortune as a fantaſtick Deity, whom a virtuous perſon honored by ſubmitting to her. Themiſtus whoſe heart was burthened with a ſecret grief which he could not maſter, was in a manner as ſad at his return to the Court, as he had been at his departure thence. At laſt he got thither, and reſolved to overcome all obſtacles that ſhould hinder his deſign, or die. The Prince entertained him with the greateſt kindneſs that could be; he met with all thoſe Sycophants, that had forſaken him in his diſgrace. Perianthus brought him to make a ſhort viſit to Demarata, out of a fear that if he did it not, the cauſe might haply be gueſſed at. That Princeſs received him with a certain cold civility, admirably ſuitable to all ſhe had done before. That done, Themiſtus followed the Prince to his lodgings, who perceiveing ſome diſturbance in him, took him aſide, and ſpoke to him with a very obliging countenance; I ſee, ſaid he to him, that you are extreamly troubled at what you made me privy to, and that you are in doubt whether I ſhould take it well that you ſee my Siſter. But Themiſtus, I am ſo glad that you do not love Demarata, that I leave you to your ſelf; beſides that, to be free with you, I am ſo well ſatisfied of my ſiſters virtue, that I am not troubled at it at all. Nor have I told her any thing of what I had from you, nor ſhall ever, till you think it convenient.

Themiſtus thinking himſelf infinitely obliged by this obliging carriage of the Prince towards him, gave him millions of thanks, and proteſted to him, his ſoul had never been guilty of an unworthy thought; whereupon he went to Lindamira, whom he found half-indiſpoſed. At firſt, this Princeſs entertained him with an extream coldneſs, which ſoon after turned into anger, till at laſt ſhe made a thouſand reproaches to him of perfidiouſneſs, inconſtancy and indiſcretion. So that Themiſtus was ſo aſtoniſhed, that one would have ſaid, he had been guilty. How Madam, ſaid he to her, when ſhe had given over ſpeaking? Is it thus you receive an unfortunate man that expected no joy by his return to the Court, than what proceeded from the hope of finding you the ſame perſon he had left you. To find me ſuch as I was, replyes Lindamira, you ſhould not have come hither unfaithful, and indiſcreet. Ah Madam, replyed he, you charge me with too much rigor ſor if I were unfaithful, you would not charge me with infidelity. What you ſay is ſo obſcure, anſwered ſhe, that it is apparent you are guilty, and that you have no good plea to make for your ſelf. But to begin with your indiſcretion, is it not true, that you have told the Prince my Brother, what you never ought to have told any one, which if you might have done, Perianthus ſhould have been the laſt of all the World to hear it. Themiſtus was much ſurpriſed to ſee his Maſter had not kept his word with him, but at length recovering himſelf a little, Alaſs! Madam, ſaid he to her, had you been in my place, you had ſaid what I have; for I was in ſuch an unfortunate poſture of affairs, that I muſt have loſt you for ever; nay expoſed my ſelf, to the reputation of an unfaithful perſon in your judgment, had you known the cauſe of my baniſhment. While you only tell me things I underſtand not, replyed ſhe roundly, I ſhall not be friends with you: but in few words (added ſhe, not giveing him the leiſure to ſpeak) the truth of the buſineſs is this, that you made it no great difficulty to expoſe me, ſo to conceal your true paſſion, and made it your only means to keep the Prince my Brother from diſcovering your love to Demarata. You had ſaid more truly Madam, had you ſaid believing inſtead of diſcovering, for it is true, I would not have the Prince to think me an unworthy and ungrateful perſon. But I proteſt to you Madam, that when I confeſſed to him the affection I had for you, ſo to hinder him from conceiving I loved Demarata, I did it principally out of a conſideration of providing, that you ſhould not one day ſuſpect me to have been unfaithful: for if the Prince had believed it, he would have told you as much, and you would haply have thought I had been really ſuch, Beſides that, the Prince having ſaid he would pardon me all things, conditionally I were not in love with Demarata, I muſt confeſs, I thought it concerned me very much, he ſhould know I had taken the boldneſs to direct my affections to you. But Madam, I have not told him I had the happineſs of any favor from you. You have done better than you imagine, replyed ſhe, for I do not think at the preſent ever to do you any. But Madam, what have I done that I ſhould be ſo loſt to your affection, replyes Themiſtus, am I unworthy of it, becauſe I am unfortunate, and unjuſtly perſecuted? You deſerve all the averſion and all the revenge I can have for you, replyed ſhe, for pretending to love me when you loved Demarata. Do I love Demarata, replyed he haſtily, from whom have you it? from Demarata her ſelf, anſwers Lindamira, who hates you as much as I would hate you. Ah Madam, replyed he, Demarata is unworthy the diſcretion I have had for her, and ſince ſhe is bent every way to ruine me, I muſt at leſt endeavor the preſervation of your affection, which is the only happineſs I look after, and without which I could not live. But Madam, you muſt hear me without prejudice, nay, you muſt hear me with a certain goodneſs; for I have concealed one thing from you, which I ſhall now have much ado to acquaint you withall, though my juſtification depends on it, and that I am only to impeach a perſon that endeavors my ruine. But all conſidered, considered, Madam, I think I have not offended much against the love I have for you, in not telling you that I had taken notice that Demarata had some inclinations towards me; nor do I think I offend much against honour by acknowledging it now, since she hath endeavoured to destroy me in your thoughts. But Themistus, replied she, could Demarata have loved you, if you had not loved her? Alas, Madam, can you put that question to me, when you know that I have loved you a long time, without being loved? You, who cannot be ignorant that you are the absolute Mistress of my heart; you, who know well enough that I am neither base nor perfidious, and who should, methinks, be satisfied that I look not upon any thing on earth but your self? But why have you not told me before, what you do now, replies Lindamira? Out of a conceit, Madam, replied he, that a person of honour should never speak any thing against a woman, by whom he is loved, even though he had the greatest aversion that could be for her. So that to forbear doing what might prejudice Demarata, and withal cause you to esteem me the less, I have concealed the weakness of that Princess from you, which I might rationally think she had overcome.

Lindamira somewhat appeased at this, was desirous to know all that had passed between Demarata and Themistus, so that he gave her an account of the conversation he had heretofore had with that Princess, when it was her design to engage him to tell her that he was in love with her; and thence fell upon a hundred little passages he had observed at several times, to the conference he had had with the Prince the day he had met with him a hunting. Themistus discovered such a sincerity through all this relation, and entertained Lindamira with so many passionate things, that she concluded him to be innocent. But they at the same time perceived they were both equally unfortunate, in that they were exposed to the fury of a jealous and exasperated Woman, of whom Perianthus was still very fond. However, this reconciliation was not concluded without much kindness; yet with this resolution, that they would see one another privately as seldom as might be, the less to incense the jealous Demarata, whose sufferings were greater than can well be imagined.

Things standing thus, news came that the Prince of Messena had gained a battel, which cost Themistus the displeasure of being forced publickly to rejoyce at the glory of his Rival. But for Demarata she was extreamly satisfied at it; not out of any reflection on the advantage of the State thereby, but a conceit, that after that service done, it was impossible Perianthus should deny the Princess of Himera to the Prince of Messena; and indeed, the end of the Campagne approaching, he returns to Syracuse, where he was no sooner arrived, but Demarata furthering his interests, and giving him advice, he demanded Lindamira of the Prince of Syracuse. He satisfied him, that the Prince his Father would consent thereto, and pressed the business so much, that Perianthus was sufficiently troubled with him. However, he told the Prince of Messena, that Lindamira was at liberty to dispose of her self, and that for his consent he might assure himself of it, provided he gained hers.

Themistus durst not all this while discover his resentments, out of the respects he had for his master; but withal resolved, if he perceived Lindamira at a loss, as to what she should do, to perish himself, or dispatch his Rival out of the way. Insomuch that the Princess of Himera perceiving in him those inclinations to hatred towards the Prince of Messena, which he had much ado to smother, resolved to take another way, which proved effectual. Looking therefore on the Prince of Messena, as a person of much reason and generosity, she took him one day in a private discourse. I know, my Lord, said she to him, that the marriages of persons of your condition and mine, are commonly concluded without affection; but since you would have me believe that you have some for me, you were certainly unhappy not to be loved again: and therefore I beseech you, be no longer obstinate, for I have certain particular reasons, for which I shall never love you in the manner you would have me. So that you would make me unhappy, without being happy your self, even though I were forced to marry you, which it were not easie to do. To this the Prince of Messena answered her, with what ever the love he had within him could suggest, that were most likely to prevail with her, but not doing any good, he left her with abundance of affliction, seeming to be resolved to obey her, and to return home; for the Prince his Father had at length executed the Treaty, seeing the War of Heraclea proved so unsuccessful. But being that night at the Palace very sad, Demarata, whose jealousie and indignation daily increased, asked him privately what troubled him. Whereupon the Prince having acquainted her with what had passed between the Princess of Himera and him, and the resolution he had taken, she was so troubled at it, that, to divert him from quitting his design, she told him she should not do so, and that Themistus was not a person to contest with him, for the affection of Lindamira. The Prince of Messena was much surprised at what Demarata said, for he had never suspected any thing of the love of Themistus. On the contrary, 'Twas he that had given him the name of the Insensible Courtier; but reflecting on things past, he remembred that Themistus had ever avoided his company, when he would have entertained him with his affection for Lindamira, so that he thence drew those consequences, which obliged him to credit what Demarata said, who seeming to concern her self in his interests, told him she should not so give over, adding, that Themistus was a presumptuous person, that had more ambition in him than love. Demarata in the mean time never considered that she created a jealousie in a Lovers heart, whereof she could not hinder the consequences. In a word, from that day, the Prince of Messena had so much ado to endure Themistus, that Themistus perceived it: for a Rival that hates, soon discovers the hatred of his enemy. So that feeling within him, something of cruelty which he could not hinder from breaking forth, he out of prudence avoided his company. But as chance would have it, meeting alone, with their slaves, upon the Achradina, where Themistus had hazarded his life for the Prince of Messena, they took a turn about, without saying ought to one another. Which done, the Prince of Messena speaking first, and falling immediately to the business, will you do me the favour Themistus, said he, as to answer me sincerely to what I ask. I engage my self, replies Themistus, to tell you that I cannot answer you, if you ask me a thing, which I would not, or ought not to tell you. Tell me then, replies the Prince of Messena, whether it be true, that a man that cannot be happy himself, doth not offend in hindring another to be so? What you say is so general, replies Themistus, that I cannot answer thereto; because sometimes there are those particular circumstances, which hinder the most general Rules that are to be such. Since you would have me to explain my self, replies the Prince of Messena, I am content, nor indeed, should I go otherwise than in plain terms, when I speak to a man upon the very place, where he had hazarded his life upon my account. I am therefore to confess, that I know of your being in love with the Princess of Himera; but since she will not in all likelihood, ever marry you, methinks I may, without being thought ungrateful, intreat you to tell me, whether you are loved by her: for if she loves you, I will absolutely quit my design upon her, and will be gone to morrow towards Messena; if she does not, I will prosecute it as I can, to bring it to some period. Since you know that I love Lindamira, replies Themistus, I shall not disavow it; but to tell you I am loved by her, is that you shall never know from me: for if I am, I were indiscreet, and unworthy to tell it without her permission; and if I am not, I should not very easily afford you the joy to know so much, since you are my Rival. But my Lord, since you deal very obligingly with me, I will tell you ingeniously, that, for Lindamira's satisfaction, you should give over all thoughts of wedding her, for I am so well acquainted with her intentions, as to that point, that I can assure you, she will never make you happy? And where you say, my Lord, I can never be such, I know not what you ground your assertion upon; for Love and Fortune are wont to do things more extraordinary. Certain it is I am no Prince, added he, but my birth is noble enough to encourage me to aspire to any thing, and whoever hath such a heart as I have, thinks few things above him. Nay then, Themistus, saies the Prince of Messena, you are lov'd, and I have no more to do, but to think of my departure, since honor will not suffer me to be ungrateful, and that the Princess Lindamira loves you I have not told you she does, replies Themistus, but only that she cannot make you happy. But if I one day understand, that you have been loved by her, replied this Prince angrily, I shall have a quarrel against you. You may make what quarrel you please of it, replies Themistus coldly, for I am ever in a capacity to satisfie those that have any quarrel against me.

The Prince of Messena, confirmed hereby, that Themistus was loved by Lindamira, had immediately the greatest hatred in the world for him: so that this discourse which had been begun kindly enough, grew so bitter, that the Prince of Messena and Themistus came at last to blows. The latter generously did all that lay in his power, to avoid coming to that extremity, as fore-seeing the sad consequences of that unhappy business; but the Prince of Messena having drawn his sword, the other could do no less than defend himself. 'Tis true, he did it with that courage, that, how valiant soever the Prince of Messena might be, he made a shift to receive two great wounds, and to be disarmed, before those whom their slaves went to the Palace for, were come to separate them. You may imagine what a noise this Duel made in the Court, and what advantage Demarata made of it, in order to her revenge.

The news was no sooner come, but she went to the Prince, and confidently asked him, whether he would still suffer that presumptuous person in his Court, whose temerity was now come to the highest pitch. For in fine, added she, the business is out of all controversie, because if Themistus be in love with Lindamira, he further affronts you, for he ought no more to pretend to your Sisters than your Wife. In the interim, you see he fights with a Prince, as if their contestation were, who should marry Lindamira. But, Madam, replied Perianthus, the Prince of Messena drew first upon Themistus. 'Tis true, continued she; but it is as certain that Themistus affronted the Prince of Messena, when you are obliged to for a great victory, as well as the other.

While they were thus engaged, Themistus, who was lightly wounded in the left arm, sent to the Prince to excuse what had past; and the Prince of Messena sent also to him, to crave pardon that he had engaged against a person he loved: so that not minding much what Demarata said, he visited them both; but being a little exasperated by her speeches, he spoke not to Themistus with his ordinary kindness, for after divers things said, concerning his fighting with the Prince of Messena: how-e'r it may be, saies the Prince to him, you are to blame, for you know that you are not to entertain any thoughts of marrying my Sister. I know my Lord, replyed he, I am not worthy that honor, but I know much better, that you had the goodness to pardon me the love I have for her, and that you have not forbidden me to have any. I have neither forbidden you, nor permitted you, replied Perianthus, and have only pardoned you a passion, which I thought your reason would have advised you to dis-ingage. It hath so long advised me to it ineffectually, replied Themistus, that it hath at last given over. Since it is so, replies Perianthus, I must needs command you to do it. Ah, my Lord, replies Themistus, when men command things impossible, it argues they would not be obeyed. Are you, my Lord, able to cease loving Demarata, if there were any one in the world had a right to lay that unjust command upon you? How-e'r it be, saies the Prince, I begin to find out, that Demarata knows you better than I do, since your ambition hath no limits. For I now see clearly, that you pretend to marry Lindamira, and must needs believe, that the friendship you express towards me, and the love to her, are only the effects of an insatiable ambition, whence you equally derive your friendship, your love, nay, your valour too.

As you are my Master, replies Themistus, I am to suffer any thing at your hands; but if you would consider it well, you would find that the love you bear Demarata, will soon stifle the friendship you have had for Themistus. And if you do it, my Lord, added he, you will be more unjust than you conceive your self: for in fine, Demarata hates me without any cause. Be it so or not, think no more on Lindamira, saies Perianthus, if you would preserve my affection.

Having

Having ſaid ſo, Perianthus went out and left Themiſtus in a ſtrange affliction. A little after the Prince was gone, I came in, and ſaw the firſt eruptions of it. Now, my dear Meleagenes, ſaid he to me, what think you of my croſs fortune? All that I think to do for my ſelf ruines me; all the ſervices I do, raiſe up ungrateful perſons to perſecute me, my victories ſerve only, either to make my Rival victorious, or to ſtrengthen the power of an ungrateful Maſter, who would rather hearken to a perfidious Woman, than to a faithful ſubject that hath ſaved his life; ſo that to make my miſery full weight, there needs no more than that Lindamira diſclaim me. The Prince is now gone in to her, replied I, and no doubt but he will ſpeak to her againſt you. Nay, I believe, continued I, that the Princeſs will not have the confidence to tell him that ſhe loves you, and that ſhe will ever continue it, though I am perſwaded ſhe is reſolved to be faithful to you. What reſolution the Prince will take, I know not, replies Themiſtus, but I find in my ſelf, that if he forget the ſervices I have done him, and will force Lindamira to marry my Rival, I ſhall forbear no extremity to make him underſtand himſelf, and to hinder Lindamira to be taken away from me. But why did you not let him know what Demarata was? ſaid I to him (for then he had told me the truth:) Alas Meleagenes, replied he, do you think he could have believed me, having no proofs to give him. No, no, that had been to no purpoſe, but if I engage with his enemies, I ſhall haply make victory change ſides. Yet could I not do that without much difficulty, but Love and Ambition may force an unfortunate man whom all are bent to ruine, to do ſtrange things.

To contract therefore my relation, Madam, which is already but too long, we had no ſooner heard, that Perianthus was gone from Lindamira's, but I went to her on the behalf of Themiſtus. I found her extreamly troubled, for the Prince had not only ſeemed very much incens'd againſt Themiſtus, but he had ſaid many things to her, whence ſhe feared he would force her to marry the Prince of Meſſena. Which ſhe oppoſing as much as ſhe could, he had ask'd her whether ſhe would have Themiſtus, adding, That Favourites may be made of all ſorts of perſons, but that ſhe ſhould not make him a Brother-in-law, but of a perſon of his rank and quality. So that Lindamira being unwilling to make him a punctual anſwer, had only intreated him not to believe all that Demarata ſhould ſay to him, becauſe ſhe might be pre-poſſeſſed, But the Prince being pre-poſſeſſed himſelf, Lindamira did only incenſe him the more, and ſo he returned to the Palace, where he found Demarata in a kind and flattering humour, ſuch as won him ſo much, that ſhe put him upon what reſolutions ſhe pleaſed. She perſwaded him, that it extreamly concerned him, as things ſtood, to do an action of Authority, that it might appear, Themiſtus governed not him as he pleaſed. That there was a fair opportunity to do it, ſince that beſtowing Lindamira on the Prince of Meſſena, he would hinder that Princeſs from committing any folly; he would recompence a Prince that had done him good ſervice, he would pull down the pride of Themiſtus, and bring him ſo much under for ever after, that he ſhould never ſtiffen on any new pretence of extravagance.

Demarata ſeconded this with whatever a perſon of a great and ſubtil wit, experienc'd and malicious could ſay, that manages a revenge proceeding from Love. So that Perianthus, whoſe only imperfection was his facility for thoſe he loved, thought of nothing but the execution of it. To that end, he had an extraordinary care of the Prince of Meſſena, little or none for Themiſtus; he went himſelf, and brought Lindamira to be lodged in the Palace, upon pretence of ſome deſign he had heard there was to carry her away; ſo that Themiſtus was deprived of the comfort of ſeeing her; for beſides that, he had a ſlight hurt, the Prince ſent him word he ſhould not come into the Palace, till he had ſent him order to that purpoſe. Thus was Themiſtus the moſt unfortunate man in the World, and Demarata entertained ſo great a joy at it, that ſhe diſcovered it in all her actions. So that Perianthus obſerving it, and perceiving that ſhe hated Themiſtus, began to be jealous again, and to be almoſt perſwaded, that what ſhe had ſaid to him before was true, becauſe he ſaw no other apparent occaſion of her hatred. He did not therefore only do what he did violently, but alſo without prudence, or any reflection on the influence Themiſtus had over the Soldiery: he ſpoke bitterly of him, even in publique, and ſaying openly, that he would make it a match between the Prince of Meſſena and Lindamira, aſſoon as he was recoverd of his wound; he ſent Themiſtus order to leave Syracuſe. Nay, my friend had notice given him, that he was to be ſecured aſſoon as he were out of the City, where they durſt not take him, as being much the darling of the people. Being in this condition, this deſperate Lover would fain have taken leave of his Princeſs, and he had been confident enough, and haply cunning enough to find out the means to do it, but fearing ſhe might forbid him the execution of any ſuch deſign, he was content only to ſend her this Letter.

The unfortunate THEMISTUS to the Princeſs LINDAMIRA.

I Depart, Madam, and I depart the moſt miſerable of all men, to tell you whether I am going, I am not able, and yet I queſtion not but I ſhall find out the ways to deliver you and revenge my ſelf. I ſhall haply do thoſe things which at firſt ſight you may blame me for; but if you prove not unconſtant, the event will convince you, that I ſhall do nothing contrary to reaſon. Be conſtant therefore, Madam, ſo to prevent my reſentments, from reaching ſo far, as otherwiſe they might; for if I loſe you, there is not any thing which I ſhall not endeavour to deprive them of, who ſhould be the occaſion of ſo great a misfortune to me.

This Letter being delivered to my Siſter, who ſtill had the liberty to ſee Lindamira, though ſhe was kept very cloſe, Themiſtus departed, and I ſtayed at Syracuſe to give him an account of what paſſed there. But inſtead of returning to the place where he had been before, he went to the Army, and did there againſt Syracuſe, what Brutus did for Rome in Tarquin's Army; that is, made himſelf the Maſter of it, ſo far, that it was at his choice, either to bring it up againſt Perianthus, or againſt the Prince of Heraclea. 'Tis true, this Prince was ſo far unfurniſhed with Horſe, that he was not in a condition to keep the field. Whence it came, that he ſent to Themiſtus as ſoon as he underſtood how things went, to treat with him; but my friend, without either making any breach, or yet treating, put him off with delaies, and began his march towards Syracuſe. That which furthered the execution of his deſign, was, that there was no Officer but held his place from Themiſtus; for the former War having been very bloudy, all the Officery in a manner was changed. Beſides that, being of a very liberal and gallant diſpoſition, the hearts of the Soldiery was at his command, and that the exceſſive affection Perianthus had for Demarata, was prejudicial to that Prince, and advantageous to Themiſtus.

The report of the revolt of the Army was no ſooner come to Syracuſe, but Demarata inſulted over Themiſtus after a ſtrange manner. Nay, ſhe perſwaded Perianthus, that it was fit Lindamira ſhould be ſecured, and accordingly ſhe was put into a Tower, on the quarter of the Hexapila, out of a fear, that if ſhe remained on the Achradina ſide, ſome deſign might be laid to carry her away by the advantage of the Sea. However, ſhe was attended with abundance of reſpect, but ſhe was withal kept very cloſe, and ſtrong guards about her. The Prince of Meſſena, who lay ſtill under cure, was extreamly afflicted that he had been the occaſion of ſo much diſorder, yet was it ſome comfort to him, that Themiſtus was not at the Court; but Perianthus was at his wits end almoſt. Not but that he is a very gallant perſon, but having only his guards about him, that he could truſt himſelf to, he knew not what to reſolve on: the people of Syracuſe were diſcontented, and would not arm, to defend themſelves againſt a man that had brought them peace, and whoſe valour was their terror; a great number of the grandees charged Demarata with imprudence, and Perianthus with facility, ſo that all the Prince could do, was to ſecure the Gates of the City. For Lindamira, though ſhe well knew that Themiſtus did not what he did, but out of the affection he had for her, yet could ſhe not forbear being very much exaſperated againſt him, to have brought things to that extremity, without making her acquainted with his deſignes. 'Twas to no great purpoſe that I ſecretly gave her notice, that Themiſtus's deſign was only to deliver her, and to prevent her marriage with the Prince of Meſſena, ſhe was never the more appeaſed, and ſent me word ſhe would never love Themiſtus, while he was in Arms againſt her Brother and his Countrey. But this I thought not fit preciſely to communicate to Themiſtus, for it had afflicted him beyond meaſure; but at laſt, to ſhew he would be no Uſurper, he ſent me a Declaration, which I got handſomely ſcattered up and down Syracuſe, wherein he declared, that if they would ſend the Prince of Meſſena back into his Countrey, ſet the Princeſs of Himera at liberty, and permit her abſolutely to diſpoſe of herſelf as ſhe pleaſed, he would lay down Arms, as ſoon as Lindamira ſhould have expreſſed her Will, in ſuch place, where ſhe might ſay ſhe was free. The people being not at all concerned in this affair, thought there had been no way but to grant Themiſtus all he deſired, and divers perſons ſtirred up by me, cried out aloud, that it were better to beſtow the Princeſs of Himera on Themiſtus, than on the Prince of Meſſena. However, Perianthus ſtood out and refuſed all that was demanded, ſo that Themiſtus marched ſtill on towards Syracuſe. The Prince of Meſſena had ſent to the Prince his Father, but he was not too haſty to ſuccour Perianthus, with whom he had ſtill rather have been in War than Alliance, though he had been forced to do otherwiſe. So that Perianthus and Demarata were at an extream loſs what to do. Yet could not this revengeful Woman, repent her of any thing ſhe had done; inſomuch, that Amerina deſirous to tell her ſomething one morning, ſhe was ſo incenſed againſt her, that ſhe ſent her away, ſo that this Woman exaſperated at her being pack'd out of doors, for finding fault with a deſign that had been ſo unfortunate, acquainted ſome perſons with all I have already told you, of the ſentiments of Demarata, and among others, my Siſter.

Themiſtus all this time drew nearer and nearer, keeping his Troops in very good order, pretending as if he would beſiege Syracuſe, if they granted him not what he deſired. Lindamira ſeeing her Countrey in ſo much danger, deſired a conference with the Prince. Perianthus came to her, and underſtood that her deſire was, that ſhe might have the liberty to ſpeak to Themiſtus, e're he uſed any hoſtility againſt the City, promiſing ſhe would do all that lay in her power to make him change his reſolution. Perianthus, who ſaw that all his force conſiſted in a raw undiſciplin'd people, and not very forward to endure a Siege, granted her what ſhe deſired, for the Army was in ſight. Yet was he once minded to recal the permiſſion he had given, when he had ſeen Demarata, for that jealous Princeſs was almoſt out of her ſelf at this interview. But Perianthus having ſuffered the thing already to take air, could not hinder it. Some were therefore ſent to Themiſtus, to propoſe a conference between him and Lindamira, which, though he doubted not but ſhe would tell him ſuch things, as ſhould extreamly trouble him, he could not but grant. Nay, on the contrary, he conceived it would be no ſmall ſatisfaction to him to ſee her, ſo that he granted all was deſired of him. It was therefore reſolved, that Themiſtus in the head of two hundred Horſe, ſhould come within a flight ſhot of the Walls, and that the Princeſs being in a Chariot, attended by a like number of Horſe, ſhould come with two of her Women, to a little Hill, ſurrounded with a Wood, which lay at the diſtance aforeſaid from the Walls of the City; and that there the Horſe of both parties, ſhould ſtand at an equal diſtance from the Hill, where Themiſtus might entertain Lindamira, whoſe women were to ſtay ſome few paces behind, for Themiſtus would not grant that interview, if he might not have the liberty to ſpeak to the Princeſs of Himera without witneſſes.

Thus was the buſineſs carried, much to the grief of Demarata, and the Prince of Meſſena, whoſe wounds

wounds were still in a very sad posture. Lindamira attended by two Gentlewomen, came to the place where she was to meet Themistus, having dressed her self after a very negligent manner, yet may it be said, she never looked handsomer in her life. As she passed through the streets, all the people cried out to her to make up a peace, and that with the tears in their eies; the Walls of the City were full of people, of all qualities and sexes; nay, Demarata her self saw her pass by through the window of her Closet, the Prince of Messena caused himself to be brought to that of his Chamber, to the same end, and Perianthus conducted her to the City Gate, entreating her most affectionately, to rescue her Countrey from destruction. In this posture went Lindamira to the Hill, where Themistus expected her. As soon as he saw her Chariot stop he alighted, and went to help her out, but Lindamira coldly putting him off from her, No, no, Themistus, said she to him, you are not in a condition to do me that inconsiderable service, and to oblige me to accept of that, you must do me one that is much greater. Whereupon, leaning upon one of her Gentlewomen, she got out of the Chariot, and going up into the little Hill, surrounded with a Wood, she rested her self against a Tree, her Women set themselves at the foot of another, at some distance, and Themistus placing himself over against her, looked on her with so much love, that she was forced to look towards the ground. Well Madam, saies he to her, with a very submissive action, what commands do you lay upon me? I would now see by experience, said she, whether it be true that you love me, for if you do, and consequently are tender of my life, my quiet, and my reputation, you will do as I shall advise you. Provided, you do not command me to cease loving you, replied he, that you forbid me not to endeavour your deliverance, and to destroy my Rival, I shall do any thing you desire. But Themistus, replied the Princess of Himera, cannot you conceive there are some just things, which yet ought never to be done, because they cannot be but by unjust means. I grant, added she, that my deliverance is a just action, and that it is natural for a man to wish the destruction of his Rival; but to do these two things, is it lawful for him to revolt against his Prince, to ruine his Country, and to incurr the displeasure of his Mistris, by endeavouring to serve her? Ah, Madam, replies Themistus, I should be very unfortunate, if I should meet with hatred, when I do all I can to deserve Love. 'Tis no question your case at the present, replied she; for, to be short Themistus, I shall not flatter you, but acquaint you with the true state of my soul, without concealing, even that which you may be offended at, no more than what may humour you. I must confess then that I have loved you, and that I may be still in a capacity to love you—Ah, Madam, interrupted Themistus, while you tell me of the past and future, I beseech you, let me not be ignorant of my present condition, in your inclinations. It is such, replied she, as that of a man I can either love or hate, either love beyond my life, or hate worse than death. How Madam, replied he, stepping back a little, is it possible you can hate me? It is Themistus, replied she, for if you obey me not, I must needs hate you. What then must I do to obey you, replied he? You must not ruine Syracuse, replied she; you must be no longer an enemy to the Prince my Brother; you must put the Army into his hands, and give over all thoughts of War. I apprehend you, Madam, said he, that is, you would have me wander up and down the world, as an unfortunate exile, while you in the mean time marry the Prince of Messena. On the contrary, replied Lindamira, I shall love you eternally, and it is out of that respect, that I would not have you do a thing which would put me into a capacity, of not presuming to love you when I would; for if you conquer my Brother, and prove the destroyer of your Countrey, you may well judge, that having a respect for glory, I shall never endure to see you. Nay, I shall, on the other side, look on you as an ambitious person, that never had any affection for me, and one that is in love with his own greatness.

But Madam, replies Themistus, you consider not that your generosity blinds you; for as things stand now, what would you have me to be? Can I ever repose any confidence in the Princess? Can I resign you to the Prince of Messena, and can I hope that Perianthus will forget what I do, while he loves Demarata, that is, one that hath made him forget all my services? No, no, Madam, you consider not well what you propose to me, But that you may not imagine I have the least inclination to usurp the Supream power, I declare to you, that if I take Syracuse, as I hope to do, though I have no Fleet, I will send thence my Rival, I will undeceive Perianthus, as to what concerns Demarata, I will restore him his Estate, and will demand nothing but Lindamira, and that of her self. This, Madam, is the design that seems to you so criminal. But if it be true, that you are not a Loveless, ambitious man, replied she, why can you not do a greater action than that? You may save your Countrey instead of conquering it; you may still be a friend to your Master, and if I may presume to say it, Huband to your Mistris: Ah, Madam, to be what you say, I would run the hazard of a hundred Battels. You need only let Syracuse be in peace, replied she: but if you do not, assure your self, that what aversion soever I may have for the Prince of Messena, I will marry him as soon as I come into the City. Ah, Madam, said he, your cruelty is now excessive, that you give words so indigestible, and I know not whether they should not rather incline me to set Syracuse on fire, than to do what you would have me. I beseech you, Madam, use no such menace to perswade me to your Will, for if I thought it possible you could do what you say, there should not be any thing that I would stick at. But, Themistus, replied the Princess, what would you have a person to say, that fears nothing so much as to lose you for ever, if you put your design in execution; so that both my fear and my hope are engaged in your safety. You had said more truly if you had said, my destruction. But in fine, Madam, you never have loved me, nor ever will; for were you constant to me, instead of advising me to my ruine, you would presently go into the Army I command, whether I would bring you safely, notwithstanding your Convoy, and when you are once there, you shall dispose of Syracuse as you please. Ah, Themistus, replies Lindamira, I will never come into a rebellious Army. But, Madam, replied he, this Army is rebellious only ly in order to your deliverance. Let it then ceaſe to be ſuch, replied ſhe, ſince I am reſolved not to be delivered, to the deſtruction of my Countrey; for I tell you once more, that if there be any Siege laid before Syracuſe, I will never ſee you again: and on the contrary I promiſe you, that if you reſtore it to peace, as I deſire you, I ſhall forget my own condition, to make an inſeparable union between your fortunes and mine. How Themiſtus, (continued ſhe, looking on him with an extraordinary affection, ſeeing he made no anſwer) can you deliberate on what you ſhould anſwer me? and when a choice is propoſed to you of being either loved or hated, can you be indifferent as to any reſolution? Nay, if it be ſo, Themiſtus, and that neither my words nor tears can prevail any thing upon you, hear from hence the groans and complaints of a great people, that hath ſometime ſent up its addreſſes to Heaven for you, when the end of your fighting was peace. Force it not to ſend up imprecations againſt their antient Protector; and if you are wiſe; do not exaſperate it too much, and ſo engage it to ſet Syracuſe on fire, rather than deliver it into your hands. Do but ſee from hence, added ſhe, all ye would deſtroy; if it be that magnificent City, it hath given you birth; if it be the inhabitants of it, you are haply obliged, as I told you, for one part of your Victories, to the vows they have made for you; if it be your Rival, he is unfortunate and wounded; is not that enough to ſatisfie you? If it be the Prince my Brother, he is your ſovereign, and you owe him your fortune; if it be Demarata, ſhe does not hate you, but becauſe ſhe loves you; and if it be Lindamira, ſhe hath deſerved you ſhould ſacrifice all things for her ſake, ſince ſhe hath lov'd you beyond her own glory, which adviſed her not to love any thing.

While the Princeſs of Himera ſpoke thus, Themiſtus hearkened very attentively, and looked on her, without having the leaſt power to interrupt her, ſuch an agitation were his thoughts in; ſo that the Princeſs perceiving him to be in ſome diſturbance, I beſeech you Themiſtus, ſaid ſhe, reaching forth her hand to him, ſtand out no longer, I know your heart is on my ſide, that it acknowledges its antient Miſtriſs, and that it is no rebell as you are. Submit Themiſtus, ſubmit, and refuſe not the glory, it is to ſubdue your ſelf. A man is ſufficiently revenged, when he gives his enemies peace, when they are not in a condition to maintain a War againſt him, and it would be leſs ſatisfaction to you, to ſee Syracuſe deſtroyed, than to obey the lawful Prince of it. Ah, Madam, (ſaid he, kiſſing her hand very ſubmiſſively, which ſhe immediately ſnatched from him) there need not ſo many arguments to convince me, ſince that if I ſhould hearken to Reaſon, I ſhould not mind them. But, Madam, you have an abſolute power over me, and you know it ſo well, that if I durſt ſay it without derogating from the reſpect I owe you, you make uſe of it with unjuſtice. For is it juſt, Madam, I ſhould quit an Army where I have found refuge? No, ſaies Lindamira, but you may command it, till you have reduced the Prince of Heraclea, and by a freſh victory blot out the Characters of your revolt and his, out of the ſpirit of your Maſter, For I tell you once more, that if you do not as I would have you, I will never ſee you while I live again. Reſolve therefore immediately, conſider that I am to leave you, and that the the firſt words I ſhall hear from you, will either ſeparate us for ever, or unite us for ever. Well, Madam, ſaid he to her, tranſported by his love, what muſt be done to ſatisfie you? muſt I caſt my ſelf into a priſon at Syracuſe, and deliver my ſelf to the revengeful Demarata? I will do it if you would have me, for, added he, lifting up his eies to Heaven, can a man reſiſt the perſon he loves, and that when ſhe is the moſt accompliſh'd in the world, and he the moſt amorous of men? No, replyed Lindamira, you ſhall not do any thing of what you ſay, and you ſhall only truſt your ſelf to me, and reſign your intereſts to my management of them. I will do ſo ſince you command it, replied he, but I ſhall be miſtaken, if you do not one day repent it.

Upon this did Lindamira entertain Themiſtus, with what ever gratitude or tenderneſs of affection could imagine, that were moſt obliging; but for fear he ſhould repent him of it, ſhe left him, with an abſolute command to remove the Army three or four miles at the preſent, to give the people a certain omen of peace, and an aſſurance, that the next day ſhe would ſend him ſuch Articles in order thereto, as he could not but accept. Themiſtus anſwered her with a thouſand things, the moſt paſſionate that could be, yet with ſuch a ſadneſs as ſufficiently diſcovered he did himſelf an extream violence in obeying her; but at laſt he continued firm in the reſolution, which love had made him take, ſo much to the prejudice of his ambition; and when Lindamira took her leave, he gave her his hand, he ſalted her, without being able to ſay any thing, but with his eies; as her Chariot began to ſtir, he got on horſeback, and looked after her as long as he could perceive her, and at laſt returned to the Army, but ſo ſad, that it was eaſie to judge that the Princeſſes tears had overcome him. He accordingly diſlodged the Army immediately, and took up his quarters four miles thence. In the mean time the Princeſs Lindamira, doing her ſelf ſome violence, diſcovered more joy than ſhe had; for though ſhe was extreamly well ſatisfied with the abſolute power ſhe had over Themiſtus, yet could ſhe not but ſtand in fear of a thouſand things whereat ſhe was afflicted. But at laſt, deſirous to gain credit among the people, ſhe put on a chearful countenance, and told them as ſhe came in, that ſhe promiſed them peace, and that Themiſtus would immediately remove his Army. So that this report being ſcattered up and down the City, you could hear nothing but the name of Lindamira, and it was with much ado that her Chariot could paſs through the ſtreets, by reaſon of the throng.

This conſidered, it was not to be ſuppoſed, that ſhe ſhould be carried to the Tower from whence ſhe was brought. for the people were reſolved on the contrary; ſo that ſhe was conducted to her own houſe, whether Periander came to her. For Demarata, ſhe was alſo deſirous to go thither. But I having cunningly ſcatspread diverse things against her among the people, they openly threatned to cast her into the Sea, if she withstood the peace, insomuch that she was forced to remain in the Palace, and to go and comfort her self the best she could with the Prince of Messena, who was in no less trouble than her self. Periandus was no sooner come to Lindamira's, but I gave notice to all the well-affected of any quality, to come thither also; and among others, Anaxander and Meriander came.

I shall not, Madam, give you a particular account of what Lindamira said to Periandus, for it were impossible for me to do, it being certain that never any one spoke with so much Art as she did. She very discreetly excused Themistus; she said she had perswaded him without any trouble, and very prudently making the Articles her self, without seeming to do any thing, she brought the business to such a posture, that it might be said Periandus was very much obliged to her, for that she would condescend to be the Victim, to appease that exasperated ambitious person. Not to abuse your patience any longer, Madam, Meriander being chosen to negotiate the Peace, the Articles were made and communicated to the Prince of Messena. He at first opposed them what he could, as did also Demarata; but the people coming to hear it, threatned to put them into a vessel without Oars, Pilot, or Mariners, and to expose them to the mercy of the Sea and winds; so that they were forced to submit to what they could not hinder.

Meriander was hereupon sent to Themistus, to whom Lindamira writ a Letter, to tell him that he must condescend to what was offered. Yet were there divers things proposed to him which he was very much troubled at, insomuch that Meriander spent three daies in journeys between Syracuse and the Camp, and had he not carri'd himself very discreetly and sincerely, this pretended peace had not been concluded. For Demarata did all she could to oppose it; the Prince of Messena was dissatisfi'd with it, and Themistus would have been glad Lindamira had not pressed him to it. But at last, it was concluded, that all should be forgotten on both sides; that Themistus should command the Army, till the War of Heraclea were expired; that the Princess Lindamira should remain, if she so pleas'd, at a strong house of her own, with a sufficient guard, and that there she might marry to whom she pleased within the space of one year; That in case the War with the Prince of Heraclea were soon ended, as it was likely it would be; Themistus should for the space of one year, not only keep out of Syracuse, but out of Sicily, so the better to work a faithful confidence between the Prince and him. That no Officer of the Army should lose his place if he committed not some new fault that deserved it. That the Prince of Messena should be entreated to return to Messena, assoon as he were recovered; That Themistus should not, during his absence, be deprived of any of the employments and estate he had received from the Prince. Besides all which, Periandus engaged to consent to Lindamira's marriage with him, in case that Princess should be willing after the year were expired. This last Article was it that Themistus boggl'd at most, as being unwilling his happ nes should remain in such uncertainty. In the mean time Demarata endeavoured what she could to perswade Periandus it should be so; besides that, Lindamira conceiving it would be the better for Themistus, that Demarata should not see him of a long time, purposely to cure her of her passion, commanded Themistus not to oppose it. So that after a many negotiations, the Treaty was concluded and executed; the Princess of Himera went to Himera, whether Themistus sent certain Soldiers for her guard. The Prince of Messena, sick as he was, caused himself to be caried out of Syracuse, threatning, that he should haply return thither one day, to demand the recompence of his services; and Themistus remained at the head of the Army against the Enemy, who having rallied together some few Troops, was defeated by him; whereupon he was forced to embrace a peace, though much against his will. But the Prince of Heraclea propos'd it with such advantage, that it could not be refus'd. This done, Themistus would needs oblige Lindamira to change her resolution, but ineffectually, for she would have him perform what he had promised, that he might not give ill example to the Prince, by being the first breaker of his word. So that he was forced to leave Himera, to depart Sicily, and to come and live here till the year be expired. For Demarata, I cannot well tell you what she said, during all these transactions, for Amerintha being not with her, she would not certainly confide in any other, and all I know of her is, that when we left Sicily, it was told us for certain, that her beauty was extreamly decayed, that she was grown so froward, that she could endure no company, and that Periandus's love towards her began already to remit. In the mean time Themistus, through the excess of his love, is as unquiet, and as sad when he is alone, as if he had not reason to think himself happy, though I am perswaded Lindamira will be faithful to him, and that he will one day meet with the recompence he deserves. This, Madam, is the History of Themistus, who hath chosen Rome rather than any other place for his refuge, for that if Demarata persecute him too violently, after he hath married Lindamira, if he be so happy as to have her, Rome is the only place of all the world, which he would fasten on for a long retirement.

Meleagenes having finished his relation, the principal accidents of this History, were their entertainment for the rest of the day. Well then, saies Amilcar, speaking to Herminius, will you still commend obstinacy to the prejudice of inconstancy? for if Demarata had been one of those fantastick Women, that jump out of one act of Gallantry into another, without fastning upon any Gallant, all those people had not been put to so much trouble. If Periandus had not loved his Wife so long, and that his love, according to the custom, had died eight daies after his marriage, he had been capable of more diversion; if Themistus and Lindamira had loved less, they had been more happy. You are very much too blame, to charge Constancy with so many mischiefs, replied Herminius, they are chargeable only upon Fortune, who is ever an enemy to Virtue.

But

But you consider not, that you commend inconstancy, before the amiable Plotina. Assure your self, replies that excellent Lady, I should be very much troubled if Amilcar were not unconstant; for in the first place, if he had not been such, I should not have been his Mistriss: And, Secondly, if he were not so still, we should be weary one of another, in one daies conversation. Seriously replied Amilcar, I love you infinitely beyond what I did before, for speaking as you do, and the first time I shall commend you to any one, when I have told that-any-one, that she is handsome, excellent good company, hugely witty, divertive, and gallant, and that she hath a thousand other admirable qualities, I shall seriously add, and what I am infinitely more taken with, she is almost as unconstant as my self. The whole company having laughed at the pleasant humour of Amilcar, they separated. Clelia went home, Plotina went to Cæsonia's, whither she was conducted by Amilcar; Meleagenes went to find out Themistus, and Herminius to find out Brutus, whose thoughts were still wholly taken up with the revenge of Lucretia, and the liberty of Rome.

Romane Hiſtory.

The Third Part.

BOOK III.

HErminius being come to Brutus, do you not admire ſays he, at the ſtrange humorſomeneſs of Fortune? Tarquin, that had been King of Rome for ſo many years, meets not with any Romans that will be of his party; and yet, though he is unfortunate, wicked, an exile, without wealth, he elſewhere meets with refuge and aſſiſtance, and hath got together an Army much more numerous than ours; this conſidered, what would you have me expect for the future? All great enterprises, replyed Herminius, are ever difficult, and if they were not they were leſs glorious. It is indeed ſomething ſtrange, replyes Brutus, to ſee wicked deſigns ſometimes ſo eaſily proſper, and good ones to meet with ſo many hindrances. However it be, replyes Herminius, it is better be unfortunate with good intentions, than happy with ill ones. Beſides, methinks I have often obſerved it, that happineſs is divided, as I may ſo ſay, between the enterpriſe and him that undertakes it, when it is great and heroick; for though the Heroe be unfortunate, as to his perſon, yet his enterpriſe may nevertheleſs be happy. On the contrary, it is often ſeen, that though ſuch as are unjuſt, are fortunate, yet all the pains they have taken, is loſt as ſoon as they ceaſe to be; ſo that I conclude, that though you ſhould ever be unfortunate, your deſigns would be carried on after your death, if Rome ſhould be ſo unhappy as to loſe you. It were too baſe, and too great to hope for any other ſucceſs of it; we muſt hope, that notwithſtanding the forces of Tarquin, we ſhall overcome him, ſince for upon ſuch an occaſion as this, we muſt account one Roman as good as two Veientines, or Tarquinians. For there is a remarkable difference between thoſe that fight for the preſervation of their liberty, and the defence of their City, Wives, and Children; and thoſe who only aſſiſt a Prince that is hated even by thoſe who have the greateſt eſteem for whatever in him that is good; and therefore I am incouraged into a confidence, that Rome will never be reduced to ſlavery again. Did I not hope it, replyes Brutus, all I ſhould have to do were to dye, but ſince to overcome, there is a neceſſity of fighting, and that to fight with good ſucceſs, a man muſt be aſſured of the Army he commands, we muſt within three days have a Rendezvous in the field of Mars; Valerius and I, are already agreed upon it, and I tell you ſo much, to the end you may prepare your ſelf for it. But I beſeech you, my dear Herminius, added he, give me leave to beg this favor at your hands, that you will promiſe me to fight as violently to revenge Lucretia, as for the liberty of Rome, when we ſhall come to the work; for I am not confident of my own valor, when I am to revenge that unfortunate fair one, whoſe virtue was yet beyond her beauty, though this were infinitely beyond that of all others. I ſhall be glad to do what you would have me, replyed Herminius, ſince I had as much friendſhip for Lucretia, as you had love for her. As they were thus diſcourſing, comes in Valerius, who told them that news was brought him, that the enemy would ſoon be upon their march; ſo that making what haſt they could, the Muſter was ordered to be the next day. Orders were iſſued out, that all the Centurions ſhould have notice thereof, and that both Officers and Souldiers ſhould be ready. And in effect the love of the Country uniting all both friends and enemies, you might ſee Herminius, Mutius and Spurius, act with equal zeal, as being embarked in the ſame intereſt; as alſo Horatius and Octavius, equally promoting the publick good. I put Octavius in a manner into the ſame rank with the reſt, for though he was no more to be conſidered as Rival to Horatius, yet had he ſtill an averſion for him, and not reflecting on his virtue, he could not avoid hating him, whenever he thought it was not impoſſible but he might Marry Clelia, for Aronces, he being one for whom he ſometime had a very great friendſhip, and beſides, was obliged to, he felt that friendſhip growing ſtronger within him. To which may be added, that looking on him as at a great diſtance from happineſs, he could not entertain any envy againſt him. Nay, on the contrary, he became his Protector, as to Otho, Sulpicia and Clelia. Yet had he as little diſcourſe as he could with his admirable Siſter, who alſo for her part avoided all converſation as much as civility permitted, by reaſon of the melancholly ſhe was in, that ſhe could not hear from her deareſt Aronces, who at that time was kept ſo cloſe a Priſoner, that he had not the liberty to write. Celeres was alſo equally ill-treated, and the Prince of Pometia, and Prince Titus, were no longer in a capacity to do him any good office, which troubled them very much. For they were themſelves at a loſs, as to all opportunity of writing to Hermilia and Collatina, whom they both loved, and were beloved by. For Aronces, he endured all that an unfortunate Lover could endure. He was a Priſoner to a Prince that was his Rival; he thought he had two Rivals about his Miſtreſs, for he knew not that the pretended Prince of Numidia was her Brother; he thought in all probability, that Porſenna would engage in the intereſts of Tarquin; Celeres was a Priſoner; he could not ſee the Princes that were wont to comfort him, and he could hear no tidings from Clelia, ſo that he had only the aſſiſtance of his own courage to oppoſe ſo many misfortunes. What added to his affliction, was, to underſtand by thoſe that guarded him, that Tarquin had a conſiderable Army, and that within a few days, in all likelihood, the fate of Rome would be decided by a Battel, before Porſenna had the time to declare. For had he been at liberty, he would with incredible joy have fought for his friends, for a juſt cauſe, for his Miſtreſs, and for to ſmother the valor of his Rivals, by the greatneſs of his own. But ſeeing no hope of liberty, he was extreamly caſt down, though he ſeemed reſolute enough to thoſe whom Tarquin had ſet to look after him.

But for this Tyrant, and the cruel Tullia, they were extreamly well ſatisfied to ſee they had an Army, for as it is ordinary with thoſe, who attribute nothing to the conduct of a ſuperiour power, to be eaſily perſuaded that injuſtice may be ever proſperous, they made no queſtion but to ſee Rome once more under their Tyranny; and when they were alone together, they debated the puniſhments ſhould be inflicted on Brutus, Valerius, Clelia, Lucretia's father, Herminius, Horatius, Mutius, and divers others who expreſſed a particular zeal for her liberty. For Amilcar, for his great wit ſake, they were content only to forbid him any abode in Rome, as they would alſo ſerve Artemidorus and Zenocrates. Thence they fell to diſpoſe of the Eſtates of all the beſt Families, they promiſed rewards to thoſe that ſerved them, at their charge, who were not engaged in their intereſts. They propoſed not only to purge the Senate, but to aboliſh it; and there is not any thing ſo tyrannical, which the deſire of revenge ſuggeſted not unto them. But as for Clelia, they ſaid nothing one to another of her, their deſigns being ſo different as to what concerned her, that they could not be communicated; for Tullia's intention was to have her put to death, ſo to disburthen Tarquin's heart of her, and Tarquin's to make her Queen, if he could diſpatch Tullia out of the way. In the mean time, having nothing to expect from Rome, and imagining they ſhould never reduce it but by force, they ſent for Sextus, on whom Tarquin beſtowed the chief command of his Army next himſelf.

But while this Prince made it his only buſineſs to re-eſtabliſh his Tyranny, Brutus, Valerius, and all their illuſtrious friends, minded nothing ſo much as how to oppoſe it. To this end, the Legions were reviewed with all the accuſtomed Ceremonies. The Conſuls made a kind of particular ſacrifice in the field of Mars, in order to the War, wherein were offered three ſeveral Victims conſecrated to Mars, for it happened that the ſeaſon which is by the Romans called Luſtrum, was expired, and for that reaſon, it was requiſite according to their cuſtom, to purify the Army by that ſacrifice, purpoſely inſtituted to make a review of the Soldiery from five years to five years, and to inſpire them with new courage. But this being not for a ſimple review, only to know the number of the Soldiery, but looked on as concerning liberty and publick ſafety, it inſpired the whole people of Rome with an univerſal curioſity, all the Ladies were preſent at the ceremony, which was performed in the beſt order in the world. Never were the Chiefs ſeen more magnificent, nor the Souldiers better armed. Even Brutus himſelf, notwithſtanding his melancholly, conceiving it neceſſary to gain the reſpect and vows of the people by magnificent objects put on Coat-armes, ſuch as for luſtre the world could not afford the like. Yet were there ſome marks of mourning in his equipage; for his horſe was black, his Feather black, and he had divers black twiſts amidſt the gold, wherewith his magnificent Coat ſhined. All the other Chiefs were alſo very richly armed, and all the Soldiers had taken ſo much pains to make their Arms bright and clean, that the leaſt agitation of theſe ſeveral bodies, making all objects ſhine again, the luſtre was ſo great as could hardly be endured. And as there was not any Roman Souldier, who made it not his deſign to gain reputation in this War, and to be remarkable, ſo had they all particular Badges, ſome diſtinguiſhed by their ſeveral Feathers, ſome by the ſkins of ſtout beaſts which they faſtned on their Shoulders, as thoſe of Lyons, Wolves, Tygers, and Panthers; ſome by what they had about their heads, as burniſhed Leather, glittering ſteel, ſome by their large Bucklers, wherof the edges were very different. Thoſe that had any particular inclination to ſome beauty, and withall ſomthing to expreſs the poſture of their thoughts and fortune. But beſides the ordinary enſigns, Brutus had cauſed to be faſtned under every one of them a ſtreamer wherein, in ſome of them were found theſe words in the vulgar language.

CONQUER OR DIE.

And in ſome others,

For GLORY and LIBERTY.

So to acquaint the Souldiers both with the occaſion of the War and their duty.

But beſides all the ſeveral Troops whereof the Legions conſiſted which made up the Army, the

from a Body of those that came from Ardea, to which the Voluntiers were that day joined, such as Themistus, Meleagenes, Amilcar, and divers others. For Otlavius, though he had not passed through the several offices he should have done, according to the Roman Discipline, as having not been brought up at Rome, yet was he ranked among persons of quality of his age, such as Horatius, Mutius, Spurius, Herminius, and divers others of the same condition, who were in the Catalogue of those that might be chosen for Commanders. This review was performed with so many expressions of joy in the Souldiery, that the people drew a happy presage thence, and the Army seemed so terrible when it was drawn up, that it was not easie to fear it should be vanquished. In the mean time, the two Consuls going from Band to Band, with the Lictors, and the Fasces before them, put a certain respect upon all those that saw them; and this War being extraordinary, they did one ceremony that was beyond all custom, for they made all the Army take a publick oath never to lay down Arms till Rome were absolutely free. So that at a certain signal given by a military harmony, which was in use in those days, all both Commanders and Souldiers drawing their Swords, and lifting them up to Heaven with a menacing action, every Centurion promised for all that were under his command, that they should dye a thousand times rather than suffer Rome to be enslaved again.

Having proceeded thus far, the two Consuls went to the head of the Army, while in the interim all the Ladies of quality, were in magnificent Chariots, disposed in a manner of a half moon before the Troops, in one whereof were Clelia, Valeria, Cæsonia, and Plotina. While all were thus placed, there appeared these three men on horseback admirably graceful, conducted by a fourth, who was also a very proper person. The former was armed like a Roman, the other three after the Grecian mode. Their Horses were of a dark colour, their Plumes black, and all their equipage mourning. There was upon their Bucklers without any figure these sad words,

WE COURT DEATH.

But of these three, there was one whose melancholly was much more visible, than that of the other two, though they all seemed to be sad enough. He that followed them, seemed also to be very pensive; so that this mournful company drawing all eyes after it, and raising their curiosity, it took up the thoughts of the people, the Army, the Ladies, and the two Consuls. Nay, Clelia whose heart was never filled with any thing but her dear Aronces, looked very attentively on these Strangers, not knowing but that he had made an escape out of prison, and might be among those she saw, though she could not apprehend why he should put himself into that mournful equipage, if some groundless jealousie should not put him into the humor. Valeria also who sate next her, looked on them no less; but passing close by the Chariot wherein she was to go towards the Consuls who expected them, she perceived that the Roman who conducted the three strangers, was Æmilius, so that her colour changed at it. Herminius on the other side, being in the head of the Army, knew him to be his friend, and withall his Rival, when he was come up to the Consuls. Spurius and Mutius knew him also, and Valerius no sooner saw him, but he knew it to be him, to whom he had promised Valeria, when he thought Herminius dead.

Æmilius coming up to the Consuls, bowed very submissively, and speaking to them, My Lords, said he, the love of my Country having brought me to Rome, whence another passion had banished me, I thought it good service to persuade these three illustrious, but unfortunate persons to come along with me; for since they desire nothing so much as to dye gloriously, I thought the greatest happiness they could arrive at, was to expose their lives for the safety of Rome. Receive them my Lords, as persons whose birth is very noble, whose valor extraordinary, and whose fortune deplorable. But since they seek neither protection nor service, but only a glorious occasion to dye, I demand on their behalf, the favor immediately to be put into the rank of those that are to fight. If your illustrious friends (replyed Brutus, with a kind of a forced smile) only sought death, they should have gone to the Enemies Army for it, but since they also court glory in it, and that it is not impossible to find them together in a victorious Army, we receive them with joy, but with this hope, that the glory they shall gain by saving Rome, will take off part of their disgraces, and encourage them to live. However, added he, speaking to Valerius, that they may be put into a rank suitable to their quality, do you not think fit they should be put with Themistus, Meleagenes, and Amilcar? Valerius approving what Brutus said, and the three Strangers by an action of condescention approving what Æmilius had said of them, they were conducted whither Brutus had disposed them. For Æmilius, though he were a Roman, yet he desired he might not be separated from his friends, so that he was placed with them, but as he went to his place he saw Valeria, whom he saluted very submissively. Herminius, who still followed him with his eyes, had observed that Valerius and Æmilius had had no private discourse, but thought that Valeria had saluted his Rival with a little too much courtesie, so that it put him into a disturbance, which lasted till the Muster was over.

On the other side Valerius felt an affliction growing upon him that troubled him not a little, for he loved Æmilius as well as he did Herminius, and had promised his daughter to both. However, he omitted nothing he should have done with Brutus, that related to the review of the Army. Mutius for his part was not well pleased to see another Rival in his way, and only Spurius out of his revengful humor, took a certain pleasure in this distraction. For Valeria, she gave over looking at any thing, so much was she afflicted at Æmilius's return. But says Clelia to her, seeing what trouble she was in, I cannot conceive how you ever hated Æmilius. On the contrary, replyed she, I have ever had a friendship for him, and have still, and thence proceeds my disturbance, for it being impossible Herminius and he should be good friends, if his thoughts be not otherwise than they were towards me, I see my self exposed to unhappy adventures.

While Clelia and Valeria discoursed thus, and that Cæsonia and Plotina hearken to them, all the other Ladies had a curiosity for these three strangers in mourning, who were so handsome, and withall seemed to be so melancholly. Nor was this curiosity particular to the Ladies, for all the men were equally desirous to know them, and amongst the rest Amilcar, who was placed just before one of these strangers. But military discipline not permitting discourse upon such occasions, he was forced to be silent, and to forbear asking who they were, that he was so desirous to be acquainted withall. At the last, the review being over, and that great body wasted away by companies and parties, Amilcar, to whom Æmilius had been named, came up to these strangers, spoke to them, and notwithstanding their melancholly, forced some little discourse out of them. I imagine (said he, to get somewhat out of them) that you are friends, and that some concernment of ambition hath made you equally unfortunate. On the contrary, replies one of the Strangers, we are Rivals, we have been a long time enemies, and nothing unites us but the equality of our misfortune, and the desire of death. If love, said he to them, furnished a man with no more pleasant desires then that, I should never either desire or obtain any thing. It is not love replyes another of the Strangers, that makes us desire death, but despair. You may add some hatred to it, says the third, who had not yet spoken, for I abhor my self so much, because I cannot hate that which hath not loved me, that I cannot endure my self. For my part, says Amilcar I am much more happy then you are, for when one loves me, I am extreamly pleased, and when I am not loved I give over loving, and laugh at the Woman that would not love me.

These Strangers perceiving the good humor Amilcar was in, were troubled the more, and envyed his disposition, as a wretched minded man would the treasures of a rich man. But Æmilius taking them to his house, they left Amilcar, who went to Themistus, with whom he spent the rest of the day at Sulpicia's, where they found Clelia, Valerius, Cæsonia, and Plotina. In the mean time, Valeria, preferring the publick interest before the private, what disturbance soever he conceived at Æmilius's return, left not Brutus, till he had done all those things which according to his place he ought to have done. Besides, knowing the prudence of Herminius, that of Æmilius, and their ancient Friendship, he was in hope there would not any thing amiss happen till he had spoken to them. On the other side, Æmilius was in a strange distraction, for having not spoken with any one since his coming to Rome, because of the Review of the Army, nor since his departure heard any news thence, he knew not whether Herminius were Married to Valeria or not. So that not able to continue in that cruel uncertainty, he went abroad as soon as he had brought his three Friends to his House. For having found there but one old slave, that looked to it, whom he could not ask any thing, for that as soon as he had perceived him, and opened him the Gate, he went, without saying ought to him to acquaint his friends with his return, he was forced to go to one of his ancient friends to satisfie his curiosity. But he had scarce gone twenty paces, but he met Herminius, he had no sooner eyed him, but he felt an extraordinary emotion within him; Herminius for his part was not very quiet within; love it seems and friendship raising in their hearts an equal agitation. They saluted one the other civilly enough, besides, that having not any thing to reproach one another withall, they were persons of a greater command of themselves, than to be carried away by the impetuosity of their sentiments, in a procedure wherein love had not caused them to do any thing that might rationally injure their friendship. But at last after salutations, Æmilius looking attentively on Herminius, I was going said he to him, to inform my self of the condition of your fortune and my own, but since I have met you, it were better I asked your self, whether you are happy, and I miserable. If you are still in love with Valeria, replyes Herminius, you are still unhappy, for I do not doubt but she will be so constant as to preserve her first affection. But if absence and reason have recovered you, you are happy, since it is certain she hath abundance of friendship for you, and that I am still your friend. Ah Herminius, cries out Æmilius, were you Married to Valeria, I might haply still act as your friend, but since you are not, I must needs tell you, that I am still your Rival, and that neither time, absence, nor reason have cured me. And yet when I came to Rome, it was with intention if you were married to Valeria, not to say any thing to her of my passion, nor yet to your self, but only to find out death in the defence of my Countrey; but since it is not so, and that Valerius hath kept his word with me, you must needs do me that favor to promise me that you will entertain no thoughts of Marrying Valeria, till the end of the War. I know you have a greater interest in her, than I have, but when all's done, I may be able to love her without any injury to you; it is impossible I should forbear loving her, and I cannot forget that I had some place in her affections when you returned, which if you had not, I had been happy. The War will haply take me out of your way, added Æmilius, deny me not what I desire; and if you would convince me that you be my friend, you will oblige Valeria to give me leave to wait on her. To deal sincerely with you, replyes Herminius, I will tell you, that Valerius hath no intention to marry his Daughter while the War lasts; and since I am no Tyrant over my Mistriss, she shall see you if she thinks fit. But if you would take my advice, you would not desire it; for Valeria is still handsome, still amiable, still constant. How ere she may be, replyes Æmilius, I once more desire what I did before. And I make you the same answer I did before, replyes Herminius; so that it is of Valeria that you are to desire the liberty to see her, and not of me. Satisfie your self that I do not oppose it, and assure your self that all a Lover can do, I shall ever do for you, as long as Valeria shall not love you, but if she come to affect you to my prejudice, no doubt but I shall do what ever an unfortunate Rival can do to Revenge himself. It seems then replyed Æmilius, according to your Maxims, I am to look on you as mine enemy? By no means replyed Herminius, for I have done nothing against you. Ah cruel friend, replyes Æmilius, why should honor and friendship oblige me to forbear hating you?

As they were at this pass, Valerius passing by, embraced Æmilius, and carried these two Rivals to his his house, and there spoke to them with such prudence, that he obliged them to continue friends, while the War lasted. And yet he advised Æmilius to give over all thoughts of Valeria, and pressed it so much upon him, that that unfortunate Lover desired no other comfort than a promise from Valerius, that he might see Valeria whilst the War lasted, assuring him, that if he could not be happy when that were ended, nothing should hinder him from dying an exile. But for a final favor, he would needs have Herminius tell him, that in case he dyed, he would give his consent that Valeria should marry him. So that not able to deny an unfortunate friend a comfort that could do him no prejudice, he promised him his intreaties to Valeria to that purpose. Accordingly when she was returned from Sulpicia's, and that Valerius had commanded her to entertain Æmilius, as a person she had made unfortunate, and whom to recover, she should imploy all her reason, Herminius gave her an account of what had past between Valerius Æmilius and himself. She being a discreet Lady, made not at that time any discovery of the agitation of her heart, but certain it is, that through an excess of affection, she took it ill that Herminius had consented, in case he dyed, his Rival should marry her. For Æmilius, she received him very civilly, yet in such a manner as gave not that unfortunate Lover any shadow of hope, so that he went away first; insomuch that some coming in that took up Valerius and Sulpicia, Herminius had a quarter of an hours private discourse with Valeria. Well, Madam said he to her, ought I not to fear that Æmilius's return may not prove as unfortunate to me, as mine was to him, and that though I neither dye nor prove unconstant, I may be forgotten or punished as if I were one of them. It were no easie matter to forget you, replyed she, for you have but just now put me into such an indignation, that I know not whether I shall ever forget the spight you have done me. I beseech you, Madam, replyed he, let me immediately know my crime, that I may repent me of it, and do you satisfaction; for I assure you, I apprehend it not. How replyed she, do you think you have done me no injury by consenting, that if you dyed in the War, Æmilius should marry me? Ah, Herminius, you think you love, but do not, or at best, tis very weakly, since you might conceive it impossible I should ever be any others. And truly I need not wonder at it, for since you do not believe that I love you, so far as that I should never marry, even though you dyed, it is not strange your love to me should be so weak. But Madam, replyed Herminius, methinks I have only guessed at the future by what is past, for since you were content to marry Æmilius, when you thought me dead, why should I think it impossible you might, a second time, take the same resolution? Ah, Herminius, replyed she, had I not thought you unconstant, I had never taken it, and you know well that you told me then, that if I had had a strong affection for you, I could never have endured Æmilius. But I tell you now with much more reason, that if you loved me, you could not have said that to your Rival which you have.

For in fine, I must confess it to my own confusion, I have that tenderness for you which will not suffer me to think you could ever be any ones but mine; and could I look on any woman in the world, as such as you might love, though I were not in being, I think I should not be able to forbear hating her almost as much as I should do you. There is so much obligation in your anger, replyed Herminius, and it makes you guilty of so much kindness, that I have much ado to repent me that I have been the occasion of it. But all considered Madam, I must needs justifie my self, and give you an account of my sentiments. In the first place, I declare, that I have not promised Æmilius that you should marry him; nay, that I have not so much as imagined you could marry him; all the promise I made him was, to intreat you to do it. And indeed Madam, were it possible you could marry any one, I would rather it should be Æmilius than any other, for he deserves you, he loves you, and would speak to you of me as a person for whom he hath a friendship, notwithstanding his love. It must certainly be Herminius cryes out Valeria, that you know not well how to love; you are haply acquainted with an ordinary friendship, or haply an affectionate friendship; but for love, you know not the humors of it. Howe're it may be, added she, you have vexed me, and I perceive I shall not be reconciled with you this day. Valeria was not as good as her word, for Herminius entertained her with things so full of passion, that she pardoned him.

In the mean time, all the talk in Rome was about Æmilius's return, and the arrival of the three strangers, whereof one was called Lysydas, another Caliantes, and the third Alcimides. But for their adventures, there was no more known at that time, than that Love put them upon desires of death, for the business of the War took up all mens thoughts so much, that people were not very forward to look after such as avoided society. For Mutius and Spurius, they were always together; yet did not this latter look on Æmilius as an enemy, for that considering him as a Rival to Herminius, and one that might do him a prejudice, he thought him a person ingaged in his interests.

In this interim came news, that Artemidorus and Zenocrates had been kindly received by the Princess of Leontum, that she had not discovered them to be what they were, for some reasons that concerned her self; and that they had prevailed so far with her, that Porsenna would not declare till there had happened a battel between the Roman Army and that of Tarquin. Brutus understood at the same time, that the Prince was advantageously posted near the Forrest of Arsia between Veiæ and the Tiber; so that desirous to prevent him, and to fight him beyond the River, it was resolved they should depart within two days. Then was it, that there might have been seen in Rome, what had not even from its foundation. For the Wars thatare undertaken for liberty, are carried on with much more zeal, than those whose end is conquest or defence. There you might see Fathers encouraging their Children, when they took their leaves of them: Mothers praying for their Sons, Sisters for their Brothers, slaves for their Masters; nor did Mistresses escape those sad sentiments which love inspired them with. But among others, Hermilia was so afflicted, that it was impossible any one could be more; for knowing the courage of Brutus, and the Prince of Pometia, and reflecting on their quality, quality, ſhe could not forbear imagining that ſhe ſaw them with their ſwords drawn one againſt another, and fearing thereupon all the fatal effects that are the neceſſary conſequences of battails; for ſhe had a tender affection both for her Brother and her Servant. Collatina was alſo very ſad, for the concernment ſhe had in Prince Titus. Cæſonia was no leſs for Perſander, Valeria for her Father and Herminius; the virtuous Sivelia, for her illuſtrious Son; Racilia for Brutus, Plotina for Amilcar, and all the perſons of quality of his acquaintance; and Clelia for her illuſtrious Brother Herminius, Brutus, and ſo many honorable perſons that went to expoſe their lives for the publick ſafety. All the comfort ſhe had, was, to conſider that her dear Aronces would not be in the fight, and that her Father was to remain in Rome with Lucretius, to take order for all things during the abſence of the Conſuls. For they had a great influence over the new elected Senate, ſince Tarquin's departure from Rome.

But at laſt, the day of their departure being come, there was nothing to be ſeen from the break of day till noon, but the preparations of War, and the baggage of particular perſons that left Rome. But when Brutus and Valerius went out, there could nothing be heard through all the ſtreets, but the Prayers of the people, that they might gain the Victory. They were both excellently well mounted, their Arms were very magnificent, and they were followed by all of the higheſt quality. Thoſe were Octavius, Herminius, Æmilius, Spurius, Perſander, Mutius, Amilcar, the three ſtrangers in Mourning, and a many others. For Horatius he went away laſt, becauſe he would needs take his leave of Clelia, who had avoided him as much as lay in her power; but at laſt ſhe was forced to afford him one minutes private diſcourſe; for he had been ſo cautious as to bring one of his friends with him, who entertained Sulpicia, while he ſpoke to Clelia. I am not ſo preſumptuous, Madam, ſaid he to her, as to imagine you ſhould make it your deſire that I might not periſh in the War, but knowing you to be too good a Roman not to put up your addreſſes to heaven for the Victory, all the favor I beg is, that it may be without exception; for if I am comprehended among that multitude, for whom you make vows, I ſhall hope the honour to ſee you again, and haply the glory of having merited, by ſome action of mine your eſteem. Since you are a perſon of much gallantry, replyed ſhe, ſince I love my Country, and am neither cruel nor unjuſt, aſſure your ſelf, that when I ſhall put up my Prayers for the Victory, you ſhall be included in them; but at the ſame time that I ſhall pray to the gods for the peace of Rome, I ſhall do the ſame for its Protectors, and conſequently for you. Alas Madam, replyed he, my peace depends ſo abſolutely upon you, that the gods, omnipotent as they are, cannot give it me, without you. I beſeech you interrupted Clelia force me not to torment you, by deſiring of me more than I can do, for ſadneſs is not a diſpoſition for Victory. Be gone then Horatius, be gone, and behave your ſelf ſo, that at your return your heart may know no other love than that of your Country. Rome does better deſerve your affection than I do, ſince I can never afford you mine. I apprehend you Madam, I apprehend you, replyes haſtily Horatius, you encourage me to Victory, becauſe when ſhe is ſought, a man often meets with death; but know unmerciful as you are, that this will be more favorable to me than you are, and that I ſhall find incomparably much more ſatisfaction in dying than in living, without being beloved by the only perſon whom I can love.

Upon this Horatius left Clelia, and made after the Army which was now upon its march. Brutus and Valerius, who would not have any thing omitted which they ought in prudence to do, had not forgotten to ſend out military Tribunes with a body of Horſe for their guard, to aſſure themſelves of the Poſt which they had reſolved to take, and to prepare it for caſtrametation. The Tribunes, ſecured by the Horſe, marked out the compaſs of the Camp, by the help of the Pioneers they had brought with them. They took up ſuch a tract of ground, as might conveniently receive all the Legions, taking great heed that the Cavalry ſhould not be diſpoſed on that ſide where it could not eaſily meet with thoſe things that were neceſſary for it, and where all the Troops might not remain in order and ſafety. To take away all expreſſion of Superiority, Brutus, eſtabliſhed that cuſtom, which hath in a manner been obſerved ever ſince, which is, that when there were two Conſuls in one Army, it might be ſaid there were two Camps in one, for either of the Conſuls had under his particular command, all the Troops that belonged to him, as if there had been no other Troops, though the general extent of the Camp included all the Legions. According to this order the military Tribunes made two ſpacious ſquares, compaſſed by the ſame Trench. In the midſt of that which lay next the enemy, was Brutus's Tent raiſed at the diſtance of a hundred foot from any other Tent. That done, making ſpacious and long ſtreets proportionable to the number of the Officers and Souldiers, they ſo diſpoſed them, that the avenues looked towards the Conſuls tent, that at his firſt orders all might be immediately, ready to wait on him. They placed the Cavalry on the two ſides oppoſite one to another, and the Infantry in like manner, the Centurions at the head of thoſe they commanded, and the Tents of the Tribunes at one of the ranks which looked towards that of the Conſul, that they might be ready to receive the ſeveral orders that were ſent them; for ſome had the charge of the Magazins of the Army, others of the place where Military juſtice was executed, and others of the great place where all neceſſaries for the Souldiers were ſold. They alſo aſſigned a place for the Baggage, and the Chariots, and put the Camp into ſuch order, that every one knew preſently where he was to quarter. To that end they put a particular mark at the firſt Tent of every ſtreet, which giving direction for whom it was aſſigned, the Souldiers immediately knew where there Tents were in the Camp, as well as they knew where there Houſes were in Rome. To be ſhort, they ſo diſpoſed of all things, that the Camp was equally defenſible every where, and could not be ſurpaſſed by any external force, nor was ſubject to any confuſion within, ſo excellent were they in the Art of encamping. There was a particular Poſt aſſigned for the Stranger-forces; that ſo there might happen no diſſention between thoſe of Ardea, and thoſe those of Rome. The same order being observed in Valerius's Quarters as was in Brutus's, between these two Quarters lay the Magazines of the Army I mentioned before, the place where all Military necessaries were sold, and that where justice was one. The several Troops were also so disposed, that the Cavalry might every way relieve the Infantery, so that whether you consider defence, order, accommodations, or the convenience of the Camp, nothing was omitted. So that when the Army was come up, it went into the Camp as into a City, and it came so seasonably, that Tarquin, who had some intentions to hinder their incamping, was forced to alter his design, and to mind only the fortification of the Post he was in himself. Insomuch, that Brutus, upon his arrival to the Camp, hearing there had been a little skirmish between the Horse he had sent to secure those that drew out the lines of the Trench, and a party of Tarquin's, would needs give a happy presage to his Army by the beginning of a Victory, and so sent the Cavalry of Ardea, commanded by Persander, to relieve those that were engaged. So that Æmilius, the three lovers in Mourning, and Amilcar, were in this first engagement, which proved wholly advantageous to the Romans. For they pursued the enemy to their Trenches, killed many, and brought no small number Prisoners.

But among others, the three Lovers in Mourning, gave such signal expressions of their courage, that all that saw them, acknowledged they had never seen people behave themselves so gallantly. Insomuch, that when Amilcar was returned to the Camp, and found Brutus examining the Prisoners, to find out what posture the Enemies Army was in, he gave them such extraordinary commendations, that it added much to the curiosity which some had to have an account of their adventures. For my part (says Amilcar to Brutus, speaking of these Strangers, before all that were about him) I can assure you, that these Gentlemen, who have put upon their Bucklers, that they court Death, know better how to bestow it on others, and consequently overcome, than you can well imagine; and if they always defend their lives so well, it will be long ere they meet with what they so much court. Since it is very hard replyes Brutus, to know well how to give death, without running at the same time the hazard of receiving it, it may not haply be so long ere these excellent unfortunate men may find it, But it being a pitty that such gallant persons should miscarry, be it your charge, who are so great a lover of Life, to win them into a love of it; and who are guilty of so much joy, to comfort them in their misfortunes, if so be they be capable of it.

Brutus could but in a manner sigh out these words, by reason of the cruel reflection he made on such misfortunes as were inconsolable, and out of a consideration that the death of Lucretia, was by him to be numbred among those unhappinesses which Time cannot alleviate, nor admit any period but that of life. But Revenge being the only satisfaction he was capable of, his thoughts were wholly taken up with those things which are to be considered when a man hath a powerful enemy to overcome. To this end he went in person about the Camp, he appointed guards, gave orders to the Tribunes, that they might derive the same to the Centurions; and they to others, and according to custom, he sent every one a dart, to the three Lovers in mourning, who had done so valiantly; and a little before day, he went, forgetting the dignity of Consul, to take a view of the enemies Camp, which he perceived it was very difficult to assault. Yet had he some intentions to set upon them the next day, so to prevent them from farther fortification. But there fell such extraordinary rain for two days together, that he was forced to give over all thoughts of it; for besides that, the Souldiers would have been over-wearied to fight, he must have made his assault on a side, that lay upon a Fenne, which had been very inconvenient. So that it was impossible to do any thing, and the weather proved so ill, that the two Armies were equally forced to keep within their Trenches, without any act of hostility of either side. So that those who were not ingaged in the chiefest places of command had no more to do but to entertain themselves in their Tents. Accordingly, while Brutus and Valerius took order for all things, Octavius, Herminius, Horatius, and Persander were gotten into Amilcar's Tent, whither Æmilius coming a little after, they all set upon him to relate the adventures of those unfortunate Lovers he had brought with him to Rome, whose valor had raised so much admiration, and whose melancholly so much pitty and curiosity. Æmilius, would at first have excused himself, but they importuned him so far, that he was forced to comply with their desires. Having therefore given order they should not be disturbed, but in case Brutus asked for them, he began his story thus.

The History of ARTELISA, MELICRATES, LISIDAS, CALIANTES, and ALCIMEDES

WEre I to relate the History of my illustrious friends, to persons unacquainted with Love, I might haply fear I should not raise compassiom in their hearts; but being to speak to such as have loved, do still love, and will love, haply while they live, I hope my relation will win your pitty for those whose adventures I am to give you an account of: But that you may apprehend them the better, and be satisfied with what I shall tell you, You are to know, that since I made my self a voluntary exile, I never stirred from Eryx, but resided there ever since. For, it being a place where there is a great resort of strangers, because of the famous Temple of Venus that is there, I thought I might more easily remain obscure there, than in any other place, Nay, I was in hope, that a place consecrated to the Mother of Love, would prove more fortunate to me than any other, and that the very sight of so many Lovers that came thither from all parts, would be some comfort to me, in that I thence inferr'd that I was not the only wretched man in the world. I must confess also, that an humour took me, to see whether the conversation of persons of worth and virtue, might give me any ease, and whether the sight of the most accomplished beauties of all Sicily could recover me. But that you may know what remedies I have found ineffectual, to the end you may afford me some of your pitty, as well as my friends; I will describe the place of my banishment, and give you a representation of the principal persons that inhabit it; it being in some sort necessary you were acquainted with the Court, where the History, I am to relate to you, was acted.

Eryx is a Mountain of Sicily, which admits none higher than it self, but that of Ætna, and which is as famous for the magnificent Temple of Venus, that is upon the top of it, as the other for the flames it breaths out. This Mountain looks towards the Sea, on the side of Italy; it is scituated between Drepanum and Panormus, but nearer Panormus than Drepanum. Upon the top of this Mountain there is a pleasant Plain, on which is built the famous Temple of Venus, whereof I shall in the sequel of my discourse, give you a particular account. Towards the midst of this Mountain, there is a great City of the same name whereof the avenues are certainly very difficult, but the prospect so pleasant, that there is hardly a house in the City, whence you have not an admirable sight of the Countrey, For, stand where you will, you see the Sea, Brooks, Springs, Meadows, Gardens, Towns at a distance, and divers other pleasant objects: The Prince who at the present, governs that little State, hath had two Sons, whereof the elder died, after he had married an admirable person, whereof I will give you a description, that you may the better judge of this little Court; and the younger is a very noble well-made Prince, who is fallen in love at Agrigentum, with a very excellent person, named Bereliſa. But in regard he staied but a little while at Eryx, while I was there, I shall give you no account of him.

That then which brings so much gallantry to this Court, is, that from Greece, Africk, and Italy, there come continually persons of all qualities and Sexes, bringing offerings to Venus Erycina. Hence is it that the Temple of that Goddess is richer than all other Temples of Sicily; for according to the popular opinion, Venus receives more favourably the addresses that are made to her in that place, than even in Cyprus it self, where she first landed after her birth. Accordingly are there to be continually seen, the sacrifices of fortunate and unfortunate Lovers, who come either to acknowledge, or implore the assistance of the Goddess. Nay, there you may find some people without love, who fearing Venus should be incens'd at their insensibility, and might order her Son to punish them for it, come and offer sacrifice to appease her, intreating her to remember, that Adonis had been insensible, so to win her to pardon their insensibility. Upon some such account was it, that when I left Eryx, they expected there the Princess of Elida, who is called Eliſmunda, who they said, was one of the most beautiful, and most amiable persons upon earth, who was coming to the Temple of Venus Erycina, to beg her pardon for having raised love in so many, without taking any her self, and to entreat her, that she might spend her whole life in captivating of hearts, without ever engaging her own.

For Heavens sake, replied Amilcar, interrupting him, write to Eryx, to know whether the prayers of this unjust Beauty are granted, as also to know what kind of person she is, for I think it a rational curiosity in me, to be a little better acquainted with a Princess, who would all her life time raise love in others, without entertaining any her self.

It will not be long e'r you be satisfied, replied Emilius, since that one of the best-humored men in the world, that I left at Eryx, will be at Rome within fifteen daies, so that he will be able to give you a pleasant Character of her. For my own part, I have heard some say, who are well seen in things of that nature, that this Princess is undeniably one of the most accomplished persons that eye can see. But till he I speak of come to give you a draught of her, I am only to tell you, that it is not hard for you to imagine, that this great resort of strangers of both Sexes, who come to Eryx, meerly upon the account of Love, hath insensibly added very much to the Gallantry of the Court. And thence it comes, that the news which which that place affords, relate for the most part to their adventures, who come to Venus's Temple, whereof the magnificence is extraordinary. For besides, that it is built altogether of Marble, and that the Architecture of it is very noble; there are Pictures that represent Venus, in an hundred several postures. There is both above and below those large Pictures, embossed Imagery, wherein are represented all the famous victories of her Son; that is, Jupiter in the form of a Bull, carrying away Europa; Apollo running after Daphne; Hercules spinning with Deianira; Pluto carrying away Proserpina; Neptune in love with Thetis; and divers other illustrious Lovers. What's yet further remarkable, is, That this Temple is in the midst of a spacious place, whereof the four sides are built with houses, for the entertainment of those that come thither, such as are furnish'd differently, according to the qualities of the Lodgers. For there are some very magnificent, others but ordinary, but none that are not convenient, and where the perfumes do not purifie the air, for a more pleasant respiration. There is further in this Temple, continual Musick; so that it is not the least part of their care who keep it, by pleasant objects, admirable scents, ravishing consorts, to enkindle most tender and affectionate dispositions in their hearts, who are come to sacrifice, and to nourish them in those that have them not.

But to return to the Prince of Eryx, though he be not young, yet is he not so far gone in years, as that he may be called old, so that being naturally noble, his whole Court derives from his humour; but to speak truly, the Princess Clarinta, wife to his eldest Son, is that which makes this little Court the most neat, the most divertive, and the most sprightly of any in the world. Nor indeed does the Princess of Eryx want that particular gift of inspiring wit into those that come near her, that it might be said, a man durst not be stupid where she is. I beseech you, interrupted Amilcar, be pleased to take the pains to give us a description of her Beauty, Wit, and Humor. What you desire, replied Æmilius, is doutless a harder task than you imagine, since there is something that is so delicate and so particular in the Beauty and worth of the Princess of Clarinta, that I think I shall not be able to find expressions proper enough to make you apprehend it. For should I tell you in general, that she is of a good stature, well made, handsome, that she hath a good countenance, and is infinitely witty, you might compare her to divers others of her sex, who might challenge much in all those qualities.

To distinguish her therefore from other Beauties, I am to acquaint you with what is particular in this admirable Woman. Know then, that she is of that comely stature, which, being much above the mean, is not yet excessive; Besides, she hath that freedom of air, an action so natural, and a deportment so noble, that a man must at first sight, conclude her to be of high birth, that she hath spent her whole life among people, that she is of a cheerful disposition, and inclined to dancing. She is fair-hair'd, yet of that fairness, that hath nothing of faintness, but suits well with beauty. For her complexion, it is so admirable, that it is not in the power of the sharpest winters, to derogate from that fair Damask, which makes her so beautiful, and gives such a lustre to her admirable whiteness, that it ever displaies such a freshness, as is never seen, but, at the uprising of Aurora, upon the fairest Roses of the Spring. Clarinta hath moreover this advantage, that the agitations of her mind never appear, to the disadvantage of her complexion. Melancholly never makes her look yellow, anger does but add a little to the damask of her Cheeks, modesty heightens her Beauty, and joy shadows her Face with a certain serenity, which becalms the disturbances even of those that come near her. For her Lips, she hath them of the noblest colour in the world, an excellent compass of Face, eyes Sky-coloured, and full of Spirit, and the cheeks so inviting, that she never smiles, but she discovers something that's inexpressible, yet not the most inconsiderable part of what is most taking in her. For her Breast, it is impossible to have one better made, or whiter, and to tell you all in few words, there cannot be seen an handsomer person, nor one that can with so much ease conquer hearts.

For her Wit, I am in doubt whether I shall be able to make you understand it, but am certain, there never was any more pleasant, more clear, more subtil, or more delicate. She hath a lively imagination, and the whole carriage of her person is so gallant, so neat, and so full of charm, that a man cannot without shame see her, and not fall in love with her. And yet she confesses her self to be subject to certain groundless vexations, which cause her to make a truce with joy, only for three or four hours. But these vexations are so inconsiderable, and so transient, that hardly any but her self is sensible of them. Her conversation is familiar, divertive, and natural; she speaks pertinently and well, nay, sometimes she hath some natural and sprightly expressions that are infinitely taking: and though she be not of those immoveable Beauties, that are guilty of no action, yet do not the pretty gestures she uses, proceed from any affectation, but are only the effects of her vivacity of spirit, liveliness of disposition, her divertive humour, and her natural inclination to do alwaies that which is handsome. To be short, she dances admirably well, so that she ravishes the eyes and hearts of all that see her, for she so accurately observes time and measure, and carries her self with that evenness, and hath I know not what, that a man connot make intelligible, which gives her that gallantry and pleasantness of air, that all others have not.

Besides all this, Clarinta is very much given to reading, and what is best of all, is, that without pretending to much knowledge, she is excellently well acquainted with all that is noble, as to Science. She hath learnt the African language, with a miraculous facility, for there being great commerce between Africa and Sicily, the Ladies that are of any worth, are desirous to learn it. Add to all, that this Princess hath a very sweet and excellent voice; and what is yet more commendable, is, that though she sings in a passionate way, and that it may be justly said that she sings well, yet doth she it like a person of quality; that is without engaging her honour upon it, without intreaty, or affectation, but so gallantly, that it makes her more amiable, especially when she sings certain little African Songs, which she is more taken with, than those of her own Countrey, because they are more passionate. Clarinta is also a lover of all excellent things, and all innocent pleasures, but she loves glory above her self, and what makes for her advantage, she hath so great a judgement, that she hath found out the way, without being severe, savage, or solitary, to preserve the noblest reputation in the world, and that in a great Court, where all persons of worth have access to her, and where she raises love in all those that are capable of it. 'Tis true, she never raised hope in any one of those that love her, but is so highly deserving, that despair, the most infallible remedy of that passion, does not cure those that sigh for her. In the mean time, Clarinta looks not on them as her Adorers, and that very sprightliness of humour which becomes her so well, and which diverts her self while she diverts others, is further serviceable to her, in that it pleasantly makes a many pass for friends, who would, if they durst, be accounted Lovers. In fine, she behaves her self with such prudence, that detraction it self hath a respect for her virtue, and hath not charged her with the least gallantry, though the world affords not a person equally gallant. Hence is it that she sometimes merrily saies, that she was never in love with any thing but her own glory, and that she is so with that, even to jealousie.

What is further admirable in this person, is, that at the age she is now of, she manages the affairs of her house, with as much prudence, as if she had all the experience that time can give to a great understanding, and what I more admire, is, that when there is a necessity, she can slight company and the Court, and divert her self in the Countrey, with as much enjoyment as if she had been born in the woods. And she returns thence as fair, as cheerful, and as neat, as if she had not stirr'd from Eryx. I had forgot to tell you that she writes as she speaks; that is, in the most pleasant and gallant-like manner that may be. Nay, what is yet further remarkable in this Princess, is, that her charms are so great, and so unavoidable, that contrary to custom, she gains the hearts of the Ladies, as well as those of the men, and that she knows as well how to inspire others with friendship as with love. Hence may it be affirmed, she hath equally subdued envy and detraction, since she is lov'd by all the beauties, and all the gallants of the Court where she is. In fine, that person only whom I love excepted, I have never seen so many attractions together, so much sprightliness, so much gallantry, so much entertainment, so much innocence, and so much virtue, and there was never any other that so well understood the art of being ever decent without affectation, subject to railery without malice, to mirth without imprudence, to glory without pride, and to virtue without severity.

Clarinta hath yet one thing very extraordinary in persons of her age and humour, for she is soon won to submit to the advice of her friends, and to believe them sometimes in things that are contrary to her own sentiments. 'Tis true she hath one, that hath known her from her infancy, a person of very great worth, so much understanding, judgement, knowledge, virtue, politeness, and who understands the world so well, that it is not strange she should choose him from the beginning to be the chiefest of her friends; from all which you may judge, whether such a Princess may not derive wit to the whole Court where she is. And indeed I can assure you, there is hardly any place in the world, where, proportionably to its greatness, there are so many persons of worth, as may be seen at Eryx. But since I cannot at the present trouble you with the descriptions of them all, I shall only tell you, that there is in that place a person of quality, called Artelisa, whose merit you must needs imagine to be very great, since she hath ever had a higher place in the esteem and friendship of Clarinta, than any other. This person is black-hair'd, hath a white and lively complexion, hath a brown eye, yet full of Beauty, and languishing, an Air mixt with gallantry and modesty, and is excellently well made. For her face, she hath certainly that which pleases, which charms, and that especially which can enchant hearts, by a certain sweetness that hath something in it that's fierce, which makes in her disposition such a mixture of mirth, melancholly, fierceness, and complaisance, that it is hard to forbear loving her, if a man once sees her. Accordingly hath she been more lov'd, than any other beauty ever could be, but particularly by four men, all persons of more than ordinary worth. I am confident you will agree to what I say, when I have told you that the three unfortunate persons I brought with me to Rome, and whose valour you have in so much admiration, are the slaves of the accomplish'd Artelisa, and are not miserable, but upon the account of her love. 'Tis true, you have not heard them speak enough to understand what they are, but you must needs think them persons of very much worth, when I have told you that they have an understanding equal to their courage. Caliander is doubtless infinitely well furnished, but what I yet more, admire in him, is, that he is generous, liberal, magnificent, and generally obliging: For Decimedes, he is commendable, not only for his courage and his wit, but because he is an eager lover, an eager friend, and a great enemy to people that are lukewarm and indifferent. Thence it is that he is of opinion, a man should earnestly desire what ever he desires, from the most inconsiderable things, even to the greatest, maintaining that a staggering Will is ever an argument of mediocrity of understanding. For this reason was Decimedes in love with life, and the pleasures thereof, more than any one before this misfortune happened: and he was one that of all the world, spent his time the most pleasantly.

For Lisydas I can assure you, that before he fell into misfortune, there was not a pleasanter person than he; yet had he ever some little inclination to melancholly, but it was a melancholly that had in it so much sweetness, was so far from frowardness, and so fit for society, that he seemed to be sad, but only out of an over-tenderness of heart, and that he was of a more divertive disposition it being certain that those that are professedly merry, do not many times please so much as those that are of another humour, who yet speak things that are pleasant. So I may without flattery say of Lisydas, that a man could not be more amiable than he was.

For

Now Melicrates, since you have not seen him, I must needs describe him to you more particularly, for he is so much concern'd in this History, that it is first fit you knew what kind of person he is. Yet I shall only tell you in two words, that he hath a good face, that he is well made, and that he wants not any thing that might please in an instant, and lack whatever might render a man acceptable while he lived. For wit, he hath as much as may be had; for valour no less than his Rivals; he is of a complaint and taking humour; he speaks well, writes gallant-like, and what more precisely distinguishes him from all other persons of worth, is, that he loves glory beyond what can be imagined; that he hath the most passionate soul that may be, and that he attributes more to the power of love, than most Lovers do. For he says that when a man loves a person by whom he is loved, it is not lawful for him to love any thing else but for her sake; that he must renounce all, and live only for her whom he adores; that he must submit his Will to hers; that he must consider his Mistriss, as a person that hath a right to command all; and he must never consult prudence or reason, when he is to obey her.

Thus have you the sentiments of Artelisa's four Lovers: by all whom, she hath been so excessively belov'd, that the like was never seen. But to give you some account of the original of their loves with some order, you are to know, that Lisydas hath loved her, even from the Cradle, and continued it all his life with some hope: they were of equal quality, their Estates suitable thereto, and sufficient to maintain them honourably together; there was no difference between their Families; and Artelisa, when she had reason, was not too violently set against his love: So that it could not be but that Lisydas must be in some hope. Artelisa had lost her Father at four years of age, and her Mother being infinitely fond of her, and having not so much wit as her Daughter, it may be said that Artelisa was at her own disposal. Nor did she declare any less to all the world, than that she had absolutely resolved, not to hearken to any proposition of marriage, till she were twenty years of age, not thinking, as she said, any thing more unjust, than that Maids should marry before they had judgement enough to know what they ought either to love or hate. So that Artelisa being but seventeen years of age when she spoke thus, Lisydas extreamly amorous as he was, could do no more than serve her and hope; she in the mean time, not admitting him so much as to speak to her of his love. 'Twas to little purpose for him to tell her, that she had her full weight of reason at seventeen, for she had made so strong a resolution, not to marry too soon, that nothing could make her change her mind.

About this time, Melicrates, who was gone to travel into Greece, return'd to Eryx, and brought Caliantes along with him, whom he had made acquaintance with at Elida, of which Countrey he was. But being a person that was very rich, free, and young, he at his arrival at Eryx, sought out only the occasions of expence and entertainment. For Melicrates he was so taken with Greece, that he forget it what he could, he returned with an intention to engage himself in some love at Eryx. Of this humour went Caliantes and he to the Princess Clarinta, the next day after their arrival; yet did they not see her, because she was somewhat indispos'd; but they saw Artelisa, who having a particular priviledge there, came out of the Princesses chamber, when they were going away. Being grown very much handsomer since Melicrates's departure from Eryx, for he had been away three years, and Caliantes having never seen her, they were in a manner equally surpriz'd; nay so farr, that their hearts were sufficiently engaged from that first sight, for to go and wait on the Princess of Eryx the next day without any danger. Melicrates had no sooner perceived her, but he went to her, and told her, that he durst not presume to see her, till he had waited on the Princess, and so presented Caliantes to her, telling her, his intention was to do it at her own house. At last, the discourse came so about, that Artelisa having acquainted them, that she was to return home, they conducted her to her Chamber door; she presented them to her Mother, who knew, and had a great esteem for Melicrates; so that they staid till night with Artelisa, and two Ladies of her friends that came to see her. Insomuch that she having an extraordinary wit, they went away both with a certain emotion, which might haply already be called Love. Nor did they keep this new passion secret from one another; on the contrary, Melicrates told Caliantes, that he was very much afraid Artelisa might engage him; and Caliantes made answer, that for his part he was engag'd already. But, added he, laughing, since I am not of Eryx, and that I intend to make no long stay here, I shall be no great hindrance to you, and therefore think it not much to afford me this pleasant entertainment while I am here. But do you take love, says Melicrates, to be a jesting matter? For any hurt he hath done me yet, replies Caliantes, laughing still, I would much rather jest with him than with a young Lion, whose claws I should stand in greater fear of, than all the darts of that Love you think so terrible. Yet as I am a person naturally very curious, I should not be much troubled to have a violent passion, were it but to see whether there be so much pleasure, and so much pain in love, as all those pretend there is who speak of love. And therefore I once more intreat you not to take it amiss, if I endeavour to raise my self to a love of Artelisa; but I mean a violent one, for as to a Gallant's love, I have it already. But if we become Rivals, replies Melicrates, we shall not haply be any longer friends. To avoid that inconvenience, replies Caliantes, let us now mutually promise not to fall out, though we should both fall in love in good earnest. Believe me, answered Melicrates, we should do better to promise not to love Artelisa at all, or cast lots who shall serve her. For my part, replies Caliantes, I will serve her, and cannot avoid it: and for my part, replies Melicrates, I serve her already; for in my judgement, it is a good office done her, to endeavour to hinder a stranger, so great a gallant as you are, from attempting to conquer her heart.

This brought upon the stage amany other things, after which, they seriously promised not to fall out, if they became Rivals. But Caliantes loving to do all things with abundance of noise, was very glad of this occasion to discover his liberality, and to make a publique Declaration of Love, such such as no man had ever made. To this end he offered a sacrifice to Venus Erycina, such as for the nobleness of it, might have become a Prince; for his offering was the most magnificent that could be. So that it being requisite that a man tell publiquely why he sacrifices; Caliantes said, he gave the goddess thanks, for that she had caus'd the first beautiful person he had spoken to in Eryx, to raise love in him; adding, that being come only to desire it, he thought himself obliged to give the Goddess thanks, that had prevented his desires. So that the so extraordinary occasion of so gallant a sacrifice, being soon known, it was afterwards easily found out, that Arteliſa was she that Caliantes had first spoken to; which she had often cast in her dish, especially at the Princess Clarinta's, where the entertainments were always infinitely divertive: but being look'd on as the gallantry of a magnificent person, who was no great believer of Venus, since he would scoff at the sacrifice he had offered her, Arteliſa was not troubled at it, for she understood the business of raillery, as well as another.

Liſydas at first conceived no jealousie of it, nay, even Melicrates did not think himself obliged for that, to smother the violent inclination he had for Arteliſa; so that he saw her as often as he could, and fell so deeply in love with her, that it was impossible for him to oppose his passion when he pleas'd himself. Nay, he flatter'd himself with happy success in his design, for he imagin'd that Arteliſa having always seen Liſydas, could not possibly have any more than an indifferent affection for him; that Caliantes being an only Son, would soon be sent for by his friends, and that Arteliſa would haply be sensible of the tenderness of his love; being with all this, perswaded that he knew how to love better than all other men, and that love was of greater consequence in order to be lov'd, than any thing else.

About the same time came Alcimedes from Heraclea to Eryx, for there being a very rich Uncle of his in that Countrey, that resolved to make him his Heir, he thought it not amiss to confirm him by his presence in a design so advantageous to him. He being of an humour that would not permit him to be long in Eryx, e'r he had seen whatever were most considerable there, he went to the accomplish'd Clarinta's, the very next day after his arrival, where he found a many excellent Ladies, and not a few men, persons of worth and quality. For besides Caliantes, Liſydas, and Melicrates, there was also one called Teramus, a person questionless of extraordinary merit, who proved partly the occasion of Alcimedes's love to Arteliſa, because it was through his means, that this fair Lady said something that encouraged him to serve her. But since you cannot have the whole pleasure of that days conversation, without being well acquainted with Teramus, give me leave to describe him to you, for I am confident the description will please you, and you will acknowledge that I have had reason to be so desirous to give it you.

Teramus is a person of high birth, not only of an extraordinary merit, but of a merit particular to himself; a lover of honour, honesty, and Philosophy, but the gallant-like Philosophy which banishes all the uncivil'z'd virtues; who hath the art of reconciling Wisdom and Pleasures, and does not believe but that prudence ought to be employed as well in the choice of pleasures, as in the management of the affairs of greatest consequence. For his person, he is somewhat above the ordinary stature; his action is negligent enough, yet such as becomes a person of quality; his hair is inclining to fair; his complexion palish, eyes black, sparkling, and full of spirit; and what's remarkable, is, that the Phisiognomie, which is a thing one would imagine should never change, changes in him, according to the humour he is in, and the persons he is in company with; For if he happen accidentally into a company that is troublesome and unpleasant, he puts on a cold, cloudy, melancholly, and thoughtful countenance. On the contrary, when he is among persons that please him, the sprightliness of his imagination changes the air of his face, and his eyes betray an insinuating, crafty, pleasant, and lively smile, which multiplies the pleasure of all the ingenious extravagancies which his imagination furnishes him with, upon whatever subject is offered. He hath certainly a very clear understanding, and there are few things excellent in point of knowledge, which he is not acquainted with. But though he hath made himself master of whatever is most excellent in books, yet may it be affirmed he hath made the world in general, especially persons of worth and gallantry, his particular study: for it is certain that he is so well acquainted with all the insinuations which love hath inspired, either into men or women; that, in point of gallantry, he might over-reach any one, and not be over-reach'd by any. He hath a sprightly imagination, a lively and delicate wit, and is exquisite in the discernment of things. He loves all persons of worth, and he writes things that have a Character so natural, so gallant, and so ingeniously pleasant, that though it be impossible to say what he says, yet cannot a man but be astonished that he hath not thought what he thinks; so that he does what is very hard to do; that is to write things natural, yet infinitely taking.

Add to this, That Teramus is a person above Ambition, though he be extreamly sensible of what is most nobly glorious. Not but that in the beginning of his life, the greatness of his Soul inclin'd him to make some approaches towards Fortune; but having discovered that she avoided him, he hath prudently slighted her, and would not put himself upon fruitless attempts for a thing his vertue could be without. So that looking on Ambition as a passion full of disquiet, he hath kept it from all entrance into his heart. Nor would he ever admit love there, with all those torments that attend it in the hearts of other Lovers; On the contrary, he makes use of joy in all things; 'tis out of joy that he falls in love, 'tis joy that appeases his passion, nay, 'tis joy that is his remedy against his passion; for if it happens that he must either renounce his joy, or quit a Mistress, he can sometimes without any great difficulty, be induced to do the latter.

Teramus is further sensible of all pleasures in general, and his unsatisfied soul hath endeavoured to try what there is most pleasant in all the passions. For Musick, he is so much taken with it, that he makes it a remedy against his indispositions; for he loves harmony in all its kinds, though he prefers an excellent voice before all the other charms of Musick.

Muſick. For converſation, he ſeems to be ſo cut out for it when he pleaſes, and he is ſo perfect in the art of heightning the enjoyments of it when he thinks fit, that it is not the moſt inconſiderable of his perfections. In a word, he makes ſuch pleaſant reflections on things, that there's nothing ſo ſerious, which he makes not divertive when he undertakes it. Yet is not his temperament altogether free from melancholly, but it is ſuch as is ſuitable with greatneſs of mind, and not that which betrays any frowardneſs. 'Tis of that kind which makes a man in love with the nobleſt touches of Muſick, that makes a man write things infinitely taking, that can unite pleaſure and faintneſs, and makes the ſoul paſſionate, and the heart ſuſceptible of Love. Accordingly is it the predominant paſſion of Teramus, and by which he hath dreſs'd up an amorous morality, which is the pleaſant thing in the world,

For heavens's ſake, ſaies Amilcar, what are the Maxims of it?

In the firſt place replies Æmilius, he maintains, that pleaſure is the ſoul of Love; that ſighs, tears, afflictions, torments, and deſpair, are only fit for Songs. That there is nothing ſo dangerous, as to be rude and importune with continual complaints; and that to gain her love, a man muſt make it his main buſineſs to divert her, and to make her think of him whether ſhe will or no. Yet would he not have it done by being ridiculous; for there is a vaſt difference between a perſon that makes ſport without being eſteemed, and him who is reſpected and diverts. He alſo maintains that a man ſhould never make profeſſion of being unconſtant, though he ought not to be faithful to obſtinacy. He acknowledges a man ſhould be alwaies diſcreet, and that he ſhould never reſign up his Miſtriſs to another, but for long and tedious loves they are without his acquaintance, and abſolutely contrary to his inclination. But what is yet further particular, is, that he only deſerves the praiſe of the ſatisfaction he gives her whom he loves; for he is not of thoſe Lovers who cannot pleaſe, but by a hundred things they can make no claim to themſelves. On the contrary, he pleaſes of himſelf, and that by a certain Art he hath, while he diverts the perſon he loves, to prejudice ſome others which he conceives ſhe might love. Hence is it, that if he obſerve, there are ſome pretenders that might gain any thing upon the affections of his Miſtriſs, he cunningly dreſſes up ſome ingenious ſtory againſt them, yet without diſcovering himſelf to be their Rival, ſo to work in her mind a contempt of thoſe he would ruine, before he endeavour to eſtabliſh himſelf: and this he does ſo finely, and ſo pleaſantly, that he forces that woman into a confidence with him, as to what relates to the imperfections of his Rivals. So that making her ſport with their defects, he deſtroys them, and pleaſes her he would be in favour with; he diverts her, and eſtabliſhes himſelf upon the ruines of thoſe he hath deſtroyed. You ſee what a perſon the amiable Teramus is; but that you may be the better acquainted with his humour, and better underſtand what I am to tell you, I muſt needs tell you what he ſent one day to a friend of his, who had jeſtingly intreated him to inſtruct him in his Amorous Morality, which is what you deſired

The Amorous MORALITY of TERAMUS.

THoſe who have affirm'd, that to be loved, it was neceſſary one ſhould love, were certainly perſwaded that Juſtice and Love ever held a good correſpondence. But to ſpeak without flattery, they never underſtood the humour of Women in general, nor yet the nature of Love in particular; ſince it is unqueſtionable, that it is more ordinary for us, to love thoſe that ſeem amiable to us, than to love thoſe that love us. So that to ſpeak rationally, at leaſt in my judgement, to be in favour among the Ladies, it is more neceſſary for a man to be much a Gallant, than to be very amorous. For as great paſſions are ever attended by afflictions, ſo it is hard, they ſhould work the effect which a Lover expects from them, ſince that for the moſt part, Love is more eaſily bred in joy than in grief. And indeed there is ſuch a conſonancy between Joy and Love, that it is only by it that a man can be loved, and only for it that a man ſhould love. Thence it is, that many times thoſe mourning and melancholly Lovers, who perſecute their Miſtreſſes with their afflictions, advantage their Rivals more than they do themſelves, if ſo be the others have any thing of a divertive diſpoſition. I therefore maintain, that the enſuing Maximes ought to be exactly followed, as ſuch as I have found ſo much advantage by, as to adviſe you to make uſe of them. You have in them what I have diſcovered, by a long experience to be moſt certain.

I.

A man ought to love whatever ſeems amiable to him, provided there be ſome probability to find more pleaſure than trouble in the conqueſt he propoſes to himſelf.

II.

A man ought to have a very great care, among women, not to profeſs himſelf an unconſtant man; yet ought he not on the other ſide, to be over-ſcrupulouſly conſtant; for it were much better to have a thouſand loves, than to have but one that ſhould laſt a man's whole life.

III.

Further, though a man muſt make no ſcruple to change a Miſtriſs, aſſoon as the trouble exceeds the pleaſure; yet ſhould he not be guilty of any indiſcretion towards any; for not only honour and generoſity adviſe the contrary, but there is alſo ſomething of intereſt that will not permit it, there being nothing ſo likely to make a man loſe a thouſand favours, as one act of indiſcretion.

IV.

A Lover muſt, above all things, make it his buſineſs to divert and to pleaſe, but to pleaſe upon his own account, and to divert, without being himſelf ridiculous; for though he do not ſpeak openly of Love to the Lady he ſerves, yet, if it come to be neceſſary for his pleaſure, he puts her into a condition to be eaſily perſwaded.

V.

V.

A man should never acquaint his Mistriss with his real secrets; for since a man that is well acquainted with the world, should never have any Mistress, unless he forsee that he shall give over loving within a short time, he ought to make his confidences among his friends of either Sex, and only direct his services, his wit, and his Songs to his Mistresses. For secrets of no consideration, when a man hath not any, he must invent some; for it is not amiss, to accustom Ladies to speak low, though you entertain them with things never so trivial.

VI.

A man must do all that lies in his power, so to put himself into a condition of pleasing, as not to ruine himself, and should be so well skilled in the choice of those he loves, that they shall be satisfied to find him divertive, that he hath a good wit, and is good company; for it is not glorious for any man to owe the conquest of a Ladies heart, onely to the multitude of his slaves.

VII.

A man should take especial care he be not betrayed into the hands of his Rivals, but must, on the contrary, behave himself so circumspectly, that they may be discovered to him.

VIII.

It were also good that the Lady one loves did believe, that your heart is not so much at her devotion, but that it is possible she may lose it, if she slight you; and that she be withal perswaded, that if she refuse it, some other would accept of it.

IX.

A man must further endeavour what in him lies, to make himself perfect in all the Gallantries of the place where he is; for a fair Lady is many times as easily perswaded by examples, as by arguments.

X.

For jealousie, a man must by all means avoid having too much of it, or keeping it long; for it is much better he should hate his Mistress, than make it his business to hate his Rivals to no purpose.

XI.

A man should not make it a profession to speak kind things to all beauties; but there is no great danger for him so to behave himself towards handsom women, as to give them occasion to think, that if he loves them not, 'tis not impossible he may.

XII.

It were not also amiss, for a man to be guilty of a certain subtility, such as may make him dreadful to those that may prejudice him; and to know how to make use of a kind of ingenious railery, which may oblige his Mistress, by way of concurrence, to laugh at them with him.

XIII.

A man must by all means, avoid an implicite obedience, which is good for nothing but to put a poor Lover to inconveniencies, and he may well think he does his duty in obeying exactly, when she commands things that are pleasant, where there is nothing fantastick, nothing of tyrannie or injustice.

XIV.

But above all things, a man must remember, that if it be good to instruct while he diverts, it is much better for him to divert himself while he perswades; for there is nothing more unjust, than for a man to profess love to make himself unhappy, and to love so violently, as to cease to be amiable, and to be incapable of ever raising love in another.

From what I have said, it is not hard to infer, that Teramus is a person that is infinite good company, and that accordingly being at the Princess of Eryx's, with all those other persons of worth I have spoken of, the day that Acimedes came thither first, the conversation that happened there, must needs be very divertive: Nor wanted there a particular subject to make it such; for the fair Artelisa, who had seen the Amorous Morality of Teramus, told him, that a person of quality of her acquaintance had answered him. I am confident, replies Clarinta, it must be some illustrious friend of the solitary Merigenes, who makes it his particular profession, to be able to love perfectly. For my part saies Teramus, could I imagine he would perswade me, I should be far from the curiosity of seeing his answer; but since I fear no such thing, and am fully perswaded that my reasons are the true reasons of gallantry, I would intreat the fair Artelisa to shew me this answer. If the Princess be so pleased, replied Artelisa, I am ready to satisfie you, for I have the greatest desire in the world to convert you. How witty soever this friend of Merigenes may be, (replied Teramus with a low voice) fair eyes, such as yours, are much more likely to cure me of inconstancy, than fair words, and therefore, if you would make me a Proselyte, you need no more than to look favourably on me. Had favourable looks that effect, replies Aurelia, you had been converted long since, and therefore let us see, whether the reasons of your friend will not make you change your opinion. Whereupon Artelisa takes out her Table-Book, and read out of it what you shall hear, by way of answer, Article for Article, to what Teramus had said.

Maximes contrary to those of TERAMUS.

THose who never knew how to love well, make a great enquiry into the nature of Love. For which reason, Teramus, a person otherwise infinitely excellent, hath been mistaken in the opinion he maintains, that a man, to be loved, ought rather to be a Gallant than Amorous, since it is certain, that if he had never perswaded his Mistriss of the greatness of his passion, all his merit, how extraordinary soever, should never have done it: But it proceeds certainly hence that having a great wit, and such as is capable of any thing he pleases, he hath found out the art of being exempted from sighs, complaints, and tears, and would employ in their stead, the graces, enjoyments, and laughters, to perswade his passion. But, when all is done, he hath said that he was in love, or pretends it, before he is loved, and is content to wound hearts, without any consideration, because he would never do any thing but lend his own, instead of bestowing it.

It is certainly madneſs for a man to have any love, unleſs he have as much as he is capable of; for the mediocrity of this paſſion, produces but a mediocrity of pleaſures, and it is not very proper to effect illuſtrious conqueſts. No queſtion but a man ſhould divert the perſon he loves, but it is not enough to pleaſe her, if he have not ſome influence on her heart; ſo that to act rationally, he muſt diſpoſe and make it pliant by joy, but he muſt move it by grief, and know how to make the advantages of certain occaſions, wherein two or three ſighs ſeaſonably breathed out, may be more effectual than all the Songs in the World.

I.

For the multitude of Miſtreſſes, 'tis a thing not to be endured, for to ſpeak truly, whoever hath two, hath none at all.

II.

For conſtancy, whoever would baniſh it out of the empire of love, deſtroys love it ſelf; for it no ſooner comes into a mans imagination, that a time may come wherein he ſhall love no more, but he ceaſes to love at the very inſtant, or to ſay better, hath already given over all thoughts of love, it being impoſſible that a heart truly amorous ſhould imagine that it can give over loving that which to it ſeems the only amiable thing upon earth. On the contrary, to ſay truth, one of the greateſt ſatisfactions of this paſſion is to imagine the eternity of love, if a man may ſo expreſs himſelf, and to ſet in futurition a multitude of pleaſures whereof he is not confident.

III.

For diſcretion, both the conſtant and unconſtant, that are perſons of quality are agreed it ought to be obſerved; and therefore I have not any thing to ſay to it, ſave that it is no eaſie matter to be always diſcreet, when a man is engaged in ſo many ſeveral intereſts.

IV.

No doubt but a man ought to pleaſe and divert, as I have already ſaid, but it cannot be ſaid it ought precisely to be done by way of raillery; for the general rule is, that a man ſhould accommodate himſelf to the humor of the perſon beloved.

V.

Whoever can conceal what he thinks moſt ſecret from his Miſtreſs, hath not given her his heart; for it is ſo impoſſible for a man to love any one and not acquaint her with all even to his leaſt thoughts, that it may be affirmed that a man does himſelf a certain violence when he conceals any of his ſentiments from the perſon he loves, and deprives himſelf of the moſt ſenſible pleaſure of love, by being uncapable of that exchange of ſecrets, wherein there is ſo much ſatisfaction. For indeed, what are they but the mutual hoſtages of that eternal peace which ought to be between two amorous hearts, and infallible arguments of the love a man hath in his ſoul, and which he will ever conſerve there. For thoſe little ſecrets which ſignifie nothing, he needs not be put to his invention for them, who loves paſſionately, for they ſpring at every moment, in their minds who know how to love.

VI.

For exceſſive magnificence, it ought always to be blamed when it ruines him that is addicted thereto, yet it is certain, that nothing makes it more excuſable than love, nay I durſt maintain that he was the inventor of it. But when all's done, I agree with my adverſary in this, that he who is magnificent, either as to retinue or cloaths, ought to make no account of it; and ſhould endeavor to raiſe himſelf into the love of his Miſtreſs without any aſſiſtance from ſuch things as belong not to him.

VII.

When a man hath Rivals, the ſureſt way to do them any prejudice, and to be better eſteemed than they, is to exceed them in worth, gallantry, and love; and if after all that, the Lady be unjuſt, and makes an ill choice, a man may change if he pleaſe, without incurring the cenſure of inconſtancy.

VIII.

It is certainly no ſmall advantage that the Lady whom a man loves, ſhould believe that the perſon ſhe affects may be loved by her; but this perſwaſion muſt proceed from the great merit of him that ſerves her, and not from his inſinuations to make her believe ſo much.

IX.

For the news that's abroad in the World, I queſtion whether a perſon that is very amorous, can take the pains to inform himſelf exactly thereof, for a ſincere love finds a man ſo much buſineſs, that it takes up his whole heart.

X.

For jealouſie, it is ſo far impoſſible to love, and not be guilty of it, that whoever can regulate it in his heart, is maſter of his own affection, and conſequently hath no great love for his Miſtreſs.

XI.

It is alſo my judgment, that a man ought not to make it his profeſſion to entertain all beauties with kind things; for when a man loves but one, he muſt have the leſs civility for all the reſt. He muſt at laſt ſo regulate it, that it be not exceſſive, nor yet dangerouſly interpreted by the perſon he loves.

XII.

As for that gallant-like ſubtilty which ſome are ſo much taken with, and is ſo much feared by others, it is ſo hard to pitch upon a mediocrity between a dangerous raillery and ſimple mirth, that I would not adviſe thoſe to meddle with it, on whom nature hath not beſtowed, as on Teramus, that gift of inſinuation, which at the ſame time cauſes a love and a fear of of him that hath it.

XIII.

For obedience, if you deprive love of it, you take away his Empire; for he that can diſobey the perſon he loves; loves her not, and deſerves not the name of Lover.

XIV.

For the laſt Article, I confeſs that he who thinks he may be always happy in loving, deſerves to be accounted a mad man, if he be not one; but love being not a thing voluntary, the torments that attend it are of the ſame nature; Whence I infer, that Teramus hath hath only made it his business to instruct a pleasing Gallant, and not a real Lover.

Though Merigenes's friends and I, interrupted Amilcar, are not of the same sect, since I agree with pleasant Teramus, yet I cannot but think him a person that is very understanding, and would fain know what manner of man he is. For my part replyes Herminius, though I am not of your opinion, yet do I agree with you in that desire: and for my part, added Ollavius, though I should have wished not to be of Merigenes's sect, yet shall I be glad to be acquainted with him. For my part says Persander, I am so much taken with an ardent affection, that I love all those that are of my opinion. For what concerns me, says Horatius, I must attribute all my unhappiness to Constancy, so far, that if I would, I should wish not to be constant; but when all's done, since it is some comfort to find persons of worth of our judgment, I shall be glad to know whether this Protector of Constancy be so excellent a person as I believe him.

Since you are all resolved replyes Æmilius, I will describe Merigines to you, he being a person so much concerned in the close of this History, that I think it some obligation to give you an account of him. Know then, that Merigines is an Asian, of very noble birth, and virtuous inclinations. He is tall, of a good complexion, all the lineaments of his face are very well made; he is brown hair'd, hath eyes full of spirit, a noble air, teeth admirably fair, a pleasant smile, and a fortunate and prudent Physiognomy. He hath a clear understanding, considers things as he should do, and his wit and judgment hold such a correspondence, that they never act one without another. Sincerity discovers it self in all his actions, and there is a perfect sympathy between his words and thoughts. In a word, he is a great professor of honor, integrity, and generosity; he is a faithful friend, and an earnest lover; goodness he affects and professes; he is eminent for politeness, sweetness and complaisance, his conversation is familiar and pleasant; he argues smartly, is a great lover of Books, and is as well acquainted with them as a person of quality, who doth not make it his profession, should be.

For Morality, he is very exact in it, and if he be ask'd whence it comes that he is so excellent in it, he answers, that he is obliged for whatever there is of good in him to love. That without him, he would not be what he is, and that if he be qualified as a person of worth, he is the more obliged to a beauty, who hath raised in his heart the desire of pleasing, and the design of deserving her affecton. He makes all the pleasures of humane life to consist in friendship and love; but when he loves, his love is as great as it can be. He is farther of the opinion that love smothers reason, and that a Lover ought to do, without any exception whatever the person he loves would have him.

In the mean time, though he be somewhat inclined to a tumultuous life, yet hath Philosophy raised in him a love of solitude, and he often retires into a little wilderness that he hath made himself, though there be not any thing that obliges him to that distance from the Court. 'Tis true, he hath an illustrious friend in his neighborhood, in whom he may find whatever the World thinks desirable, since he is one that possesses all the virtues, and whose politeness and wit are suitable to his generosity. And for the place where Merigenes lives, it is so pleasant and delightful, that solitude was never so taking in any other place upon earth; at least it might be said, he hath an Arbor that is worth a Palace, as I shall convince you anon: that with the assistance of a little conversation, a few Books, and abundance of love for virtue and liberty, Merigenes is the happiest Solitary that ever was, when he leaves the Court to go to his wilderness; besides all this, he is loved by many persons of honor, insomuch that who should judge of him meerly by his friends, would be soon sensible of part of his worth. He is of a sweet and compliant disposition, and there is in his humor such a just mixture of gladness and melancholy, that there issues from thence a very pleasant Temperament. For courage, Merigenes is so well furnished as man can be, and if his prudence did not check his ambition, he would not be so great a lover of solitude; but he makes it so much his business to master himself, that, unless it be when he pleases, he never obeys any thing but his reason.

This premised, I am now to return to the fair Clarinta's, where Teramus had no sooner withstood the answer of Merigenes's friend, but having commended his wit, he set himself to oppose his Maxims, but in such a pleasant manner, that Celiantes, Lisydas, and Meliserates, who pretended all to the glory of being accounted constant to Aloisa, could not but be extreamly pleased with it. For Clarinta, she did not much discover her self, but spoke in the praise of Constancy, yet without blaming a gallant inconstancy. For Alcimedes, his inclination leading him to be extreamly exact in any thing he desired; he sided with Merigenes. For my part, says Teramus, I am persuaded, that as we have been taught that there is a Venus that is wholly serious, called Venus Urania, and that there is another that is absolutely amorous, which is she that landed at the Island Cyprus, so do I believe that there are two Loves, whereof one is a froward child that is troublesome and untoward, ever crying and knows not what he would have, and the other an Infant newly awakened, that plays, laughs, dances and makes sport, and whose darts does but slightly touch their hearts whom he wounds as it were in jest. Seriously, says the Princess of Eryx smiling, I think Teramus is in the right, for it were impossible there should be a people whose way of loving were so different, if they were wounded by the same God. But all considered, since it is never just to condemn a person that cannot defend himself, my opinion is, that we should go and walk in Merigenes's Wilderness, and conclude our conversation in his Arbor, which hath been represented to me for so excellent a thing.

The Princesse of Eryx's proposal being approved by the whole company, it was put in execution as soon as so many Chariots could be got, as were necessary for the Ladies, and horses for the men. But not to give you a general description of the place of Merigenes's retirement, I shall only entertain you with the particular rarities of the enchanted Arbor, to the end that you may follow the fair Clarinta thither. You are not to imagine it extraordinary

...tary magnificent, for its greateſt beauties ...within it ſelf, and all the commendations ...given it, belong unto it, only becauſe it ...the nobleſt objects in nature. Mountains at a farther diſtance, ſown as it ...with Woods, Villages, and Country-houſes.

But to re-unite all there ſeveral Proſpects, Me- rigenes hath cauſed to be ſet on that ſide which is not open, a great ſquare of ſeveral glaſſes, which receiving the objects of theſe three miraculous proſpects, give you an epitome of all the beau- ties of nature together. It was then in ſo noble a place, that one of the nobleſt Companies in the world, ſpent one of the faireſt days that ever were, for the Sun, ſeeming to be concerned in point of honor to diſcover the beauty of this tract of ground, had ſo purified the air, that the objects that were at great diſtance, could eaſily be diſcerned. When the Princeſs of Eryx came firſt into the Arbor, ſhe made a hundred exclamations at the excellency of that admirable Proſpect; Artelisa and the other Ladies were no leſs amazed; Teramus, for his part was much taken with it; Alcimedes, and the reſt ſaid no leſs of it; in fine, all were ſo pleaſed that the company had not been above half an hour in the Arbor, ere any one had taken notice of an ex- cellent Picture there was of a young Heros, which hung upon the right ſide. But at laſt Clarinta ta- king notice of it, asked Merigenes, whether he had cauſed Adonis to be painted in the Arms of Mars. 'Tis true, replyed Merigenes, the great Prince whoſe Picture you ſee, is no leſs fair than Adonis, and it is as true, that he hath ſo great a heart, as he ought to have to be juſtly compared to Mars. I know not, added he, whether the zeal I have for Alcander, whoſe ſubject I have the honour to be, deceives me, but I am perſwaded you never ſaw a handſomer man than he. For in fine, (continued he tranſported by a tenderneſs he could not for- bear) have you ever ſeen a handſomer head, ſo good eyes, a better form of face, a noſe better made, finer lips, a more fortunate and wiſer look, a nobler ſtature, a more majeſtick air, a freer acti- on, or ſo ſtern a countenance with ſo much beauty? for commonly, the handſomeſt men have not the moſt majeſtick air. Nay, you cannot perceive all the excellencies of this Prince, for the Painter ha- ving drawn him no lower than the knee, hath de- prived you of the handſomeſt legs that can be ſeen, Beſides this Prince hath received from na- ture, not only a well-made body, fit for all thoſe exerciſes, that are either neceſſary, or contri- bute to the pleaſure of a young Prince, (eſpecially dancing, wherein, as in all the reſt, he is inimmuta- ble) but he hath alſo a noble ſoul inclined to paſſi- on, humanity, and mildneſs. His inclinations are wholly noble, and he hath a mind capable of what ever he undertakes. He diſcovers much integrity and magnificence, as well as ſleight in the recreati- ons he makes uſe of. He is much more afraid to do thoſe foul play that have the honour to play with him, than to receive any from them, and though he be above the Laws, yet is he, to give a great example of equity, the moſt willing to ſubmit them, This Prince hath yet one quality ve- ry requiſite to a young Conqueror, for he can bear the wearineſs of hunting, and the War with an in- credible vigor, and what is infinitely commenda- ble, he hath an extraordinary affection for the Queen his Mother; not indeed does ſhe deſerve leſs, for the many virtues ſhe is Miſtriſs of: and he hath alſo much friendſhip for the Prince his Bro- ther, who by thouſand of excellent qualities, draws the general admiration after him, and is already become the delight of his Court, though he be but very young. Anaxander, is farther an example of piety, to his whole Court, and for his courage he hath given ſeveral heroick expreſſions of it, as well in the Army, as in other dangerous occaſions. For being to go over a bridge in a Chariot, he was nothing daunted though the bridge broke under him. In fine, he ſpeaks as a great Prince ought to ſpeak, that is, with underſtanding, judgment, and abundance of eloquence, yet without affectation or trouble; in a word, he is a perſon ſo accompliſhed, though he but in the nineteenth year of his age, that I believe he will blaſt the glory of all his predeceſſors. For it may be rationally hoped from the great Victories he hath already gained, that Fortune will not oppoſe his virtue, and that Mars and Love will be equally favorable to him, ſince he is as fit to make a gallant as a Heroe, and conſequently, what by his prudence, humanity, valor, juſtice, and underſtanding, he will ever be the felicity of his people, and the glory of his time and Country.

Ah Merigenes, interrupted Clarinta, how well skilled muſt you needs be in loving, and how well would you draw your Miſtreſſes picture, if you undertook it, ſince you have ſo exactly done that of your Maſter! 'Tis true, Madam, replyed he, that I love whatever I ought to love; but all conſidered, I am never partial, nor give undeſerved praiſes. That hinders not, but you have a friend, who gives dangerous advice in point of gallantry, as well as Melicrates, replyes Teramus, for were it followed, Loves Empire would conſiſt of none but unfortunate ſlaves, that ſhould never have any new chains after the firſt they were put into. Recreations, and laughters muſt be baniſhed it, and a ſerious kind of fair dealing taking their place, people muſt needs be ſtrangely, tyred. For take away the innocent extravagance that is in love, and you take away all its ſatisfaction, all its gallantry, and what ever makes it inviting and agreeable. I muſt confeſs, replyes Melicrates, that I am an enemy to thoſe indifferent Loves which amuſe people, and afterward come to nothing; and would have a man that loves to do it in good earneſt, or not to meddle with it at all. But I do not acknowledge my ſelf an enemy to laughters and entertainments, on the contrary, I am of opinion, that only a great paſſion can give great ſatisfactions. For theſe great ſatisfactions that coſt a man many thouſands of afflictions, replyes Teramus, I reſign them to thoſe that have a mind to them; for thoſe diſchequered delights that admit not the leaſt trouble, and am ſuch a ſworn enemy to all grief, that there is not any flower ſo inconſiderable, which I ſhould not rather gather, than the faireſt Roſes in the world, conditionally it had no prickles. For my part, ſays Melicrates, I am not of your opinion, for I would gladly endure a thouſand afflictions for one ſingle pleaſure. Upon this Clarina, Arteliſa, Caliantes, Liſydas Alcimedes, and Merigenes coming into play, the converſation grew extreamly pleaſant. But paſſing inſenſibly from one thing to another, without agreeing upon any thing, Clarinta told them that ſhe was ſatisfied it was impoſſible to terminate in one day a diſpute of ſuch conſequence as that, but would be glad nevertheleſs, to have the judgment of the company upon two things. One was, Whether Reaſon ought to be abſolutely ſubject to Love, the other, Whether obedience ought to be implicite. For mine, ſays Teramus, it is, that Reaſon is no friend to Love, and all I ſhould deſire from her is, that ſhe ſhould not ſatyriſe at my amorous extravagances, but mind only the prudent management of my affairs. And for obedience, added he. I would have it limited to thoſe things that are pleaſing, without any exception. For my part ſays Meliſ-tes, I am of a contrary opinion, and maintain, that while reaſon is in any power, there can be no true Love. But is not reaſon, replyes Liſyda, requiſite ſo far as to diſcover the merit of the perſon one loves? Is it not employed, added Caliantes, to ſerve her ſometimes in things of conſequence, and can a man merit her eſteem if he do not comply with reaſon? For me, replyes Alcimedes, I think that if reaſon be not ſubject to love, 'tis a feeble paſſion: and for me, replyes Teramus, I think a Lover without reaſon ſubject to all extravagances imaginable, if he be ſo unhappy as to love a fantaſtick perſon. But a perſon of worth, replyes Merigenes, loves not any thing but what is amiable. According to the Idæa I have of love, added Melicrates, I am perſuaded, that when a man loves truly, he hath no other reaſon than that of the perſon he loves, and conſequently no other will. So that when he obeys her, he does it with as much eaſe as if he obeyed himſelf, and followed his own inclinations. For where there is a perfect love, there cannot be a diverſity of Wills. Ordinary loves are not of this mettal, for there are different wills and different deſires, they obey with a ſecret repining, nay, ſometimes do not obey at all. For which reaſon, I do not conceive it ought to be called Love, but only ſimple gallantry, the pure effect of a mans own pleaſure. The caſe is otherwiſe with the love I ſpeak of, for it requires a certain union of ſentiments, ſo indiviſible, that a man wills not any thing but in complyance with the perſon whom he loves, and by whom he is loved. Their hearts admit no difference, the diviſion there is between them is inperceptible, and diſobedience can never be found in the heart of a true lover. A man thinks himſelf born with that affection, ſo inherent does it ſeem to be to him that loves perfectly, and thinks he could not live a minute without loving what he loves.

Were it poſſible, replyed Teramus, there could be any ſuch lover, I ſhould adviſe his Miſtriſs, to make tryal of his ſubmiſſion, in an hundred extravagant things, for it were a pleaſant thing to ſee how far this blind obedience would extend. For my part, ſays Artileſa, were I to beſtow my heart on any one, I muſt confeſs it ſhould be on the moſt dutiful of thoſe that ſhould pretend to conquer it, provided he were a perſon of deſert, for I ſhould thence infer him to be the moſt amorous. He certainly that takes away obedience from love, ſays Melicrates, robs it of all that diſtinguiſhes it from ordinary friendſhip, and gives it the title of a paſſion. Friendſhip admits complyance, but requires not abſolute ſubmiſſion; a friend conſiders of what is propoſed to him, nay he may contradict and diſpute it; but for a Lover, he muſt ever obey. For my part, replies Alcimedes, had I a Miſtreſs that ſhould command me to hazard my life a thouſand times, I ſhould do it with joy. For matter of life, replyes Teramus, though I am not the leaſt lover of it, I ſhould not be much troubled to hazard it either for glory, or for love; but to think I ſhould be consent to do an hundred odd things, that it might come into a womans humour to desire, is what I should never do. For my part, saies Merigenes, I should do all things, I mean without any exception. But if the person whom I have heard you were sometime in love with, replies the Princess of Eryx, had commanded you to fire the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or that of Venus at Eryx, had you done it? She would never have laid any such command on me. But in case, added Teramus, it were her absolute Will it should be done—no question but I had obeyed her, replied he: for as I could not disobey my self, if I earnestly desired any thing, so could I not disobey her, since I relied more on her conduct of me, than my own.

I am so much of Merigenes's opinion, added Melicrates, that I cannot conceive how a man can be of any other. For a man must look on the Will of the person beloved, as his own, and where there is a perfect love, there is an union of interests. Liberality must be an useless virtue between two persons united by love; there is nothing to be lent, nor any thing to be given; there is no use of acknowledgements or thanks, because there is nothing so difficult which one is not obliged to do for the other. I am satisfied as to the necessity of obedience, replies Lisydas, but cannot imagine it should be so absolute, as to engage a man in crimes, were it only for the reputation of the person he loves, which ought to be as dear to a Lover as his own. When a man loves, as I apprehend it, replied Melicrates, he is not able to conceive there can be any injustice in the commands of a beloved person; for having a greater esteem for her than all the world besides, a man never disputes what he commands, and minds only the execution of it. But, admitting your own maxime, replies Teramus, Love will be a complice in the most horrid crimes, and greatest extravagances. It follows not, replies Melicrates, for I hold, that a perfect love can never be in the heart of a person that hath not virtue, nay, that a person of an ordinary spirit and virtue, cannot be capable of those Heroick affections that are above the ordinary pitch, and are marked out for the tryals of Time and Fortune. So that those that are guilty of this submission of reason which I mean, put their virtue into safer hands than others; for in fine, two discreet persons having a perfect love one for the other, would rather commit a fault alone, than advise one the other to it, and consequently there is no danger to follow my maximes. Though I should grant you what is not, replied Teramus, yet must you still acknowledge, that my way of loving is more divertive than yours. For thy part, saies the Princess Clarinta, I should not take it amiss to be obeyed, but should not much care to obey. And I think, saies Artelisa, that all the satisfaction of Love, as to Women, consists in a little Tyranny. So that, saies Alcimedes, who was very much taken with her already, he who is the best slave would be the happiest Lover. No question of it replies Artelisa, and it is my humour, if I loved any one, I should put some fantastick commands upon him, purposely for the pleasure of being obeyed. Seriously, saies the Princess Clarinta, I think you are in the right, and am of opinion, that there is some pleasure in being fantastick out of design. Howe'r it be, saies Teramus, this I am confident of, that as I shall not convert Melicrates, so shall he not convert me; it being haply but requisite there should be a diversity among Lovers, and that men should not be like the Nightingals, that ever wooe in the Spring, and ever almost sing the same note. 'Tis indeed all for the best, there should be some grave Lovers, some fantastick, some serious, some complaisant, some constant, and some unconstant; for were there only sincere Lovers, the world would be too much given to melancholly.

Upon this, Merigenes led this illustrious company to that friend of his, whom I have mentioned before, to see his excellent Garden, yet not before he had entertained them himself with a magnificent Collation. Being come into the Garden, he who was Master of it, being acquainted with the matter in dispute, took part with the juster side; but though he were a very eloquent person, yet could he not convince those that were of opinions contrary to his. So that after a pleasant conversation, every one returned according to the ordinary custom, better setled in his own perswasion than before. For in the heat of dispute, a man sometimes lights on such reasons, as he had not reflected on, whence it often happens, that a man, instead of perswading others, is perswaded himself. In the mean time, Alcimedes whose desires as I told you, were very earnest and violent, beginning to love Artelisa, was as earnest from that day, as if he had loved her all his life. So that Artelisa, at her return to Eryx, had four Lovers in her attendance.

Now Teramus being extreamly prying into such adventures, easily discovered the secret sentiments of all these persons, and made them his sport with Clarinta, whose divertive humour suggested her imagination with a hundred pleasant things upon that diversity of Lovers. He did the same with Artelisa, nay, with all these pretended Lovers severally. For as to the solitary Merigenes, he continued in his delightful Wilderness, a peaceable and pleasant life, which yet wanted not its charms and satisfactions. But the poor Lisydas, being the most antient servant of Artelisa's, was very much troubled to see his Rivals daily increasing; but he had this comfort withal, to see that Artelisa treated them with a wonderful equality; for she was neither favourable, nor harsh to any of the four, but had such a general civility for them, that they loved her without hating one another, and served her with all diligence imaginable. For all remembring they had heard her say at Merigenes's, that if she had any Lover, she should in all likelyhood bestow her heart on the most obedient, as believing him the most amorous, they made it their business, not only to do those things she desired of them, but even to obey her very desires, if I may so say, and to guess at them so as to comply with them: so that having observed that she loved all the great Festivals, they were so many assigned daies of divertisement. Yet would she not allow them to speak openly of their passion, though she was not ignorant thereof. Lisydas had discovered his to her all his life time; Caliantes had made a publique declaration of his by a Sacrifice: Melicrates expressed his in all his actions, and made her sensible of it by all his words; and Alcimedes discovered his to so many people, that there were enough that told Artelisa of it; who being of a mild and easie nature, behaved her self so, that she every day saw all her Lovers, without any bodies taking exception at it, because she treated them as if they had not been such. She also without any trouble received Letters from them, when they had any occasion to write to her; and that you may know they were persons of no ordinary worth, I shall furnish you with some, whence you may judge of the rest, for you are not to expect I should acquaint you with all the little accidents that happened between Artelisa and these four Lovers. This were but requisite when a man hath but the sufferings of one Lover to relate; but to give an account of those of four, were hardly possible. I shall therefore only give you a general Idæa of the beginnings of this adventure, whereof the end will find me work enough, without troubling my self with things of little consequence. I must therefore, to observe my word, tell you, that there was never any thing so gallant seen at Eryx, for every day afforded new entertainment; if one Lover was at the charge of a Ball one day, another found Musick the next; the day following the third would take some occasion to give a Collation; and the fourth gave some noble prize for a race, or some other exercise of the body. Nay, Clarinta her self, to make it appear, as she said, that the very desire of diverting ones self, was able to cause magnificence and invention as well as Love, made one of the noblest entertainments in the world. 'Tis true, it was to celebrate the feast-day of Venus's birth-day, which is solemnized at Eryx, on one of the first daies of the Spring: yet should I not have mentioned it to you, had it not proved the occasion of a pleasant dispute between Artelisa and her four Lovers, as also of the writing of the Letter I have to shew you.

You are then to imagine, that Clarinta, knowing that the entertainments of the night speak more magnificence than those of the day, summon'd all the Ladies to her Palace, to be there much about Sun-setting. So that all being come, Clarinta, followed by all the beauties, by the Prince, and most of quality, went and embarked her self in a sumptuous Galley, covered all over with a magnificent Tent, such as when they were once gotten in, they could see neither the Sea nor the City. Yet was it lightsome enough under that proud Tent, for it was enlightned by fifty crystal Lamps. All the Ladies were seated on Cushions in the Stern, the men either stood or kneeled by them; and discourse was at first the only divertisement of that noble Company; for though I have not given you any particular description of the Ladies of that little Court, yet are they as beautiful and as gallant, as in any other place in the world.

In the mean time, it was no small trouble to them to guess what divertisement Clarinta would give them that night. The place they were in, they thought indeed pleasant enough; it was so well perfumed, that it purified the air they breathed; it was light enough, and all that was to be seen was sufficiently inviting, for the Tent was so ordered, that they could not see those that row'd. At first all spake loud enough, till at last all being silent, or speaking very low, there was no other noise heard than that of the Oars, which falling into the water by a measur'd motion, made such as were in only, to cause a pleasant revery. But at last, having gone very slowly for some time, the Galley staid of a suddain; the Tent was taken up of all sides, and there was heard admirable Musick, consisting of several Consorts that answered one the other, and the company was surprised by the noblest object in the world. For you are to imagine, that night being now come on, they found the Galley in the midst of a great Circl, of above two hundred Barks, to each of which they had fastened above two hundred Lamps Pyramid-wise. So that that great number of Pyramids of fire, in the midst of the Sea, made the noblest object that can be imagined. Insomuch that the Sea, receiving the impression of so many lights, seemed to be all on fire. Add to this, that the Galley lying opposite to the City, which is built upon the brow of the Mountain, and that the best prospect of Venus's Temple, is on that side, there was not a window which had not Torches in it. All the tops of houses were also full all along the Walls of the City, and at all the pillars of the Temple, whose of the covering was so well furnished, that it vy'd lights with the Stars. So that seeing at the same time that noble City, and that magnificent Temple, all seemingly on fire, and those two hundred Pyramids of Lamps all burning, which made such a circle about the Galley, wherein Clarinta and the whole Court were, it was impossible they should with cries of joy and admiration, express the pleasure they took at so delightful a surprisal.

Yet was not this all, for after the whole Assembly had been entertained awhile, with so excellent an object, they might see all about the Galley, Tritons with Naker-shells; Nereides with their long hair, and to accomplish the magnificence, they both saw and heard Syrens, which silencing all those several consorts that were in those enflam'd Barks, sung such amorous Verses, that the excellency of the words adding to that of the air, and the sweetness of their voices that sung, it raised in all their hearts a tenderness more than ordinary. That done, the Tritons, the Nereides, and the Syrens, (who were men so disguised in little Boats, that lay even with the water) departing, and hid among the Barks, the Consorts begun again, and thereupon the two hundred Pyramids of fire changed place, and made divers Figures about the Galley, and then falling into two right lines, and making as it were a spacious passage, the Princess's Galley began to set forward between the Pyramids, to make to the shore, where it landed, at a place that led into a most pleasant Garden. But as the Ladies came to Land, they were entertained at the shore by the Tritons, with baskets full of Naker-shells, branches of Coral, and other maritime curiosities, whereof they all took every one something.

That done, they went into the Garden, where they found a magnificent Collation in a Banqueting-house that was there, which was admirably enlightened, and compassed by an infinite number of Orange-trees, whose leaves just budding out, perfumed the air. After which, going into a Hall, whose beauty was suitable to the rest of the entertainment, the Ball, and discourse consummated the pleasant passing away of that night.

This

This puts me into an imagination, interrupted Emilius, that the four Lovers of Artelisa were very much troubled that they were not the persons concerned in this so magnificent an entertainment.

Their affliction was much greater than you imagine (replied Æmilius, continuing his relation:) for you are to know, that Artelisa being ready to come to the Princess, having dressed her self as one that would not be sorry to preserve the acquests she had made, her Mother fell so extreamly ill, that nature and decency not permitting her to leave her in that condition, she sent one to excuse her to Clarinta, who would not put off the business to another time, what friendship soever she might have for Artelisa, because it was the day appointed for the celebration of the Festival-day of Venus. So that all she could do, was to express a great regret, that that excellent person participated not of the divertisement. But as soon as she was come to the Garden I spoke of, she sent to her, and word was brought her, that Artelisa's Mother had had only a sudden qualm, whereof she soon recovered.

In the mean time, these four Lovers behaved themselves differently in this accident; for Melicrates, perceiving that Artelisa was not at the entertainment, forbore going thither, and kept his Chamber all alone; Caliantes was there, and gave thousands of expressions that he was extreamly weary of the solemnity: Alcimedes went not, but was with a friend of his, whose house looked towards the Sea; and Lisydas was there, not knowing but that Artelisa was there also: for being one of the last, he imagined that she was embarqu'd before him; but perceiving afterward his error, he spoke not one word during the whole solemnity. The next morning these four Lovers would needs make Artelisa acquainted with what had passed in their hearts, out of a design to prejudice one another. Melicrates sent to know how Artelisa's Mother and she did, sending her word that he was loath to wait on her the night before, for fear of importuning her, and that he had stayed all alone at home out of sympathy. Lisydas sent her word that he was extreamly afflicted, that he had been engaged in a place where she was not. Alcimedes, that he had preferred the satisfaction of discoursing of her, with one of his friends, before that of the noblest entertainment in the world; and Caliantes sent her a Letter much to this effect.

I Know not what your meaning may be; you are the most troublesome, the most discourteous, and the most unreasonable person in the world. You hinder a man from taking any pleasure in things, which of themselves would infinitely afford it, and you force others to think it insupportable, to be near the most accomplished Princess in the world. However, that you may not say you are absolutely deprived of all the pleasure of the entertainment, it shall not be long e'r I come to give you an account of it, for I had no other motive of seeing it, but that I might give you a relation thereof, though I am confident, that if you had been in my place, and that I had been in yours, you would have had the cruelty to divert your self admirably well without me.

Artelisa received this Letter, and made no answer thereto, thinking it enough to send Caliantes word, indifferently enough, that since she was to see him, there was no necessity of any answer. The ordinary hours of visits were no sooner come, but Melicrates came to Artelisa's, whom he found in her Chamber; for though her Mother were well recovered, yet was it not thought fitting she should see any company that day? Insomuch, that she had commanded her Daughter to entertain the Princess in her Lodgings, she having sent her notice in the morning, that she would give her a visit. Assoon as Melicrates was come in, Artelisa told him that she was very sorry for him, that he had not been at the entertainment, but spoke it with a certain obliging expression, whence he perceived that she thought her self beholding to him. He was hardly sate, but Alcimedes enters, who after the first complements passed, told Artelisa, that for his own part, it troubled him not that he had not been with the Princess, but was infinitely sorry, that she was not in a condition to be there; for though I have seen this solemnity only at a window, yet am I confident it deserved to be seen by the faireſt eies in the world. As Artelisa was going to make him some answer, Lisydas enters, so that Melicrates and Alcimedes combining together to prejudice their Rival, told him that he was very happy, to be the first to give Artelisa a perfect account of the Princess's magnificence. I must confess, replies Lisydas, that I was at this solemnity, but I know some that were not there, can give a better account of it than I; for I was there and saw nothing, whereas I have heard that Alcimedes saw it at a distance, out of a friends window. Ah Lisydas, replies Alcimedes, these things are better seen near than at a distance. I assure you, replyed he, they are better seen at a distance than near, when those that are near, think more of what they do not see, than what they do; and that those who are at a distance, mind what they do see, more than what they do not. For my part, saies Melicrates, who have not seen ought, either near or at a distance, I cannot be reproached with any thing. As he said this, comes in Caliantes, saying, that he was extreamly troubled that Lisydas had prevented him in giving Artelisa an account of the solemnity. Assure your self, replied he, that you come time enough to do that your self, for I have neither told her any thing, nor indeed am able to tell her ought; for there lay something so heavy on my heart, that that prodigious number of Lights which enlightned the Sea, could not dispell the darkness of my thoughts.

Lisydas had hardly given over speaking, but Clarinta, led by Teramus, came in, who by an excess of kindness would needs convince Artelisa, how great an affliction it was to her, that she had not had her part in the divertisement which the whole whole Court had received the night before. But indeed, said she, you are obliged to Caliantes, for he told me several times, that he looked on what passed, meerly to the end he might give you a faithful account of it. I beseech you, Madam, replies Artelisa, engage me not to think my self beholding to Caliantes, for the pleasure he only hath had in seeing one of the noblest things in the world; for I think my self more obliged to those that have not seen any thing at all. It must be then principally to me, Madam, replies Lisydas; for as to Melicrates, who kept his Chamber, haply more out of policy than affection, it speaks neither any great miracle, nor great obligation, that he saw nothing from a place whence he could not see any thing. But for my part, who, because you were not there, have not seen any thing of what I might have seen, and ever thought on what I saw not, there's reason I should apply to my self what you have spoken with so much kindness. I know not, say Alcimedes, whether the fair Artelisa will be unjust, but am confident, I am he whose sentiments, as to affection and tenderness, are most out of controversie. for as to Melicrates, who was not at the solemnity, but stayed in his Chamber, it may be questioned whether he were not indisposed, or had not some business to dispatch. For Lisydas, there needs no more be said, than that he was, where Artelisa was not, to exclude him from all comparison with me; for as to his affirming that he saw nothing, believe him who will; and for Caliantes, he was not in a place of divertisement, while Artelisa was afflicted, but made it his main business to take exact notice of all that passed, to have the further pleasure of making a relation thereof. But for my part, I have not been where all the world was, and to make it appear that I deprived not my self of that pleasure, but for Artelisa's sake, I passed away the night with a friend of mine, with whom I had no discourse but what was of her. All this may be true, says Melicrates, but to bring your expressions of affection and mine, into a just dispute, you should have taken a house that look'd not upon the Sea, and consequently seen nothing of what happened at the solemnity. But is it my fault, replies Alcimedes, if he, with whom I was, hath no Chamber but what looks into the Sea?—There's a Closet at your own Lodging, replies Melicrates, whence you might have seen no more than what I did from mine—'Tis true, replies Alcimedes, but since I could not be with Artelisa, I would needs speak of her. When a man sees so noble an object as that you saw, replies Melicrates, he minds not much what he saies, and for my part, who was resolved to bestow all my thoughts on Artelisa, I took such a place as should afford nothing to divert or distract me.

When a man loves but weakly, replies Lisydas, he speaks as you do, but he that loves as I do, ever thinks earnestly on what he loves, in what place soever he be; and certainly it argues a greater tenderness to be ever thinking of Artelisa, amidst the noblest company in the world, and in a place of pleasure, than to think of her alone, when a man cannot do any thing else. But, if what you say be true, saies Caliantes, and that your thoughts were so taken up with Artelisa, that you saw nothing of what passed, it was not tedious or wearisome to you; for no doubt but you thought on something that was very pleasant, and consequently past away the time better than any of the company. For instance, added he smiling, as the imaginations of Lovers are many times as far from reason and probability, as the dreams of other men, so, if you could imagine that Artelisa might prefer you before all your Rivals, and that you might be one day loved by her, you needed no other pleasure; and I here confidently declare, before the Princess, that for such a pleasant imagination as that, I would willingly renounce the sight of the greatest solemnities in the world, though they were as noble as that of yesterday. To speak therefore freely, Artelisa is more engaged to me than all of you, and particularly much more than you; for first, I had not been in that place, had not the Princess laid her commands on me to that purpose; and next, being I could not be near Artelisa, I was near the person, for whom, of any, she hath the greatest affection. But that I might contribute somewhat to the pleasure of the person I love, I took notice of what ever I saw, to give her an account thereof, though I could not observe things without being withal strangely wearied and troubled. Nay, I appeal to the Princess, whether she did not upbraid me with it more than once. I must needs confess I did, saies Clarinta; and for my part, am much at a loss to determine which of those four unfortunate persons Artelisa is most engaged to. There is certainly, saies Teramus, some difficulty in the business, but since Artelisa is the most concerned in it, she must give the sentence. How, Madam, saies Melicrates, can you stick at any thing in this case? How, added Alcimedes, can this dispute turn to my disadvantage? Alas, Madam, cries out Lisydas, what injustice were it in you to condemn me; and how cruel were you, continued Caliantes, should you prefer any one before me?

To reconcile you all, said she to them, smiling, I am inclined to believe, that Melicrates was afraid of the fresh air of the evening; that Alcimedes, knowing haply what was to be seen, imagined he might see it better from a house than out of the Galley; That Lisydas had seen all, and would not acknowledge it; and that Caliantes pretended discontent and weariness, though he were very well pleased.

Artelisa had hardly said these words, but these four Lovers combining all against her, made a thousand exceptions against her sentence. For my part, saies Clarinta pleasantly to them, I know not how you understand her, but were I in your condition, I would not have it pronounced by Artelisa. For there must needs be three miserable, and there can be but one happy; since that in friendship there may be many happy places in the heart of a friend of either sex; but in gallantry, there can be but one good place in the heart of a Lover, or a Mistress. It matters not, saies Melicrates, I had rather run the hazard of being condemned, than be ignorant of the judgement of Artelisa. For my part, saies Caliantes, if I thought I should be condemned, I had rather continue in my ignorance of her resentment. For what concerns me, added Lisydas, I should be satisfied, could I but guess it; and for me, saies Alcimedes, I would rather she acquainted me privately with it.

But

But put the case, (saies Artelisa, smiling on Teramus,) you had been a Lover of mine, what would you have done? I think, said he, I should have done somewhat which none of all these Lovers hath; for without thinking of being upbraided with a fear of the fair weather, because of the uncertainty of my health, I think I should have passed away the evening with you. But you consider not, saies Melicrates, that there was one sick in the House, and that she was not to be seen. My Mother's indisposition was so soon over, replies Artelisa, that had you sent to know, you might haply have seen me. Whence I conclude, that though Teramus is not to be thought the most constant Lover in the World, yet hath he better imagined what you ought to have done, than all you have been able to do, put together. But in fine, saies Clarinta, you must take things as they are, and since these illustrious unfortunate men will have it so, pronounce their sentence. That it may be a just one, replies Artelisa, I must have better evidence than I have, and therefore I order Melicrates to prove that he hath thought on nothing but me, when he had lock'd himself in his Closet; Lisydas, to make it clearly appear that he saw not any thing of what passed in the place where he was; Alcimedes, that his thoughts ran more upon me when he discoursed with his friend, than on what he looked on; and Caliantes, that his weariness proceeded not rather from the tediousness of the solemnity, than from my absence.

For my part, saies Melicrates, I can easily obey you, for I made Verses to express my sentiments, which shall prove what I alledged. I am much fearful of your happiness, replies Lisydas, for it is not possible for me to prove that I have not seen what I might have seen. Nor is it any easier, for me, replied Alcimedes, to make it appear, that I thought only of Artelisa while I spoke of her, when at the same time I looked on those noble Pyramids of Light, that seemed to set the Sea on fire; and for my part, replies Caliantes, I am as far to seek how to make good proof of what Artelisa would have me prove, though there be not any thing more true. If it be so, saies this Beauty, Melicrates is the person that must be declared to have given the greatest expressions of affection, and to punish the rest for their indifference. I condemn Alcimedes, not to speak of me any more, but when he is at leisure to think of me; Lisydas, never to go to a place where he will not take notice of what passes; and Caliantes to give me an exact account of all he hath seen, as soon as the Princess shall be gone hence, that thereby I may be confirmed in the opinion I am of, as to what concerns him.

But since you have inflicted punishments, (saies Teramus, not giving these three slighted Lovers the leisure to say any thing) methinks you should take some order that Melicrates be rewarded, for it belongs to justice as well to recompence as to punish: nay, it is in a manner as unjust not to recompence as not to punish; Teramus is certainly in the right added Clarinta, and therefore I condemn you to recompence Melicrates, since you have given sentence in his favour. Since it is your Will, replied Artelisa, I condemn him to shew the Verses which he says he hath made; for since they must needs be excellent, he will be fully recompenced. Madam, if they are liked by you, and please Teramus, who is so great a Critick in things of that nature. Melicrates made answer, it was no fair dealing, for that if the Verses proved ill, he was not recompenced, but punished. But after all excuses he was forced to obey, and to shew his Verses, which were found very amorous, and like a Gallant: so that his Rivals had the affliction to hear them commended, and to think them but indeed too good.

I shall not give you an account of all the pleasant entertainments which this proved the occasion of, for I am resolved not to tell you any thing in particular, till I come to the end of the History. I shall only tell you, that Lisydas, who had, from his infancy, an affection of Artelisa, continued it with such assiduity, that it was beyond all example; that Alcimedes carried away by the violence of his disposition, did for her all that a violent love could put him upon that were most difficult; for he was no less exact and vigilant than Lisydas, but many times much more jealous, for that at divers times he would needs fight with his Rivals all, one after another. For Caliantes he gave such signal expressions of his Love, that notwithstanding his inclination to magnificence, and the satisfaction he took in being liberal, he had such an aversion to leave Eryx, and was so absolutely desirous to marry Artelisa, that he would not by any means hearken to the entreaties of his friends to return into Greece. They indeed thought at first, that there needed no more to bring it home, than to send him any allowance; but he chose rather to lose all than leave Artelisa, insomuch, that at last his Father disinherited him for his disobedience. So that this magnificent Lover, who had been at such vast expences, was forced to subsist meerly upon the generosity of the Prince of Eryx, who allowed him not enough, either to live honourably, or rationally to pretend to Artelisa. However, he continued an earnest affection towards her, and repented him not of a constancy that cost him so dear. He generously told her, that, it being not in his power to make her happy, he yet loved her without hope.

For Alcimedes, he gave a violent expression of his love to Artelisa, for having one day obliged her to tell him positively, whether he should hope or fear, and she unmercifully telling him before one of his Rivals, that he was to fear all things, and to hope nothing; he, carried away by his violent sentiments, answered her roundly, that he should find the way to rid himself of all fear, since she deprived him of hope. Whereupon this desperate Lover, going out of her Chamber, and passing by a Closet, wherein there were certain Arms that had been his Mistresses Fathers, and finding the door open, goes in, takes a ponyard, and gives himself a stab, that he fell down dead. I leave you to imagine, how much Artelisa was surprised at this accident, and what care she took to save the life of of a man that would die out of excess of Love. Chirurgeons were sent for to dress him, who found him very dangerously wounded. His Lodging being near Artelisa's, he was immediately carried thither, there being less danger to remove him from one place to another at that time, than if they had stayed longer. But when he had recovered himself a little, out of the weakness he was in, by reason of the loss of bloud, and perceived he was in his bed, and dressed, he would.

would have torn off what they had laid to his wound. 'Tis true, those that looked to him, prevented it, and the better to effect their design, they went to Artilesa's mother, who obliged her daughter to send Alcimedes a command not to oppose the remedies were used to him, and that it was her Will that he should entertain whatever contributed to his recovery. From which command Alcimedes conceiving some little hope, suffered himself to be dressed, and resolved to live.

Whence it being easie to judge, that Alcimedes would not have killed himself, but because he was slighted: his Rivals rejoyced at it, though they were in some fear, that that great expression of his love might work somewhat upon the heart of Artelisa. For Caliantes, he, being in a very sad posture, as to fortune, was not so glad of it as Lisydas, who never was so much in hope as then, for he knew by the accident that had happened to Alcimedes, that he was not loved.

Caliantes's poverty seemed to him to be an invincible obstacle, as to the compassing of his design; and Melicrates's affection to Artelisa, being of a date much latter than his, he did not fear him much. So that he lived then with a confidence full of satisfaction: For Melicrates, he being one that had much love, was also subject to much fear, as also to much hope, for it is only an indifference of affection, which admits not a vicissitude of hope and fear. He was therefore subject to more fear than Lisydas, lest this extraordinary expression of love in Alcimedes, might have some influence on Artelisa, and accordingly sought some favourable opportunity to entertain her privately, and to discover unto her the true sentiments of his soul. But this he found a hard work, for besides that, he was perpetually pester'd with Rivals: Artelisa, ever since the accident of Alcimedes, was very shie in raising any sentiment of jealousie in any of her Lovers, lest it might prove the occasion of some further unhappy adventure. So that according to the humour she was in then, she durst not in a manner be either kind or cruel. This found Clarinta and Teramus sport enough when they came to Artelisa's, for they were ever casting into her dish, that she never durst say either yea or nay, to any of her Lovers. For if you answer any one affirmatively, said they, the rest will kill him; and if negatively, he to whom you shall say so, will kill himself.

But not to insist on things of no consequence, that you may the better apprehend what I have yet to tell you, you are to know, that there was a man at Eryx, an antient enemy of the house of Melicrates, and of Melicrates in particular, with whom he could never be brought to any reconciliation; for besides that he hated him, he valued him not, and would not admit any composure of the differences between them. Melicrates in the mean time was so taken up with love, that he in a manner minded not the aversion he had for his enemy, though his friends often advised him to look to himself, and not to be abroad in the night without company. This hindred not, but that it came into his mind to fasten on some opportunity to speak to Artelisa in the night, since he could not do it in the day. He knew her chamber lay even with the Garden, that her Mother, because of her indisposition, lodg'd in another part of the house, far enough off; that the windows of that Chamber were low, and that Artelisa went to bed very late. He knew further, that she loved to walk in the Moon-shine, so that it being then a season that the Moon shone all night, he corrupted a slave, who promised to open him a door to the Garden, that went out into a lone-street, which he accordingly did.

But as it ordinarily happens, that when a man hath some secret design, he meets with an hundred rubs he never foresaw, Melicrates was courted that day to spend the evening in divers places; two of his friends came to desire his company at supper; in so much that he had much ado to be rid of all those that came to see him. He indeed dismissed them in such a way, as gave those he denied occasion, to imagine he had some secret design; for though he denied them, yet gave he not any handsome account why he did so. Not but that he did all that lay in his power to conceal it, but it seems a Lover is less master of himself than any one. At last having sent all away, even to his own slaves, it was late e'r he came to that door of Artelisa's Garden, which the slave he had corrupted opened to him: which done, getting behind a hedge-row: he expected till the same slave should, with a torch, make him the sign they were agreed upon, to let him know that all were retired but Artelisa, and a maid that waited on her. Accordingly, Melicrates perceiving there was no light any where but in Artelisa's chamber, prepared to go thither, when he perceives that beauty coming out, with a little white vail over her head, and half undress'd, who, according to her custom, desirous of the coolness of the night, and to walk in the Moon-shine, came towards the place where he was, having with her a pretty little dog, that she made extreamly much of. So that this pretty creature skipping up and down among the flowers and borders, and coming at last to the hedge, behind which Melicrates lay hid, stopped of a sudden, as being frighted at the scent of some body there. Nay, he bark'd a little angrily, looking back on his Mistriss, then presently after, knowing Melicrates (who was wont to make much of him, as one that loved any that Artelisa was taken with) he violently jetted into the hedge-row with all that insinuation and fawning, whereby a creature of that nature is wont to express his services to those he loves. So that Artelisa, who thought her self alone in the Garden, was at first much surpriz'd; yet imagined it might be a young slave of her Mother's that was there. She therefore went about the hedge-row on one side, while Melicrates did the like on the other, to come and meet her, so that she was very much amazed to see him. One while she would have turned away from him hastily; another time she would cry out; but Melicrates having stayed her, and her own reason telling her, that if she cryed out, it might cause a great disturbance, which might be ill-interpreted, she thought it the best course to lay a strict command on Melicrates, to go his ways, for she had ever found him so obedient, that she doubted not but that he would obey her. She therefore stood still, and the rather, that knowing she might be heard from her chamber, she thought she might call people at any time, if need were. It argues a strange confidence in you, Melicrates, said she to him, to come at this hour into the Garden, and your love cannot be great, when you expose my reputation as you do. For if you were seen either coming in, or shall be seen going out; will it not give people occasion to imagine it was by my appointment to some base end. The worst I came in at, replyes Melicrates, is so little frequented, that I neither have been, nor fear I shall be seen, and the slave who hath opened me the door, is the only person that knows any thing of my design, not that I thence conceive my self absolutely innocent; but Madam, that my unhappiness is such, that it is not strange I should do something against reason: For, because I have a Rival that would needs kill himself, rather out of indignation than love; I must never speak to you more again, and consequently must be eternally ignorant how I stand in your inclinations. To be short with you Madam, continued he, I am not able to live at this rate, and to prevent me from seeking out extraordinary ways to speak to you, tell me something that is kind, that may allay the tempest my soul is in. I have only two words to say to you, replyed she, while you stay in the Garden, and those two words are, be gone. Ah, Madam, replyed he, those two words speak too much cruelty; not but that as I sometime told you in Mergueri's Arbor, obedience is the greatest and surest mark of a real love, and consequently that I will obey you, but Madam, before I do it, give me leave to tell you, that I love you far beyond any of my Rivals; and intreat you to acknowledge it though but by some sign that you believe it. For since you have declared that the greatest affection should prevail with you, I shall think my self happy enough, if you do but believe mine to be greater than any other mans whatsoever.

Whereupon, though Artelisa had told Melicrates that she had but two words to say to him, yet did she speak a many to him; yet such as he could not interpret much to his advantage; for she was in so great a disturbance to see him there, and so incensed against him for his boldness, that she spoke very harshly to him, though she had an infinite concern for him. Insomuch, that it was to no purpose for him to fall to flatteries and intreaties, but he must needs think of leaving the place. You must needs acknowledge, said she to him, that you have done very indiscreetly, not only in respect of me, but your self; for take it from me, that if ever your boldness comes to be known, I shall never look on you again, and I shall treat you so, that it shall take off all suspicion of your kind entertainment. What troubles me yet farther, added she, is, that the slave who hath let you in, thinks haply that your coming hither is with my consent. Melicrates gave her all the assurance he could that there was no such matter, and would have said divers other things to her, but she laid such an absolute command upon him to be gone, that he left the place immediately. Artelisa made fast the door after him, and returned to her Chamber in a strange disturbance. For Melicrates, he was not seen by any, and so prevent his own servants from seeing whence he came, least they might imagine where he had been, he went a great way about, and came to a place where he saw a man, very richly cloathed, lie along on the ground, as if he had been either dead or asleep. He comes up to him, and knowing him to be that enemy of his I told you of, he killed him assassinated. He was much surprised at the sight; so that not desirous to be seen about the dead person, he made what hast he could away, but he had hardly gone twenty paces, ere he meets with one of the principal Magistrates attended by a guard, accompanyed by the friends of the dead party, and conducted by one of his slaves, who seeing Melicrates, told the Magistrate, that he being at enmity with his Master, had undoubtedly caused him to be Murthered, and was come to see whether he had been quite dead: This the slave said as confidently as if he knew it to be true: so that the friends of the murthered, pressing him that was to do them justice, to lay hold of Melicrates, whose hatred towards the other was sufficiently known, he did it, though he could not imagine him guilty. He asked him from whence he came; but he not willing to tell him, made answer somewhat angrely, that a single person could not well be charged with an assassinate. Ah, my Lord, says the dead persons slave, speaking to the judge, my Master was murthered by six men, and had I had but any thing of arms about me, I would have dyed in his defence. But while I was gone for help, they killed him and fled several ways.

Melicrates, being a person of exemplary virtue, people could not easily suspect him guilty; but he still refusing to tell them whence he came, there was no reason, but that according as it was desired, Melicrates should be secured. To take therefore a moderate course in so unhappy an emergency, he desired he might be put into the hands of a friend of his, whom he named, who should see him forth coming, which was accordingly done. In the mean time, when the charge was drawn up against Melicrates, the circumstances were very pregnant against him, for it was known, that he had refused to go to several places that night, that he would neither entertain, nor be entertained, by some friends of his, that he went out alone; and that he had taken a sword with him, that none of his people knew whether he was gone; and that a woman out of a window had seen him looking on the dead party. So that adding to this the inveterate hatred he had had for him, and his obstinacy in refusing to tell where he had been, from the time he had left his own house, till that he had been met in, it could not be expected, that either his virtue, or his reputation, how great soever, should exempt him from a suspicion of that murther. They desired him only to name any one man that could say he had seen him any where; but that he could not do, for he had seen only Artelisa, and the slave that had opened the Garden door to him. So that choosing rather to be unjustly thought guilty of a crime, than to expose the reputation of his Mistress, he answered ambiguously, and did himself more prejudice than all the other conjectures and circumstances could do. Insomuch, that the next day, it was news in all companies, that Melicrates had caused his enemy to be assassinated. At first, all the world were troubled to imagine it could be so; but the circumstances being so pregnant, and the conjectures so strong, the best friends that Melicrates had, were drawn into belief, that hatred had had the upper hand of his virtue.

You may easily imagine how strangely Artelisa was surprised to hear that Melicrates was charged with having assassinated his enemy, and that it was told her, that the strongest conjecture they had of it, was, that he would not acknowledge where he had spent that evening. This put her into an extraordinary disturbance, for having an infinite esteem for Melicrates, and knowing how great an affection he had for her, she was extreamly afflicted to see him accused with so much injustice, yet could she not on the other side avoid some fear, that, to clear himself he might discover the truth; for it run into her imagination, that if he should say he was alone with her in the Garden at the time the murther happened, her reputation were lost; it being unlikely the world should believe the thing precisely as it was, especially the three Rivals of Melicrates, who would give that adventure the most disadvantageous interpretation they could.

But while she was in this uncertainty, Melicrates, who stood committed to the custody of one of his friends, till something more of the business might be discovered, was not without disturbance. For being so great a Lover of Glory as he was, it was an extraordinary affliction to him, to be charged with the doing of a criminal action.

What shall I do (said he to himself, as he hath acknowledged since?) shall I eternally lye under the suspition of having committed a crime that argues the greatest baseness that may be, rather than discover a thing that is absolutely innocent? for by acknowledging my self to be an inconsiderate person, that had had the boldness to corrupt a slave of Artelisa's to open me her Garden door, that so I might speak with her privately, I shall say nothing against her. But Alass! added he, can I imagine people will believe it to be as I say? No, no, I must not flatter my self, continued he, and there is no mean between these two things, I must expose either my Mistresses reputation, or my own, I must either be unjustly accused my self, or prove a means that she may be. Ah! the choice is soon decided, I am resolved; I had much rather be accused, than be the occasion of her being so. I have this confidence at least, that it is impossible she should not be pleas'd with my discretion; let us then be content, continued this unfortunate Lover, that we only know Artelisa to be conscious of our innocence; she amounts to as much with us as all the world beside, nay all the world could not ease us, were she once incensed against us. Let us therefore undergo our misfortune with patience, the Gods are more just than not to discover our innocence by some way which may not prejudice that of Artelisa; and let us endeavor for our part, to do some great action that may justifie us. Whereupon, Melicrates resolving never to say any thing which might bring Artelisa's virtue into the least dispute, he found an opportunity secretly to write her a Letter, which contained these words.

MELICRATES, to ARTELISA.

I Must confess, Madam, that Caliantes hath loved you beyond Fortune, since he embraces poverty for your sake; and that Alcimedes loves you beyond his life, since he would have killed himself out of despair. But to do some thing greater than all this, you will find, that I love you beyond Glory, though I am perswaded it ought to be looked on as a thing more precious in the account of a person of honor, than either fortune or life. In the mean time, give me leave to entertain the comfort of hoping, that while I am looked on as a criminall by all the world, I shall be accounted innocent by the divine Artelisa, to whom I infallibly offer the greatest sacrifice that can be expected from an amorous heart.

This Letter Artelisa took extream kindly, and accordingly answered it with abundance of obligations as you shall perceive.

ARTELISA to MELICRATES.

YOur discretion hath made me forget your boldness, and the tender care you have of my innocence, speaks so much obligation, that if I thought your life in danger, I should be so generous as to hazard my reputation for your sake. In the mean time, assure your self, I send up my continual addresses to the gods, that they would be pleased to clear you, without any necessity I should accuse my self.

But the more they endeavored to discover of this adventure, the more obscure it seemed to be, all the world would have justified Melicrates, excepting his Rivals, but his silence argued so much against him, that he could not be cleared. Yet was there not evidence enough to condemn him, that being a person of quality, and much favored by the Prince and Princess, all the friends of the deceased could obtain, was that Melicrates should have the City for his prison, for the space of six Months, during which time they might do what they could to find out more pregnant proofs against him. But Melicrates desirous by doing noble actions, to make it appear he could not be guilty of base ones, having met with two of his enemies kindred one after another, fought with them, hurt them, and disarmed them, and had all the reputation he could expect; for he in the midst of victory, used much humanity, though he fought against such as accused him unjustly.

But as men are very much subject to take all things amiss, and in the worst sense, so did these two great actions instead of justifying Melicrates, very much heighten the suspition that he was guilty of the murther of his enemy, people thinking that it was his design by that means to repair the crime wherein his malice had engaged him. So that Melicrates knowing what men thought of him, would have fallen into despair, had he not had the satisfaction of being somewhat better treated by Artelisa, than he had been before. But it being hard, a Lover should receive any favor from his Mistress, but his Rivals must hear of it, when there is not between him and her one of those indissolvable affections which require a reciprocall secrecy, Lysidas, who was glad that Melicrates was under such a cloud, out of a fear he was in of him above all the reſt, came to underſtand that Melicrates had never been ſo much in favor with Arteliſa, as he was then. So that not able to endure the injuſtice he thought ſhe did him, he ſought an opportunity to make his complaints to her of it; and accordingly, having one day found her alone in her Chamber, he began to repreſent unto her the long time that he had been her ſervant. For it was true, that he loved her aſſoon as ever ſhe began to be capable of his love. Whereupon he earneſtly entreated her to ſay ſomething to him that ſhould not afflict him, aſſuring her that ſhe had not any Lover whoſe affection was as great as his. For in fine, ſaid he to her, Caliantes looſing his eſtate for your ſake, hath not done any thing which I ſhould not have as gladly done, had any occaſion offered it ſelf. For Alcimedes, in being deſirous to kill himſelf out of deſpair, he hath done leſs than I ſhould, had you put me out of all hope, for I ſhould dye of grief, without the aſſiſtance of a poniard.

And for Melicrates, added he, in an accent expreſſing his contempt of him, I do not ſee why you ſhould be ſo much perſuaded of the greatneſs of his affection, unleſs you meaſure his love by his malice, and that becauſe he knows well how to hate and revenge himſelf, you imagine he knows as well how to love and ſerve you. Ah, Liſydas, replies Arteliſa, a little angrily, and withall bluſhing; if you would not have me blame you, inſult not over an unfortunate man whom I cannot believe any way guilty. I could never have believed it, Madam, replied Liſydas coldly, that to gain your favor, a man muſt be charged with Aſſaſſinates. No, he muſt be innocent and unfortunate, replyed ſhe, to deſerve my protection; and ſince I conceive Melicrates to be both, you ſhould not think it ſtrange if I take his part againſt you. The apparent circumſtances are very deceitful, Madam, replyed he, if Melicrates be innocent. In fine, Madam, innocent or guilty it matters not; he is too happy to be ſo much in your favor, and I am very unhappy to be ſo little, after I have ſpent my whole life in ſerving you. But when all is done, though I muſt expect to be more ſleighted than I am, yet cannot I forbear telling you, that you are very much to blame for multiplying your favors on Melicrates, when all perſons of honor have abated him part of their eſteem, And therefore give me leave, Madam, to adviſe you for your reputation ſake, to ſlight him, at leaſt as much as you do me; I am content to be ſo much more than I have been, conditionally he be no leſs than I am, for I cannot endure to hear you blamed, or that you ſhould love him.

Arteliſa, perceiving by this diſcourſe, more than by any thing before, how much ſhe was obliged to Melicrates's diſcretion, was exaſperated againſt Liſydas, and though ſhe was ſatisfied that ſhe did not well in blaming him ſo much as ſhe did, yet not thinking it fit to tell him poſitively, that Melicrates was innocent, ſhe conceived ſuch a diſpleaſure at it, that ſhe revenged her ſelf on that miſerable Lover. She therefore ſpoke to him diſdainfully enough, in anſwer to which he being ſtill obſtinate to preſs the injury he pretended ſhe did her ſelf, and to entertain her with the greatneſs of his affection, ſhe forbad him ever to ſee her again. Be gone, ſaid ſhe to him, be gone, and have nothing to do with my carriage, for you are ſo little concerned in my affection, that it ſhould be indifferent to you whom I love, and whom I do not: Liſydas, ſurpriſed at this ſally of diſdain, looked on her with amazement, and would have made her ſome anſwer, but this incenſed beauty forbidding him to ſpeak, and commanding him to leave her Chamber, he was forced to obey her; he therefore went his ways, but clouded with ſuch a deep ſadneſs, that he met certain Ladies upon the ſtairs whom he ſaw not, and conſequently ſaluted not, though they were of his acquaintance, ſo much were his thoughts ore-whelmed with grief.

From Arteliſa's, he went to his Chamber, where he ſpent both that evening and night, without eating or ſleeping, or indeed ſo much as lying down. One while he walked ſoftly, another very faſt; ſometimes he leant againſt the Table, ſometimes lifted up his eyes to heaven, ſometimes pronounced certain confuſed words, amongſt which might be heard the names of Arteliſa, and Melicrates, and ſometimes he was in a deep ſilence, which was not interrupted but by long and mournful ſighs. But in fine, not to trouble you with a deſcription of the exceſſive grief of Liſydas, I ſhall only tell you, that he was three days and three nights in ſo great a diſturbance, that a feaver took him, but with ſuch violence, that he loſt the uſe of his reaſon the very firſt day. So that not able to make any reſiſtance againſt the remedies were preſcribed him, he recovered of the feaver, but a Siſter of his, a very lovely Lady, that looked after him, was very much ſurpriſed to ſee that he recovered not his reaſon with his health. It was not ſo much wondered at, that while the feaver laſted, he was heard to ſpeak perpetually of Arteliſa and Melicrates, and all his other Rivals with a ſtrange confuſion, but when he had recovered of the feaver, all were troubled to ſee ſuch a change happened to a perſon of great worth and underſtanding. Yet had his extravagance ſomething advantageous in it; and it was ſuch as made him ſpeak but little. He was very melancholly, ſaid little, and when he ſpoke it was altogether of Arteliſa. But though there were no great ſenſe in what he ſaid of her, nor yet much coherence, yet did all his diſcourſes betray certain expreſſions of reſpect; and it was impoſſible to make him do or take any thing, if they did not tell him that it was Arteliſa's will he ſhould.

You may eaſily imagine what noiſe this accident made, for at laſt it was blurted out by a ſlave of Arteliſa's, that the laſt day that Liſydas had been with her, ſhe had ſleighted him extreamly, and the Ladies he had met on the ſtairs reflected on the alteration they had perceived in his countenance. So that there was no other diſcourſe at Clarinta's but of the fatal conſequences that attended thoſe that ſhould love Arteliſa. For Caliantes had, upon that account, loſt all his Eſtate, Alcimedes would have killed himſelf, Liſydas had thereby loſt his reaſon, and Melicrates, though it was then known, had by the ſame means loſt his honor. In the mean time, the accident happened to Liſydas, raiſed pitty in all, and particularly in Arteliſa, who had been the occaſion of it. So that the friends of this unfortunate Lover, having been with Clarin-

ter, to entreat her to speak to Artelisa to humour him, to see whether it would restore him to his reason, Artelisa was content. She therefore one day gave a visit to the Sister of this unhappy Lover, who had sent for her Brother to her Chamber. As soon as she came in sight, he would have gone away, remembring that she had forbidden him to see her. But she being come thither purposely to humour him, staid him, and ask'd him why he avoided her company. At these words he stay'd, he look'd on her very earnestly, and sigh'd two or three times; after which, he ask'd her with a feeble voice, whether she knew him to be Lisydas. I do said she to him, and I am so troubled for the harshness I used towards you, that I come purposely hither to entreat you to forget it.

This rais'd Lisydas to a very great joy, yet could he not express it otherwise than by his looks, for it was impossible for him to speak. He fell down on his knees, took her garment and kiss'd it, and out of a miracle of Love, three or four kind words restored his Reason to this unfortunate Lover. Accordingly from that hour, he had not that melancholly in his countenance, which extravagance puts upon those it possesses; and though he spake not, but only look'd on Artelisa, yet was it thence inferred, that he would recover the freedom of his thoughts. But what was most extraordinary, was, that as grief had been the occasion of his sickness, so this excess of joy, put him into a fit of the Feaver, that lasted a whole day, during which time, Artelisa sent twice to see how he did. 'Tis true, the success of this relapse was much different from that of the first sickness; for this fit, caus'd by the agitation of an excessive joy that had surpriz'd him, dispell'd those melancholly vapors that had corrupted his Reason. In so much, that when the Feaver had left him, his thoughts were absolutely free and dis-engaged. You may easily imagine what entreaties were made to Artelisa, that she should not too suddenly break off her kindness to Lisydas, for fear of a relapse into the same misery. So that upon these inducements, as also the entreaties of the other Rivals, who thought him a person not much to be fear'd; she so sooth'd up Lisydas, that in a few daies he became as gallant a man as ever he had been. 'Tis true, having the misfortune to know the accident that had happened to him, it made him so much the more unfortunate; but finding after all, Artelisa very kind to him, it put him into some hopes, that his late extravagance being look'd on by her, as an expression of his affection, it might contribute to his further happiness.

About this time it happened, that Caliantes's Father being dead, he to whom he had given his Estate, when he disinherited his Son, fell sick eight daies after, so dangerously, that he thought it concern'd him to put his affairs into some order. But being a very generous person, he returned to Caliantes all the Estate he had received from his Father, and added thereto his own, which was very great: so that Caliantes was gotten richer by one halfe, than ever he expected to have been. Upon the first arrival of this news to him, he wrote to Artelisa in these terms.

WHen I first directed my affections to you, it was with some hope that proceeded from a confidence I could make you happy; and when fortune turn'd her back upon me, I quitted my hope without any loss as to my love, out of a consideration, that not willing to make you unfortunate, I conceived I had no longer any reason to hope, without ceasing to be generous, and being guilty of a treason against true love. But now that Fortune hath been pleased to bestow much more upon me, than she had taken away from me, give me leave, Madam, to re-assume that hope, which generosity had obliged to quit, and be so favourable to me, as to believe, that no man ever knew how to love so well as I do.

No doubt but this must needs add very much to the esteem which Artelisa had for Caliantes, whose procedure was so generous: however she thought not fit to answer it otherwise, than by a civility that engaged her not to any thing. In the mean time, she treated Melicrates better than any of the rest, for his reputation being still under a cloud upon her account, she thought it some obligation to comfort him: yet durst she not on the other side, be too harsh to Alcimedes, lest he should offer himself any violence a second time; she flattered the poor Lisydas, and she could not treat Caliantes ill, because his generosity had been extraordinary.

Things standing thus, there was a certain man, that had committed a great robbery, taken; and confessed he had been one of those that had assassinated this enemy of Melicrates. At first it was thought he had been a lost man, and that this thief would have nam'd him for the Author of his crime; but the world was strangely surpriz'd, to understand that Melicrates was not at all concerned in it, and that this horrid action had been committed by a jealous and revengeful Husband, who having discovered some familiarity between his wife and that enemy of Melicrates, would needs revenge himself in that manner. Whereupon he that was truly guilty, being taken as he was making his escape, and having confessed all, Melicrates was absolutely cleared, and recovered his former reputation, with much more luster than before. However, people were extreamly to seek, why he should be so loath to discover the place he was at when this murther had been committed. But it was not long e're it came out, for I am to tell you, that Caliantes spending now more highly than ever he had done; the slave, who had sometime opened the Garden-door to Melicrates, and whom Artelisa had soon after ordered to be sold, having passed through the hands of two other Masters, came at last to Caliantes, and reveal'd that secret to him, whereat this Lover was so surprized, that he could not smother the astonishment ment he conceived thereat. For though the ſlave had told him that Arteliſa knew not of his coming into the Garden, yet would he not believe him. So that not content with his own reflections on this adventure, he told it a friend of his, and that friend another. Inſomuch that ſoon after it came to be the general talk of this City, that what had caus'd that great ſilence of Melicrates, was, that he would not diſcover a ſecret appointment there had been between him and Arteliſa. This beauty, hearing at laſt what was ſaid of her, reſolved to tell what really paſſed, and conſequently to make appear the great expreſſion of affection ſhe had receiv'd from Melicrates. Arteliſa ſpoke this ſo freely, and Melicrates ſeconded it with ſuch prudence, that Arteliſa being known to be a virtuous perſon, all her Lovers, except Caliantes, believ'd the thing had paſſed as ſhe ſaid; nor indeed could it be much doubted of, for the Letters that had paſſed between Arteliſa and Melicrates, were very pregnant proofs of it.

Upon this there aroſe no ſmall difficulty, viz. to know whether of theſe four Lovers had made the greateſt expreſſion of Love to Arteliſa; whether Caliantes, who being of a magnificent and liberal nature, was content to embrace poverty for her ſake; or Alcimedes, who being a Lover of life and its enjoyments, would through an exceſs of love kill himſelf; or Liſydas, a perſon of great underſtanding, who had fallen mad through the violence of his paſſion; or Melicrates, who being a paſſionate lover of Glory, had conſented to the loſs of his own, rather than prejudice the reputation of his Miſtriſs. Arteliſa was juſt then come to the age ſhe would be of e're ſhe married, for this adventure had laſted to the twentieth year of her age. So that her Mother and the reſt of her friends, preſſed her to make choice of the perſon ſhe intended to marry. The Prince of Eryx would alſo have her to declare, to prevent what misfortune might happen between four perſons of equal worth, with any in the world. Add to this, that theſe Lovers being incin'd to do only what was juſt, notwithſtanding their love, every one thought he had many reaſons to alledge to Arteliſa, ſo that their mutual hatred being ſmother'd by an exceſs of generoſity, the Princeſs Clarinta, who was to arbitrate this great difference, endeavoured to find out ſome expedient, whereby this adventure might come to a period without any miſchief done. She therefore ſo manag'd the buſineſs, that theſe four Lovers promiſed to ſubmit to Arteliſa's Will, ſo as that the unfortunate ſhould not quarrel with him that were choſen, provided that, before hand, in the preſence of perſons that were able to adviſe, they might produce their reaſons, to prove every one the greatneſs of his affection; for I had forgot to tell you that Arteliſa had declar'd, that ſhe would beſtow herſelf on him, from whom ſhe had received the greateſt expreſſion of love. But the Princeſs Clarinta, fearing that if they ſpoke themſelves, they would be exaſperated one againſt another, made them conſent every one to chooſe a friend, to ſpeak their reaſons for them, before thoſe that were to adviſe Arteliſa. She alſo made them ſwear, that aſſoon as the choice were over, thoſe that were not choſen ſhould leave Eryx for ſix moneths, and ſhould not ſo much as take their leave of Arteliſa.

All theſe Articles being agreed on, the Princeſs aſſembled together all thoſe perſons whom ſhe thought competent judges in ſuch a caſe, and the four Lovers made choice of thoſe that were to ſpeak for them. Teramus was one of the firſt invited to this famous conſiſtory; a perſon of great worth, called Meriander, who was come from Syracuſe to Eryx, was alſo entreated to be there; the ſolitary Merigenes quitted his wilderneſs to the ſame end; and Clarinta would needs have them ſtay one day for an illuſtrious friend of hers, whom I muſt give you a character of: for having made you acquainted with all the perſons of worth at Eryx, it is but juſt I give you the knowledge of him, I am to ſpeak to you of, ſince he was one of my friends judges.

Know then that this generous friend of Clarinta's is called Anaximenes, a perſon of extraordinary merit. He is well born, and comes of a Houſe bleſs'd with an Eſtate ſufficient to ſatisfie a wiſe man, and yet it may be ſaid, it is a thouſand times leſs than he deſerves. Anaximenes is tall, hath an Oval countenance, a dark hair, a delicate but pale complexion, ſomewhat a great mouth, a well proportion'd noſe, eyes black, large, and full of fire, Yet is his deportment grave enough, though his eyes do many times betray an obliging ſmile. For his underſtanding, it requires more knowledg than I have to define it well. For not to mention the great prodigality of Nature towards him in that particular, he hath improved it ſtrangely. He hath not only learned whatever the Greeks knew, but alſo whatever the Chaldeans, the Babylonians, and the Egyptians, have communicated to others. So that whatever the moſt learned, as well antient as modern, knew ſeparately, he hath united in himſelf. Thence is it, that he is conſulted upon the moſt obſcure paſſages of Heſiod and Homer, and what from Greece, where the Diſciples of the ſeven Wiſe men do yet flouriſh; what from Crotona and Metapont, where live thoſe of Pythagoras, he conſtantly receives Letters from thoſe learned perſons with whom he holds correſpondence. For the Tongues, he hath an admirable command of four, not reckoning his own, and writes Verſes in all thoſe four, as well as in his own natural language. He hath alſo writ divers pieces in Proſe, full of excellent knowledge; and what ever is noble in Poeſie, or curious in point of Letters, he is abſolute maſter of.

But though Anaximenes be a very knowing perſon, and his company much courted by all the Lovers and profeſſors of Learning; yet is it not to be imagined, that he ſees no other people; no, his acquaintance ſpreads, not only into that of Queens, Princes, Princeſſes, and Miniſters of State, but alſo into that of all the Gallants about the Court, and all the Beauties without any exception; for to ſpeak freely, he is no leſs a lover of the Ladies than of the Muſes; and what makes for his advantage is, that they have an infinite eſteem for him, and that he never had any violent love for any one of them, but ſhe became his very familiar friend. For when he loves he does it with violence, nay, he hath the gift of ſhedding paſſionate tears, which all Lovers have not, and he is the moſt generous Lover in the world. 'Tis true, he cannot endure to love all his life-time to no purpoſe; and what is moſt particular in his love, is, that ſometimes an ordinary passion cures him of a great one, that he can afterwards resume his former chains, without breaking his second, that he can cease loving, yet not hate, and that his love is many times changed into friendship.

Anaximenes is not to be numbred among those people that have friends only for themselves, for though he hath a great interest in all those that have any in the Court of Eryx, yet does he not make any advantage of it himself, save that of serving others. He is perpetually doing good offices for some or other, and the world affords not a person that takes greater pleasure in obliging such of any worth as are unfortunate, than he does. Nor does he think it enough to serve such with his credit, as he thinks stand in need thereof, but his own estate lies as open to his friends, as himself, and these things he does as freely, as if fortune had given him security, he should never want any thing. And for the interest he hath with great ones, he gets it not by base sycophancy; on the contrary, he speaks sincerely, and courageously to those whom he deals with; and discovers a greater heart in giving a faithful advice, than others do in those actions that make most noise. His virtue is not unciviliz'd, or scrupulous, he injures no man, nay, endeavours not the prejudice of his enemies; his behaviour is innocent, all his inclinations generous; he loves glory, yet does not admit ambition; and to define him in few words, he hath the knowledge of a Grecian, the heart of a Roman, and a soul as amorous, as if he had been born in Africk.

Anaximenes, being such a person as I represent him to you, was one of those that came to the Princess Clarinta's, on the day appointed for Artelisa's four Lovers, to give each of them their reasons, to prove the greatness of their affection. But that so great a difference might receive a period without the fear of any unhappy consequence, they caused the four Lovers solemnly to swear that they would exactly observe the engagement that they had made, not to raise any quarrel about the choice after it was once made, and to leave Eryx the same day. For my own particular, in regard I had been long there, and was a friend to all these Lovers, and much favour'd by the Princess Clarinta, I was one of those that were to give Artelisa their advice. But at last, the day being set, and Artelisa come to the Princess Clarinta's Palace, where four very understanding Ladies, chosen by her, with the consent of the four Lovers, being come, Meriander, Teramus, Anaximenes, Merigenes, three others, and my self, met them there. Clarinta would have the business debated in a spacious Closet, wainscotted in the roof, that had all about it many Cabinets, full of things, curious and magnificent. The Princess lay on a little Bed of State, all the Ladies sate on cushions, and the men either stood or half kneeled by the Ladies, upon a large piece of Tapestry which took up half of the Closet. For the four Lovers, they were with the Prince; Clarinta not thinking it fit they should hear what was said against them one after another, lest it might exasperate them: Nay, they drew lots who should speak first of those that were to plead for them. So it happened, that Alcimedes's friend should begin, Caliantes should be the second, Lisydas's next, and Melicrates's last. Clarinta did further oblige those that were to speak, to address their speech to Artelisa, whose thoughts were then in no small disturbance. When all had taken their places, Alcimedes's friend, who was to speak for him, was call'd, who having made a low reverence, and received Clarinta's order, spoke to the fair Artelisa, in these terms.

ALCIMEDES's Plea.

THe cause I am to defend is so just, Madam, that were I not satisfi'd, that it is impossible for a man to love without hope, I should charge the illustrious persons, whom your merit hath made your servants, with a carriage very irrational. For, Madam, can any of them compare what they have done for the discovery and expression of their affection, with that which Alcimedes hath? Caliantes, it must be confess'd, hath done a generous action, in resolving to lose his Estate rather than leave you; but when all is done, Madam, a man may imagine, if he please, his resolution to continue still at Eryx, proceeded from a certain confidence, that his Father could not be so rigorous as to disinherit him, meerly because he was in love with one of the most excellent persons in the world. And when it was done, it was no extraordinary prudence in him to bear his misfortune with constancy, and to oblige you to think he deserved well at your hands. But, be it suppos'd, that he should be willing to lose all for your sake, yet cannot matter of fortune be compared to life, which Alcimedes was content to cast away out of an excess of love. For Lisydas, whom grief deprived of reason, I must confess, I am so much the further to seek, why he should presume to contend with Alcimedes, for we never recompence any actions, but the voluntary. And if that be granted, what pretence hath he to stand so much upon the misfortune that is happened to him, when it is evident that it happened to him against his will? Besides, it may haply be attributed as much to the weakness of his constitution, as to the greatness of his love; But for Alcimedes, when he gave himself a stab with a Ponyard, it was his desire and set purpose to do it; his Will guided his Hand, and Love forced his Will, so that the merit of his action is out of all controversie. For Melicrates, I must acknowledge he hath done a thing very obliging, in being content to be unjustly accused, rather than to give the least occasion that you should be unjustly suspected. But, all considered, this action, which at first sight seems so, is not so glorious as is imagined; for Melicrates having committed a fault, in coming to your Garden without your knowledge, had it been just in him to prejudice your reputation, or was it any more than fit that he should bear the burthen and punishment of his own crime? Besides, Madam, while he made you this expression of his Love, he wanted not the satisfaction of knowing himself to be innocent, and that thought him no less; nay, he might be guilty of a further perswasion, that in case you ever thought so well of him as to marry him, it would be easie for you one day to vindicate him. But for Alcimedes, Madam, his very resolution to die, amounts to this, that in you he placed his Estate, his Reason, his Glory, and all things, since you had no sooner forbidden him to hope, but he inferr'd he had no longer to live. But it may be objected, that Alcimedes is a person crush'd with the troubles of life, one that lost as life as a thing indifferent, and is not acquainted with the enjoyments thereof. On the contrary, Madam, you know him to be a lover of life, a man born to joy, and studies all the entertainments that may be had; and yet four words, disdainfully pronounced, have caused a dissolution of all the engagements he had to cherish life, and forced him to die for your sake, in the most amorous manner that a Lover could be induced to die in. Had he dyed to do you some service, he might have found some satisfaction in dying; but to be content to dye, without the least hope of being so much as pitied, is the highest expression of affection that can be given: for it must needs be, that Alcimedes, at the very instant that he was first transported by despair, was perswaded he could not live without you, that he could never cease loving you, that it was not in the power of time to ease him, that the curse afforded not any thing could satisfie him, and that only death could mitigate the torments love had put him into. Let not then Caliantes make any further comparison between what he hath done, and what Alcimedes hath; for a man may slight the goods of Fortune out of a thousand considerations, less forcible than that of love. Let Lisydas quit his claim, since that a simple melancholly vapor, without any cause of affliction, may put a man to the loss of his Reason. And let not Melicrates boast so much of the sacrifice he hath made of his reputation, since he only engaged a thing, which he might one day recover, whereas Alcimedes hath been willing to lose for your sake, what can never be either recovered or recalled again. Let your judgement then, Madam, be given in his favour, who is the most amorous of those that adore you; and I beseech you to consider how dangerous it were to hazard a second time, the life of a person so considerable as Alcimedes.

When Alcimedes's friend had given over speaking, the whole Company fixed their eyes on Artemia, to see by her countenance, what impression this discourse had made in her heart. But there being an order made, that none should speak till the four friends of the unfortunate Lovers had given in their reasons, no body spoke, only Teramus whispered some pleasant things to Clarinta; which done, he who was to maintain the cause of Caliantes, spoke thus,

CALIANTES's Plea.

I Must confess, Madam, that the person who hath spoken for Alcimedes, hath very pertinently urged all that could be said to weaken the pretences of Lisydas and Melicrates, insomuch that I have not any thing to add to what he hath said against them. But I must withal make it appear to you, that he hath not fought with the same force against Caliantes; and that he hath not so much proved the right of Alcimedes, as discovered the unjust pretences of two of his Rivals. To discover this truth, I am to let you understand, that to judge aright of the merit of an action, a man ought sometimes to consider all those that have preceded it, nay, many times those that follow it. For I lay down this as an infallible rule, that there is no man in the world so wicked, whose life affords not some one action that might give men occasion to think he might be virtuous, if there were no more known of him: as also that there are few people so innocent, in whose lives there may not some action be found, which being stripped of all those circumstances that might render it innocent, or excusable, might not give some occasion to think them less virtuous than they are. Let not therefore Alcimedes pretend, that we ought to measure the greatness of his love by one single action of his life, and that, an action proceeding rather from indignation than love; and is more likely to argue the despair of a voluptuous person, exasperated at the loss of his pleasures, than a Lover afflicted at the cruelty of his Mistriss. I shall not deny, but Alcimedes loves life, and that he discovers no less by his courting of all the enjoyments thereof, but shall not grant that he loves you as much as Caliantes does, whose affection hath appeared without interest from the first beginning thereof to the end; Alcimedes was willing enough to live for your sake, while he looked on you as a person that might prove the means of his felicity; but it no sooner came into his thoughts, that you had destroyed his pleasures, by eluding his hope, but he abhors himself, and by a violent motion, to which true passion does not contribute any thing, he would needs die, not knowing precisely why he should live no longer. Add to this, that death is not a thing so terrible as it is imagined, and it is evident from thousands of examples, that Love is not the most ordinary cause thereof, in the hearts of desperate persons. There are some that rush upon it of themselves, for fear of receiving it from the hands of their enemies; others to avoid being well treated by them; others to prevent the inconveniencies of old age; others out of a fear of abating any thing of their enjoyments; and others out of an irrational melancholly, which makes them hate life. But for Caliantes, if we consider all he hath done for you, since he fell in love with you, we shall find, that in being content to embrace poverty for your sake, he hath done the greatest and most heroick action that ever Lover did. For you know, Madam, that when he first directed his affections to you, he was prodigiously rich, and prodigiously liberal; and yet rather than want your sight, he suffers all to be taken from him, he hath no further employment for a virtue, wherin he placed his greatest satisfaction; he puts himself into a condition of asking, rather than giving; and while he does this, he declares to you, that he will love you eternally, even without any hope: for you know, that as soon as he fell into misfortune, he plainly told you, he would not be so irrational, as to be guilty of a wish to see you engaged in his fortunes. Accordingly hath he undergone his misfortune with no less constancy than love, till such time as the gods having bestowed on him more than he had lost, have put him into a condition to discover his passion to you, by re-admitting hope into his heart. Judge then, Madam, what recompence that man deserves, who hath voluntarily lost his fortune, though he could not lose it, without the loss of all the hopes of happiness, who in his misfortune hath preserved his passion without any interest, and who in his good fortune makes a new sacrifice of his heart to you. You see, Madam, that Caliantes hath done something for you more noble than to kill himself. For grief is a resentment, much more tender than indignation. You also perceive that the loss of reason is not so great an expression of love, as for a man to have employ'd his reason to do an action that speaks a great generosity, and withal, a great passion; and for what concerns Melicrates, the sacrifice he hath made of his reputation, is not so considerable as what Caliantes hath done. For Melicrates hath done nothing against any one, when he was content to be suspected; but Caliantes not only

ly loſes his fortune, but diſobeys a Father, and conſequently does an unjuſt thing, which he never had done, had he not loved you, as much as it is poſſible to love any one. So that, Madam, if you conſider what went before, and what followed Caliantes's action, you will find that he hath expreſſed more love to you than all his Rivals, and conſequently deſerves to be preferred before them. Be not therefore dazled with actions ſeemingly glorious, which truly conſidered, argue leſs true love, and leſs generoſity than that of my friend, and I beſeech you, bethink your ſelf, whether a magnificent and liberal perſon, who became poor for your ſake, and being grown rich again, would beſtow all on you, deſerves not your heart before any other.

Caliantes's Advocate had no ſooner given over ſpeaking, but he that was to plead for Liſydas, aſſum'd the diſcourſe in this manner.

LISYDAS's Plea.

I Know not, Madam, whether the friendſhip I have for Liſydas, makes me partial, but am perſwaded that none of his Rivals have ſo much right to your affection as he. For to ſpeak rationally, the heart of a fair Lady can never be more juſtly beſtow'd, than when it is beſtow'd on the moſt unfortunate, conditionally he be the moſt amorous, and be otherwiſe a perſon that knows how to value her love: for I muſt confeſs, that love without deſert, gives not any man a lawful right to pretend to the poſſeſſion of an excellent Ladies heart. This granted, Madam, muſt it not be withal acknowledged, that Liſydas deſerves your affection much beyond any of his Rivals? He hath loved you ever ſince you were a fit object of love, that is, ever ſince you were in the world. Nay, he hath had ſome ground to hope he ſhould not be ſlighted; he hath ſeen the new victories you have gain'd without quitting that hope; and though you have not in a manner done any thing for him, yet hath he ſerv'd you with extraordinary reſpect, without any complaints or repining. But when you took away the hope he was in, you took away withal his reaſon, and through an exceſs of love, to which nothing can be compared; we find that your power over him, is equal to that of the gods, who only can give and take away their reaſon from them. In ſo much, that to make it appear, you were abſolute Miſtriſs of his deſtiny, You no ſooner looked kindly on him, but he recovered the uſe of his reaſon; and men have ſeen again in Liſydas, that great and divertive mind, which hath got him the love and eſteem of all that know him. To ſit down quietly with the loſs of an eſtate, there needs no more than generoſity; for a man to give himſelf a ſtab with a Poniard, there needs only a minute of fury, which he repents him of a quarter of an hour after; for a man to expoſe his reputation, he needs do no more than ſet himſelf above what the world can ſay of him: but for a man to loſe his reaſon, upon the hearing of four ſcornful words, argues him to be the moſt amorous of men, and conſequently the moſt worthy to be loved; For all conſidered, this ſtrange accident could not poſſibly have happened to Liſydas, any otherwiſe than through an exceſſive grief, which could proceed from no other cauſe, than the paſſion he hath for you: Be pleas'd then, Madam, to make ſerious reflections on the power you have over him, and thence, I beſeech you, conſider, what affliction it muſt needs be to you, if your cruelty ſhould force him to a relapſe into that misfortune out of which you have delivered him by a ſtrange kindneſs. For Caliantes, he was able to live without hope while he was poor. Alcimedes being cured of his wound, will not offer to kill himſelf a ſecond time, and to prevent it, you need do no more than forbid him to do ſo. But for Liſydas, Madam, he muſt infallibly loſe either his reaſon or his life, if you do him not juſtice. Make choice then of the moſt unfortunate, ſince he is the moſt amorous, and is a perſon of that worth, that he deſerves you. 'Twere a horrid injuſtice in you, to reproach him with a misfortune, which you had been the occaſion of; and it were as ſtrange a cruelty to expoſe him to a relapſe, after you had once recovered him. For to what end have you reſtored his reaſon, if you intend not to make him happy? Think on him, Madam, think on him, but let it be with a mixture of equity and generoſity, if you would not run the hazard of being charged at the ſame time with injuſtice and inhumanity.

Whereupon Melicrates's friend advancing, and he who had ſpoke laſt, reſigning his place to him, began his diſcourſe thus;

MELICRATES's Plea.

THoſe things which happen ſeldom, Madam, do certainly require our conſideration after a very particular manner, and what ordinarily happens, never cauſes much admiration. Hence is it I muſt confeſs, that I can without any manner of aſtoniſhment, ſpeak of what is happened to Alcimedes, Caliantes, and Liſydas, becauſe there are a many examples of their adventures. Divers Lovers have loſt their reaſon, through a reſentment of grief; many have loved without intereſt, and not a few have endeavoured to die out of deſpair; but never any Lover beſides Melicrates, hath been content to expoſe his reputation, out of a pure ſentiment of Love. I beſeech you, Madam, to but imagine you ſee Melicrates, a perſon infinitely ſpelling his reputation, full of honor and noble work, content to be accuſed of an Aſſaſſinate, the baſeſt and moſt horid of all crimes, rather than give the leſt ground of ſuſpicion, that you had any kindneſs for him, and I am confident your own heart will prove his Advocate, and will not be able to reſiſt his Love. For was it juſt to ſtick at a thing ſo eaſie to be reſolved on? for to ſay ſomething of the ſeveral actions of theſe Lovers, according to ordinary reaſon, he who ſacrifices his life, does an action that is more difficult, than what he does who only loſes an Eſtate; he who loſes his reaſon out of an exceſs of Love, ſeems to pretend to ſomething that is more proper to demonſtrate the greatneſs of his paſſion, than he that would kill himſelf; but he that is content to loſe his honor, does queſtionleſs much more than he who loſes his eſtate, than who loſes his life, and than he who loſes his reaſon. But what makes the main difference between him and his Rivals, is, that the actions whereby they pretend to diſcover the greatneſs of their love, are not purely voluntary, as Caliantes's friend hath well obſerved; for when the Father of that Lover diſinherited him, it was far from Caliantes to deſire any ſuch thing; Alcimedes giving himſelf a ſtab with a Poniard, wanted the freedom of his Will, but ſurely being at that time the abſolute Miſtriſs of it, and he knew not haply what he did: and for Liſydas, his

out of all question, he would not have chosen extravagance, to give his Mistress an assurance of his affection, had it depended meerly on his Will. But for Melicrates, he willingly took upon him the shame of a lewd action, out of a scrupulous sentiment of love: for in fine, without doing any thing against the respect he ought you, he might have justified himself since he needed no more than to say, that without your knowledge he is come to your house. But he very well imagining that the world would not have believed the relation he might have made of the business, chose rather, out of an unparallel'd generosity, to suffer himself to be accus'd, than to expose you to the suspicion of having given him a meeting. So that, the violent passion he hath ever had for glory, notwithstanding, he was satisfied to have only you, of the world, conscious of his innocence, Nay, he thought it indeed some satisfaction to make you so great a sacrifice, and one so particular, that I dare affirm there never was the like, as I said before. To be short, if you well consider this action, you will find it much more hard to do, than it seems to be at first sight. How hard a thing do you think it must needs have been to Melicrates, to lose the esteem of his Rivals, had he not infinitely loved you. You are haply surpriz'd at this manner of speaking, yet can I not but account it rational. For it is certain, that whoever hath a great and noble heart, is in a manner no less desirous of the esteem of his Rivals, than of his Mistress, though it proceeded from different sentiments. In a word, Madam, What Melicrates hath done for you, is so great, and so heroick, that it in some sort derogates from the justice of his cause, to use so many words, so weak as mine are, to maintain it. Be pleas'd then only to remember, Madam, that he having lost his reputation for your sake, you will infallibly lose yours, if you prefer any of his Rivals before him.

As soon as he who had pleaded for Melicrates, had given over speaking, the Princess Clarinta commanded him, and the other three who had apologiz'd for the other three Lovers, to withdraw. Which done, she asked the company what they thought of the business, enjoyning all those that had heard the reasons of the four Lovers, to give Artelisa faithful advice, whose thoughts no doubt were not over-quiet. For Teramus, he desir'd for him who was content to lose his Estate; Meriander for Lisydas, Anaximenes for Alcimedes, Merigenes for Melicrates, for whom I was also my self; there were some others of our side as well as the Ladies; and the business grew so hot, that it began a new dispute amongst us, much more earnest than the other, for every one would maintain his own opinion. For my part, saies Teramus, at last, smiling, I know but one raional expedient, whereby to detemine this so great a difference, and withal, to give Artelisa good counsel. All thronging together to hear what this expedient should be; 'tis this, said he, that the fair Artelisa discarding these four Lovers, should pitch upon a fifth. This advice indeed is like your self, replies Clarinta, smiling, but Artelisa, if she will be rul'd by me, will not follow it, and yet I must confess, I am very much troubled what to advise her to, for poor Caliantes, who is so generous I cannot but pitty; Alcimedes, a person of so much worth, and of a disposition so violent, raises in me both a compassion and a fear for him; Lisydas I am also extreamly troubled for; Melicrates hath done an action so noble, , that I shall have much ado to suffer he should be unfortunate, and if I am not mistaken, Artelisa will be as much to seek in the business as I am. I must confess it, Madam, replied she, but to speak sincerely, I am one of the most unfortunate persons in the world, to be the occasion that so many excellent persons must be unfortunate: But, it were not amiss, saies Anaximenes, after we have examined whether of these four Lovers love Artelisa best, to know of Artelisa which she loves best; for being all four very excellent persons, and pretending an equal claim to her love, I conceive that her inclination ought to be judge of this grand controversie. You speak very well, saies the Princess Clarinta, and since Artelisa, hath heard all that may fortifie or weaken her inclinations, 'tis only she that can decide this great business.

At this was that excellent Virgin extreamly troubled, she reflected a little while on what she was to do, she blush'd, and discover'd in her countenance all the expressions of a violent disturbance; then at last resolving of a sudden, since I must clearly express my self, said she, and that I find more people of the side my heart is secretly inclin'd to, than of any other, I declare, That I shall think my self eternally oblig'd to Caliantes; that it is with abundance of regret I see Alcimedes unfortunate; that I am troubled for poor Lisydas; and that I make choice of Melicrates.

This sentence being pronounced, the contestation vanished, and all that was to be done, was to engage the three unfortunate Lovers to observe their words, that so no quarrel might happen between the happy and miserable. The Princess Clarinta with her ordinary prudence, went to acquaint the unfortunate with their misfortune, and Melicrates with his happiness; and this she did so ingeni usly, that the respect they bore her, hindred them from breaking forth into violence before her. Caliantes seemed to be extreamly afflicted, yet was it a grief that discovered divers expressions of constancy. Alcimedes betrayed more violence in his despair; and Lisydas was so o're-whelm'd by his, that he had not the power to speak one word: however, they desired the favour to take their leave of Artelisa, and to hear their sentence from her mouth; but the Prince and Princess made them let fall that suit, and obliging to leave Eryx, Clarinta recommended them to Merigenes, who the same day took them along with him to his Wilderness. Now to shew that an equality of misfortune does sometimes unite the most implacable enemies; These three Rivals hated one the other no longer, and Caliantes, who had been an antient friend of Melicrates's, would not see him after he had been chosen by Artelisa.

I shall not make it my business to aggravate the affliction of these three Lovers to you, and shall only tell you, that had it not been for the advice of Merigenes, and his illustrious friend, whom I told you of before, they had taken some more violent resolution than what they now have. Nor shall I give you any account of the magnificences of Artelisa's Nuptials, or the satisfaction of Melicrates; for according to the humor I then was, and still am of, I sought out the miserable rather than the happy, as such whose fortunes were more sutable to my own. I therefore thought it fitter to embrace affliction with the unfortunate, than to enjoy my self with the fortunate, whence it came, that these three Lovers were purposely recommended to me and Merigenes, to have a more careful eye over them.

Now as things stood thus, the greatest news that was in Sicily, being of the great action Brutus had done, Tarquin's being forc'd away, Rome's liberty, and the War then breaking forth, I took a resolution to come and die for my Countrey, and have prevail'd with these three illustrious but unfortunate persons, to come and seek their recovery in serving Rome. They made me answer, that they would never seek after that which they knew they should never find, but were content to come and meet with death in Brutus's Army; and accordingly some few days after, we left the solitary Merigenes in his pleasant Wilderness, and took our way towards Rome, whither we came in the manner you saw Æmilius concluding his relation, left in the hearts of those that heard it, a violent desire to comfort those three unfortunate Lovers, whose valour had given them so much admiration, and whose misfortune so much pitty. Amilcar said, that he would endeavour their recovery, and that till then he had never met with any melancholly that was incurable. The reason is, replies Octavius, that you have ever had friends of your own humour; but for my part, I am perswaded, there are those afflictions that cannot be cured. Horatius was of the same opinion, as also Herminius and Æmilius; yet all agreed, that there was not any which might not admit some alleviation. Hereupon it proving fair weather, they went all together to Brutus's Tent, to see if there were any Orders for them. They found Valerius there, and that it was to be debated how they should set upon the enemy, according to the account Brutus gave of them, who had taken a view of them: for this generous Consul had put it out of all debate, whether they should be assaulted or not. But as his judgement commonly concluded all consultations, whatever he propos'd was approved; and he gave out all necessary Orders for the carrying on of the assault that had been agreed upon: and that the Soldiery might be the better prepared, three hours were assigned to rest; and Brutus himself, though with no hope to sleep, yet cast himself on his Bed, his imaginations being then wholly taken up with the liberty of Rome, the revenge of Lucretia, and an extraordinary desire to overcome. At first these reflections permitted him not to close his eyes, but at last a weak slumber laying all his senses asleep, and chaining up his reason, left only his imagination at liberty. He had hardly closed his eyes, but represented it to him the admirable Lucretia, but so beautiful and so amiable, that he had never seen her so prepar'd to conquer hearts. He thought he was going towards Lucretia, who reaching forth her hand, said these words to him; Youshall overcome, Brutus, you shall overcome; Rome shall be free, I shall be revenged, and we shall be eternally together; At which Brutus conceiv'd such an excessive joy, that it awak'd him, and cruelly dispers'd that pleasant Idea, which a favourable dream had made him see. Then was he troubled his slumber had been so short; yet was not sorry he had enjoy'd, though but for one minute, an object so delightful to him. But though there were hardly a man in Rome that gave less credit than Brutus, to good or ill presages, yet could he not but entertain some hopes of some over-coming from what had happened to him. Nay, he gave no fatal interpretation to the last words of Lucretia; so that not hoping to sleep any more, he called up his people, put on his Armor, and issuing out all necessary Orders, the Army went out of the Camp at the hour appointed for the assault.

But that you may the better comprehend how great an attempt this of Brutus was, you are precisely to know what kind of post the enemy was in. The Castle of Arsia was situated at the foot of those mountains of the Forrest, whence it hath its name, but extending themselves in a manner equally on both the right and left hand, they make a kind of a Crescent, in the midst whereof was a spacious Plain, which had on the one side high mountains, and on the other a scurvy Wood, which made it almost inaccessible. Yet was there one place, through which it was impossible to come to Tarquin's Camp; but it being necessary to pass along the extremity of a Mountain that commands the whole Plain, it was a dangerous course so to do: for the Plain was crossed by a little Rivulet, which having made divers turns along the Wood, falls into it, is swallowed up into it of a sudden, and then falls into the neck of a Mountain, which lies on the left hand of a Castle of Arsia.

Tarquin, being posted in a place so well fortifi'd by nature, had made all the advantages of it, that a great Captain could: for making Art and Nature combine together, he had added Trenches to a situation so strong of it self. So that a man well versed in matters of War, could not conceive it other than a rash attempt to force him, especially his Army being as numerous as that of Brutus. Besides, he had dispos'd his Camp along the little Rivulet I spoke of, behind which he had cast a Trench; and had taken such order that his Camp was inaccessible every way, what by the Rivulet that secur'd it, what by the Trench which made that yet more strong, what by the Wood, and what by the Fenn which could not be past through. The only place where they could set upon a post so fortifi'd by Art and Nature, was the high way from Rome to the Castle of Arsia, which was as I told you, pass'd by the foot of the Mountain, which seemed to be inaccessible: yet was there a necessity to master it, before they could so much as approach Tarquin's Camp. Nor had that Prince, who knew the consequence of it, neglected to put it into such a condition, that it could not be forc'd. To that end had he rais'd a Fort upon the descent of the Mountain, which looked towards the Plain, and had placed therein Machines, and people to manage them to defend it. From this Fort had he drawn a Line all along the Wood, up to the top of a Mountain, to a place so strong of it self, that men could not go it up. This Line was further made good by little Forts which he had raised at certain distances; and to make this Post somewhat stronger yet on that side, he fell'd a great number of Trees, which cast confusedly one upon another, and the boughs half cut off, and twining together, made a greater obstacle than a Wall could have done. There was yet another place which afforded a small a ſmall paſſage between two Mountains, but it being ſix or ſeven miles about to go to it, and to do that, there was a neceſſity of paſſing through places which Brutus could not poſſibly have any acquaintance with; and that beſides, a great River fortified that place without any farther trouble. Tarquin thought it ſufficient to fell down a many Trees to make the acceſs the more difficult. Add to this, that the groſs of his Army lying on that ſide, he never feared being ſet upon that way. To be ſhort, his Camp lay ſo advantageouſly, and he had ſo well improved what nature had offered him, that it was not without reaſon that he thought it inexpugnable. But Brutus was abſolutely reſolved to give him an aſſault; and to that end would needs in the firſt place attempt the line that was on the top of the Mountain, leaving the fort on the left hand, to take in the little Forts by which it was made good, for by that means maſtering the ſtrong that commanded the other places, it would have been more eaſie to take in the Fort, and ſo come to a Battel in Tarquin's Camp. For Valerius, it was his buſineſs to ſet upon that great fortification of Trees, which ſecured the valley I told you of. So that Brutus was in hope that theſe two ſeveral aſſaults would oblige Tarquin to divide his forces, and conſequently, that it would be more eaſie to overcome him; nay, that if he once gave way, it would be hard for him to avoid a total defeat; for that Brutus falling upon him from the Mountain, and Valerius poſſeſſing himſelf of the plain, he could not any way eſcape.

To put this ſo great a deſign in execution, Valerius, with the body under his command, departed earlier than Brutus, becauſe he was to go a great way about, and that having reſolved to make the aſſault at the ſame time, it was not thought fit Brutus ſhould appear too ſoon before the enemy. In the mean time, this illuſtrious Conſul iſſued out ſuch orders as were neceſſary for thoſe Forces that were to be engaged in the aſſault he was to make. Octavius with his party was commanded to make the firſt on-ſet; and Mutius commanding the ſame number of men, was ordered to relieve him, Brutus reſerving two Battalions to be diſpoſed of as need ſhould require. For the Infantry, it conſiſted only of ſix battalions, of the firſt and ſecond legion. The nobleſt ſouls, who had no particular command in this aſſault, were all about Brutus, except Horatius and Spurius, and ſome others that were with Valerius, for as to Themiſtus, Meleagenes, Æmilius, Perſander, Herminius, Amilcar, Caliantes, Alcimedes and Liſydas, they were all about the firſt Conſull. The place through which they were to go to the fight, was in a manner inacceſſible; for there was a neceſſity of going up through a Vineyard that was digged up in divers places, and had at certain diſtances walls made Terraſs-wiſe, to keep up the earth in a place ſo much digged up.

Yet could not all theſe ſeveral obſtacles hinder, but the great Brutus was ſtill in hope to overcome, and the image of Lucretia taking up all his thoughts he felt within him a certain aſſurance which perſwaded him not to hear any thing that reaſon ſuggeſted of the difficulty of the attempt. He thereupon gave the firſt orders for the aſſault, but with ſuch a noble and majeſtick countenance, that it might have been ſaid he was confident of victory. So that theſe forces with incredible violence, began that dangerous aſſault. They get up the Vineyard, though with abundance of difficulty, they courageouſly and impetuouſly break through the felled Trees, notwithſtanding the darts of the enemies. But not able to do this great action without ſome diſorder, by reaſon of the Trees, as alſo that the enemy made good their ground, they had much ado to rally after they had paſſed the felled Trees. On the other ſide, Sextus, a perſon of more gallantry than virtue, who commanded that place, coming up with a Body that had not been broken, gave a check to the forces of Brutus. Yet did they not give back, but quiting the hopes of Victory, they advanced not any farther.

In the mean time, Brutus, who out of the ſeveral deſires of revenge, the liberty of his Country, and the love of Glory, would needs have a part in all that related to that dangerous attempt, comes up to ſee what had been the ſucceſs of that firſt aſſault. But he was much ſurpriſed to ſee that his people had not forced the Trench; that Octavius and Mutius do what they could, were not able to make them advance, and that the meer reſpect they had for their leaders, hindred them from running away. Brutus much troubled at ſo unhappy a beginning, took a ſudden and gallant reſolution; yet was it a thing hard to comprehend how greater matters could be done by an equal number, than the former forces had been able to do, whereof there was not then any likelihood of making any advantage. So that looking on them as a ſort of people abſolutely unſerviceable, it could not well be hop'd that they ſhould force ſuch as were ſtronger than themſelves in number, out of ſo advantageous a Poſt. But on the other ſide, Brutus ſaw that if he retreated, he forſook the forces that had paſſed the fell'd Trees; that he loſt the glory of the day; that he muſt expect the ſhame of having ſuffered half his forces to be deſtroyed without relief; and that this firſt ill ſucceſs might hinder the revenge of Lucretia, and the liberty of Rome, as ſuch as ſhould diſhearten his own Legions, and fill the Forces of Tarquin with hope and courage. So that love, hatred, revenge, and glory, quickning his reſolutions in ſo preſſing an emergency; after he had in an inſtant ſeen all I have told you, and well conſidered the difficulty of the attempt, and the ſhame of a retreat, he reſolved on a ſudden to take the more glorious way imagining in that extremity, that he could not overcome ſuch great obſtacles, but meerly by the greatneſs of his own courage, and that it concerned his valor rather than his prudence to reſcue him out of ſo great danger.

This reſolution fixed upon, he alights, and puts himſelf in the head of the foot he had left. All the general Officers, all the Soldiers of fortune I have named to you, did the like, whereupon the generous Lover of Lucretia marched with an heroick violence ſtrait to the enemies Trench. But he came up to it with ſuch a noble confidence, that it made an impreſſion in the hearts of all thoſe that followed him, and the example of ſo prodigious a valor, raiſed ſo much joy in the forces that obſerved it, that the fear of death was to be found only among the enemies. All the Soldiery put the Victory out of all diſpute, and they looked on thoſe they were to fight with, as people already overcome. For as ſoon as they ſaw Brutus, attended by his illuſtrious friends, courageouſly paſſing through the fell'd Trees with his ſword drawn, the only ſtriſe was, who ſhould get through firſt. All made ſuch haſt, that it might be ſaid, that ſome great prize waited for them beyond the Trees, and ſo running tumultuouſly upon the enemies Trench, their diſorder and confuſion got them the Victory ſooner than if they had fought diſcreetly. The enemy made good their ground very gallantly, but how could they long oppoſe the valor of a Brutus, attended by ſo many gallant perſons, whom love, jealouſie and deſpair, endued with new valor that made them invincible. So that Tarquin's forces not able to withſtand ſo ſharp an encounter gave back, and fought as people frightned, and ſuch as thought their ſafety conſiſted in their flight. The night now coming on, being favorable to them, they endeavored to gain the Wood, and ſecure themſelves there, but Brutus underſtanding that Sextus commanded on that ſide, purſued them with all the violence he could, and having killed a horſeman of the enemies, he took his horſe, and drove ſtrait to the place where he thought to find Sextus, who was endeavoring to rally his Infantry; for things were in ſuch a tumult, that no order could be obſerved. Brutus therefore coming up with his ſword drawn towards him he thought Tarquin's eldeſt Son, he at laſt perceived he was not miſtaken. So that fury ſeizing his thoughts, and the Idæa of dying Lucretia filling his imagination, he ſet upon him with incredible earneſtneſs. Ah Traytor! cryed he to him, thou muſt at laſt be puniſhed for thy crimes, and thy blood ſhall be the firſt ſpilt for the revenge of Lucretia. Sextus diſcovering by theſe words, that it was Brutus that ſpoke to him, put himſelf in a poſture of defence; ſo that the engagement that happened between them, proved the moſt obſtinate that can be imagined. Nay, at the firſt, neither of the parties were ſenſible of it, for Brutus's friends in the heat of the fight, knew not what was become of him; and Sextus's party being defeated, was run away, and had left him to ſhift for himſelf. So that he had no other aſſiſtance than that of his own valor to oppoſe that of Brutus, animated by the moſt juſt and moſt violent hatred that ever was. Whereupon Sextus, notwithſtanding his gallantry, was wounded in three places, without ſo much as touching his enemy. Being in that condition, and fearing nothing ſo much as to come alive into the hands of that generous Roman, he did all that lay in his power to avoid it; for paſſing by to get behind Brutus's Horſe, and Brutus endeavoring the ſame to him, their ſwords croſſed, and that of Sextus broke: Being ſo diſarmed, he put on his horſe with all violence, ſo to make his eſcape. Brutus perceiving his deſign, would needs follow him, but being not ſo well horſed as Sextus, he could not execute his reſolution; beſides that, the night being come, and Sextus gotten into the Woods, where he found a party of his own that ſtood, having rallyed together to make the retreat with the leſs confuſion, Brutus was forced to be content with the ſight of his enemies blood, and to have forced him to fly: whereupon he returned to that little Fort which he had ſo courageouſly taken in, and into which he got with the firſt. But being come thither, he found himſelf in no leſs danger after he had overcome, than he had been in before to do it; for the enemy was ſtill maſter of the Fort which was at the foot of the mountain, all his infantry was broken, what by the firſt aſſault which had proved ineffectual, what by that wherein he had the advantage, as having been undertaken upon the purſuit of the enemy, ſo that if Tarquin had then fallen upon him with all his Forces, the conquered might have beaten the conquerours.

This generous Roman having all his friends about him, did all a great Captain could do: for though the obſcurity of the night, and the horror that attends darkneſs, made both parties equally afraid of ſurpriſes, yet did he not neglect any thing that could be done. To that end he commands, he acts, and with a diligence equal to his prudence and valor, he gets his foot together, makes his Horſe repaſs the fell'd Trees, fortifies the Fort he had taken, and cauſed a great noiſe to be made by that military harmony, then in uſe among the Romans, purpoſely to let the enemy know, that he was ſtill poſſeſſed of the aſcents he had gotten, ſo to put them into the greater fright.

On the other ſide Valerius, a valiant and prudent man, had made his aſſault on the ſide of that fortification of Trees which defended the valley, which lay between the mountain which was near the Caſtle of Arſia, and that whence Brutus had forced away the enemy. But Tarquin never imagining he ſhould be aſſaulted by that way which Brutus took, his main forces were towards the valley So that Valerius meeting with more oppoſition than he expected, it was not poſſible for him to force the enemy. However, Horatius behaved himſelf very gallantly, all which notwithſtanding, the whole day and part of the night were ſpent in fighting to no purpoſe. Valerius no ſooner took in any Poſt, but the enemy forced him out of it again, inſomuch, that there was one that had been gained and loſt above three ſeveral times during the aſſault.

In the mean time, Brutus underſtanding how things ſtood, prepared with the day to go and facilitate the enterpriſe of Valerius, by marching along the mountains to ſet upon Tarquin in his Camp, hoping to force him to turn all his ſtrength againſt him, and conſequently that being engaged on all ſides, he might conceive the leſs hope of eſcape. For it was unlikely he ſhould make his party good, being ſet upon two ſeveral ways with advantage when he had not been able to avoid being forced into places that ſeemed inacceſſible. So that Brutus expecting with impatience to ſee the firſt rays of the Sun, diſcourſed of the great hopes he was in with his dear friend Herminius, who might well claim a great ſhare of the glory of that day, as well as Themiſtus, Meleagenes, Emilius, Caliantes, Alcimedes, and Liſydas, whom their deſpair had not yet favored with the death they ſo much courted. Octavius and Mutius for their parts, did very great things, though the party they commanded did not acquit it ſelf well at firſt. Perſander and Amilcar had done all that gallant men could do, and Brutus having obſerved the courage of all his friends, conceived ſo great a hope of the Victory, that he made it unqueſtionable.

In

In the mean time Tarquin thought it his safest course to elude the valour of this generous Roman, or at least to defer his misfortune, and so he changed the place of his defeat. For being in that extremity, and perceiving he would be totally routed, if he gave his enemies the leasure to set upon him in the Post, wherein he then was, he took the advantage of the darkness to change it for another. Yet was it not his design to avoid fighting, but only to avoid an assault upon disadvantage. To that end he discamped with incredible diligence, and with such order, and so little noise, that neither Brutus nor Valerius had any notice of his removal; for he had caus'd a party of his to find Valerius play all the night, the better to elude him, and so made so handsome a retreat, that he left not so much as his baggage behind him. So that at the break of day, Brutus and Valerius were both equally astonished to see Tarquin possest of an eminent place at a distance, in the midst of a Plain, between two Mountains: Is it possible, O ye gods, protectors of Rome, cries out Brutus, that a Prince loaden with crimes, should be so prudent and happy! Whereupon, without losing any further time, he marches on with his forces, finds out Valerius, and, the whole Army being joyn'd, makes towards the enemy, to prevent him from fortifying himself. There lay between both Armies a narrow passage, which would admit but one abreast—but Brutus being perswaded that the liberty of Rome depended on a battel, would not give Tarquin the leisure to put himself into such a posture, as that he could not be forc'd to fight. On the other side, Tarquin knowing what importance that narrow place was to him, maintained it with a strange obstinacy. The Prince of Pometia and Prince Titus, though antient friends to the greatest part of their enemies, did things beyond ordinary valour. For Brutus, it cannot be imagined with what earnestness he encouraged his men, as well by words as by example, with what vigor he forced the enemy, and with what courage he was seconded by all the stoutest of his Army. Herminius, Æmilius, and Mutius, adding the sentiments of emulation and jealousie, to those of love and glory, did all that Lovers desirous to be recommended by fame to their Mistriss, could do, nay, all that generous Romans could perform. Horatius, out of love and despair did no less; Amilcar expressed abundance of valour; Octavius, the better to prove his birth, fought like a true Roman; and the three Lovers of Artelisa, did as much as can be imagined they could. But these fighting without minding hazard or advantage, the unfortunate Lisydas was killed, as they passed the narrow place, which Tarquin was at last forced to quit: so that the fierce Tyrant perceiving he could not avoid an engagement, chose rather so to act, as if he had been desirous to fight. To be short, while a party of his Horse relieved those that made good the narrow place, he had put his battel in array; so that though Brutus should have forced him, yet was it his necessary he kept his men from being too forward, least that while he pursued those that retreated, Tarquin might set upon him in disorder. He therefore had no sooner viewed the countenance of the enemy, but giving order that the Troops should rally as soon as they were passed through, he array'd them in sight of the contrary Army; but he did it with such order, that it could hardly be conceived, that those several bodies had past through the narrow place, after a sharp encounter. Now was the fate of Rome in the power of fortune; the two Armies were in a manner equal as to number, the Commanders valiant, the Sun favour'd neither side, the wind was as impartial, and the day was so clear, that Brutus (such a calm was there in his mind) perceiv'd a man on horse-back upon a little mountain on the left hand, who seemed as if he had been desirous to avoid the contrary Army, and to make what haste he could to come to his: for he shewed him to Herminius, not knowing but that it was some body that was to bring him intelligence, or some Officer of Tarquin's that had deserted his party. Valerius that day commanded the right wing, and Brutus the left; opposite to the former were the Veientines, with Prince Titus in the head of them; for Sextus by reason of his wounds came not into the fight; so that Brutus had to deal with the forces of Tarquinia, commanded by the Prince of Pometia. That generous Prince had done all he could to avoid having to do with the brother of the person he lov'd; but things being dispos'd otherwise, by reason of Sextus's wound, he was forced to come against that man, who of all the world was the dearest to Hermilia, excepting himself. For Brutus his thoughts were so taken up with revenge of Lucretia, and the liberty of Rome, that he looked on whatever was in Tarquin's Army, as what he was obliged to destroy. Nor did he appear otherwise in the head of his men, than one whose extraordinary forwardness, seemed to presage victory to those that looked on him.

The two Armies being thus in a posture of fighting, and so near one the other, that it was impossible but they must come to blows. Brutus, though the weather were very fair, heard a thunder-clap on his left hand, which was a happy presage to his Forces; for, according to the observations of the antient Thuscans, Thunder coming on the left hand of an Army ready to fight, was a sign of victory. Brutus therefore making his advantage of so favourable a disposition, as that he then perceived in his Forces, gave order for the charge, and marched on, and all followed, so that that great body, consisting of so many different parties, being animated by the same spirit, came up without the least disorder, within a Darts cast of the enemy. Tarquin on the other side, being in the head of his main battel, advanced towards Brutus, as Brutus did towards him. The first cast of Darts happened at the same time, so that meeting together and crossing, they did less execution than if they had been cast successively. But when that shower of Darts was over, the fight began with the Cavalry, the right wing, which was Valerius's, engag'd with that of Prince Titus, and had at first very much the advantage; and that of Brutus with the Prince of Pometia's.

But Brutus, desirous to shew by his own example, how he should slight death that would carry a victory, advanced twenty paces before with his sword drawn, seeming by a threatning action to challenge him that was in the head of the wing that was opposite to him (though some have interpreted it otherwise.) The Prince of Pometia perceiving the eyes of two great Armies to be upon him, him, turns to a friend of his that knew the affection he bore Herminia, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, May it please the gods, said he to him, that if I cannot overcome without killing Herminia's Brother, that I may not survive the victory. Whereupon that generous Prince being obliged to do what in point of honor he could not avoid, advanced before his forces, as Brutus did before his. So that they had the glory of exchanging the first blows of that bloody battel. But alas, those blows proved fatal to both, since that by a strange destiny, the wounds they gave one the other, prov'd both mortal; for at the same time that Brutus violently made towards the Prince of Pometia, he came as eagerly towards him, and meeting together with equal impetuosity, Brutus, as he run his sword through his enemy, run himself upon his, so that they were both seen to fall together, whereupon follow'd a most cruel fight, between the Tarquinians and the Romans. But to shew how predominant the love of Lucretia, and that of his Countrey was in Brutus's heart; O ye just gods! cry'd he falling, (as one that was near him hath related since) I die satisfied, so Rome be free, and Lucretia revenged.

Herminius extreamly troubled at this accident, caused the body of his illustrious friend to be brought off, to see whether he were quite dead, which perceiving he was, the indignation he conceived thereat, added very much to his ordinary valour, and made him to do things worthy immortal glory. Æmilius and Mutius did also all that persons of Worth and courage could do; but the soldiery disheartened at the death of Brutus, fought at first but very weakly; insomuch that soon after being unwilling to be commanded by Octavius, Mutius, Herminius, or any of the other Chiefs, they began to give ground, and to run away, and that with such confusion one upon another, that the stoutest were forced to go along with the disordered multitude, who despairing of victory, now that Brutus was dead, would by no means fight it out. It was therefore to no purpose, that Caliantes and Alcimedes endeavoured by their example to rally them again; for having no leader they would confide in, they did only what their fear advised them to.

In the mean time though the enemy had lost a valiant Prince, but not so considerable among the Tarquinians, as Brutus was among the Romans, yet not despairing of Victory, they fought courageously; besides that, Tarquin hearing of the death of his Son, came in person to the place, so that the Roman Forces being frightned, never was there a more horrid spectacle; for the Tarquinians dispatched all before them, notwithstanding the opposition of Brutus's illustrious friends. So that though Valerius had had the advantage over the left wing of the enemy, yet was the battel in a fair way to be lost, as to the Romans, when that Horseman that Brutus had seen on the Mountain on the left hand, and who was come into the Plain, came with his sword drawn among the Roman forces. At first was it not known whether he were a friend or an enemy; but it was soon discovered; for having observed the terror the Romans were in, and heard a confused report of Brutus's death; whither run you friends, says he to the frightned Souldiers, whither run you? you must be slaves if you turn not upon the enemy, and you shall be free if you revenge Brutus's death; follow me then, and do but what I shall do before you. Some that heard these words, knowing that he that spoke them was Aronces, whom they had seen do such great actions in the Court of Tarquin's Palace, when he endeavoured the deliverance of Clelia, made a halt, and cried out Aronces, Aronces! Herminius, who strived to rally the Soldiers that run away, turning about at those out-cries, perceived that it was indeed the valiant Aronces, who was putting himself into a posture of fighting. So that crying out with the rest, Aronces, Aronces, the name passed from mouth to mouth, among those scattered forces, who thereupon looking on that Prince as an envoy from heaven, rallied, put themselves in order, and began to fight with a strange earnestness.

Aronces, in the first place killed Helius, with whom he had fought before, near Ardea, and who was one of the chief Commanders of the enemies Army. What added to his ordinary valour, was, that he saw Octavius do things worthy eternal fame; so that looking on him still as his Rival, he endeavoured to exceed him as much in valour as he thought he did in love. He therefore did things beyond description, because they would seem incredible, for he carried terror with him, wherever he made them feel the weight of his Arm. What was yet further remarkable, was, that his presence might be said to have dissolv'd that enchantment that lay upon the valour of the Romans. For at his arrival all the Soldiers were running away, and all those that were truly valiant, endeavoured what they could to rally them together. But Aronces appearing, and dispelling that terror, which the death of Brutus had had them into, there was not a coward left among the Romans. Alcimedes, for his part, did things worthy his great heart, and his despair, but after he had given many their deaths, he received his own from two valiant Tarquinians, that fell upon him both at the same time. 'Tis true, he was soon revenged, for Aronces coming to the place, killed one of them, and made the other fly. Caliantes had near miscarried at the same time, but Mutius killed him that should have killed the other. For Themistus, he behaved himself very gallantly; Meleagnes did no less; Amilcar made it appear, that his courage was equal to his wit; and Herminius and Æmilius, fought as Rivals that would surpass Mutius, revenge Brutus, and deliver Rome. Tarquin on the other side managing his business, as a Prince that wanted neither Prudence nor courage, did all he could to preserve the advantage he had gotten at first over the left wing. So that Aronces met with no small difficulty, though the enemy had lost the greatest part of that confidence, which they had conceived at Brutus's death. Valerius, relieved by the valour of Horatius, Spurius, and divers others, lost nothing of what he had gained, yet could he not so manage his advantages, but that the Victory was still disputable. There was not any one body of either Army, that had not been engaged, so that all was full of blood, horror, and death, but especially the place where Aronces was, as being the most dangerous, and that where was the greatest number of both sides killed. At last, night coming on, added to the horror horror of the day, in regard that neither side being willing to give over, till the victory were compleated, the fight continued notwithstanding the darkness. Never was there seen any thing more dismal, than the end of that bloody day; for there being no distinction between friends and enemies, there was a fearful confusion in both Armies. Both good and bad actions were equally obscured by the night, it could be no longer known who fought well, and who did not; and the Romans, who had been inspired with new courage at the sight of Aronces, lost a part of it when they could no longer discern him. Nor was it to any purpose, that some called him, to see if he would answer, for night being come on, he was not seen after, and the last place his voice had been heard in, was that, where Octavius being still fighting, was very dangerously wounded by a certain man, who being hurt by another, just as he discharged a blow upon him, left his sword in his Arm; so that neither Herminius, nor Amilcar, nor Persander, nor any of his other friends spoke to him, nor knew what was become of him. All the hope they had was, that he would be found in the Camp, when they had made their retreat, and so fought on still on their side, as Valerius, Horatius, and the rest did on theirs.

But as night naturally brings horror with it, and that the objects that appear, seem to be both magnified and multiplied, that confused voices seem more terrible and frightful; and, that no order can be observed, a certain terror equally seized both sides. So that Valerius and Tarquin giving out their several orders for a retreat, the Romans disengag'd as they could from the Tarquinians and the Veientes, and they in like manner got off as they could from the Romans. The desire of retreating being general in both parties, they both left the field to the dead that covered it, and retired with the fatal imagination of being overcome. For there fell so great a number on both sides, that Victory seemed not to be of either. The Tarquinians bewailed the Prince of Pomptia, and the Romans Brutus, as the Father of the Countrey. In the mean time Herminius, who had taken a care of his body, had sent it to the Camp by certain Soldiers at the beginning of the fight. For Octavius, he had courageously caused the sword which was run through his Arm, to be drawn out by Amilcar, who chanced to be near him; nay, Octavius kept it instead of his own that had been broken; whereupon retreating with the rest, he got to the Camp, less troubled for his wounds, which yet was very dangerous, than for Brutus's death.

Now was it that the Romans were more fully sensible of the loss they had received; for there was so great a number of empty Tents, that it was easily seen the number of the dead was very great. That also of the wounded was such, that there were not people enough to dress them. Aronces was not to be heard of by any, which raised some suspicion he might be dead; Horatius was also to seek, and the death of Brutus was so considerable an accident, that all put together, the consternation was general. Valerius, who knew not for certain what posture the enemy was in, was afraid Tarquin might come and set upon him in his Trenches, to compleat the Victory; so that he gave order, that the remainder of his Army, notwithstanding the weariness and the service of the day before, should be in Arms all night; and to give example to others, he went himself round about the Camp. Brutus's body was all this while in the Tent that was his, when living, attended by the same Victors who were wont to accompany him, and divers of his friends bewailing him. Octavius after he had been dress'd in his Tent, was extreamly surprised to find that the sword Amilcar had taken out of his Arm, was not unknown to him, for it was one he had formerly presented Clelius with, and he knew had been afterwards bestowed on Aronces. Amilcar knew it also to be the same, and could not tell what to think of that accident. So that being surprised thereat, they talked of it as a thing they made no secret of, not knowing what to conceive of so odd an adventure, as having not heard how Aronces got out of Tarquinia, or whether it was he that had hurt Octavius, or what was become of him; all they knew was, that when Octavius was hurt, Aronces's voice had been heard very near him, and that afterwards no body knew whither he was gone. For Horatius, some reported he had been heard after the beginning of the retreat, but of that there was no great certainty, and what was out of all doubt was, that he was not to be heard of any more than Aronces; that Brutus was dead, that Lisydas and Alcimedes were so too, that Octavius was dangerously wounded, that a great number, both of the Officery and Soldiery was cut off, and that those that were left were very much disheartened.

In the mean time, the fear the whole Camp was in, made all think it the less difficulty to watch, there being nothing that so much hinders sleeping. Valerius went round the Camp, as I told you, but it was with the greatest affliction he could be capable of, whether as a generous friend, or true Roman, but by that time he came to that side of the Camp, that look'd towards the Forrest of Arsia, it might be about an hour before day. Then was it the Empire of Silence, and the Sky being clear, the night was fair enough and quiet enough. So that Valerius making a halt on a little ascent that was on that side, he hearkened attentively to hear if there were any noise in the field on the enemies side. But it was not long e'r he heard what his whole Camp, as also that of Tarquin, heard as well as himself, and what all posterity hath wondred at since; that is, a miraculous voice, which coming out of the bottom of the Forrest, with a shril noise, uttered these words, very intelligibly to both Armies.

The Romans are victorious, for their enemies have lost one man more than they have, in the battel.

This voice, which both Armies took for that of the Genius of the place, fill'd their minds with a deep respect, and a sacred astonishment. There was also seen a bright and sudden lightening, issue out of the place whence it came, that enlightned the whole Horison on the side of the Roman Camp, so that that miraculous adventure, heightning the courage of the Roman Army, all the Soldiers were so importunate to return to fight, that at the break of day Valerius quitted the Camp, and marched straight to the place where he had left the enemy. But he found him not there, for that prodigious voice having ſtartled Tarquin's Soldiers, he had been forced to diſcamp in all haſte, and to leave his baggage behind him. So that the Roman Army finding the Camp forſaken, enriched it ſelf with the ſpoils thereof, as victorious Valerius would have purſued the enemy, could he have hoped to overtake him; but thinking it better not to hazard any thing, and to make the advantage of his victory with ſafety, he forbore all thoughts of it. When therefore the Soldiers had burthened themſelves with booty, and that he had cauſed all the conſiderable Arms to be taken away, and all the Enſigns, to make his return to Rome the more glorious, he gave order for the funerals of thoſe that died in the field, among whom they found neither Aronces nor Horatius. He took alſo a particular care for thoſe of Liſydas and Alcimedes, whoſe bodies Collatines deſired to have, to beſtow a Monument on them, wherein he pretended he would be e'r long diſpos'd himſelf.

Valerius being returned to his own Camp, heard that Tarquin was retreated towards Veia, whereupon he ſent to Rome the news of his Victory, intending to turn thither the next day to re-inforce his Army, and accordingly take new reſolutions, as alſo to bring thither the body of Brutus. He that Valerius ſent, being come to Rome, they looked in his countenance, to ſee whether he brought good news or bad, and when he told them that the Roman Army had overcome, an exceſſive joy ſpread it ſelf through all their hearts that heard him; but when he afterwards told them, that the Victory had coſt the illuſtrious Brutus's life, and that he dy'd after he had kill'd the Prince of Pometia, the joy was turn'd into grief, and there was ſuch a competition between theſe two contrary ſentiments, that it may be ſaid, that never was victory entertained with ſo many tears. For Brutus was ſo generally looked on, as the deliverer of Rome, that if that miraculous voice, that had declared the Roman Army victorious, had not perſwaded the people that Brutus would ſtill be their protector after his death, all the ſatisfaction of the victory would not have appeaſed them for his loſs. The Roman Ladies expreſſed their particular affliction for his death, for they looked on Brutus, not only as the deliverer of his Countrey, but alſo as the protector of feminine virtue, becauſe of the revenge he had taken for the violence Sextus had done to the admirable Lucretia.

After this Envoy of Valerius was arrived at Rome, came in abundance of wounded men, ſo that Clelia ſoon underſtood that Octavius was hurt, and that, (as it was thought in the Camp) by Aronces, who had been the occaſion of the recovery of the battel. She alſo underſtood at the ſame time, that it was not known what became of him after the fight, no more than it was of Horatius; ſo that ſhe was extreamly troubled at the accident happened to her Brother, as alſo that it was ſuſpected that Aronces had wounded him, and that Aronces was not to be found, though ſhe could not but take ſome comfort in the glory he had acquired, and the ſervice he had done: For Clelius and Sulpitia, as they had a tender affection for Octavius: ſo were they extreamly incenſed againſt Aronces, and would not reflect on any thing that might either clear or excuſe him. For the adventure of the ſword which Clelius had ſometime given him, and had now been taken out of Octavius's arm, ſeem'd to them a circumſtance too full pregnant to be avoided, eſpecially ſince Aronces's voice was heard near Octavius when he was hurt. So that he ſeemed to be ſo exaſperated againſt Aronces, that he did all he could to hinder the ſervice he had done from being publiſh'd at Rome, and prevailed ſo far, that it was neither publickly mentioned in the Senate, nor did Valerius give the people any account of it.

But though the affliction Clelia conceived at theſe accidents, were extraordinary, yet was it not comparable to that of Hermilia, when it was told her, that her Lover and her Brother had killed one the other, as alſo what the Prince of Pometia ſaid, as he advanced towards Brutus, for he whom he ſpoke to, being taken priſoner, had given her an account of it. Valeria was then with her, and alſo Collatina, who hearing that Herminius and Titus had eſcaped, and had acquired great fame, were in a condition to comfort their friend, though they were extreamly troubled for Brutus, and the Prince of Pometia, whom they infinitely eſteemed. But neither their ingratitude, their friendſhip, nor their tears, could appeaſe the cruel affliction of Hermilia. She was at firſt ſo ſurpriſed at that fatal news, that ſhe could neither weep nor ſpeak. Then ſhe looked like one ready to die for grief: but after her firſt ſighs and firſt tears had opened a paſſage for her voice, ſhe uttered ſo many complaints, and ſpoke ſo many paſſionate things, that it would have wrought upon the moſt obdurate hearts. How, ſaid ſhe to her friends, can I, without dying, hear that Brutus hath killed the Prince of Pometia, and that the Prince of Pometia hath killed my Brother? Or can I be Miſtriſs of my own thoughts, as things now ſtand, without thinking on what is baſe and unjuſt; No, no, my dear Valeria, added ſhe, it is impoſſible it ſhould be ſo, but ſince I have loſt thoſe two perſons, who of all the world were the deareſt to me, I muſt needs loſe my glory, and be unjuſt, ungrateful, and unnatural. For when I reflect on the Prince of Pometia, and imagine him dead, I hate him that kill'd him, be he what he will. But when I alſo conſider Brutus, and imagine I ſee him dead, after he had acquired ſo much Fame, the object of my hatred is changed, and I abhor him by whoſe means he loſt his life. So that hating ſometimes the one, ſometimes the other, and yet having a paſſionate affection for both, I ſuffer an affliction that cannot be parallell'd. In the mean time I condemn my own tears, and at the ſame inſtant, that I think it juſt to weep away my life, an imagination comes into me, that I ought not to beſtow my tears on either. For if I bewail Brutus, I bewail him that kill'd the perſon I had the greateſt affection for, and who had no leſs for me: and if I beſtow my tears on that unfortunate Lover, I do it on him that hath deprived me of the moſt illuſtrious Brother that ever Siſter had, and for whom I had the tendereſt friendſhip that nature and virtue can raiſe in the heart of a perſon that can love well. What ſhall I then do, wretch that I am pain? whom shall I blame, whom shall I bemoan, and on whether of the two shall I bestow most tears? You may, in my opinion, saies Valeria, bewail them both innocently, for they had an esteem and respect for one the other, and fortune having disposed them in the head of two contrary Armies, Honor obliged them to fight as if they had not. So that you must not look on them as the occasions of one anothers death; there is a great difference between Battels and single Combats, a man is not at his choice whom to kill; and therefore the only person to be hated is Sextus, as being the cause of the War, and so you are allowed to bemoan your illustrious Brother and Lover.

Ah! my dear Valeria, reply'd she sighing, 'twere in vain to forbid me, for I find, that if death do not suddenly close these eyes, they will be eternally open to tears. No question, Valeria, but I shall ever bewail both my illustrious Brother, and my illustrious Lover; and that I shall ever feel the saddest sentiments that can proceed from an affectionate friendship, and a passionate love, when one hath lost, in so fatal a manner, the objects of both, and cannot accordingly ever after, hope for so much as one moment of pleasure, or one minute of rest. Nay, added this afflicted Beauty, had I lost them by some other way, as that if Spurius had kill'd the unfortunate Prince of Pometia and Tarquin, the unfortunate Brutus, it were some kind of comfort to me to have a horrid aversion for those that had taken away their lives. For hatred is a passion that ecclors and diminishes grief. People send up their imprecations against those that are the cause of it, they endeavour to ruine them, and rejoyce at their death when it happens. But all this is forbidden me, and grief and joy cannot be innocently together in my heart. I can neither love nor hate without a secret remorse, which puts me into a confusion, and without feeling my self seiz'd by a certain fury, whereof I dare not search into the bottom of my soul for the cause, for fear I should find it to be a criminal one. In fine, nature, friendship, love and virtue, furnish me with so many several thoughts, that I think it will cost me the loss of my reason.

While Hermilia strugled with sentiments so sad, so passionate, and so disordered, it was resolv'd in the Senate, that Valerius should be received in triumph; as well to do his valour a justice, as to make the victory of the Roman Army the more remarkable, that the partisans of Tarquin might not weaken the relation of it, by those false reports which they scatter'd among the people. Lucretius and Valerius, as the most considerable of the Senate, omitted nothing that might contribute to the honor of Valerius living, or Brutus dead. The Consul, acquainted with the resolution of the Senate, discamp'd, and caus'd his Army to march back into Rome, in the same order that it had left it. The Lictors with the Ax and Fasces went before him, which was the first time they did it; for that honor was proper only to the first Consul; Valerius march'd in the midst of his Forces, a triumphal Chariot before him, whereon was the body of Brutus, covered with black Tapistry purfled with Gold. And to do him the greater honor, the Body was set upon the richest spoils of the enemy; for there were seen Ensigns starting out on both sides, sumptuous Arms in divers places, and magnificent Bucklers all about. Several prisoners chain'd follow'd the Chariot of the illustrious deceas'd, it being Valerius's design to express thereby, that he only deserved the honor of the triumph.

But it being requisite to infuse courage into the people, Valerius had not any thing of mourning, either in his Arms or his Equipage. On the other side, all the people of Rome went as far as they could to meet Valerius; and the high way as he past along, was all bordered with Tables well furnish'd, whence the people took divers things to present to the Soldiers as they passed by, who yet made no stay to receive them. The way was strew'd with flowers, and the Senate, in Body, met Valerius without the City Gates. All the streets were hung with rich Tapistry, and all the Ladies at the windows to see the solemnity pass by. But after all, notwithstanding those great demonstrations of Victory, the sight of the Chariot, wherein the body of the illustrious Brutus was, caused more tears of grief than of joy to be shed. In the mean time Valerius, according to the pious custom of the Romans, went to the Temple to offer to the gods, the spoils of the enemy, as it were, to acknowledge victory came from them. Which done, having caused the body of Brutus to be placed under a mourning Canopy, in the midst of the spacious place, that was before Jupiter's Temple and put on a black Robe, such as were then worn in publick Mournings, he went up into the place appointed for those who had some Order to communicate to the people, and by that means, as 'tis thought at least, proved the first institutor at Rome, of that laudable custom of making Elogies on illustrious men deceased, a thing in use long before among the Grecians. Valerius therefore being compassed by the Senate, all the persons of quality in Rome, and an innumerable multitude of people, who by an awful silence seemed to expect what he would say to them, began to speak in these terms.

BRUTUS's Funeral Oration.

IT were injustice in me, generous Romans, to enjoy the honor of the victory, without acquainting you, that it is to this illustrious deceased Person that you owe it, and putting you in remembrance of all he hath done for you, that so it may never out of your memory; Give me then leave to entertain you with a slight account of his Life, and so let you know after what manner you ought to bewail your Deliverer. I need say nothing to you of his illustrious birth, you know it as well as I do; nor ſhall I trouble you with any celebrations of the virtue of his Anceſtors, for his own having exceeded theirs, it were unjuſt to derive his praiſe from the Virtues of another. But I beſeech you, Romans, forget not that tedious captivity of Brutus's Reaſon, which is the cauſe of your preſent freedom, and that Rome ſhall never again be a ſlave to the Tyrant's Will. Remember how that he devoted his whole life, to work out your ſafety, that, as ſoon as that favourable conjuncture of time, which he had expected for ſo many years, was come, he employed all his underſtanding, and all his courage, in order to your liberty, and, without minding either his Fortune or his Life, all his endeavours have been only to make you happy, to revenge the virtuous Lucretia, to puniſh the infamous Sextus, and to knock off thoſe ignominious Fetters of Slavery that we had groaned under for ſo long time. He hath knocked them off, Romans, and you ought eternally to look on him as your Deliverer, and have for him the ſame reſpect as you have for the illuſtrious Founder of Rome. Beſides, you are not only obliged to him for all he hath done, to turn Tarquin out of the Throne he had uſurped; all that by his prudence he hath done to unite you, ſince the Tyrant hath ceaſed to be your Maſter; all he hath done in the aſſault of the enemie's Camp, where he expreſſed his valour, after ſo glorious a manner; what he did when he wounded the infamous Sextus, the great actions he was ſeen to do, when he forced that dangerous narrow paſſage, which hindred us from being able to force Tarquin to a Battel; and laſtly, what he hath done ſince in the head of our Forces, and in the ſight of both Armies, when he killed one of the moſt valiant Princes in the world: but you are further obliged to him, for all we have done to gain the victory after his death, ſince we are only feeble imitators of his Virtue. Nay, Rome it ſelf is obliged to him, for all the greatneſs, and all the glory which I foreſee ſhe will arrive to hereafter; and as long as there ſhall be Romans, there will be ungrateful men, if they have not ſuch a veneration for Brutus, as, in ſome ſort, comes near that which they have for the immortal gods. In a word, that prodigious voice, that hath declared us Conquerors, is an infallible preſage to us of the intereſt he hath with the gods. Let us therefore bewail our illuſtrious Deliverer; but, generous Romans, we are not to bewail him as an ordinary perſon. It is not by fruitleſs tears that we muſt expreſs the indignation we are in for his ſake, it is by multiplying our averſion againſt thoſe that are the occaſions of his loſs; 'tis by taking a reſolution to put that deſign in execution, which he had to exterminate the race of the Tarquins, and to dye a thouſand times, rather than enter into ſlavery again. 'Tis thus, Romans, that we muſt expreſs our affliction for the loſs of a man that died ſo gloriouſly, that his Funeral Solemnity is a Triumph: for a man, I ſay, who, for the ſmall time, that he durſt diſcover his Reaſon, hath made it appear, that he was not only free from all Vice, but alſo that he had a prudence equal to his underſtanding, was as eminent for his courage, as his moderation, for his mildneſs, as his conſtancy; had more Virtue than all the Romans put together, and a thouſand times more love for his Country, than he had for himſelf.

While Valerius ſpoke, the people heard him with ſuch an awful ſilence, that it was eaſily ſeen that they were pleaſed with the praiſes of Brutus. He had no ſooner left off ſpeaking, but, though he had forbidden tears, there were heard ſo many cries, and ſo many complaints, and ſuch ſobbing and ſighing, mixt with the acclamations they gave the actions of that illuſtrious deceaſed, and the words of Valerius, that people could not diſtinctly hear one another. But ſince it was a point of prudence not to ſoften the hearts of the people too much by ſo ſad an object; they made what haſte they conveniently could, to give the illuſtrious Brutus the laſt honors he could receive; and by the order of Valerius and the Senate, it was reſolved a Statue ſhould be erected to him at the publique charge, the more to immortalize his glory. And to conclude ſo remakable a day, with ſome expreſſions of joy, Valerius, according to the cuſtom, entertained the moſt conſiderable of the Senate. The next day viſited Brutus's Aunt and Siſter, where he found all the Roman Ladies in Mourning, which they had engaged themſelves not to put off, during the ſpace of one year, ſo to acknowledge, as they ſaid, the obligation their Sex ought to Brutus, who had ſo well revenged the virtuous Lucretia. In a word, there was not a woman in Rome, that mourned not for the death of Brutus, as if he had been her Father. Valerius went alſo to viſit Clelius, who was very much troubled, becauſe of the danger of Otavius's wound, and was ſo much the more, if I may ſo ſay, out of an imagination that Aronces had hurt him, as conceiving him to be ſtill his Rival. There were indeed no infallible proofs of it, but the circumſtances were very pregnant, in ſo much that Clelius being a man of a violent nature, if Horatius had been then at Rome, would have forced Clelia to have preferred him before Aronces. Great then muſt needs be the affliction of that admirable Lady, for ſhe ſaw her Brother in danger, ſhe

she knew not whether Aronces had hurt him, was to learn whether he were living or no; she was troubled even at Horatius's absence, out of a fear, lest he and Aronces might meet together; and no doubt but she suffered all that a person that loves truely, could suffer. Yet was her disquiet encreased three daies after, for not only Octavius grew worse than he had been, but she heard that Zonocrates was newly arrived at Valerius's, and had brought a very sad account of Aronces; so that she felt not only those misfortunes that had already happened to her but was also sensible of all those that might.

To the Right Worſhipful,

The Lady Mary S. Quintin.

MADAM,

Mongſt all the remarkable expreſſions, in which Learned perſons have endeavour'd to ſum up the excellencies of Hiſtory, I know not whether the invention of any was more happy, than his, who term'd it, The Image or Picture of Life, ſince it faithfully repreſents to our eye, all the variety and circumſtances of humane actions, in which our life principally conſiſts. But Hiſtories are like Picture, either drawn according to the reſemblance of ſome real example, or merely made out of the invention of the Writer. To which latter, as a greater meaſure of skill is requir'd, ſo the liberty the Deſigner's Fancy is left to, enables him to make a more exquiſite and perfect Piece, than he could do, if he were confin'd to trace out the lineaments of ſome propoſed pattern; as it is without doubt, poſſible for an Artiſt to pourtray a Piece of more exact ſymmetry and ſhape, than ever was framed by Nature. Nor ought it to ſeem ſtrange, that I in general, give the pre-eminence to theſe Modern fained Stories, above all true (I mean profane,) as well in reference to Profit as Delight. Thoſe we have received from Antiquity, give us ſcarce more than Pourtraits halfe drawn; perhaps they repreſent to us a Conſul, or ſome other great perſon in the Field, and poſſibly give us a little taſte of his abilities in the Senate, but afford us very little knowledge, how generous his deportment was in converſation; and amongſt his Friends, how nobly he loved or hated; and how tender a relation, or faithful friend, he ſhewed himſelf in all the diverſities of adventures: All which, no queſtion, are of great importance to the Reader's improvement and pleaſure, to be handſomely deſcrib'd.

The Piece, Madam, I humbly addreſs to your Ladyſhip, was drawn by an approved Hand, the ſame that made Cyrus Great, and Ibrahim Illuſtrious; and which the moſt intelligent perſons doubt not to commend for a Maſter-piece. I acknowledge it is but a part of a greater Work; yet the ſeveral Hiſtories tranſiently interwoven in the Grand one, are perfect in themſelves; it being the cuſtom of this incomparable Author, contrary to that of moſt others, to perform more than he promiſes in his Title. The main deſign is the relation of the adventures of an excellent Lady, and I could not do her greater juſtice upon her arrival into England, than to recommend her to the protection of one that is ſo too: Which I have reaſon to be aſſur'd, will not be lookt upon as an expreſſion of formal flattery, ſince as many as have the happineſs to know you, eſteem you a Lady of great goodneſs, prudence, and virtue; and ſince your excellent accompliſhments are, notwithſtanding the eminency of your quality, known to more than your perſon. The conſideration of which, principally induc'd me to make this humble dedication, upon confidence, that amongſt ſo many perfections, you could not be averſe to pardon it; though I had together ſome motive of ſelf-intereſt, believing the reſt of the Book would be more acceptable to the Readers, when they met with your name in the beginning of it; and that they would be more favourable to my faults, when they ſaw you had permitted me the honor to ſubſcribe my ſelf,

Madam,

Your Ladyſhips moſt

Humble Servant,

Romane Hiſtory.

The Firſt BOOK.

WHilſt Clelia augmented her ſorrows, by adding the misfortunes ſhe feared to thoſe ſhe already ſuffered; Valerius, who was at that time ſole Conſul, had in his company Herminius, Amilcar, and Zenocrates, who was newly arrived from Cluſium, to inform him of divers important and unwelcome tidings; which when he had delivered diſorderly, in groſs; Valerius deſired him to relate ſomething more particularly. I beſeech you then (replyed Zenocrates) tell me firſt, whether you would have me ſpeak of Tarquinius, Porſenna, and the Princeſs of the Leontines, before I declare what I know concerning Aronces, whoſe deſtiny hath without doubt, been very extraordinary. Aronces is ſo great a Prince, (ſaid Valerius) and ſerved Rome ſo ſignally in the Battel we lately won, and moreover, it is ſo highly important to us, that the King his father be not engaged in the intereſts of the Enemy, that I ſhould be very glad to underſtand, what is become of him. For my own concern (interpoſed Herminius) the affection I have for that Prince, gives me an ardent deſire of learning his condition. And for me, (added Amilcar) having had a longer knowledge of his rare qualities than you, I muſt, without queſtion, love him more, and conſequently have a greater curioſity to learn what betides him, than you can have. It being ſo, (replyed Zenocrates) you may then be pleaſed to know, that towards the end of the Battel, when the fight continued in the darkneſs of the night, wherein Friends and Enemies could not diſtinguiſh one another; and the confuſion was ſo great, that either Party thought themſelves defeated. Aronces having notwithſtanding the darkneſs, purſued ſome of the enemies, paſſed from the Right Wing of your Army to the left; by reaſon they which fled, not knowing whither they fled, by miſtake, directed their way thither, ſuppoſing they were going to joyn with their own Forces. But as ſoon as they perceived their error, they changed the courſe of their Retreat. At which inſtant, Aronces, who knew not that Sextus was no longer in the Battel, thought he underſtood by the voice of one of thoſe he purſued, that he was amongſt them, upon which, his hatred inſpiring him with an ardent deſire of victory, he purſued them more cloſely than before. But being willing to aſſociate ſome other to him, the better to execute his deſign, he began to cry out, Here, Romans, here; here is a Son of Tarquinius, that would ſteal away by favor of the night. Theſe words, which Aronces pronounced very loud, were underſtood by Horatius, who knew not, that his Rival was eſcaped from his Priſon, becauſe he had not ſtirred from the left Wing; and that it was at the Right, where this valiant Prince had fought ſo long, as the day laſted. So that Horatius, without knowing the voice of his Rivall, in as much as it was ſomething altered by agitation and choler; and for that Aronces had uttered but three or four words; haſtned only whither the deſire of vanquiſhing the ſon of Tarquinius called him. Therefore coming up to Aronces, without obſerving who he was, and ſeconding his valor, they both put themſelves upon purſuit of them that retired; who many times making head upon thoſe that chaſed them, teſtified, that they wholly wanted not courage. But as it hapned, unfortunately for Aronces and Horatius, they fell in with a groſs of Horſe of the Veientines; with which the purſued joining, not only ſtopt their courſe, but beſet them round. Whereupon Aronces and Horatius, finding themſelves in this dreadful danger, endeavored to exhort one the other, to ſell their lives to the enemy at a dear rate; by which their ſpeech diſcovered them, and they ſaw, they were more enemies among themſelves, than of thoſe whom they had purſued. Nevertheleſs, the deſire of glory, and the ſenſe of virtue uniting them for the preſent, they exploited things surpassing all belief, and more than once attempted to break through the body that encompassed them. But the horse of Aronces being slain, and his Sword broken with the fall, he was taken prisoner. So that Horatius being then alone in the midst of so many enemies, was constrained to yield to force, although he knew well, that certain death attended him, if he fell into the hands of Tarquinius. Thus these two Rivals saw themselves prisoners of War together, and they were immediately both committed to the custody of the same souldiers: who having seen them fighting on the same side, left them to discourse together what they pleased, without interrupting them. But I shall not detain you with a circumstantial Relation of that Converse, having several things of greater consequence to impart to you. I shall suffice to let you know, that Horatius, as a generous person, remembred in his addressing to Aronces, that he was obliged to him for his life; and that Aronces did not forget his accustomed generosity, when he spake to Horatius. Both of them having observed, by the speech of them to whom they were prisoners, that they were Veientines, they conceived they might not be known, since neither of them had ever been at Veii Nor had they lived long enough in Italy, although they had been there, to believe that these Veientines might have seen them any where else. Upon this persuasion, they mutually engaged not to discover one another, and to endeavor their liberty conjointly, yet without promising to cease their mutual hatred; for there is a feud between them, which in probability cannot be terminated but with their lives. But they which had them in guard, desiring to know what they were, demanded of Aronces, who Horatius was, and of Horatius the same concerning Aronces; conceiving they might draw the truth from them better after this manner than otherwise. Horatius answered them, that Aronces was a Sicilian, that came to Rome since the War. And Aronces told them, that Horatius belonged to the forces of Ardea, which were come to the service of Rome, after Tarquin was constrained to raise his siege. Which accounts being not at all mistrusted, they were guarded without any extraordinary care, and were ordered to march together. For, as these Veientines perceived no more of their own party to come to joyn with them, they determined to make their retreat before the day should appear. Accordingly they took the way to Veii, towards which, all that routed Army was disorderly retired; and they were no sooner at the foot of the Mountain, upon which that famous City is built, but they understood, that the people beholding the Army come back in disorder, and moreover, believing the defeat greater than it was, had tumultuously shut their gates, and declared, that they would not admit the Troops of Tarquin, but only those that had been lent him; adding boldly, that he secretly corresponded with the Romans, to cause them to be cut in pieces. It is true, that the chief of the Veientines, who understood more reason than the affrighted multitude, would have opposed this Sedition, but there was no means of calming it suddainly. So that Tarquin was forced to encamp at the foot of the Mountain, and in the mean while sent to negotiate with those, that had power to appease the incensed multitude. During which, Aronces and Horatius were put together in the same Tent, where they hoped they were unknown, because as I said before, they that guarded them were Veientines. For although indeed, the Citizens would have admitted their own Troops; yet the Governors did not think fit to separate them from those of Tarquin. Thus the whole Army was encamped without the City, and continued there a day and a night, before the tumult was composed. But at length, the Inhabitants of Veii, being by the diligence of those that acted in favor of Tarquin, brought to some accommodement, they determined, in order to their security, and satisfaction of the hatred they bore so many years against the Romans, that Tarquin should deliver into their power all the Prisoners taken in the late Battel. For they were by this time made to apprehend, that the defeat was not so great as had been believed. They Articl'd also, That Tarquin should engage to cause other States to declare for him, and to do it within one month, if he failed, they would desert him, and comply with Rome, if they judged it convenient. These things being thus resolved, Tarquin caused all the Prisoners that were in the several quarters of his Army, to be brought before him, to the end he might himself conduct them to Veii, and they who had this order, went to the Tent where Aronces and Horatius were guarded, who conversed together in the most sad manner in the world: For hating one anothers person, and interest, and their equal generosity not permitting them to quarrel in the condition they were in; the civility of their discourse together, was attended with much sorcedness, and constraint from both. I beseech you (said Aronces to his Rival, when he found opportunity of speaking to him, without danger of other ears) tell me in what condition was Clelia, at the time you departed from Rome, I shall not be more in her affection for this satisfaction, but only something less miserable. Clelia (answered Horatius) is always fair, always charming; and to tell you something more grateful to you, (added he, sighing) always inexorable to the most faithful and most passionate of her Lovers. My absence then (replyed Aronces) hath changed her heart towards me; for, without doubt, she hath no Lover, whose passion can be compared to mine. Had she chosen the most amorous, and not inclined to the most noble person, (answered Horatius) I should possess the place in her heart which you do, and should not be under the unhappiness of being hated by my Mistress, obliged to my Rival, and to esteem him, and have an admiration of his virtue, in spight of the hatred, which the excess of my love produces in me towards him. The cruelty of my destiny (added he) necessitates me to have a new obligation to you every moment that I breathe.

For in brief, you need say no more, but that I am Horatius, to rid your self of a Rival. Since the hatred that Tarquin bears me, is known so generally throughout all Italy, that I should be put into the hands of the most cruel enemy that ever was, at the same instant that you should discover me. Whence it may be said, that I owe my life to you every moment. But as it is in my power to tell who you are, replyed Aronces generously, so is it in yours yours to do the like of me; so that my generosity has in this case no advantage over yours; and I do not put this obligation upon account: No, no, (Horatius replyed with an air sufficiently stern) the matter is not equal between us; for I should most certainly loose my life, if you should discover me; but though I should make you knewn, the interest of Tarquin would restrain him from treating you ill. Ah Horatius, (cryed Aronces) I had rather loose my life as things now stand, than behold my self again under the power of Tarquin; and it would be more grievous to me to be a second time his Prisoner than to be dead; for which reason I earnestly wish to remain a captive amongst the Veientines. Being in this discourse, there came a Guard to fetch and conduct them along to the other Prisoners. They demanded whither they were to be carried; and were answered in general, to Veien; upon which they rejoyced, instead of being afflicted. But when they arrived at the Tent of Tarquin, where there were already about an hundred prisoners, they were strangely surprised, especially when they beheld that fierce Tyrant come out of the Tent to see them pass by, and afterwards to conduct them to Veien. He had not seen Horatius of a long time, who was much changed, both by his Travels and his Melancholly; so that he was not discerned in the croud of prisoners. But it being but a few days since he had seen Aronces, he no sooner cast his eyes upon him, but he knew him; having been informed, in the morning of his escape out of prison. Whereupon, making a great shout, What do I see (said he, hastily approaching to that unhappy Prince) Can it be, that in the midst of my defeat, I should have the satisfaction of seeing the son of Porsenna, in my power? Aronces perceiving that it was impossible for him to be concealled, made up towards Tarquin, and by an act of unparraleld generosity, hid his Rival as he advanced; his great spirit not suffering him to expose the life of so valiant a person to the cruelty of the Tyrant. But as he went forward, he turned his head a short space; and beholding Horatius, and speaking with a low voice, Remember, said he, what I do for you this day, if Fortune ever return you to the sight of Clelia. And then passing on towards Tarquin, who was come near him, without minding any of the other prisoners, it is but too true (said he to him) that I find my self again in your fetters; but not to dissemble, it is not without some consolation, since my Conqueror has been conquered, and I may without vanity believe my self to have contributed something to his defeat. Tarquin observing with what resolutenes Aronces spoke this to him, was thinking to use him as a Rival and an Enemy; but that Policy which had through his whole life given laws to all his passions, restrained his fury, and tempered his answer; being the Son of a King (answered he) for whom I have much esteem, I interpret the peremptorines of your language, as proceeding from your resentment of your captivity; but to testifie to you that Porsenna hinders me from taking notice of the words of Aronces, I declare to you, that I will not treat you as a person whom I have seen on the side of my Rebell-Subjects, with his Sword drawn against me; but as the Son of a great King, to whom I am obliged, and who will assist me to punish the insolence of those for whom you have fought. Then without expecting an answer, he commanded that this Prince should be separated from the other Prisoners, and led into his own Tent, till farther order. After which, he marched in the head of all those Prisoners, and went directly to Veien, being followed by a party of his Troops, which were half Veientines, and half Tarquinians, according as it was resolved before. The people of that City (as the vulgar is only affected with what they see) beholding this train of Prisoners conducted by Tarquin, as if he had been victor, were as forward in receiving him, as they were lately insolent in renouncing and repining against him. Besides, Tarquin diligently causing it to be publisht at the instant, that the Son of the King of Hetruria was in his power, and that Porsenna would infallibly ingage for his interest, it served abundantly to appease the Inhabitants of the City. And moreover, as he is not wont to scruple provoking the gods, he caused it to be given out at Veien, by several of his agents, that the pretended voice which was said to be heard after the battel was a counterfeit, adding also many railleries upon that which this voice had uttered, that there was one fewer dead on the side of the Romans than his. This by degrees brought the people to be more passionate and devoted to him, and so greatly advantaged his affairs, that the next day his Troops were received into Veien. But yet, to win the hearts of the Veientines more, he declared that he nor his would have any share in the Prisoners, whereupon they were divided among the chief of the Veientines, and Horatius became presently a slave to some person at Veien, who knew not what he was. But for Aronces, he was conducted next morning into the City, and put into a Tower, where he was guarded carefully, and yet attended with very great respect. In the mean while Tarquin having been in person at the Council, propounded to send two Veientines, and two of his own, to Porsenna, to desire assistance of him, after having offered to him to restore Aronces into his hands even without any conditions; and accordingly the business was concluded on and dispatched.

But before I proceed farther, I must give you an account of my travels with Artemidorus, you shall know therefore, that we arrived in the evening at Clusium, and without loosing time, knowing that the Princess of the Leontines was lodged in the Kings Palace, we sent a slave, that was sufficiently subtile, to deliver her a Letter from the Prince her Brother, whose hand she immediately knew. But being he intreated her to make a secret of his arrival at Clusium; because if he were known to the Prince of the Leontines, he would be more incensed against him for it; she made no words of it, but only sought out ways how to give audience to that Prince, without giving suspition of what he was. To this end, she writ to him, that he should come the next morning, and walk in a Garden of the Kings without the City, on the side that Porsenna causes his own Tomb to be built, which will be one of the Wonders of the World, when it's finished. You may imagine that we were too precise to fail at this assignation. The hour of which being come, we beheld the Princes of the Leontines enter the Garden, attended only with her own Ladies; but to the end the business might be done with more secrecy, she called but one of them to follow her, and leaving the rest in a spacious walk, came to seek us in an Alley, where she had desired Artemidorus to expect her. For though we had never been before in that Garden, yet she gave us such exact directions what to do, that it was impossible to mistake. I shall not hold you with a particular description of the passionate ness of this interview of the Princess and Artemidorus, nor the circumstances of the goodness wherewith that admirable person was pleased to receive me. For the interests of Artemidorus, those of the Princess and mine, have no relation to those of Rome, I must not mis-imploy my discourse in re-declaring them. But that which I can tell you for the greatest truth, is, that had we been Romans, we could not have spoken more zealously for the interests of Rome than we did. We conjured her that she would please to instruct us of the state of affairs, and assist us to hinder Porsenna from protecting Tarquin, but induce him rather to ingage on the side of Rome. You are not ignorant (said she,) that I am obliged to Porsenna, for affording me a Sanctuary in his Court, and that I have infinite obligations upon me to the Queen of Clusium. For which reason, I declare to you that I can never be capable to do any thing against them, though I understand by what you say, that you have an inclination to serve Rome; I confess likewise to you, that I have a great aversion against Tarquin, and that the case of Lucretia has rendred all the Tarquins detestable to all Women that have any sense of virtue. But to satisfie you in brief, I am and must be for the interests of Porsenna. That which we request of you (replyed Artemidorus) is not repugnant to the interests of the King of Clusium, since we wish that he would embrace the juster cause. I wish it be so (returned this prudent Princess) and I promise you I shall omit nothing in reference to your contentment. The King without question does me the honor to bear me a respect, (added she) but as he does not consult me concerning the management of his State, so it is not immediately with him that I undertake to serve you. Galerita, I am confident hath goodness enough for me, to suffer me to speak any thing to her, and there are few persons of esteem in this Court, with whom I have not some credit. But that which I shall tell you in general, is this, that although Porsenna did not answer punctually to the first proposals made to him, both on the behalf of Tarquin and of Rome, but left things in suspence till he saw the success of the begining of the War; yet I cannot but believe he will declare rather for the weakest than the strongest, and rather for an exiled, though unjust, King, than for an upstart Republick, though those that govern it be persons of great virtue. I do not tell you this (continued the Princess) but from authentick information of them that well know it to be so. Upon this, we imployed all the inducements of reason we could, to confirm the Princess in the purpose she had to serve us; conjoining therewith, to mollifie her more, the interest of Aronces, and his love, and so departed from her, after she had promised to give us occasion of seeing her every day, in some place or other, to the end we might know by her what we were desirous to be informed of. But not to be tedious in inconsiderable particulars, you may know that Artemidorus and I, beheld the arrival of those Agents of Tarquin, and those Veientines, whom Porsenna received with all imaginable joy, when he understood by them that Aronces should be delivered to him as soon as he pleased. Galerita also was highly satisfied with the news, and the whole Court put on the face of gladness. So that (as Joy is a favorable occasion to obtain a thing that is desired) when the Veientines and the Envoys of Tarquin, demanded of Porsenna that he would renew the confederacy he sometimes had with the King of Rome, and the Veientines, and make a League offensive and defensive with them; he did not reject the proposition but only demanded two days to deliberate concerning this important affair. The Princess of the Leontines being a prudent person, and willing to serve Aronces according to his intention, and to comply with the requests of Artemidorus and me, omitted nothing which she judged effective to promote her design. First she congratulated with Galerita for the approaching return of Aronces, and then obligingly testifying to her the interest she had in all that concerned her, she came by degrees to mention the Alliance which was in hand to be renewed.

For my part (said Galerita to her) I confess to you, that if Aronces were not in the hands of Tarquin, I should be perplexed even to despair, to the Kings partaking in the quarrel of a Tyrant, whom the gods seem to have abandoned. But when I consider that the Prince my Son is in his power, and that he offers to deliver him freely, I see not how it can be honorable or even possible to refuse what Tarquin desires of Porsenna. But Madam, (replyed the Princess of the Leontines) it seems to me sufficiently dangerous to ingage in the weakest and unjustest side; and if the King would act without being surprised, he must recover the Prince his Son, out of the hands of Tarquin, without concerning himself in a War wherein he hath nothing to do, and whose success is doubtful. Besides that it would be more glorious to him to bear himself in the quality of being an Umpire in the interests of his Neighbors, than to take part against Rome, which is apparently favoured by the gods. For private persons indeed, it is oftentimes dishonorable to follow fortune, and to rank themselves always on the side of the strongest; but where the publick good is concerned, it is no shame to side with the more fortunate, when it may be done without violating the Law of Nations. So that Porsenna being ingaged to neither party, it seems to me, as I said before, that he need not intermeddle in a War, in which he is unconcerned. The Princess of the Leontines added much other discourse, which I shall forbear to repeat to you, it being enough to let you know, that though Galerita dissented from her at first, yet she brought her at length to be of her opinion. But this was not all; for she convinced some of the principal of that Court, that it would be an important service to Aronces, to hinder Porsenna from embracing the cause of Tarquin. So that considering that Prince, as he that must one day be their King, they resolved to oppose this Alliance, as much as the respect they ought to Porsenna would permit them. At length, Galerita being possessed with the sentiments, wherewith the Princess of the

Leontines had inspired her, obliged a person of chief quality, that was her Creature, to endeavour to oppose the design of Porsenna. To which effect, he declared to the King all the apparent reasons, that might forward his intent: I shall not tell you particularly what they were, because they were almost the same with those I mentioned before, yet he added others with much vehemence, insisting principally upon the unfortunateness and misery of Tarquin. Believe me, Sir, (said this diligent friend) it is sufficiently dangerous to undertake to protect a miserable man, that deserves his misfortunes; especially against a people accustomed to overcome, and whose virtues seems justly to entitle them to the Victory, which they gained over him. Its true, you have formerly been a Confederate of Tarquins, but it was as King of Rome, for that it may be said, you were more confederated with Rome than with him. Ah! Tiburſa, (exclaimed Porſenna) your counſels are alike repugnant to Generosity and to Policy. But Sir, (Tiburſa replyed) does not Policy suggest to overthrow those, whose weakness renders that effect more easily compassable? On the contrary, (said Porſenna) tis more profound Statecraft, to endeavor the subversion of those, who may attain to the power of overtopping and subduing us; and for this cause it is more important, to the greatness of Hetruria, that Rome grow not upon that pretence, to be formidable to her neighbors; and lay a bad officiousness to assist to the making of Slaves, that will in time cut our own throats. For though you should overcome in this War, (answered Tiburſa) the advantage of the victory will not redound to you, but to Tarquin, who shall be restored by your arms to his Throne; for knowing the greatness of your Soul, in case you be victor, your generosity will induce you to return the Scepter into his hands, and so you will always have a potent neighbor. 'Tis true, (replyed Porſenna) but will be a neighbor engaged to my interests, by his own. Besides, that when the war shall have exhausted Rome, both of Soldiers and Treasure, he will not be so considerably dreadful to me, as Rome would be, if I should desert Tarquin. For in truth it is no false conclusion, that as there are natural aversions between certain persons, so there is also a kind of latent hatred between Commonwealths and Monarchies. On the other side, (said Tiburſa) I conceive, the people do generally desire that which they have not; and commonly every private person affects to live under that sort of government, of which he has no experience, imagining it more pleasing, than that under which he was born. But you mistake me, (interposed Porſenna) for what I said had no relation to the multitude, but to them that manage the Government. And moreover, not to dissemble, an unfortunate King ought to excite pitty in the breast of all Kings. And since the case is, concerning Sovereign Authority, I conceive, every Sovereign ought to interest himself in behalf of him, whom prophane hands attempt to deprive of Royalty. 'Tis to me an inviolable Position, that a Brother is less obliged to assist his Brother, than one King to assist another, that wages War against his Subjects, that have expelled him. But Tarquin is a Tyrant (replyed Tiburſa.) Tarquin is a violent man, (answered Porſenna) but fortune having given him the possession of a Kingdom, which he enjoyed for a long time peaceably, and with much glory, It belongs not to me to judge of his right to the Throne of Romulus, but it does to restore him to it. And though Tarquin be so notorious a Criminal, yet do not you see, that he has the satisfaction of beholding the destruction of the most virtuous of all men, as a justice upon him for overturning his Throne. For 'tis not to be doubted, but this was the cause of Brutus's death; Collatinus also was, without dispute, expelled Rome for the same reason. And if Tarquin has not had the advantage hitherto, 'tis assuredly, because the gods are pleased, a King should have the glory of rendring the Scepter into his hands. Do not you consider (added he) that if I suffer the Government of Rome to be changed, my State will be environed amongst several Common-wealths, who will confederate together to destroy me, upon the first occasion that fortune shall present them with? 'Tis better therefore to do a generous and illustrious action, since I apprehend in it both glory and advantage. Besides that, as often as I call to mind my Sons fondness, in loving a simple Roman Girle, and his weakness in intending to marry her without my allowance; I find a new cause to hate Rome. And then with what face can I demand my Son, and deny assistance to those that return him to me? No, no, Tiburſa (continued he) I cannot change my purpose. And according to my present sentiments, I hold it more glorious to recover, and restore a Kingdom, than to conquer one, and keep it. Therefore, no longer oppose an immutable determination but prepare your self to help me to overcome. But Sir, (answered Tiburſa) what will the censure of the World be, when they behold a King so accomplished in virtue, undertake the protection of Princes so vitious? Misery (replyed Porſenna) obliterates all the vices of Kings; and when they become unhappy, the resentment of their condition, must take off all aversion of their faults; otherwise dangerous consequences would attend Soveraigns, who to speak freely, are sometimes less virtuous, than most of their Subjects. To conclude, Tiburſa, policy and glory incite me, to do what I have resolved upon, and therefore I conjure you, speak no more to me of it. Upon this Tiburſa was constrained to be silent, and to report to Otterita, that Porſenna was determined to protect Tarquin, and to joyn with him and the Veientines, in carrying on the War against Rome. And Porſenna having accordingly given a favorable answer to the Envoys of Tarquin, and the Veientines, two of them departed to carry this great news to the Tyrant, and to fetch Aronces. Upon whose return, Tarquin intending to expedite the business, immediately gave order, that Aronces should be safely conducted from Veii to Clusium, and commanded five hundred of the Veientine Cavalry to guard him thither. In the mean time, the Princess of the Leontines advertising us of the state of affairs, after many unprofitable contrivances of ways, to obstruct the design of Porſenna; it was concluded that Artemidorus should abide at Clusium, to the end he might endeavor to serve Aronces, when he should be arrived there; and that I should come to inform you, of what passed in that Court. But there is one thing strange, that Porſenna, instead of causing an apartment in his Palace to be made ready, for the reception of the Prince his Son, has commanded the Garrison to be redoubled in the Castle of the Isle of Saule, which is in the middle of the Lake of Thrasymene, where Galerita was heretofore a long time Prisoner, intending to keep his Son there as soon as he is arrived: so that it may seem, he is like only to change his prison, and have the grief of being a captive in the same place where he was born. Its true, his life will be safe; for tis presumed, that he will be confined only; because having once departed from Clusium, Porsenna fears, left his love should oblige him to do the like again. But in conclusion, to abridge my discourse, you may know, that the day of my departure being prefixed, I left Clusium accordingly to come hither. Scarce had I travelled six miles, but crossing a Wood, I met with the party of Veientine Horse which conducted Aronces, and I saw Aronces himself, who while something was redressing about his horses bridle, was alighted and walking in a musing manner. But when some of them came near and stopt me, I quitted my Roman speech (which I have pure enough, when I am minded to use it) and told them I was a stranger, and being of neither party was travelling through all Italy. This I spoke so loud, that Aronces hearing it, knew me, though I also somewhat disguised my voice; but because he judged by what I said, that it was not fit he should appear to know me, under the pretext of trying, whether he could still speak the Language of the Country, of which he said, he understood I was, and began to speak to me in my natural Language, which he did extreamly well. So that being assured by him, that the Veientines which encompassed him, were people not skilled in a strange Tongue, he told me what had happened to him. He enquired of me news concerning Clelia, all his friends, and Celer, whom he had left in prison by the Tarquins. After which I acquainted him with the resolutions of the King his father, at which he was much troubled. He charged me to assure you, and all his friends likewise, of the continuation of his friendship, and Clelia of his constancy. And then being obliged to remount his Horse, I beheld him depart with sorrow, observing an infinite discontent in his eyes, and took the way of Rome, where I am haply arrived, with intention of returning to the Princess of the Leontines, to do you all the service that I shall be able if you judge it fit. I was always of belief, (said Valerius) that Porsenna would assist Tarquin. And I ever thought, (added Herminius) that it would be a harder task to destroy that Prince than was imagined. As for me, (interposed Amilcar) I never trouble my self with foreseeing events too remote; for usually, fortune makes a mockery of humane providence; she brings that about, which was never thought of; and that which was confidently designed, sometimes never comes to pass at all. 'Tis better therefore to be prudently attentive to the affairs before us, and without hope or fear, to expect the future, with a resolution incapable of being shaken by any sort of accidents whatsoever. For though I deem it good, not to foresee any with perplexity; yet I account it very important, to have ones mind prepared against all adventures, that so it may be surprised with nothing.

To begin to put Amilcars advice in practice, (answered Valerius) it is requisite to avoid expressing to the people, any fear of Porsenna, when they come to know, that he undertakes the quarrel of Tarquin, for which reason, we must dextrously conceal a part of the extream sorrow, which we resent for the death of Brutus, and indeavor to infuse a kind of confidence into the peoples minds, which may serve to them as a presage of victory. And indeed Valerius, who had began to build a stately house upon the Mount Velia, encreased the number of his workmen that were about it, that it might appear he did not fear the success of the War, seeing he employed himself about a business that requires plenty and peace. He contrived also, for the same reason, to institute the Plays, called the Secular Plays, because they were celebrated but once in an Age, conceiving that these several devices would have a good effect, both amongst the Romans, and amongst the enemies. Zenocrates, mean while leaving Valerius, accompanied with Amilcar and Herminius, went to visit Sulpitia, who was at that time with Octavius, where Clelia was also: To whom after some little time, he addressed (for Octavius being too sick, permitted him not to be spoken to) and represented to her all the obliging blandishments, which that Prince had encharg'd him with. He informed her, that Horatius was at Ilerii, and Aronces at Clusium, that the first of them was slave to a Veientine, and the other prisoner in the Isle of Saule. Whereby Clelia being a person of a most extraordinary capacity, well understood the unpleasing consequences, to which this adventure would expose her. Yet she had some consolation, that Horatius, was separated from her. But being endued with a rare generosity, notwithstanding the tenderness she had for Aronces, she thought she offended against the obligements of honor, to what Zenocrates related of that Prince, before she were satisfied of her doubting, whether it was he that had wounded Octavius. So that she changed colour, and durst scarce enquire any thing of Zenocrates, how ardently desirous soever she was to do so. But Octavius, overhearing some part of Zenocrates's discourse to Clelia, though he spoke sufficiently low, and notwithstanding his sickness taking notice of the sentiments of this virtuous Lady, No, no, Sister (said he generously with a low voice) do not fear to inform your self of Aronces, if the wound which I have received was given me by his hand, he is not culpable for it to Octavius, but it is the Prince of Numidia that was hurt by him; 'tis his Rival, and not your Brother: and if Clelius were of my opinion, he should not hate Aronces for it, though it should prove fatal to me. What you say is so generous and noble (cryed Herminius that heard him) that I assure my self the gods will preserve the life of a person that retains equity in an occasion wherein it is sufficiently difficult to be equitable. Clelia was glad that Herminius had answered him, because being very discreet, it would have been something troublesome to her to have answered in a way wholly to her own content. But it behoved her to interpose something, had not Clelius entered into the room, whose presence altered the discourse. This afflicted Father having first demanded of his Son how he found himself, turned to Zenocrates, to enquire of him what news he had brought. Zenocrates

Aronces, who now understood that 'twas believed Aronces had wounded Ottavius, and that Clelius had told him for it, without considering that if he did it, it was innocently, found himself extreamly perplexed. Nevertheless, he told him what obliging speeches that Prince had commanded him to express in his ear to him and Clelia, that so he might intimate to him, that Aronces was not so conscious to himself of having done any thing against him. How Zenocrates? (cryed Clelius) I will hear nothing from a man that has dyed the Sword which I had given him, in the blood of my Son, and should he have wounded him as his Rival, yet I will never see him during my life; and therefore I am glad he is not in a possibility of returning to Rome; for I should forbid him my house in case he should come again to the City. Clelia with unspeakable grief heard what her Father said; Sulpitia, knowing the humor of Clelius, presumed not to oppose him therein; and Ottavius being turned towards the other side, after he had expressed himself so generously, heard no more what was spoken in his chamber. But that which compleated the sorrow both of Sulpitia and Clelia, was, that Clelius no sooner understood that Horatius was prisoner at Veii, but he declared he would endeavor to deliver him by the assistance of an illustrious Veientine, that was one of his ancient friends. Being Horatius was a brave person, and one that might be very serviceable for supporting the Liberty of Rome, neither Herminius nor Amilcar, nor Zenocrates contradicted his intention, as indeed they could not with honor do, though they were Aronces friends. So that there was none but Sulpitia and Clelia, who testifyed enough by their silence, that the liberty of Horatius, was not the object of their wishes. But the visit of Zenocrates being at length ended, he and his two friends went to spend the remainder of the day with Valeria, with whom they found Collatina, Cesonia and Plotina, for as for Hermilla, she was continually so afflicted, that she vouchsafed not to see any person whatsoever. Zenocrates addressing to Plotina, asked of her, what news there was since his departure. I assure you, (said she to him) I know none worthy your knowledge, but only that Spurius who is the most vindicative person living has lately renewed his friendship to Valeria, only because he hates his Rivals, and would do them all the injury he is able; at least I have heard so this day from one of his friends. But is it not he (replyed Zenocrates) that sometimes counselled Mutius to become a Lover of Valeria? Yes (answered Plotina, pleasantly) but being he sees Mutius, does not endear himself, and cannot dispossess Herminius out of the heart of Valeria, and that Amilius also is more interessed in her favor than he, he is so resolved to attempt that glorious adventure once again. So that Valeria has now four Lovers at once. In good time (said Valeria) who overheard this discourse of Plotina to Zenocrates, (though she spoke not very lowd) but I had almost as good have four Enemies. You do well (replyed Plotina) to make use of the word [Almost] in this occasion; for I am confident, there is at least one of the four, which you would not have to hate you. I confess it (answered she) but to speak sincerely, I account nothing more vexatious, than to be obstinately beloved by persons that I can never affect. I know many Dames interposed Amilcar, (who was discoursing with Herminius and Collatius) that are not of your humor and who esteem it an extraordinary delectation to be followed by a crowd of Suppliants, for whom notwithstanding they have no particular affection. As Herminius, was ingaging himself in this conversation, Themistus and Meleagenes came into the room, who appearing more sad than ordinary, gave occasion to Valeria, to enquire the cause of their discontentment. I deplore the death of so honorable a person (answered Themistus) that I cannot but require some lamentations of him from you, and especially from Amilcar, to whom he was well known at Syracuse. And I am confident (added he) that though you never saw but only the portraiture of him that was shewn you when you had the curiosity to know my adventures, yet you will not cease to bewail him. Oh good Gods! (cryed Amilcar) let me not hear that Meriander is dead, for I should resent it most passionately. I am sorry (replyed Themistus) that I must impart that grief to you; but it is too true that the illustrious Meriander is no longer amongst the living, but left the world three days since. How! (replyed Valeria) he that had all good qualities, none bad; who was both gallant and prudent, who knew all things of excellence, loved all noble acts, passionately affected Musick, that loved the whole World, that was so acceptable in it, so sincere, so faithful a friend, so constant and so generous, does he no longer live? He does not most certainly (answered Themistus) and the pensive Meriganes, who arrived yesterday in the evening, tells me Meriander hath been universally bewailed, as never any before in the Court of Syracuse. Not one Beauty but has lamented his fate, nor man of quality, but expressed their resentment with sighs and complaints: those that excel in any good Arts do almost abandon them, since he is no longer their Protector, and in brief, all the World deplores him as a person that could alone introduce civility, virtue, and gallantry into the Court, and serve for a model to those that propose to themselves the perfection of honorable persons. I assure you, (replyed Herminius) such as have all the rare qualities Meriander was owner of, cannot be sufficiently regretted; and if Amilcar would acquit himself well, he should compose an Epitaph worthy of his own Wit, and the merit of the illustrious Deceased. I protest to you (said Amilcar hastily) that I would have one made, but I must withall declare to you, that I will not be the Author; for in short, this kind of composure is the rack of good Wits, and I know nothing more difficult to make well. Yet I believe the cause why so few Epitaphs please those that read them, is, that generally praises and sadness are displeasing to almost all the World. So that all Epitaphs that are composed, being sad, and usually full of commendations, it is hard to please and gain approbation. Besides that, to speak judiciously, it being requisite that an Epitaph be short and clear, and exactly congruous to the person for whom it is intended, that it be between a plain Inscription and an Elogium, that there be some touch of Morality by the way, and that it excite tenderness and compassion, it is not much to be wondered at, that there be so few well made. Moreover, I assure you, that unless some Burlesque or

Feſtivous Epitaphs, I have not ſeen many excellent; for they are uſually too plain, or too eloquent; Thoſe that expreſs too little, ſtop paſſengers for nothing; thoſe that are too long, and have more words than matter, make them loſe too much time; thoſe which commend exceſſively, give occaſion of contradiction and calumnies againſt the dead, and the perſon that commends him; and thoſe which do not extoll at all, when they are intended of people that merit to be praiſed, excite generous Readers to indignation and choler.

Wherefore I conclude, that it is not fit to adventure lightly to make Epitaphs; and I cannot reſolve to make one for the noble Meriander, though his memory be very dear to me. Then Valeria demanded of Themiſtus, whether Merigenes was ſent to him by the Princeſs Lindamira. I am not ſo happy (anſwered he) but Merigenes being much my friend, thought meet to come and adverti ſe me, that he underſtood the young Prince of Meſſene was gone into Italy. 'Tis true, I received news by him of Lindamira, which gave me great ſatisfaction; and had not he inform'd me of the death of the generous Meriander, the intelligence brought me of the voyage of the Prince of Meſſena, would not have much troubled me. But by what I underſtand, (ſaid Plotina) you and Merigenes have interchanged ſighs for ſighs; for if he acquainted you with the death of Meriander, you have informed him of that of Liſydas and Alcimedes. In truth (anſwered Themiſtus) he much deplored their fates. But I muſt tell you (interpos'd Amilcar) that ſorrow of this nature is a thing very unprofitable, at leaſt to the perſons lamented; for to thoſe that expreſs it, it is honorable, making them eſteemed compaſſionate and conſtant, and gains them the reputation of bearing their friendſhip beyond the Urne, But to ſpeak unfeignedly, there is nothing more rare than true grief. I muſt confeſs (added Plotina) I am of Amilcar's opinion, and believe that there are feigned tears, tears of cuſtom, and tears of decorum. For my part, (ſaid Amilcar) I remember I ſaw a very excellent perſon dye at Carthage, who was not griev'd for by half thoſe that lamented him. But can one lament without grief (ſaid Valeria?) I could not do it, for my part (ſaid Collatina.) I have ſeen it done more than once (replied Amilcar) and if you would obſerve the general practiſe of the world, you would be of the ſame belief with me. For when people behold the death of ſome one, whom they conceive themſelves oblig'd to ſorrow for, they bewail him, and extoll him, and make ſhew of going to condole with, and comfort his Relations; but in the mean while, if during the viſit, ſome one in the company relate ſome pleaſant ſtory, it is liſtned to, paraphras'd on, and laught at; after which, the mourners walk abroad, make viſits, and are altogether after their ordinary manner, till beholding the particular friends or kindred of the deceaſed, their tears are renewed, and their ſighs and melancholly acted over again. And becauſe when this is paſt, he is never ſpoken nor thought of more; I cannot but believe that they which do things that have ſo little affinity with grief, can have no true grief at all. For to return to that perſon of great worth, whom I beheld die at Carthage, and who was ſo much regretted, I aſſure you I ſaw Women, who were ſcarce known to him in his life, out of vanity, and to make it believ'd he was their great friend, that habited themſelves careleſſy for two or three daies, and went from houſe to houſe, asking if they did lament him; ſpeaking of him with a certain familiarity, full of tenderneſs, ſufficient to deceive ſuch as had not the ſpirit of diſcernment, which is ſo neceſſary to live well in the world. And which was rare, theſe fair Mourners, the ſame day they ſpoke thus pitiouſly, went at evening to hear Muſick, and to make Collations and Revels. They pretended indeed, that they went thither only to divert their mind from their ſorrow; for truly (ſaid they, with a languiſhing voice) ſhould not we ſee ſome body and conſtrain our ſelves, we ſhould die of grief. And will not you now conſent with me, that griefs are ſometimes very ſuſpitious, and ſeldom true; and that to ſpeak things as they are, there is as little true Grief, as there is true friendſhip. The meaſure of the one (anſwer'd Herminius) is without doubt the meaſure of the other, for only their loſs is much reſented, who were much belov'd; but above all, there is nothing more excellent than to preſeve the memory of ones friends. I intend not to ſpeak of thoſe mournings, which do nothing but pour forth ſtreams of tears, which are rather an effect of the weakneſs of their reaſon that ſhed them, than of the exceſs of their regret: But I mean them that retain a long and prudent ſorrow, who during their whole life, do all they are able to do for their dead friends, in the condition they are in; that is, by ſpeaking alwaies of them with eſteem, defending their paſt actions with zeal, ſerving them whom they would have ſerv'd, had they liv'd; loving thoſe whom they lov'd, and never forgetting them. That which you ſay (replied Plotina) is, without doubt, very excellent; but if there are few people, that can deplore their friends in this manner, there are few friends that deſerve to be lamented ſo. All the company aſſenting to the opinion of Plotina, ſhe took leave of them, becauſe it was now very late. The next day Valerius, in order to executing the deſign he had, to intimate to the people, that he did not miſdoubt the ſucceſs of the War; after he came out of the Senate, went to ſee his workmen, which he employ'd in finiſhing his houſe on the Mount Velia, where he dwelt already; for there was more than half of it compleated. And to execute his purpoſe, he added half as many more to the workmen, that had hitherto laboured in his ſtructure. So that there was ſeen nothing but burthened ſlaves along the way leading to it, going and coming continually, to carry things neceſſary to the builders. Valerius alſo judg'd it not fit, in the conjuncture of affairs, to motion ſo ſoon the election of a new Conſul, in the place of the illuſtrious Brutus, for fear leſt giving an occaſion of a conteſt in the Senate, there might be ſome commotion, which might be attended with dangerous conſequences, when it ſhould come to be known, that Porſenna protected Tarquin. He adviſed with the moſt prudent of thoſe, that underſtood affairs, and did nothing but what they counſelled him to. But as the rules of prudence can never be infallible, when the deliberation is concerning what the people will, or will not do; the wiſdom and virtue of Valerius were not powerful enough to hinder, but that what what he did with the best and most innocent intention in the world, was interpreted to his disadvantage. Within five or six daies after the arrival of Xenocrates, the news of the return of Aronces to Clusium, and the alliance of Tarquin with the King of Etruria, was known by all the people; who, instead of taking heart from the tranquillity that appear'd in the mind of Valerius, and the several Orders he had given, that the forces should be in an expedite condition, began to repine very loudly. 'Tis true, some of Tarquin's creatures served secretly to irritate the minds of the multitude. Some said, 'twas easie to observe, that Valerius minded himself more than the publick good, in that he built so magnificent a House, in a time, wherein the new-born Republick stood in need that all the Romans should contribute a part of their Estates, towards sustaining the charge of the War. Others, That it appear'd enough, that he hated the King more than Royalty, since it appear'd he had a design of reigning like a Sovereign, in that he spoke nothing of making an election of another Consul, and that he caused more than ordinary diligence and haste to be used about a house, which might become an impregnable Citadel, when he would fortifie it, by reason of its advantageous situation. In fine, said these Mutineers, What serves it to commend Brutus, and yet imitate Tarquin? to speak of Liberty, and yet aspire to Tyranny? So that within four or five days, a great part of the people began to believe, that Valerius aspir'd to make himself King.

At first, all his friends did what they could to undeceive them; but the more they spoke, the less they were believed, and came themselves to be suspected of intending to be subservient to his ambition, out of hopes to be rewarded for it. Thus was the most virtuous of men suspected of intentions to betray his Countrey, and not to have expelled a Tyrant, but only to be Tyrant himself. This troublesome rumour afflicted Valerius very sensibly, when Herminius gave him notice of it; for he was not of those people, who content themselves with being virtuous, without care to appear so. Besides, should there have happened a sedition in Rome at that time, the safety of the Commonwealth had been greatly endangered. Part of his friends were of advice, that he should severely punish some of those, that had the boldness to suspect him so unjustly, to the end, others might be restrained by that example. The gods defend (answered Valerius to them that gave him this counsel) that, to secure my self from the suspition of attempting to be a Tyrant, I should commit an action that approaches near to Tyranny; for should I do it, the people would be incens'd, I should accuse instead of justifying my self, and I should expose Rome to return to her late servitude. Wherefore I resolve upon another proceeding, which perhaps will succeed better. And accordingly Valerius, without imparting his design to any but Herminius, who commended him highly for taking up so generous a resolution, caused the people to be assembled the day following in the spacious Court, where he was wont to speak in publick, when some important affair was in hand, to which the suffrages of the people were necessary. As their minds now were ill pre-disposed, part of the multitude believ'd, that Valerius caused the people to be assembled, only to make some unjust proposal to them. But when the place was full, all the Mutineers were astonished, when they observ'd the Consul, at his approach to the Tribunal where he was to speak, commanded the Axes, and the Fasces of Rods, which were the marks of Sovereign power, to be held downwards, intimating by this submissive action, that he acknowledged the power of the people to be above his own; a proceeding so remote from Tyranny, pleasingly astonished this multitude, who could not contain themselves from testifying their approbation of the fact with shouts and acclamations of joy. But at last, silence being commanded, Valerius beholding so favourable a beginning, lift up his eyes towards Heaven, and entring upon his Oration, with all the boldness that innocence inspires them with, who are accus'd unjustly; I wish (said he) O Romans; it had been the pleasure of the gods, that I had undergone the destiny of Brutus in the last Battel, and obtain'd the same glory with him, of dying in defence of my Countreys Liberty, that so I might have escap'd the misfortune, of being unjustly suspected of the most horrible of all crimes, and that by them, for whose sakes I would have sacrificed my dearest bloud. Is it possible, O Romans, that no virtue can be pure enough to restrain you from suspecting it? Is it possible, I say, that I, who have ever been a declared enemy of the Tyrant and Tyranny, should be accus'd of aspiring to the Soveraign Power? How? No, no; I could never have imagin'd it, but should have believ'd on the contrary, that though I had been possest of the Capitol, it could never have been fear'd I pretended to the Royalty. But, as I perceive, all my fore-past management, and all my services, have not been able to hinder you from blotting and traducing my reputation: For it seems, upon the lightest pretext in the world, you accuse me with unparall'eld injustice, of the greatest of all crimes. Is it just, O ye inconsiderate Romans, (continued he) that ye should judge rather of me, by the place where I dwell, than by what I am my self? But since the matter is so, I declare to you, unjust Romans, that the house of Valerius shall never more cause umbrage to the City of Rome; and as it is easier to pull down than to build up, you shall soon see the ruines of my house to justifie my innocence. The Mount Velia shall be free for those that please to dwell there; and to testifie yet more submission, I shall begin to rebuild at the foot of that Mountain, if you please to assigne me a place, to the end those suspitious Citizens, who accuse me so lightly, may dwell in a higher seat than my self; for I consent, that they, in whom more confidence is put, than in Valerius, for the liberty of his Countrey, may build their houses in the same place, where he newly demolish'd his. And accordingly while Valerius was speaking this, the great number of workmen which he had employed some daies before to build that magnificent structure, by the order of Valerius, pull'd it down with so speedy diligence, that it was absolutely raz'd before the day was done: And the first Consul, who had contributed so much to the liberty of Rome, saw himself constrained to go and lodge with one of his friends. Which great and unparallel'd deed having fully justifi'd Valerius, the same people that before murmur'd so much against him, conspir'd all with one voice to stile him Publicola, denoting by this name they gave him, his yielding and submissiveness missiveness to the people. Whence after this famous day, this Consul was no longer called Valerius, but the appellation of Publicola remain'd upon him for ever. Himself was also glad that it continued to him, in regard the people could never name him, without remembring the cause for which they term'd him so, whereby he gain'd a greater stock of credit for the good of the Common-wealth. Four or five days after, to confirm the good opinion given of him, it was proceeded to election of a new Consul; and Spurius Lucretius, Father of the admirable and unfortunate Lucretia, was chosen in the place of Brutus; for being much elder than Valerius, whom I shall hereafter call Publicola, this virtuous Consul was willing Lucretius should have the precedence, and all the honours of the Consulship. But being desirous to gain the people more powerfully, during those four or five days that he was alone, he made several Constitutions, which were very favourable and advantageous to them. He plac'd several virtuous persons in the Senate, in the room of those that were slain in the last battel. He caus'd a publick Oath to be renewed, making it Treason in any that should dare to propose the changing of the Government; He decreed that Criminals condemned, might appeal to the people; He discharged the poor from contributing to the expence of the War; He enacted, None should be entrusted in any charge, but by the consent of the people: He also caus'd the Axes to be separated from the Fasces, and moreover constituted that what he had done the last time he spoke to the people, should be a president for the future, that is, that the Fasces should be held downwards as often as the people were assembled together. Thus, in seeming to lose a part of his power, this prudent Roman augmented his authority. That which much affected the people, was, the beholding Valerius; and all his family, enforc'd to sojourn at the House of Racilia, till he had one provided of his own. The noble-minded Sivelia did not omit in this occasion, to offer hers to this virtuous Consul; but he wav'd the acceptation of it, by reason of Herminius's love to Valeria, and chose rather the same Lodgings which had formerly entertained the illustrious Brutus. Mean time, though these late transactions greatly took up those, who judg'd themselves interessed in the good of the Re-publick, Clelius, in the prejudice he had against Aronces, fail'd not to take care for Horatius, and sent secretly to Veii, to procure his deliverance; which soon after became more easie for him to effect, by reason of the death of Spurius Lucretius, which happened eight daies after he was created Consul. For an Uncle of Horatius's, who was also of the Family of those first Horatii, whose Combat is so celebrated, succeeded in his place, and assisted Clelius much, in contriving ways to bring about his return to Rome. While matters were at this pass, Clelia was possessed with extream sorrow, the weakness of Ollavius encreased; she apprehended Aronces going to engage on his Fathers side, which he could not avoid with honor; for he must either remain a prisoner, or become an enemy to Rome. Besides, she was almost certain, Horatius would return speedily; she beheld one of his Relations in Authority; her Father passionately inclin'd to his alliance; and in brief, she could foresee nothing but perplexity and disquiet; and this brought her into a strange melancholly; yet though she was something pale, and extreamly sad, she was, notwithstanding, always the most beautiful person in the world. All the Ladies her friends, visited her very frequently, and Valeria among the rest, made it almost her business to comfort the afflicted Ladies; for she was almost ever with Hermilia, or Collatina, or Clelia. But by reason Plotina and Amilcar had a certain genius of pleasantness, which could not long consist with melancholly, the converse was always very agreeable at Cesonia's house, whither generally persons of quality resorted more than usual, after Sulpitia was become a Mourner, and Valeria liv'd at the house of Racilia. So that there was scarce a day, but Themistus, Meleagenes, Xenocrates, Herminius, Mulius, Æmilius, Spurius, Amilcar, and several others went thither, where there were also many noble and beautiful Ladies. But as the conversations which are made amongst choice persons, whose number is not over great, are the most pleasing of all, there happened one in the chamber of Plotina one day, which was very divertising, and pass'd only betwixt that charming Lady Cesonia, Amilcar, Æmilius, and Herminius; the cause of it was sufficiently sad, for coming to speak of Clelia and Aronces, they resented their conditions with compassion, and foreseeing all the mischiefs which in probability would betide them, they entertain'd themselves at first after a very melancholly manner. But Amilcar not being able to talk long upon sorrowful subjects, without conforming them to his own humour; It must be confess'd (said he on a sudden) that such as are capable of great passions, are far more miserable than others; and it were better to love every thing that pleases, than to confine our affection to one single object: Besides, (added he) I look upon it as an injury done to nature, to love but one thing alone in the whole Universe. But you do not remember, (answered Plotina smiling) that you would have me think you love me, and yet what you say, does not altogether tend to make you be belov'd. You have forgot your self (replyed he) for your maxims are not much different from mine, and 'tis rather joy that unites us than love; or, to explain my self more clearly, the joy I resent in loving you, is that which maintains the passion I have for you; besides that, to speak sincerely, I was born a little too slothful, to adventure the experience of one of those great passions, which always oblige to the performance of great matters; and without question, I am more fit for a trifling, than for an heroical love. Methinks (said Cesonia) you attribute a quality to your self not very good; for I always lookt upon slothfulness as a defect. How? Cesonia (cried Amilcar) if you knew but what sweetness there is in a certain carelessness, which is the daughter of sloth, and how pleasing an employment idleness is to a man that hath some delicacy of mind, you would not speak as you do, but would conclude, that if diligence be sometimes more profitable, sloth is almost ever more agreeable. For if you consider'd it well, you would find, that they which are naturally diligent have scarce ever leisure to do nothing; because the same temperament which makes diligent, endues those that are capable of it with a certain activity, which obliges them to engage themselves into a thousand thousand difficult matters. Such people undertake all, would be all, intermeddle with all; and so, by their incessant turmoiling, deprive themselves of that, which according to the intention of Nature, is the reward of all labours, and the end of all the actions of Life; Rest. For even Heroes, that resolve most to climb to glory, by arduous and untrodden paths, propose Rest to themselves at the end of their travels. Why therefore should any account it discommendable, that being able to obtain this happy Quiet by Idleness, which is so great a pleasure, I enjoy it with tranquility and peace? Why, I say, should I be blam'd for commending and loving, yea, preferring idleness before labor? for is there any thing so sweet as to have nothing to do, and to be able to do all what ever one pleases? I confess (said Herminius) 'tis very pleasing to have the power of doing all one will; but I deny, that 'tis oftentimes agreeable to do nothing I grant indeed, that there is sometimes a kind of sweetness in the serene enjoyment of honest leasure, yet that which chiefly constitutes the pleasantness of it, is not properly idleness, but the liberty and arbitriment a man hath to do what his own inclinations lead him to. Continual labour is a thing painful, but eternal sluggishness is so tedious and troublesome a quality, that I hate nothing more. For sluggishness (replyed Amilcar) it is as well odious to me as to you, but the idleness which I mean, I love it with all my soul; It seems to me (said Cesonia) there is no great difference between them. How? Cesonia (answered he) you seem not to consider what you speak; for a sluggard is properly a man either without virtue, or without courage, or without wit, or without address. But a gallant man idle, is a Philosopher, who does nothing, because there is nothing in the world worthy to employ him; or a man, who seeking wisdom by a different way from the common sort of men, pursues only pleasures, without intermedling with the publick good, and a thousand affairs, which cause all the turmoil of life, and finds himself happier, in being gently seated upon a hillock, by the side of a Rivolet, and entertaining himself with some young Shepherdess, than those ambitious heads which are always active and unquiet, in the midst of all the honors which they attain by their continual labours. And if you consider all things aright, you will find, as I said before, that Rest is the end to which all actions of men are directed. For men do not fight, but to the intent they may not always fight; nor aspire to glory, but to enjoy it in quiet; they do not learn, but that they may make an end of learning; nor travel, but that they may arrive to the place whither they design: and whosoever looks not upon Rest as the chief good, is like a man that should undertake to travel eternally, without ever arriving to any place wherein to abide. Your argument is pleasantly set forth with advantage, (replyed Herminius) but yet I hold, there can be no true sweetness in Rest, unless so far as it is judg'd a commodious estate, of being able to do what a man best pleases. For, that I may borrow the very examples used by you, do you think that those Philosophers, who put themselves in the way of discovering, that the world being wholly corrupted, hath no employment worthy to take them up, could be termed idle? Call you that doing nothing, to have learnt to be better contented with poverty, than the ambitious are with victories; to neglect all the delights which pleasure hath invented, and to be satisfied with the converse of their Books, the melody of Birds, the purling of a Fountain, and their own innocence? As for other kind of idle people, whom only softness posses, I confess they deserve the name which you have given them, and he that loves nothing but delights, may be said to be in continual idleness. Yet 'tis at least an idleness sufficiently sweet, (replied Amilcar, smiling:) But if it were allowable to be always idle, (replied Herminius) all men would be so; for it would be more convenient, than to seek glory by difficult ways, in which also the Heroes found it. Had this opinion been always approv'd, and idleness, sloth, and careleness ranked with the virtues, we should have had neither Cities, nor Laws, nor Monarchies, nor Republicks; but all the world would have been in confusion, all men would have lived in the fields like the Herds which feed there; the Arts would never have been invented; and the same pleasure which induces you to defend the cause of idleness and sloth, would want above half the charms which allure those to it, who have the blindness to prefer it before virtue; since it is true, that men have by their pains invented or perfected very many things which serve for pleasure, as Dancing, Musick, and several others. So that if Idleness had been Mistress of the world, the world would have been in a strange confusion and ignorance; and Amilcar himself, who knows a hundred things which he hath learnt with very much care, would have known nothing of what he knows, nor have been the same person in the world he is; he could have scarce had any thing graceful, nor even discoursed of idleness at the rate he now does; whence I assure my self, he does not speak according to his real thoughts. 'Tis true, (answered Amilcar) what ever I have said, I am neither sluggish nor idle; yet, to speak unfeignedly, I could wish I had leisure to be so, and were not all my life oblig'd to study to do things, which afford me no advantage, and little pleasure. For, to tell you freely, most of the labours of men, find nothing but ingratitude in the minds of those, for whom they are undergone; and every man, from the King to the Slave, hath at least met with one ungrateful in his life. For when a Prince is just and gracious, the people are apt to infer, that he is oblig'd to be so, that they are not at all oblig'd to him for it. Most Kings, because they are born Masters of others, imagine they owe no reward to their faithful Subjects, and that Tyranny is one of the Rights of their Soveraignty. They that govern Republicks, are expos'd to the ingratitude of the people, as well as Kings; and the persons of highest employment in States of this sort, imagining those whom they govern, can never obey them with blindness enough, never trouble themselves to give them any testimonies of acknowledgement: Masters believe their slaves born to do them service without reward; and slaves on the other side, think their Masters ought to recompence them for the least matters they perform, and that they are indebted to them continually. The friends which a man obliges, knowing 'tis the engagement of friendship to serve those we love, make no esteem of any thing; and they which oblige others, require on the contrary; that all should be ascribed to them. A Father, because he hath given life to his Children, conceives, that they ought to be always as dependent on him, as they were while they were but in their Cradle; and giving them no thanks for all their endeavours to please him, does nothing at all for them: and Children for their part, knowing that their birth is not the greatest obligation they can owe to their Fathers, repine even for the life which they gave them, when they do not all for them which they think they are able to do. Husbands, whose authority is established by force and custom, conceiving their wives are too happy in obeying them, give them no thanks for their complacency; and Wives, who having either Beauty or Virtue imagining their Husbands too highly preferr'd by having married them, are not oblig'd by any thing whatsoever, but for the most part are impertinent when they are fair, and insolent when they are wise. Even Lovers are ungrateful, and the most of any other. For indeed (added Amilcar smiling) if you took notice of all the complaints they make, you would think a thousand mighty injuries had been done them, and never the least kindness. And it oftentimes happens, that a Lover, after he has received a thousand and a thousand favours; makes afterwards a thousand and a thousand repinings, only because he is something less favourably regarded than ordinary: so that forgetting all former kindnesses, he murmures and threatens to change his affection, and becomes perfectly ingrateful And as for the Ladies (continued he) I could cite an hundred Sonnets, wherein the title of Ungrateful is given them. For I remember one which begins with, Ungrateful Fair; another with Ungrateful Iris; a third with, What strange ingratitude is this of yours? a fourth with, The ungrateful beauty which I serve; and another which pronounces, All that's handsome is ungrateful. To conclude, Ingratitude is so general a thing, that a man would almost protest against obliging any person; and for fear of doing any thing for one that may afterwards prove ungrateful, resolve to do nothing at all, but to live so as only to live, without taking care of any thing. For Ingratitude, (said Æmilius, who all this while had been silent) I assent to you, that there is too much of it in the world. I am of your opinion, (answered Herminius) but there would be much less of it, if there were no slothfulness and idleness; for they are usually supine and negligent persons, who are most ungrateful, and who are willing to be oblig'd by all the world, without obliging any body. In truth (said Plotina) you have all a great stock of wit, and methinks you are in the humour to day, of expressing more than ordinary; and therefore I beseech you satisfie me of two things, which I am desirous to know: First, Which is most shameful, to be a sluggard for want of wit, or for want of courage? and Secondly, to examine well all the different ingratitudes the world is full of, and determine which is the greatest, for there are various kinds. For my own particular, I have a she-friend, who makes no account of the services which are done her, but forgets a thousand considerable good offices, without ever thinking of retribution; and who, because she is fair, and loves her beauty better than her self, if I may so speak, never forgets one flattery or commendation, but will do much more for them which deceive her, provided it be in her own praise, than for those who do her real services: What you speak of (said Cesonia) falls out very frequently, but before speaking of ingratitude, let us discourse a little concerning these idle persons, whose idleness has divers causes. I know some who are so, only because they are careless; for they have wit enough, and testifie also in some occasions, when they are forced to it, that they want no courage: and besides, it is not perceiv'd that they have any bad qualities: These people (answered Herminius) are culpable in the highest degree; for I know nothing more strange than to be unprofitable both to the world and ones self, to have wit and do nothing with it, and a certain indifferent mind, which causes a man not to interest himself in any thing, to have neither ambition nor love, and to live with a negligence that renders him incapable of all great pleasures. For my own part, I should almost like it better for a man to addict himself to something, not altogether good, than not to apply himself to any thing at all. As for me (replied Plotina) I am of Herminius's mind, and I judge it more shameful to be an eternal idler, for want of having the Will to attempt something, than to do nothing for want of Will: For what reason is there to accuse a poor stupid person, who by engaging himself in action, would only manifest his stupidity? I affirm confidently, that they to whom the gods have been sparing of the riches of the mind, are happy, when they assign them an unactive life withal, so that they remain hidden in their own obscurity. This deficiency causes the same effect in them, which prudence does in others, by restraining them from appearing unbecomingly in the world. For there is none but knows, there are people which would not be spoken of, if they were not in great employments, of whom a thousand dispraises are rumour'd, because they acquit themselves ill of what they rashly undertake. Promote a hair-brain'd man to the management of State-affairs, and one faint-hearted to command an Army, and you will find it convenient there were more idle persons than there are. For idle persons injure none but themselves; but they which manage employments they are unworthy of, oftentimes overthrow the order of the world. They make war, when there is a greater necessity for peace; and contrarily, make peace, when 'tis more convenient to undertake a war: and not understanding the import of their own actions, it would be better they did nothing at all. For which reason, upon due consideration, I judge it more reasonable to censure impertinent busie-bodies, than those miserable lazy-backs who seek ease, and oftimes do better by indulging their own quiet, than by forsaking it to become active. Let us leave them therefore in their happy idleness, (answered Cesonia) and I repent me of my curiosity I had to know distinctly, the different degrees of contempt I ought to allot them in my mind. I cannot leave them yet, (replied Herminius) but I must tell you, that the most criminal of all idle persons, are they who addict themselves to nothing, when they are oblig'd by necessity to betake themselves to the employment which fortune has given them. For though all idleness is blame-worthy, yet when a man man addicts himself to nothing, and chooses no profession, but out of choice, sloth, or incapacity, or some other reason, passes his life in so great sluggishness, that he might in a manner die, without the loss of pleasure, or benefit to any, and even without being sensible of it himself, it is sufficient to reprehend and slight him. But when we see a man, who by his birth and his own election, is instated in a great employment, which requires him to act, and he does not, he is to be hated and despised. According to my judgement (said Amilcar) ye have much reason for this; but yet there are people worse than those idle ones you speak of. I beseech you (interpos'd Cesonia) tell us who they are; for my part, I cannot comprehend there can be any such. They are those, (answered Amilcar) who being engag'd in a great employment, do not cease to forecast how to acquit themselves of it, that they may enjoy a certain quiet, which hath always some pleasure in it; yet having a kind of humorousness in their heads, which I cannot express, they do not the things they are obliged to, but busie themselves in matters which they might better dispense with, and neglect all their lives, and to which they have no engagement. For when I see a Priest omit the care of the Temple he ministers to, that knows nothing of the quality of Victims, and scarce the ceremonies of a Sacrifice; but yet discourses well concerning War, Musick, and Hunting, I am possess'd with the most pleasant indignation in the world; for at the same time I contemn him, I take infinite delight to mock and abuse him. When I observe a Senator with his grave aspect (which he sometimes sets off with a little constraint) ignorant of the Laws of his Countrey, and going about to play the Gallant with a Lady, who derides his bad courtship; I conclude, he will do better to keep in his Closet, than to meddle with an unsuitable indecorous Art, and neglect what is incumbent and proper to his place. On the other side, when I see a man, whose age and condition qualifies him for a Gallant, put on an awful Senatorious gravity, and dive into the Doctrine of Pythagoras, and speak no smaller word than that of Transmigration, or Metempsychosis; I sigh, and exclaim, O gods! Why is not this man idle? So likewise when I behold a Captain, whom it behoves to be generous, and to understand his profession, that knows only the terms of the military Art he follows, and yet is well skill'd in that of Dancing, I wish he would do nothing throughout all his life. On the contrary, when I perceive a person, whose mean birth and abilities ought to withhold him from intermedling with any thing, who yet thrusts himself into all businesses, I am as much unsatisfi'd that this man is not idle too. Now if any offer to retort unto me, that idleness is good for nothing, I may at least presume to affirm, that it does hurt to none, and that there is no comparison between idleness and ingratitude. True, (said Herminius) ingratitude is the vilest of all vices, and most opposite to natural equity; for it is never found so much as amongst brutes, nor even the most cruel and savage of them. Benefits and kindnesses mollifie Lions; Men alone are naturally capable of ingratitude. The most remarkable enormity of this vice, is that it is directly opposite to Justice, and overthrows all Laws of Society, which among people endued with reason, ought to be nothing else, but a continual commerce of good offices. According to the Laws of Humanity, it behoveth to do good to whosoever stands in need of it; judge therefore, whether it be not just to do so to them, from whom benefits have been received. But there are people of such an evil heart, that when they are too much oblig'd, they decline those to whom they are engag'd, and by degrees grow to a pass not to endure them. 'Tis a strange humour in some (said Plotina) whom I know, that will not do any thing for those who have done all things for them, and yet render considerable services to such, as never did them the least civility. These people are much of their perverse natures, who love better to make presents than to pay their debts: But the best is, that nevertheless all the world declaims against this odious quality, and there is no ungrateful person but decries ingratitude. This proceeds (said Herminius) for that no person does justice to himself, and because the greatest part of men would appear what they are not. That which amazes me more (continued he) is, to observe, that this crime is so general, since 'tis the only one which is absolutely void of all pleasure. For a man who usurps the property of another, enriches himself by doing so; a Detractor has the pleasure of being easily believ'd; a Cheater has the satisfaction, of attaining to the end he designed to himself; a Vindicative person has the contentment of revenging himself, by committing acts of cruelty: but an Ingrateful man can never think of what has been done for him, without some kind of shame and regret. I assure you (answered Plotina) they which are arriv'd to the highest pitch of ingratitude, never think of that which has been done for them. But if they do not (replied Herminius) yet they have no pleasure in not thinking of it; and so you agree to what I asserted. I confess it really, (said she) for I love no contesting: But to compleat the satisfaction of my curiosity, tell me, I beseech you, which of all ingratitudes is the blackest? That (answered Amilcar) where the obligation is greatest. That is not directly the thing I enquire, (replied Plotina.) What is it then (said Cesonia) which you demand? I would know (said this lovely Virgin) in which profession of persons, ingratititude is most odious, whether in the mind of a King, or in those of his subjects; of a master, or a slave: amongst friends, or between a Father and his Children, or a Husband and a Wife, or a Lover and his Mistriss? Ingratitude is a thing so horrible, (answered Herminius) that it never found an Advocate which dar'd to defend it, or to confess himself capable of it. Some acknowledge indeed, that they are ambitious, cholerick, and revengeful; but none will own that he is ungrateful: Wherefore ingratitude must be absolutely condemn'd, whereever it is found. But yet there are several degrees, (replied Plotina) and I think I may almost confidently adjoyn, that there is no equality in any thing under the Sun. According to my apprehension, (said Amilcar) ingrateful persons may be divided into three orders; for some are so in point of Duty, others in relation to Friendship, and others in respect of Love. Those in point of Duty, are Kings, and Subjects; Fathers, and Children; Masters, ſters, and Slaves; Husbands, and Wives: Thoſe in reference to Friendſhip, are Friends of both Sexes; And laſtly thoſe in relation to love, are Lovers and their Ladies. Amilcar hath ſpoken judiciouſly, (anſwered Herminius) it cannot be denyed; though among them, which he terms ingrateful in reference to duty, ſometimes there may be ſome, that merit a place too among thoſe that are ſo in matter of Friendſhip. But, ſpeaking generally, he hath well ranked theſe Monſters; and it remains only to examine, which are moſt culpable, For my part, (ſaid Amilcar) I believe they which are ungrateful in point of Duty, are the moſt criminal. But my opinion (ſaid Ceſonia) is, that their guilt is greateſt, who practiſe ingratitude in Friendſhip. Mine, (ſaid Æmilius) that the fouleſt aſpect of this vice is, when it appears among the Votaries of Love. I affirm ſo too, (anſwered Herminius) and you only prevented me in declaring this truth. If there were a fourth part to be taken, (ſaid Plotina) I would chooſe it: but being 'tis otherwiſe, I will attend what to reſolve on, till you have delivered your Reaſons. As for mine (ſaid Amilcar, ſmiling) I ſhall ſoon have done it, ſince I have nothing elſe to ſay, but only that Love cannot be plac'd, in compariſon with that kind of Duty we underſtand; for men, who have made Laws to teach Kings to Govern, and People to Obey, have made none to teach Gratitude in Love; and all the Morality of the goddeſs, ador'd in Cyprus, is no where to be found but in Sonnets. The ſame reaſon (anſwer'd Æmilius) which oblig'd Numa to make no Laws againſt parricides, has, without queſtion, oblig'd all Legiſlators to mention almoſt nothing concerning Love; becauſe, as Numa imagin'd, there could be no parricide, ſo they preſum'd it impoſſible ingratitude ſhould be in Love. But however it be (anſwer'd Amilcar) I am not bound to ſpeak as the matter is, but only what I think. And therefore I ſay, looking upon Love as a piece of Gallantry, I do not account the ungrateful of this Order the blackeſt; but judge thoſe that are ingrateful in friendſhip, more criminal, though leſs than thoſe which are ſo in reſpect of Duty, which I ſpoke of. Certainly, if the conſequence of Ingratitude ought to be conſidered, in order to determining the greatneſs of it, it muſt be granted me, that ingratitude in Love produces divertiſement and pleaſure in the world, inſtead of diſturbing humane ſociety; for uſually, amorous Ingratitudes occaſion the compoſure of very excellent Verſes. As for that which happens between two friends, though it be horrible, yet at moſt it only cauſes hatred to ſucceed in the room of friendſhip, and ſome families to be divided. But the ingratitude of bad Kings towards their Subjects (if the reſpect due to them will permit ſuch language) is the occaſion of a thouſand injuſtices; and that of People towards their Kings cauſes ſeditions, revolts, and eternal wars. The ingratitude of Fathers to Children, and Children to Fathers, extinguiſhes all natural ſentiments; that of Husbands to Wives, and Wives to Husbands, occaſions almoſt all criminal affections, and tragical deeds. Judge therefore whether I was miſtaken, when I affirmed the ingrateful in Duty were the moſt dangerous. I know not whether they be the moſt dangerous, (anſwered Ceſonia) but I maintain that one ungrateful in friendſhip can never be a true honeſt man; and yet 'tis not impoſſible ſometimes for one ingrateful in Duty to be ſo. For, to inſtance, there may be Kings who will give no acknwledgement of the ſervices performed for them; who ſtudy more their own glory, than the quiet of their people, and will not be other than great Princes. Indeed, if all Kings really lov'd their Subjects, as a good Father ought to love his Children, and would take eſpecial notice of the ſervices which are performed for them, they would never make War, except to defend them, but peaceably permit them to till their native ſoil, and be induc'd by no ambition to make new acqueſts of Territory at the expence of their lives, who love and obey them. Perhaps there may poſſibly be ingratitudes in Ambition, of not ſo black a ſtain, as thoſe of friendſhip. All ſuch as have began a new dominion, have been ingrateful to their Countrey: yet whilſt in their climbing from mean Citizens to the heigth of grand Princes; Fortune juſtified their ingratitude, they have been placed in the ſame degree with Heroes. But as for an ingrateful friend, he hath been always ranked amongſt the baſe and treacherous. Fathers and Children, Husbands and Wives, ingratitude is not ſo odious when it is found amongſt them; but only becauſe there is a great duty of mutual love incumbent upon them. For though I am of opinion, it is always fit for children to reſpect and obey thoſe to whom they owe their lives; yet I hold, that when a man happens to have one of thoſe Fathers that are too much ſo, and who, acting perpetually by their authority, never do any thing with tenderneſs, he may in ſome ſort be excuſable, if he aſcribe not all imaginable acknowledgements to him; nevertheleſs I agree, that he ought always to honor and ſerve him. But there is a certain reſpect or decency, and an obedience proceeding from reaſon, very different from thoſe which are produced by a real acknowledgement. The ſame I ſay of Fathers and Children, is alſo applicable to Husbands and Wives. Moreover, there is another reaſon, which renders ingratitude between friends more deteſtable, than between thoſe I now mentioned. For Kings make no choice of their Subjects, and all Subjects do not elect their Kings; no more do Fathers chooſe their Children, or theſe their Fathers: Intereſt, for the moſt part, makes all Marriages, rather than Reaſon or Love. Wherefore when all theſe perſons are defective in acknowledgements, though they deſerve blame, yet 'tis in a leſs meaſure than ingrateful friends do; eſpecially, becauſe not loving at all, they leſſen the value of the obligations they have one towards another; for conceiving their duty leſs, it is not ſtrange if they diſpence with a part of what they owe. As for Lovers, though their ingratitude be horrible, yet it may be alledg'd, that ſince we love not whom we will, we cannot be oblig'd thereunto in ſpight of our inclinations; and beſides, as Love ſeiſes on one party firſt, when ſuch poſſeſſion ſeiſes on the one ſide, it commonly begins on the other; whence a Lover, whoſe intereſt is diſ-reſpected, believes not himſelf ſo oblig'd as he is to the perſon by whom he is belov'd. But for friends, they are choſen by us, we are voluntarily oblig'd to them, we ſue unto, and engage them, we readily admit of their ſervices, not being being constrained to a confederate amity, either by the Laws, or any disordered Passion; and by consequence, nature, reason, justice, virtue, and glory, exact of us a correspondent return of good offices, and when it is not in a mans power to perform that, he ought never at least, to forget the obligation he hath to his Friend, but publish and own it with delight. For my part, I confess, I cannot comprehend how there should be ingrateful friends, or how there can be any people which endure those which are so. What assurance can there be in the heart of a man, who is wanting to his friend and himself? what sentiment is able to retain him, who despises friendship, justice, and glory, and makes himself apparent to be as imprudent as false? for indeed, the ingrateful ruines his reputation amongst all people of honor, and does himself more mischief than others, though perhaps he is not sensible of it. It were not impossible, but one ingrateful to his Prince may be grateful to his friend, and his Mistress, and also to the other Relations I mentioned; but I judge, an ingrateful Friend, may be an ingrateful Subject, Father, Child, Husband, and Lover, for friendship is a thing so sacred, that who so contemns it, is capable of violating all things; Wherefore I conceive my opinion more warranted by reason than that of Amilcars. You are highly ingenious, (answered Herminius) and I confess, all you have said in favor of Friendship is admirably well discoursed, and so much the more as it serves to prove, that the most horrible of all Ingratitudes is Ingratitude in Love. Which before I undertake, I must declare, that there is no kind excusable, but all ingrateful persons merit contempt and detestation. It is not material to examine whether a man loves or hates, to know whether he ought to be grateful. For upon the reception of a benefit, he is indispensably obliged to be acknowledged for it, not only to his friends, but also to his enemies, when he accepts a good office from their hands: And besides, I am not satisfied whether a man be not obliged to gratitude, even when he refuses the services they would do him.

The word [Acknowledgment] so clearly implies the necessary obligation of him that receives a favor from any one, that none can be ignorant of it. To acknowledge a good turn, is to be always in a propensity of doing what has been done for you; and whosoever feels not in his breast a continual desire of performing that towards another which has been done to serve him, is without question secretly ingrateful, and will discover himself upon the first occasion presented him, of serving those by whom he has been obliged. But to come to the particular design I have, to make it apparent, that Ingratitude in Love is more abominable than all others, I stand not in need of very many words to do it. For though there can be no small ingratitude, yet it is certain, it may be more or less great, according as the person is more or less obliged. For if a man owes his life to a friend, he is more oblig'd to him, than if he owed to him only his Fortune; and consequently is more ingrateful to him, than if he were accountable to him for a less engagement. Which being so, what doubt can be made of the question in hand, and is there any thing that may be placed in comparison with Love? A man serves his King, his Father, his Master, and his Friend; but a Lover gives himself to his Mistress, and a Mistress her self to her Lover; 'tis Love alone that has the power to make two hearts one. I know friendship boasts of being able to do it, but without reason. Two friends that are most intimately such, may have each his Mistress which will divide them, or at least render their friendship less considerable to them, because it will no longer afford them their greatest contentment. But when Love closely unites two persons together, whose breasts are tender, and minds intelligent, I defie all the power of Friendship to divide them. Therefore since Love is an union incomparably more strong and perfect than Friendship, and nothing can be parrallel'd with the obligation we have to a person who bestowes his whole heart, it is easie to conclude, that there is no ingratitude of a deeper dye, than that of a Lover towards a Mistress, or a Mistress towards a Lover. But when I mention Love, I am not to be understood of those triffling sorts of Love which wear a name they deserve not, for they who love at this rate, giving themselves only for the time which they spend in jollity, are engaged to nothing but to divert themselves as best they may, so long as they have a fancy to be seen, and loved. But I mean a certain ardent and sincere Love, founded upon esteem and virtue; in which is made a real commutation of hearts, where Desires are the same in two breasts, and seem likely to continue so eternally. For since there is nothing more precious in the world than an affection of this nature, therefore who ever is capable of Ingratitude after such a dearness, is the most perfidious and vile of all other ingrateful persons. Yet there is a certain interressed disposition in men, which almost generally induces them to detest one that is ungrateful, by forgetting a good office done him, in relation to his fortune; more than a criminal Lover, who extinguishes out of his mind all memorials and tokens of a great passion conferred on him. But to speak reasonably, there is nothing more unjust, nor even more inhumane, than to be capable of ingratitude towards a person, who has given all he was able, by giveing his heart. For in Love, the services which are received ought to be reckoned upon as in Friendship; because when two persons love perfectly, it must be supposed they are qualified to do and suffer all things one for the other, even to the loss of life. As soon as they love, they mutually owe one another all the offices which love can prompt them to; and this community of duty they ought to make reckoning of, as much as of services performed, since there is nothing requisite more but occasion, which depends solely on fortune. By this discourse of yours (replyed Æmilius coldly) it seems, that Gratitude in love belongs only to happy Lovers. I should be very glad it were so, (said Plotina, smiling) and that some distinction be made in reference to Acknowledgment; for otherwise I should be in a desperate case, if I apprehended my self obliged not to be ingrateful to three or four persons, which make semblance of loving me. There is without doubt, (answered Herminius) considerable distinction to be made in these sort of matters; for excepting in Love, it behoveth never to receive a good office, without an inclination of mind to repay it, and a resentment of the

the obligation. But the caſe is not the ſame in Love; and Acknowledgment, in order to being perfect, ought never to be againſt either Juſtice or Virtue. But it would be againſt both, if a Lady equally acknowledged the affection of four or five Lovers; for indeed Love cannot be divided. But what then ſhall become of the ſervices of unhappy Lovers, (ſaid Æmilius?) and why is not ſhe accuſable of ingratitude who receives and not acknowledges them? Impoſſibility (anſwered Herminius) gives bounds to all things, and it is eaſie to be underſtood. A Lady loves not whom ſhe pleaſes, and when ſhe loves ſome one, ſhe can have no other recogniſance for them which ſhe loves not and ſerve her, than that which obliges her to pitty them, and wiſh them cur'd of their Love; and moreover to ſerve them as generous friends, when ſhe finds occaſion to do it. The Virtues are never in hoſtility among themſelves; and one ſhould not be truly grateful, if he were ſo with injuſtice. It is not lawful to injure one friend, in order to doing ſervice to another; and when 'tis ſaid, We ought to acknowledge all good offices we receive, it is meant, after ſuch a manner as may with reaſon be done. Thus may a Lady not render Love for Love, without being ingrateful; and 'tis to ſpeak ſtrictly only reciprocal Love, that has reference to that black ingratitude which I account ſo monſtrous, and which amaſes me ſo much the more, in that it cannot be committed but againſt ſuch a perſon of all the World, as one is moſt loved by, and moſt ingaged to love. And now to ſpeak of Ingratitude in general, it can never be good for any thing. Ambition may produce good effects, Love oftentimes excites to atchieve great actions, Indignation ſerves ſometimes to uphold Juſtice; Cruelty, as terrible as it is, may be in ſome ſort profitable in the breaſts of thoſe who in order to ſaving a mans life are conſtrained to cut off his Arm, But Ingratitude is almoſt the ſole thing which is good only to do miſchief. On the other ſide gratitude, though a virtue which makes not ſo much noiſe as many others, is nevertheleſs compleatly heroical. in the breaſts of thoſe that underſtand it aright; and I cannot decide whether there be not ſometimes as much glory in the handſome acknowledgment of a Civility, as for a man himſelf to confer a favor. Whilſt they were thus arguing, Themiſtus arrived, who conducted the ſolitary Merigenes to Ceſonia's houſe, by whom he was received with extraordinary kindneſs. Plotina alſo expreſſed to him all the civility his quality required; Æmilius teſtified much joy to ſee him, having known him before at Eryx; Herminius likewiſe made him many careſſes; and Amilcar, who was friend to all worthy perſons, was his as ſoon as he ſaw him. To ſignifie to him that he was not ignorant of his affairs, he demanded of him whether he were not weary of his ſolitude, and his rare Cloſet which was ſo excellently adorned, and inquired whether an Illuſtrious friend of his of near habitation to him, ſtood yet in need of all his conſtancy to undergo the many vexations which attend a decaying health; and then deſired that he would tell him news of the Princeſs of Elis, who was gone to Eryx, to implore Venus that ſhe might have the priviledge of kindling love in the breaſts of others, yet keeping her own inſenſible. You ask me ſo many things at once (anſwered Merigenes) that it is not poſſible for me to ſatisfie you ſuddenly. But I ſhall tell you, that Rome is a very fit place to comfort one of the Deſart, that the ſight of the Capitol is ſufficiently pleaſing to make me contentedly ſuffer my abſence from my Cloſet, that the illuſtrious friend you ſpeak of, is ever the moſt prudent and virtuous of all men, and withall the moſt miſerable through his unhealthineſs, and that the Princeſs of Elis having fallen ſick at Eryx, is diverted into my Deſart, to recover the perfect luſtre of her incomparable complexion. And now I have anſwered all the Queſtions, I beſeech you tell me why you ask me tidings of the fair Eliſmonda, and whether or no you know her. I know her, (replyed Amilcar, ſmiling) only by the report of Æmilius, who never ſaw her; but I wiſh I were ſo happy to know her my ſelf. For indeed I have a kind of curioſity to underſtand how that unjuſt perſon is compos'd, who addreſſes confidently to the Mother of Love, that ſhe would impower her to inflame others with that paſſion, and be exempted from it her ſelf. And becauſe you have ſeen her for ſome days in the Deſart, I conceive you will much oblige the Company by deſcribing her. Though I have no great skill in Peinture (anſwered Merigenes) yet I ſhall indeavor to repreſent her Pourtraiture to you, in caſe the Ladies before whom I ſpeak require it as well as you. For my part (ſaid Ceſonia) I am always very well contented, Amilcar ſhould have any thing granted him that may ſatisfie his curioſity; for he has ſuch an excellent faculty of uſing all he knows, that he can never know too much. And as for me, (ſaid Plotina) the ſentiment of the Princeſs of Elis, ſeems to me ſo gallant, that it gives me the ſame curioſity too. And I, (ſaid Herminius) were it for nothing elſe, but becauſe ſhe reigns in a place where the Olympick Games, which are the famouſeſt of all Greece, are celebrated ſhould not be unwilling to have ſome knowledge of her. Since 'tis thus, (ſaid Merigenes) I ſhall betake my ſelf to content your curioſity, though I muſt declare to you, that the Princeſs of Elis is a perſon, whoſe Picture is not ſo eaſily to be drawn as you imagine. For whatever diligence I may bring to effect it, I am aſſured I ſhall never make it perfectly reſemble her; but they who well know the fair Eliſmonda, will judge, that I have fallen ſhort in delineating her pourtract. But ſince 'tis impoſſible for me not to obey you, I ſhall tell you, that that young Princeſs is exactly of the ſtature which I would have the Mother of Love repreſented by, for I cannot approve of thoſe Peinters and Sculptures, who ſet forth Venus to us in ſuch an extraordinary ſize, that it cannot be imagined that Cupid ſhould be her Son, who if he had a ſiſter, it may be thought ſhe would without doubt reſemble the Princeſs of Elis. You underſtand by this, that Eliſmonda is not great, but from the firſt being of handſome perſons, there was never any whoſe ſtature was better proportioned, nor more ſutable to the ayr of her countenance and beauty, than hers; for were ſhe ſomewhat taller, or a little lower, any thing more thick, or a thought more ſlender, ſhe would infallibly loſe ſome part of that which renders her ſo lovely, ſo true it is, that ſhe is, ſuch as is requiſite for her to be, exactly ſhaped. Eliſmonda's hair is flaxen, and ſo wonderfully comely, that Art only ſerves to com-

...hood place it, though perhaps a careless disorder sometimes renders it more graceful. The shape of her countenance is Oval, her nose is well and regularly proportioned, her mouth curiously framed, teeth white, complexion very clear and smooth, the dye of youth diffus'd over all her face, cerulean eyes, sweet, smiling, sprightly, and yet a little languishing; and that which makes her infinitely charming, is her pleasing and attracting Aspect, which promises nothing but goodness and tenderness. Then Elismonda's neck is so well made, that it appears handsome even after languishing tedious sicknesses. For her arms and hands, they leave all description beneath them, for whether it be by reason of their shape, whiteness, plumpness, or I know not what secret unexpressible charm, 'tis not possible but to forbear holding her eyes, how lovely soever, for some moments, and turn them to admire the beauty of the rarest hands and arms in the World, when the occasion of lifting up her veil, or rectifying something about her head-tire, or doing any other action, causes the discovery of their handsomness. Another greater loveliness in the Princess of Elis, is the freedom of her carriage, for though she loves her self enough, yet she is far from all ostentative affectation of seeming fair, she has ever the same natural neatness, nothing savoring of fantasticalness, her dress is not over finical, nor too much neglected, and her attire never too magnificent, yet 'tis very stately, and she wears it with a singular grace, she chooses with Art such colours as are most advantageous to her, and if she have especial care in any things 'tis in artificial and becoming bracelets, and to be always alike neat, whether she be dress'd or not. For Wit, without question Elismonda, has a plenteous stock of it, especially of such as enhances the power of Beauty. She speaks gracefully, she is gentle, civil, and even flattering when she pleases, though sometimes she puts on a colder air towards certain people, whom she does not much affect. And then for her disposition, tis extreamly even and uniform, especially towards her friends. Her temper is apparently something inclinable to melancholly, but she scarce ever discovers any in conversation, and only serves her self of it in the passionate singing of languishing ayrs; for Elismonda's voice is infinitely pleasing, wherewith she repeats Love-verses after so affecting a manner, that you would judge she felt her self the passion which the Sonnets express, and take her for the Author, by her exact reach of their sentiments, who were inspired by Love in the composition. Moreover, Elismonda is merry when she is in company that pleases her, yet 'tis always a modest mirth, and never ascends to those excessive wantonnesses which are discordant to seemliness. On the other side, when she thinks fit, she puts on a more serious deportment, though without disgust to any. Nor is she like those fair ones, who ever resort to all great feasts; for she loves not a croud, and very seldom goes to a Ball, notwithstanding she dances with an excellent grace. As little is she of the humor of those, who would think their beauty undervalued, if it do not every year procure them great number of Collations, Treatments, and Serenades. For Elismonda is contented to conquer hearts, without desiring such testimonies of affection; and excepting some praises in Verse, which she sometimes suffers to be given her, she can never resolve to receive any thing, either from her Lovers or Friends of either sex. But Elismonda's heart being great and noble, she loves naturally to give, and to make, handsome Treatments at home, not to seek them from others. She has moreover a quality very rare in a person fair and young, not to speak ill of any person living in the least, picquant and dangerous railleries are displeasing to her, and 'tis against her desire if any person whatsoever be injur'd. 'Tis not to be doubted but that Elismonda loves praises, and though she declare she will never love any besides the Prince of Elis, who alone has been able to make impressions on her heart, yet she takes it not ill that she is esteemed, admired, and adored; and if any thing of cruelty harbors in her soul, tis in having a general design to please, without caring to make some persons miserable, whom she never intends to render happy. Not but that she has reason to persist faithful to the Prince of Elis, for certainly never man was owner of more generosity and goodness than he, nor in whom all the qualities of a true person of honor may be more essentially found. He is well made of his person, has a lofty aspect, a noble heart, a just mind, a gentle nature, a tender soul, he is an ardent friend, and a more ardent lover, he is liberal, real, wise, and moderate; loves reasonable delights, and justice above all things. So that to speak according to justice, Elismonda has reason to make all her Lovers unhappy, though they may be pardoned for repining a little against her charms and beauty, when they suffer the tyranny of it. It's always just for one that suffers to complain, (answered Amilcar.) True, (said Plotina) for I should complain of my self, had I occasioned my own mischief; and we also see Men complain more or less, according to the different degrees of affection they have for those, who cause them to suffer. But to return to Elismonda, if I were assured her vows were heard, I would forthwith prepare my self for a journey to Eryx. Then you are afraid of being in love, (said Herminius smiling.) Indeed (replyed she) I am unwilling to entertain that passion; and for the present, I find it trouble enough, to be continually repressing the esteem which we have of honorable persons; it being hourly necessary, for our minds to be sentinels to our hearts, to observe carefully that Love enter not thereinto, under the disguise of tender friendship. One thing (said Cesonia) I am very confident of, that some persons known to me are in Love, and never think they are so. A mistake of this kind may sometimes fall out, (answered Amilcar) but 'tis not possible to be always deceived so. For my part, (interpos'd Themistus) I know other people very opposite to those you speak of; for they believe themselves in love, when they are only possessed with a kind of wanton folly, which scarce resembles love at all. Whilst Themistus was speaking thus, Zenocrates arrived, who being first made to understand the person of Merigenes, informed this noble company, that there was brought to Valerius a man of Veii, who had been taken and was found encharged with several important Letters. Was he coming to Rome, (said Cesonia?) Zenocrates made some difficulty to answer, but Themistus, judging it was because of the presence of Merigenes, engaged for his fidelity, so that re-ſuming his diſcourſe; he was coming to Rome, (ſaid he) without queſtion, his buſineſs being to ſpeak with Clelius from a Veientine, called Mamilius, his antient friend, they ſay to whom Horatius is ſlave, though they of Veii know not his quality. You will find (ſaid Herminius) that 'twas to that very Veientine, Clelius ſent ſecretly, to endeavor the delivery of Horatius. 'Tis the very ſame, (replyed Zenocrates) and Clelius does his utmoſt to hinder the Conſuls from uſing him that is taken ſeverely. But what was his meſſage to Clelius, (demanded Herminius.) He came to tell him (anſwered Zenocrates) that Mamilius aſſured him, that though he were of a ſide enemy to his, he ſhould perſevere his friend, and ever expreſs teſtimonies of amity to him, as far as the intereſt of his party would permit. If this man be only charged with ſuch Commiſſions, (replyed Herminius) there is no cauſe to treat him hardly. Were there no more but this, (anſwered Zenocrates,) he would be out of danger, but Letters have been found about him from the Prince Titus to Collatina and Hermilia; which 'tis true, ſpeak nothing concerning affairs of State; but there is one from Tarquin, to the chief Pontiff, in which that Prince, exaggerating the exceſſive expence he made, to teſtify his zeal towards the gods, when he cauſed the Temple of Jupiter to be built, ſeems deſirous to engage him to recompence him for it, by embracing his intereſts, and cunningly inſinuating into the minds of his people, that 'tis fit he were recalled. But amongſt all thoſe ſeveral Letters, the man had ſome others which intimate, that having ended his negotiating at Rome, he had order to go into Greece to the Princeſs of Elis; for there is one from the Veientine we ſpoke of to the Prince of that Country. And that which is ſufficiently ſtrange, this Veientine ſpeaks to him with very much authority, and almoſt commands him to go in perſon to Delphos, to conſult the oracle concerning the ſucceſs of the War which the Veientines have determined to make againſt Rome. For whereas Tarquin, heretofore ſent the Princeſs his ſons thither, when Brutus accompanyed them, the Veientines obſerving lately, how true the Oracle they received has been found, by Brutus's becomeing maſter of Rome, they would know what the event of their deſign would prove: And accordingly Mamilius writes, as I told you, to the Prince of Elis, to oblige him to conſult that Oracle, engaging himſelf to make a conſiderable offering to the Temple of Delphos, in the name of his Republick. There are alſo in the ſame Letter many other things, which cannot be underſtood. But is this Prince of Elis (ſaid Plotina, turning towards Merigenes) nothing to the Princeſs Eliſmonda, whoſe Picture you juſt now gave us? He is her Husband, (anſwered Merigenes) and the perſon I mentioned after I had deſcribed the Princeſs his wife; and it ought not to be wondered at, if Mamilius ſpeaks to that Prince with authority, for he is his father. But how comes it to paſs, (demanded Plotina) that the ſon of a Veientine, is Prince of Elis? Fortune, who is capricious, (anſwered Merigenes) does things much more aſtoniſhing than this. But yet I can aſſure you, that ſince ſhe firſt made adventures of War, of Love, and of Generoſity, ſhe never made any more ſurpriſing than thoſe which have befallen the Prince of Elis. And truly, it ought not to be accounted ſtrange, that Mamilius is ſo ſtrongly perſwaded of a Power, foreſeeing things to come; for he has an example of it in the Prince his Son, which will not ſuffer him to doubt it. All the company hearing this diſcourſe of Merigenes, had great curioſity of knowing the Hiſtory of the Prince and Princeſs of Elis, but becauſe it was already ſufficiently late, and Herminius judged it important to let Valerius know, the Prince of Elis was Son of Mamilius, and moreover, was willing to go ſee Valeria, he ſaid, 'twas requiſite to refer the buſineſs to the next morning, and that Valeria ought to have her part in this pleaſure, and accordingly the company broke up and departed. But to the end Valerius might be better informed of what it was it he ſhould know, Themiſtus accompanyed Merigenes to the Conſul, to whom he declared very important matters; For, you know (ſaid Merigenes to Valerius) that the Family of the Tarquins is originally of Corinth, upon which account it would not be impoſſible, but Mamilius might engage the Prince his ſon to perſuade the Corinthians to embrace the intereſts of Tarquin. And being the Commerce of Corinth into Sicily is great, they might afterwards engage ſome of the Princes of that Iſland, which is nearer hither than themſelves, to intermeddle in this War. After which, Merigenes offered himſelf to negotiate with the Prince of Elis, whoſe virtue is ſo great, that he was confident he would be always on the ſide of Juſtice, aſſuring him, that there were alſo ſome matters in his life, which engaged him to be enemy to all Tyrants. Valerius thanked Merigenes, and without refuſing the offer which he made, of treating the intereſts of Rome with the Prince of Elis, he entreated him to inform him, by what adventure the ſon of Mamilius, who was believed loſt in a long voyage, came to be Prince of Elis. But Merigenes anſwering him, that the ſtory was long, and that there was at leaſt as much War as Love in it, Valerius ſmiling, gave commiſſion to Herminius, to learn the ſame from Merigenes, ſince the publick affairs did not allow him leiſure enough at preſent. Thus the Hiſtory of the Princeſs of Elis, which Merigenes was to relate only to content the curioſity of Ceſonia, Plotina, and Amilcar, became almoſt a neceſſary affair of State. But in order to it, the next morning, after Herminius had been to make a viſit to Clelia and Octavius, who was ſomewhat better to day, he went to Valeria's houſe, where Ceſonia, Plotina, Themiſtus, Amilcar and Merigenes were alſo met. And Merigenes knowing he had many things to relate, after the firſt civilities were over, and Valeria, who received him very civilly, had intreated him to begin the narration he had promiſed, ſpoke in this manner, addreſſing himſelf to Valeria, to whom Plotina had already told all that ſhe knew concerning the Princeſs of Elis.

The

THE HISTORY Of the PRINCESS ELISMONDA.

YOU will perhaps judge me very presumptuous, Madam in daring to entertain you with the adventures of your Neighbors. and tell you of things done at Veii, which is not far from your Gates, as if I were a Tuscan, and not a Native of Italy: Tis true, Fortune has guided me into so many different regions, my habitation has so long been in Sicily, and my travels so universal all over Italy, that I can almost term every place my Country. To me, according to the genius I am of, all persons of honor are fellow-Citizens; and I never put real distinction between men, besides what virtue alone makes. Now Madam, I must acquaint you that the Prince of Elis, whose name is Hortensius, is of a most illustrious race. For his family is as antient as the City wherein he was born, which is, as you know, one of the most considerable of those twelve famous Cities, which share amongst them the Dominion of all Tuscany. But not to detain you with unprofitable particularizing all the several badges of honor which belong to that House, I shall only intimate, that it possessed the highest imployments in Veii, and that they report that one of the Predecessors of Hortensius, heretofore gave that famous Statue of Juno, whom they call Queen Juno, which they have plac'd in a stately Temple erected for it. For as the Veientines adore the Goddess represented by it as the tutelar Deity of their City, and are naturally superstitious; so they believe if this Statue should be taken from them, their City would be destroyed. I say this Madam, to the end that remembring the nature of the Tuscanes, you may not think strange that the Illustrious Father of Hortensius, has been capable of doing that which you shall understand in the sequel of my discourse. Which before I unfold to you, it is requisite you know, that that generous Veientine, who is called Manilius, was always virtuous from his first youth, that he loved his Countrey eminently more than all things, and glory as much as his Countrey, and that as it is the custom of those of this Nation to consult their Augurs, which are the most learned of the world in the art they pretend to, he consulted the most famous that he knew concerning the birth of his only son, Hortensius, whose life I am relating to you. But all he inquired of (first telling him that his son should be indued with a thousand great qualities) assured him it was the decree of fate for him to raign in the place where he should live, and that it was impossible but he should dye a Soveraign. This generous Veientine, instead of rejoycing was afflicted with this answer, for loving his native soil with an extream Passion, he judged himself the most unhappy of all men, in having a son, whom he feared would become Tyrant of his Countrey. Which perplexing thought not forsaking him, and being willing to find cause to doubt of what the Augurs of his City had told him, he went from City to City throughout all Tuscany, to consult all such as were in repute for skill in the art of Divinations. But the more he consulted, the more was his fear augmented, for all told him the same thing. Afterwards being not yet satisfied, he went to Præneste to the famous Temple of Fortune, which is upon the top of the Mountain, on which this City is built, to try whether the Prænestine Lots would agree with the Augurs which he had consulted. For which (you are not ignorant) there is in that place a kind of Oracle of Chance, which seems to decide the destinies of men. But at Præneste too, as well as at Veii, this generous Father found that his Son was born to rule, and that it was necessary he should render himself absolute Master of a Soveraignity. This being so decreed; his noble Father, whose virtue caused his affliction, returned to Veii, and without discovering any thing of his sorrow, provided for the education of his Son in the best manner he could, if possibly by industry and the flexibleness of his minority he might oppose the power of Destiny, which seemed to intend him for a Tyrant of his Countrey. But as the Child grew up in years, so was his inquietude augmented; by reason there ever appeared some Token of Superiority in all his actions. If he played with Children of equal age, he would be the master of them; he had a lofty aspect, lov'd not to obey his equals, and gave testimonies both of courage and wit, and lastly, was very lovely and excellently well made. Hortensius liv'd on this sort till the age of seven years, when being in the Temple of Queen Juno, where a multitude of people were assembled, because it was the day whereon they celebrated the feast of that goddess, He went boldly to seat himself in a Chair raised three steps high, which was never us'd but by the chief of the Augurs who was Priest; and though they endeavour'd to make him go thence, he kept himself there immoveable, till the Augur came thither to perform the ceremony. Whose intreaties and commands were all ineffectual to perswade him from his seat, so that he was constrain'd to pull him out forcibly. Whereupon the Augur observing whose Child it was, and remembring what himself had foretold concerning him, transported with zeal to his Countrey, turning himself towards the Statue of Juno, and lifting up his voice and his hands towards it, O great goddess (cry'd he) be pleas'd to avert, that this dangerous Child become not the Tyrant of a place, where men adore you with so sincere devotion. He had scarce pronounc'd this, but there arose a confusion of voices amongst the people. During which, the generous Father of Hortensius, who was most zealous above all the Veientines, of the publick safety, being entred into the Temple, as things were thus, and understanding what had pass'd, stept forth, and with a generosity never parallel'd, took Hortensius by the hand, and addressing to the Priest, with an admirable constancy, bad him, Go and make a sacrifice of his Son to his Countrey. 'Tis not (added he) for that I believe I ought to deprive him of a life which the gods have given him; but I shall dispose of him in such manner, that Veii shall never be in fear of his ambition. Soon after, this afflicted Father, making choice of a friend he had of no great wealth, but virtuous, and who had all his life a very great desire of travel, requested him he would undertake the conduct of his Son, and become a father to him. And assigning him half his wealth, he conjur'd him to go and travel about the world with his Son, to instruct him constantly in virtue, to endeavour to cause him to forget of what Countrey he was, to make him rather choose Greece to live in, than any other place in the world, and never to return into Italy. This man, whose name was Gentius, accordingly accepted the bargain propounded to him by his friend, perceiving he had taken up an unalterable purpose to banish Hortensius, and a few daies after went to take ship at one of the Ports of Tuscany. Whence his first passage was into Sicily, and thence to Corinth, where he educated Hortensius, till he was twenty years old, and then dyed: But for that the wealth Hortensius's Father had given him, had not been improv'd in his hands, but he had almost wholly spent it, either in travelling, or in causing Hortensius to be instructed, he left him a very small pittance, and dying suddenly, discover'd nothing to him of his fortune. For you must know, Madam, Gentius had us'd so much art to cause this Youth to forget of what Countrey he was, that he took himself to be a Sicilian. Not but that he still remembred Veii; but, being Gentius had told him that he was brought to that City at the age of six months, he was at a loss what to imagine; and there was so great a confusion in his memory, of what he had seen during his Childhood, that all he was able to conjecture was this, that there must needs have been something very extraordinary in his birth. Wherefore being excited with greatness of mind; he was loath to seek what he was unwilling to find, and only consider'd with himself, what behov'd him to do at that time. He had very many friends at Corinth, but this was of no advantage to him; and therefore hearing there was a War lately broke out between the Thessalonians and the Opuntines, he resolv'd to go thither to try what fortune would do for him, But, as curiosity is always inherent in the souls of brave persons, Hortensius in his journey into Thessaly, which is the fairest part of all Macedonia, purposed to go see that famous valley of Tempe, which is between the Mountains, Ossa and Olympus; the top of the latter of which is above all storms and tempests, and can only be sight it self be depriv'd of the Sun-beams. That Hortensius, having I know not what instinct which oblig'd him to trust to his fortune, he put himself into an equipage of a man of his quality (of which he was ignorant) who travels with no great train, leaving to his destiny the care of providing means to make it subsist. Wherefore accompanied with two slaves, he went directly towards Tempe, which I shall not stay to describe to you, though I have some desire to do it, because it is the most pleasing place that ever I beheld, and whose pleasant prospect occasion'd the endangering of the life of Hortensius. Hold, I beseech you (said Valeria, interrupting Merigenes) speed not so fast, but tell us something of the delectable site of that place, which all the world commends. For my part (said Aurelia) I was once design'd to go on purpose from Africa to Thessaly, to have the pleasure of walking there. Let us go thither presently (said Plotia) for I believe if Merigenes describe it to us, we shall know what excellency of contrivance, nature has shewn in it, as well as if we had been there. As for me (said Cassonia) I never was against walking. It needs (said Herminius) to be of a bad humour to break this off; and therefore I conceive Merigenes has nothing to do but to prepare himself to make a handsome description: for I take it as granted, Æmilius and Themistus will not disgust it. Both which answering like persons who wish'd whatsoever the company desir'd, Merigenes pursued his discourse in this manner. Tempe is situate between the Mountains Ossa and Olympus which are two the highest of Thessaly, in which there are about thirty four. The length of this famous Valley is four hundred furlongs: for the breadth, it is sufficiently unequal, for in some places it is broader, and in some more contracted. In the midst of this delightful Vale, slides the River Peneus, which being swell'd, by the accesse of four other pleasant Rivers is capable of bearing Boats of a considerable size. But that which is remarkable in it, is, that the River Eurotas, which Homer calls Titaretis, and which discharges it self into the River Peneus, does not mingle its own waters with his. For they are distinguishable by the difference of their colour. So that, as if the River Peneus bare disdain to the other, having passed some space together without mixing their waters, it casts the River Eurotas on one side, and they both separate without joyning streams. But the greatest Ornament of the valley of Tempe, is the intwining of Ivy about all the Trees that grow there, from their roots to the top, so that nothing is seen there but a lovely universal verdure: there is also an Herb admirably grateful to the eye, called called Smilax, which climbs along the Trees, and reflecting downwards like a wild Vine, wholly covers the Earth. Whereby, as I said before, this pleasant valley becomes green all over. There are also seen by the Rivers side, both on the right hand and left, little Woods of Myrtles and Laurels, which offer their shadow to those which pass by. And that which renders this place yet more agreeable, is, that under these shades, several little Brooks purle along, the waters of which are not only pleasant to drink, but excellent for health. There is also a great multitude of Birds which delight in this rare Desart, both by reason of the number of Trees, Thickets, and Rivers, and for the calmness and quiet which perpetually reigns there. Moreover, the River Peneus, after having as it were precipitated it self at the entrance of this Valley, seems to be delighted in it, and slides so slowly, that you would think his stream were asleep. Many Islands appear in his Channel, which serve to embellish both the River and the Valley. As for the people thereabouts, they believing it a place particularly agreeable to the gods, make choice of it to perform sacrifices in, imagining their vows more favourably heard from thence than elsewhere. Which occasions that they which pass through this place alwaies find the air in it perfum'd, either by the incense of sacrifices which are continually offered there, or by the flowers which grow abundantly in this lovely Vally. The Thessalonians say, that Apollo having slain the Serpent Pytho, came thither to purifie himself by the commandment of Jupiter; after which he was crowned with Laurel, whereof the banks of the River Peneus are plentifully beset. They report also that after his having been crown'd, he took a bough of the same Laurel, and went to Delphos, and put himself in possession of the Oracle there, which is so universally celebrated. In proof of this truth, they shew strangers an Altar, where they affirm he was crown'd, and took that Laurel I speak of. But however it be, all the young people of Delphos go, under the conduct of a Captain, every year to offer a sacrifice at Tempe, in memory of Apollo, and return home crown'd with Laurel, singing Hymns and Pæans in celebration of his glory. They pass by the way which they call Pythia, that is to say by Dagonia, Ethe, the Enians, Melians, Dorians, Lorians, Herperians; all which several Nations accompany those Delphick youths with very much honour, as they of Delphos accompany those which come to Tempe from more remote regions. But that which renders this Valley yet more extraordinary, is this, That all those you meet with there, behave themselves reverently, as in a place consecrated to Apollo, and no unpleasing object offends the eye. Moreover, those two high Mountains which are at one end of the Valley, whose steepness is gradually diminisht as they come further distant from the mouth of the River Peneus where it enters into the Sea, serve to add more handsomness to it. For the place whereby they descend into it, is stony, craggy, unequal, rustical and wild; that the Valley appears more delightful by the rudeness of the entrance. The opinion of the inhabitants of the Countrey is, that these two Mountains were separated by an Earthquake, before which time the River Peneus having no out-let from this place into the Sea, overflow'd the whole Countrey. And thus you have the prospect of the famous valley of Tempe which Hortensius was desirous to see in his way to Thessaly. And he accordingly contented his curiosity, being so charmed with the delightfulness of the place, that he resolv'd to abide there three or four daies, that he might see the famous Assembly of Delphos I mention'd, which was to be precisely at the time of his being there. He understood also, that the Sister of the Prince of the Messenians, who was then at war with a neighbor Prince, was coming to offer sacrifice in the valley of Tempe, to implore victory for the Prince her Brother. But two days being to be staid out, Hortensius, who was dextrous at all sorts of exercises, and a great lover of hunting at that time, not knowing the Laws of the Countrey, betook himself to walk along the River Peneus, causing a Bow and Arrows to be carried by one of his slaves, with intention to make use of the same against some wild Beast, if he met any; for he was singular in the art of shooting. Going therefore one morning to walk in this manner, he perceiv'd something moving cross the reeds. And as they who love such divertisement are more curious than others in the like occasions, he drew near it, and saw it was a great Stork which had seiz'd on a Serpent. Hortensius being stirr'd up with the ardor of a young marks-man, who loves to shew his dexterity, took his Bow, and shot the Bird so fatally, that he deliver'd the Serpent from being devour'd by it. But he had scarce done this, when six arm'd Thessalians, who were reposing in a little grove of Laurel not far from thence, came forth suddenly from the place they were in, and set upon him, endeavouring to take him: For you must know, Madam, there is a Law amongst the Thessalians, which forbids the killing of Storks, upon pain of death, because Thessaly being subject to be infested with a prodigious multitude of Serpents, which are a delightful food to these Fowls, they look upon them as Sacred Birds sent them by the gods to deliver them from those Serpents and Vipers. But Hortensius, who had never heard speak of this Law, believ'd those which set upon him to be people that intended to rob him; for understanding not their language very well, which is different from the Greek spoken at Corinth, he observ'd not that they call'd him impious and sacrilegious; and therefore only betook himself to his defence. Which he stood to with a very Heroick courage: for though they were six against him, and he had only one slave unarm'd on his side, yet he wounded three of those that assaulted him, and fought a long while without being able to be taken. But at length four other Thessalians coming to joyn with the former, and his sword being broken, he was constrain'd to yield to the number, and render himself. Which he had no sooner done, but he found himself treated like a criminal, and was led by them to a City, which is at the foot of the Mountain Olympus, to the end, that upon their accusation (before him that administred justice in that place) of having seen him kill a Stork, which was eating a Serpent, he might receive sentence of death, according to the Law of the Countrey. Now it happened as they were leading him along with all the rigor superstition is able to inspire people with, representing cruelty to be zeal of Religon, they met a Chariot full of Ladies within a little distance from the Gates of the City, attended by several men on horseback. She who seem'd Mistress of the rest, was fair, and of a goodly aspect, having a kind of air in her face, bespeaking much goodness. This person, who was nam'd Andronice, and Sister to the Prince of the Messenians, beholding so comely a person as Hortensius, and so well cloath'd, led so rudely by ten men, three of which were wounded, desired them to stay a little, and give her the satisfaction of knowing what crime the person they led had committed. The Thessalians judging her a person of high quality, and of a commanding Beauty, told her the crime of Hortensius, adding that he should be cast headlong from a Rock the next morning. This they spoke more clearly than they had done when they assaulted Hortensius, who now understood, as well as Andronice, of what he was accus'd, and the danger impendent over him. Upon which understanding of his cause, addressing himself to the Princess, who seem'd so obligingly to interess her self in his fortune; I will believe, Madam, (said he; for she spake the same language with him) that the gods have sent you hither to save the life af a stranger, who knowing not the Laws of the Countrey, hath committed a crime innocently. For though I am habited in a Grecian garb, I am so far from being a Thessalian, that I was not born in any part of Greece. Therefore I have reason to hope you will take upon you my protection, in a Countrey where I am unknown to all. 'Tis not (added he with great resolution) for that I am much enamour'd on life, or have any great fear of death; but as I believe it a folly to despise the former too much, and a weakness to be over-apprehensive of the latter, so I believe it no disparagement to the greatness of courage, to beseech your protection; for though I know well you are not of this Countrey, nevertheless I presume, your condition and your beauty may easily gain you an interest wherever you desire it. Hortensius utter'd these words with so noble an air, that Andronice's heart was much affected with it. But the Thessalians perceiving this discourse might obstruct their design, interrupted it, and forced Hortensius to follow them, especially they who beheld their bloud still flowing from the wounds which he had given them. Yet as Virtue sometimes finds admiration in the breast of the most brutish, there was one of these Thessalians who staid behind the rest, and approaching towards the Chariot of Andronice, told the Princess, that since the man was a stranger, she would do honorably to have commiseration on him, and assured her that he never met with a greater valour than his; after which, he went and joyn'd himself to his companions. In the mean while Andronice, who observ'd Hortensius had the aspect of a man of quality, and spoke well, that he was courageous and innocent, took up a firm resolution to save his life; and therefore she commanded him that drove her Chariot, to go to the same place whither those people went, which conducted the prisoner; and so she arriv'd at the house of him who was to pronounce the sentence on Hortensius at the very same time with him. Who causing it to be known who she was, she was received with respect, and spoke of Hortensius's case, before those who brought him could be heard. Whose true relation of the matter to the Judge, sensibly affected him with the misfortune of Hortensius; but he told her that the Law he had broken was so rigorously observed in Thessaly, that it was hard to save him. Andronice answer'd him, that the quality of a stranger mitigated the fact; But he reply'd, it was suppos'd a stranger ought to be inform'd of the customs of the place whither he goes, and that as soon as a man enters into any Countrey, he becomes subject to the Laws of the same, adding, that it belonged to the people to grant this kind of grace, because they were most concern'd in the crime; and, in summ, that all he could do, was to suspend his judgement, and refer the business to the people. Andronice finding him so inflexible, us'd more mollifying language to him, and did it so effectually, that he promis'd to save the life of this stranger, and to handle the matter so, that the people should consent to it. Nevertheless it behov'd Hortensius to be in prison at present; but the next morning the Princess Andronice acted so happily, that the people pardon'd this illustrious criminal; and as the Thessalians are the least intelligent amongst the Greeks, they made him engage to bring or send another Stork into Thessaly, to the end he might be reputed innocent. As soon as he was free, he went to tender his remerciaments to Andronice, which he did with so good a grace, that she accounted her self well recompens'd for the service she had done him. But after she had imposed silence to his acknowledgements of the favour he receiv'd, she demanded of him, of what Countrey he was, whither he was going, what design brought him into Thessaly, and what he sought there. For the place of my birth, Madam (said he to her) it is not permitted me to tell you it; but for the other things you ask me, I shall inform you that I came to Tempe only out of curiosity, and my next purpose is to go to the War in Thessaly, to the end I may perform some action, which may render me worthy the protection which I have receiv'd from you. Since you seek nothing but glory (answer'd she) come and seek it in the Army of the Prince of Messena my Brother. It being for the happy success of his Arms that I am come into Thessaly, so I shall believe my vows have been heard, if I can bring him a person so courageous as you: for whereas being single you were able to keep your self from being taken by six men well appointed; and there needed ten to overcome you; when you come to be in an Army which hitherto has not been unprosperous, you will without question do things which shall be equally advantageous both to him that does them, and for whose interest they are exploited. Hortensius hearing these words of Andronice, was extreamly joyful at them; for having no particular design, he was highly pleas'd in finding so commodious an occasion as this, and therefore he receiv'd this offer with joy, and assured Andronice, that he should esteem himself absolutely happy in hazarding the life she had preserved to him, in the service of the Prince her brother. Accordingly he prepar'd himself to follow her so soon as she had dispacht the sacrifice she was determin'd to offer: And not to insist upon matters of small moment, I shall tell you in few words, that Andronice having perform'd what she ought to the gods, and seen all the excellencies of the Valley of Tempe, return'd from thence, accompanied by Hor-

tensius. She had with her two persons of quality, with whom Hortensius soon contracted a friendship. During the journey, Andronice very much augmented the esteem she had conceiv'd of Hortensius, for she found him so full of spirit, so prudent, and so respectful, that he pleas'd her infinitely. Hortensius on the other side observ'd a thousand agreeable qualities in this Princess, besides her beauty, which was not mean.

But it fell out, that as they were crossing a Wood a little before Sun-set, they heard a great noise of horses, and within a moment after saw about fifty horsemen with their swords in their hands coming to surround the Chariot of Andronice. The Princess had scarce cast her eyes upon the people which inclos'd her, but she espied a Lover of hers, nam'd Attalus, whom she hated in perfection. So that not doubting but he intended to take her away, Ah Hortensius! (cry'd she, looking about for him) you may now render me more than the life you owe me, by hindring me from being taken away by the Traitor Attalus. At these words, Hortensius, who had already drawn his sword, went with ten or twelve other Horsemen, who attended on Andronice, directly towards Attalus, whom he easily discover'd to be maker of the rest. But for that this incensed Lover sought not to fight, but only design'd to carry away his Mistriss, Hortensius could not overcome him so soon as he would, by reason Attalus had contriv'd to order his followers to take Andronice out of her Chariot and put her into his Arms, that so he might carry her away, whilst they kept the Princesses attendants in fight. For he was determined to take sanctuary in that wood, where there stood an old Castle, of which the Master was his friend. But Hortensius being zealous to acquit himself to the full of what he ought Andronice, broke thorow those that oppos'd his passage, and having first slain one and wounded two, encountred with Attalus, whose valour was known to all that knew his person. There began a very sharp fight between these two Gallants, while those who accompany'd Andronice, defended themselves against the party of Attalus. By the number of which they had without question been overpower'd, if Hortensius, who was resolv'd either to conquer or dye, had not shew'd extraordinary courage, and made haste to dispatch the head of those people, who were twice as many as those they fought against. For the sense of glory and gratitude redoubled his natural valour, which being seconded by favour of Fortune, he wounded Attalus in three places, and the last pass that he made at him, running him through the body, he fell down as dead at his horses feet. Which his followers perceiving, some run to succor him, others set upon Hortensius to revenge their Master, and part of those who environ'd Andronice's Chariot, fled. But the first victory elevating the heart of Hortensius, advantag'd him to a second, he soon ridding himself of those who assaulted him after the fall of Attalus, whom some of his own carried off, whilst the attendants of Andronice, seconding the courage of Hortensius, help'd him to compleat the conquest. Thus having put to flight or slain all that had attacked them, the Chariot proceeded again forward; and Hortensius marching still, to the end he might be first in fighting, in case they should be follow'd, was happy enough to come off in this adventure, without being wounded, though his cloaths were pierc'd in several places. 'Tis true, there were three of the Princess of Messena's people so wounded, that it was requisite to leave them at the next village they came to. Andronice for more surety, would not stay at the place where she had purposed to lodge, but went on as far as the horses were able to go, that she might be as remote as possible from a place, where so cruel an adventure had befallen her. I omit to repeat to you, Madam, the Princesses discourse to Hortensius upon the way, and at her arrival at the place where she was to repose: for I have so many other things to tell you, that I ought not to trouble you with circumstances of no importance; and moreover, you may easily imagine, what a grateful Princess, and of much wit, might say in this occurrent, and what might be answer'd by a modest Cavalier, who still believ'd he had receiv'd more than he had return'd. But I shall tell you that Hortensius, who was ingenious, sought occasion to be instructed of the state of the Court whither he was going, to the end he might deport himself there with more prudence. The late accident encreased his curiosity much more; and therefore having contracted friendship with two persons of quality, who accompanied this Princess, especially with one, who was called Eumenes, and possess'd both Virtue and Wit, he began one evening a private Converse with him in this manner: Generous Eumenes, (said he, after several protestations of friendship) I beseech you, please to instruct an unhappy stranger, who already looks upon Messena as his Countrey, since he can hope to gain such a friend there as you. Being you are a person of much merit (answer'd Eumenes) I shall be very ready to inform you with sincerity; for the Court you are going to, is much more hard to be well understood, than you imagine; and the War in which the Prince Melantius is engag'd, more troublesome than you may at present conceive it: And therefore perhaps it will not be unprofitable to you to grant you what you request. But is it not the War (said Hortensius) which the Prince of Messena is engag'd in against Elis, which is a Countrey of no great extent? Yes, answer'd Eumenes, but for that 'tis a Countrey consecrated to the gods, the design of usurping it seems criminal to almost all the Republicks of Greece, and especially to those of Peloponnesus, as you may know, because you liv'd a while at Corinth. I know it well (replyed Hortensius) having not been so long at Corinth, without hearing people speak of Elis, Pisa, and the famous Temple of Olympia, and knowing all the priviledges of that Countrey, which was consecrated to the gods, after the antient War of the Heraclida.

I believe indeed (interpos'd Plotina pleasantly) Hortensius knew all this; but being Valeria, Cesonia, and my self knew nothing at all thereof, I beseech you make not so much speed, but tell us all you know of Elis, Pisa, and Olympia; for the confus'd talk I have heard of them, makes me desirous to be better inform'd, especially, since I know it is the Countrey of Elismonda. Valeria and Cesonia testifying they had the same desires with Plotina, Merigenes, resum'd his discourse in these terms.

That

That which you would know, Madam, is undoubtedly worthy of your knowledge; and, to speak truly, almost as necessary to be known by you; for understanding the sequel of this History, as it was profitable to be known by Hortensius, in order to his being benefited by the counsels of Eumenes. Nevertheless I shall omit to relate to you all which tradition tells us, concerning the original of those Nations. For the Messenians themselves say, they were the Subjects of Menelaus, son of Atreus, and brother of Agamemnon, King of Sparta; that afterwards the Nephews of Helle were their Masters; and since, a Prince of Cyparissa, called Melanthus, drove out those which reign'd, and made himself Sovereign of the Country, whose successors ever since have rul'd in Messenia. For the Prince of Messenia, brother of the Princess Andronice, is named Melanthus, as he was from whom he pretends to be descended; and he might reign peaceably, did not ambition excite him to rush into the War he is engag'd in. For he might well enough have been contented with the Country of Messena, being so good and pleasant, that only Laconia is comparable to it: it is neither too cold in Winter, nor too hot in Summer; and the River Pamisus, which hastens rapidly to unite with the Sea, cuts so commodiously thorough the middle of it, that all the Inhabitants of the Country partake in the benefits which the River brings. This Territory is bounded on one side with the Sea, and on the other is environ'd with Laconia, Arcadia, and a small corner of Land called Triphilia, scited between Pisa and Messenia. But, Madam, because it is more important for you to be inform'd of the Country which the Prince Melanthus designed to usurp, than that of his own, I must be a little more large in describing to you the Principality of Elis, than I have been in that of Messenia. Elis, the principal City, and from whence the whole Province is denominated, is, notwithstanding, none of the most antient of Peloponnesus, for it was not in being in the daies of Homer; yet it is so famous for a hundred other respects, (as also are Pisa and Olympia, which lie very near together) that there is none more. As for the Princes of Pisa, they were heretofore very powerful; Oenemaus and Pelops his successor, who were Soveraigns thereof, are known throughout all the world for their glorious adventures. But I am not willing to trouble you with a long rehearsal of those antient Wars, which caus'd confusion in all Greece, and principally in Peloponnesus; I shall only unfold matters past so far, as may suffice to shew you the rise of those extraordinary priviledges, which the Countreys of Elis, Pisa, and Olympia have enjoyed for so many ages. You must know then, that after a long War of the Heraclidæ, who had the Æsolians on their side, against the Epeians; Pyrecmenus of Æsolia, who was General of the Heraclidæ, propos'd to the Commander of the enemies, whose name was Degmenus, that they might conclude their differences by a single and decisive combate, in the sight of their Armies. Which being accepted and resolv'd on, the day and place was appointed; the Troops were drawn up in battalia on both sides, and the Combat was performed by Perecmenus, General of the Heraclidæ, and Degmenus of the Epeians. This last came to the Encounter with no other Arms than his Bow and Arrows, but the first brought a Sling and Stones; for they had not agreed what weapons they would use. But at last Pyrecmenus kill'd his enemy, and therefore detetmin'd to possess himself of the Countrey in controversie between them, and drive out all the Elæans from Elis. But because the vanquisht pretended dissatisfaction of the victory of Pyrecmenus, in regard of the inequality of their Arms, the neighbouring people interposing themselves to accommode the matter, found out an expedient to do it, which was accepted with joy by both parties. The proposal was, That the Territory which they made War for, might be consecrated to the gods: And accordingly by the consent of both parties, and of all the neighboring people of Elis, Pisa, and Olympia, all this lovely Countrey, and particularly the City of Elis, was consecrated to Jupiter. But the better to signifie that it was under the protection of the gods, and needed not to be defended by men, it was resolved that it should never be wall'd about, and a declaration made, that whoever attempted to take it, should be held for a sacrilegious person; and in case it happened the Elæans were oblig'd to give passage to any Forces of the neighboring Regions, they should not go through this of Elis, with their Arms in their hands; but on the contrary, as soon as such Troops should come to the frontier of this Countrey, they should lay aside their Arms which the Elæans should transport for them in Carriages, and not render the same till they were arriv'd to the confines of their small State. On these conditions, Pyrecmenus was invested in the Soveraignty of the Countrey, and took care of the Temple of Jupiter, with consent of all the adjacent States, who engag'd themselves by oath never to violate the priviledges accorded to Elis. They report also, that at this time divers ceremonies in the Olympick Games were renew'd, and that thence-forward the people of Elis became rich and happy; for while their neighbors were at war, they enjoy'd a profound peace, and enricht themselves by others infelicities, so that they might have been judg'd the most happy people of all Greece, for their Countrey is the most sweet and pleasant that can be imagin'd. Two Rivers there are which extreamly imbellish it; one called Peneus, as well as that of Tempe, in the source of which, there is one thing very remarkable; for near the City of Megalopolis there are two Springs, each of which produce a River; the Peneus I speak of is one, and the River Eurotas the other. But after these two Rivers have pass'd for some space, without being much separated, they both hide themselves under the earth, where finding out ways unknown to men, the one issues forth again in Laconia, and the other in Elis. But besides the River Peneus which passes through the fair City of Elis, there is the River Alpheus, which coming out of Arcadia, passeth near Pisa and Olympia, on whose Banks the Olympick Games are celebrated, which are assuredly the most magnificent sports of all Greece. This great Festival is celebrated in a Wood of wild Olives, about three hundred furlongs from Elis. But this River which comes from Arcadia, and opens into the Sea towards the West, on the side of Sicily, and which is so known over all the World, for the love they say he bears to Arethusa, whom he hastens to find in the Island of Ortygia, without without mingling his waters with those of the Sea, is not only pleasant but commodious; for being swelled up by a very great number of other Rivers, of which the most considerable are Enipeus, Celadon, and Erimanthus, it bears very great vessels, which serve for the commerce of the Country; which is so much the more pleasant, in that all the region which is inclos'd between Achaia, Arcadia, and Messena, is beset with a great number of small Temples, dedicated to Diana, Venus, and the Nymphs, in little Woods of Myrtle, all over embellish'd with Flowers, and irrigated with Springs and Rivulets. Almost all the great Roads have Temples dedicated to Mercury, and by the Sea-shore are seen many consecrated to Neptune. There is one also dedicated to Pallas, which is not very far distant from Olympia, near to which is the Mountain of Philaceus, which seems to separate Arcadia, and the Countrey of Elis; for the foot of it reaches near to Pisa. As for the Temple of Jupiter, being I shall have occasion to speek of it in another place of my story, I shall not now stay to do it, but tell you, to return where I was, that the Eleans after a long enjoyment of the priviledges which had been granted them, were twice invaded, but always to the disadvantage of those who made war upon them. For a Son of the Prince of the Messenians, named Melanthus, whose Mother was of the race of that Degmenus who was overcome, designing to renew that antient War, undertook the same to his own destruction; and another going about to attempt the like was as unfortunate as he. But to return at length to the discourse of Eumenes, with Hortensius; You shall know (said he) that the present Prince of the Messenians, brother of the Princess Andronice, being born with an ambition, which will never suffer him to live in quiet, though he should have conquer'd all Greece, has believ'd he shall be more happy than his forefathers, and that he could not find a more favourable time to invade the Country of Elis than this, wherein he is peaceful master of his own State. The Prince his Father, who di'd two years since, left him excessively rich, whereby he is sufficiently provided of Forces, Ships, and Ammunition for the design. He is young, gallant, sprightly, of a daring courage; and had he but something more humanity, and a little better conduct to manage the advantages which nature hath given him, he would be a very great Prince. But he hath defects so apparent to all the world, that it is not easie to determine what rank to give him. That which encourag'd him to undertake the War, was the great age of the Prince of Elis; who besides, had but one daughter, which is the Princess Elismonda, and having pass'd his whole life in peace, might be thought unfit to bear up against a War. And a greater inducement to undertake the same was, that a Prince under his dominions, a very gallant Person, called the Prince of Cyparissa, having been exil'd by the late Prince of Messena, was retir'd to the Prince of Elis, and according to report, was very favourably entertain'd by him. Whence, upon a jealousie that he might marry Elismonda, and a fear that one of his subjects should be his neighbor, his equal, and his allie, he resolv'd to denounce war against the Prince of Elis: which he did with the greater confidence, for that all the States of Peloponnesus being at that time accustomed to peace, he did not fear lest they would trouble their own quiet to intermeddle in the affairs of another, though the priviledges of Elis requir'd all the neighboring Provinces to take Arms for its defence. And thus he accordingly took up a resolution to make the War. The Princess his Sister, who is admirably prudent above the custom of her years, did all she could, out of a sentiment of piety, to avert him from invading a Countrey so particularly under the protection of the gods. But he smilingly answering her, that in Homer the gods took sides as well as men, and therefore he hop'd he should not be abandon'd by all the Deities, follow'd his design, and took no other care but to accomplish it happily. About that time Attalus, whom you lately fought with, and who is a person of the highest quality in Messena, became very amorous of Andronice. And believing if he serv'd the Prince Melanthus bravely in the War, he might more easily obtain his sister, he did his utmost to signize his zeal and his courage before him; which much afflicted Andronice, who had ever such an aversion against Attalus, as virtuous persons could not disapprove: for though Attalus wants no heraldry, nor courage, nor magnificence, nor wit, yet he is very odious because he hath neither goodness nor generosity. But to hasten to tell what you are desirous to know: The Prince of Messena began the War, upon colour of that antient quarrel I mention'd to you before; for you know, Policy will never suffer the ambitious to want pretences. At first the Prince of Elis, who desir'd only to dye in peace, and saw himself unfurnisht of requisites to maintain a War, because a rich and unmarshall'd people is fit only to be conquer'd, us'd all possible means to enter into Treaty with the Prince of Messena, and sent him word, that he would have offer'd him the Princess his daughter in marriage, if the Laws of Elis would have permitted him to give her to a Prince who is Soveraign of another State, or one who is not able to circumscribe his ambition within the bounds of Elis. The Prince of Cyparissa us'd all possible perswasions to hinder the Father of the fair Elismonda from making propositions of peace so advantageous to his enemy. But this virtuous Prince being already sensible of the approaches of death, and knowing that he could not longer practise any other virtues but those of peace, omitted nothing he believ'd conducive to avert the War. But all his endeavors prov'd fruitless; for Melanthus made no longer negotiation about peace, than serv'd to amuse him, whilst he was preparing for the War. Whereupon, the Prince of Elis perceiving no means of bringing his enemy to reason, provided for his defence, with all diligence the weakness of his age was capable of. The Prince of Cyparissa omitted nothing for his part, which lay in his power to do in behalf of a Prince, who had given him Sanctuary in his Court, and to which the love he had for Elismonda, whom he passionately serv'd, oblig'd him, though he had hitherto preserv'd his affection undiscover'd to her in his own breast. The Prince of Elis sent to the adjecent States to summon them to defend Elis, in accomplishment of the Engagements their Ancestors had made to do so. But whilst all those Nations had the matter under deliberation, Melanthus enters into Elis in the head of a considerable Army: whereby the Eleans saw themselves invaded, and unprovided for such an invasion, and altogether succorless. Yet the zeal of their Countrey effecting that in them, which use and skill in War does in others, they defended themselves better than was believ'd, and the Prince of Elis, notwithstanding his age, put himself in the head of his Army, and fought in person. He had the advantage of his enemies at the first encounter of their forces, and beat them back; but at the second, this prudent Prince was constrain'd to retire into Elis, to endeavour to put the young Princess his daughter into the Castle of Pisa (for he had lost the Princess his wife awhile before) believing Elismonda would be there in greater safety. For this purpose he left the Prince of Cyparissa with his Troops, to give stop to the enemy, whilst he made his retreat, and took order to put Olympia into a condition of being defended. But this Prince being old, and of a crazy health, upon his arrival to Elis, he fell into an extream sickness, which within two days, ended his Life and Reign. During which, the young Elismonda, preferring being present with a dying Father, before providing for her own security, continu'd with him till he expir'd; and afterwards this fair and generous Princess, being unwilling to leave the body of her Father to the power of the Enemies (who approach'd nearer Elis every day, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Prince of Cyrarissa) caus'd it to to be plac'd in a Chariot, and taking another for her self and a Lady of high quality, and great virtue, she left a City destitute of Walls, and took the way towards Pisa. But as it fell out unhappily for her, Melanthus who had his spies in Elis, being inform'd of her departure, and of the death of the Prince of Elis, dispatcht Attalus with a body of horse to go and surprise her in the way: who march'd with such diligence that he overtook this young Princess before she could reach to Pisa: When being destitute of a Convoy to resist him, she saw her self abandon'd by all her attendants, and constrain'd to remain in her Chariot with the Lady which accompanied her, and that with the cruel necessity of beholding the fierce Attalus not only become master of her liberty, but also inhumanely commanding the body of the Prince of Elis, to be cast into the River Alpheus which ran hard by, to the end the sight of that dead Prince might not excite valour in the heart of the people by exciting compassion in them towards the Conquer'd and hatred against the Conquerors. The young Princess of Elis hearing this cruel command, made the most passionate Treaties to him in the world, and accompany'd her words with such a flood of tears, that she obtain'd at length, that the body of the Prince her Father, should be plac'd in a little Temple, not above six or seven furlongs distant from the place where they were, and order given to him that took care of it, to perform the last offices to that virtuous Prince. This done, Attalus put himself upon his march to conduct Elismonda towards the Army of the Prince of Messena: but upon the way he heard there had been a fight, that the Prince of Cyparissa had had the worst, having understood of the death of the Prince of Elis, and the departure of Elismonda, who had sent to advertise him of it, he thought himself to retire to the same place whither the Princess was gone, judging it necessary to abandon the City of Elis, and only provide to defend himself in Pisa. And moreover, that Love inciting this Prince to go where Elismonda was he had not demurr'd what he ought to do, but took way, in which it would be difficult for the Prince of Messena to force him to fight, by reason there were many streights in it; and having pass'd the first before, that Prince perceiv'd his retreat, there was no likelyhood he could follow him. Attalus also understood that Melanthus intending to possess himself of Elis, for the glory of his victory, had sack'd the City, the inhabitants of which having lately lost their Prince, seen the flight of the young Princess, and learnt the defeat of the Prince of Cyparissa, believ'd it the best course to surrender to the Conqueror, and so hinder their City from being pillaged. And accordingly they sent Commissioners to Melanthus, who promis'd them all they desir'd; but kept his promise not over-carefully; for they were very evilly and barbarously treated. This intelligence caus'd Attalus to change his course, to the end he might not meet with the Troops of the Prince of Cyparissa, but rather go directly where the Prince of Messena was. Yet he would not carry Elismonda into the City of Elis, without first knowing the pleasure of Melanthus. Wherefore he stay'd four furlongs off from the City, to expect the return of one of his followers whom he sent to him for that purpose. But this Prince having by promising the inhabitants of Elis to use them civilly, oblig'd them to deliver a Castle into his hands, which nature alone had impregnably fortifi'd, situate about fifteen furlongs from Elis, he sent order to Attalus to conduct the Princess thither, and to place as many men in the Castle, as was requisite to guard her safely. Attalus accordingly carried her to this Castle, together with that Lady of quality I told you she had chosen, and four women to attend on her, sending all the rest into Elis, and going thither also himself soon after, to give Melanthus an account of what had pass'd. Where after awhile, Attalus being a violent man, and the Prince of Messena not being able to endure any to resist him, at the Council of War that was held, the judgement of Attalus being opposite to that of Melanthus, each of both maintain'd his own with very great stiffness and pertinacy. The opinion of Melanthus was, That it was not fit to give the Prince of Cyparissa leasure tō fortfie himself in Pisa, and make use of the name of the Princess Elismonda to continue the War; but that it were requisite to go and set upon him without losing time. Attalus on the other side judg'd it necessary to put Elis into defence before going to expose his forces to a new battel with the Prince of Cyparissa, who was too magnanimous to suffer himself to be inclos'd in Pisa, without having once again experienc'd the fortune of War: That his forces would be recruited by the Inhabitants of Pisa and Olympia; and in case it should happen the Prince of Messena had the worst, he would find that his enterprise was no advantage to him; whereas on the contrary, when he once had fortifi'd Elis, which was easily put into defence, in case he should be worsted in the battel he would still be master of the City which gives name to the Countrey he intended to conquer. Attalus, according to his violent humour and boldness, having express'd all these reasons, added some ambi-

gious words, which being subject to be construed in a manner injurious to Melanthus, offended this Prince so highly, that being transported with choler, Hold thy peace Attalus, (said he to him) and since you are already so weary of fighting, that you have need of rest, go and take your rest at home, and depart this very day. Whereupon Attalus, who believed Melanthus very much obliged to him for having taken Elismonda, answered yet more insolently than before; which farther incensing Melanthus, he broke up the Council, and commanded Attalus to depart forthwith out of Elis. Who being a person much hated, there was none that interceded to make his peace; and so he went away without being observed out of the City. And it was not then known to any what was become of him; but when the Princess Andronice took her journey to accomplish the vow she had made to go and offer a sacrifice to Apollo, in the same place where they report Daphne was heretofore Metamorphos'd into a Laurel, there was spread a rumor at Messenia, that he had put himself into Pisa, towards which, the Prince Melanthus was upon the way at the time we left Messenia, to go to Tempe. But now (continued Eumenes to Hortensius) you have seen that that report was false, since had it not been for your valor, he had carried away Andronice, as well out of revenge as love. But lastly, generous Hortensius, remember I conjure you, when you come to be with Melanthus, that I have told you this day, that he is a Prince with whom 'tis the most difficult thing in the world to be in favor long together; because he is naturally distrustful, and easily suspects another of all things which he has the power to commit. As for the Princess Andronice, I have nothing but honorable to say of her, and I am so strongly linked to her interests, that I exhort you as much as I can to endeavor to ingratiate your self with the Prince her Brother, to the end you may be able sometimes to moderate part of the impetuousness of his humor. I know he is a lover of novelty, that you are a person fit to please him, and the action you have lately done against Attalus, will soon bring you into a condition of becoming his favorite if you please, and therefore I conjure you not to resist it, unless your affairs call you elsewhere, but to ingage your self in the interests of the Princess Andronice. I must be the vilest of men, (answered Hortensius) if I could separate my self from them; but I beseech you, generous Eumenes, (added he) make me a promise that you will always assist me with your counsels of which I apprehend I shall have very great need. While they were in this discourse, it was told them that there was one newly arrived, sent from the Prince of Messenia to the Princess, who brought her news which very much afflicted her. This caused them to go immediately to wait upon her, who told them Melanthus had sent some to meet her in the way she was to pass, and give her notice that she should not go by the ordinary way, when she came to the Frontier, because having been disadvantaged in two Battels as he advanced towards Pisa, he was enforced to make speed to a place of security near Elis, till new forces were levyed for him in Messenia. Hortensius had no sooner heard what the Princess told Eumenes and him, but he conjur'd her she would please to make hast to depart thence, that so having first conducted her to Messenia, he might go offer his Sword to the Prince of Melanthus. Andronice, who was before resolved upon that which Hortensius requested, and believed she could not too speedily go as far as possible from a place, where she was in danger to have been carried away, though she were already at a good distance from it, disposed all things to set forward immediately. But, in brief, Madam, not to mispend your patience, with exact relation of the way the Princess took, it suffices that you know Eumenes, who was no Stranger in the Countrey, conducted her so happily, that she arrived at Messene, without having met any Troops of the Prince of Cyparissa, or incurred any dangerous adventure. As soon as she was there, Hortensius and Eumenes took leave of her, to go to the Army of Melanthus. But though Andronice gave charge to Eumenes to represent handsomly to the Prince her Brother, the obligation she had to Hortensius, yet she omitted not to give this generous Veientine, a Letter to the Prince of Messenia, which ran almost in these terms.

The Princess Andronice, to the Prince Melanthus.

WHen you understand that this generous Stranger who delivers you my Letter, rescued me from being carried away by the precipitous Attalus, and that his valor revenged you of the insolence of that ingrateful Subject, I assure my self you will receive him according to the greatness of his merit. For which reason I am not importunate with you to do so, the intention of my writing being only to tell, that I shall have an interest in all the favors which my Deliverer shall receive from you, and that if the Prayers I have made to the Gods for the prosperity of your Arms be heard, the Victory which you shall gain, will soon end the War, and speedily return you to Messene, where you are passionately desired by

Hortensius, received this Letter from the hands of Andronice, for whom he had a very high respect, very great admiration, and much gratitude and tenderness without any mixture of Love, Andronice on the other side esteemed him infinitely, and felt in her heart a great inclination to prefer him above all the friends she had ever had to that time not excepting Eumenes, to whom notwithstanding she bare a very sincere friendship. So that the parting of Andronice and Hortensius was with as much kindness as if their friendship had been of a far elder date: The Countrey of Messenia, being of no great extent, and only a little corner of earth between it and that of Elis, named Triphylia, by reason it was sometimes inhabited by three different sort of people, before it was united to Elis. Hortensius and Eumenes were soon at the Camp of Melanthus; and they arrived there so happily to be well received, that Hortensius and Eumenes presented themselves before the Prince of Messenia, and the former delivered him the Letter of the Princess Andronice, just as he was coming forth of the Council of War, where it had been resolved to fight the enemy the next morning, or force him to quit the Pass which he possessed. for the fresh Troops of Messenia had been joined to the Army of Melanthus, two days ago. Hortensius having a noble aspect, and magnificent garb, his presence easily confirmed the commendations which the Letter of the Princess Andronice, and Eumenes expressed of him. For Melanthus, after having read what the Princess his Sister had writ to him, and heard what Eumenes said to the advantage of Hortensius; This generous Stranger (said he, turning to Eumenes, and pointing towards Hortensius) could not arrive more opportunely for his own glory, and the benefit of my occasions, since I shall soon give him place to signalize his valor against a more worthy enemy than the insolent Attalus. Hortensius answered to this discourse with all the honorable confidence becoming a brave man, and together with all the modesty becoming an intelligent and discreet person. After which, Melcanthus taking him aside from the Multitude lead him into a Garden which was behind the Castle, wherein the young Prince of Elis was guarded, for it being seated just in the middle of the several quarters of his Army, he made choice of it as most convenient to assemble a Council of War, in though he returned back again at night to Elis. But he had not as yet seen Elismonda nor had any intention to see her at that time; besides that, this fair Captive having been sick ever since she came into his power, he thought not fit to give her the trouble of receiving a visit from him, though indeed naturally he had not so much humanity as a great Prince ought to have. For it was a kind of cruelty to hold a Council of War in the place where this fair Princess was, and to bring as it were before her eyes such a multitude destinated to the ruine of her Countrey. And this was really a strange augmentation of her sorrow; for as I understood afterwards from the mouth of that Lady of quality who was then with her, and whose name was Cleontine, Elismonda stood at a window looking directly upon the bridge of a Castle, at the time when Eumenes and Hortensius arrived there. So that both of them seeming of a noble aspect, and Hortensius, very richly cloathed, when Elismonda saw Eumenes present himself to Melanthus, who was in the Court of the Castle at their addressing to him, she judg'd it was some stranger that came to serve the Prince of Messenia. Alas! Cleontine (said she sighing) behold here for certain new enemies come against me, who have the appearance of brave men, and consequently give me terror enough to make me hate them. You are too just (answered Cleontine, who was a very discreet person and handsome enough, though past the glory of her first youth) to hate people which you know not, and they you as little. But Cleontine, (said Elismonda) do not these people know at least, though I am as unknown to them as they to me, that Melanthus makes an unjust War? and if they be not his Subjects, why do they not go and put themselves into the Army of the Prince of Cyparissa, who defends an unfortunate Princess unjustly oppress? Perhaps, Madam, (answered Cleontine they which you see are subjects to Melanthus, and if so, they may with Justice partake in an unjust side: for in my opinion, it is not lawful for subjects to dispence with themselves from going to the War when their Prince is there, though they be perswaded he has the wrong cause. For I remember I had a Father who sometimes discoursed thus to a Brother of mine, when he enjoyned him to be always faithful to his Prince. Ah! Cleontine (replyed Elismonda,) one of those two persons there is none of Melanthus's subject, and therefore you ought at least allow me to hate him. In saying which, she pointed to Hortensius, whom the Prince of Messenia had taken apart from the rest which enviroued him, to lead him into the Garden I spoke of, towards which also Elismonda had grated windows jetting forth. But Madam, (said Cleontine, who only endeavored to amuse her,) He whom you would hate, is the man of the more noble air and gallant personage. That's it I hate him for, (answered she) for had I not a good opinion of him, I should wish less ill to him. But alass! (continued she sighing,) I am my self very unjust; for since the Gods seem to abandon the protection of a Countrey which is consecrated to them, ought I to wonder that men should be against me? ought I not rather to think it the Will of Heaven that I should be infortunate, and though apparently born to be happy, become the most miserable Princess in the World? for in brief, I have lost a Father who lov'd me tenderly; my Subjects look upon me almost as a Child, and since they are comforted after the death of the Prince my Father, they will assuredly make peace with the Usurper. So that my dear Cleontine, there is only the Prince of Cyparissa, who upholds my interests; though he does it not for my sake only, for he is banisht out of his own Countrey, and could not be better elsewhere. But Madam (answered Cleontine) you know it as well as I, that the Prince of Cyparissa loves you, though he has not yet discovered himself to you. I know it but too well (replyed Elismonda) and this is it, which renders me compleatly unhappy. For if he happen to be overcome, I shall remain prisoner to Melanthus, and if he be Conqueror, how shall I be able to give check to his pretensions? But Madam (said Cleontine) the Prince of Cyparissa is excellently shap'd, a man of courage, spirit, and birth, and if he should restore Elis, Pisa, and Olympia to you, and drive back Melanthus into his own Countrey, and put you in a condition of seeing peaceably the next Olympick Games that shall be celebrated, I conceive you would have no reason to complain of fortune, though you should be obliged to marry him. I confess you have cause to speak as you do (answered Elismonda) but yet I am not to be blam'd for saying what I do; for to discover to you the bottom of my heart, to this hour I never saw a person I could be inclinable to marry without some strange kind of regret. I know I am of a quality in which such persons are not wont to choose; but this is it which troubles me, and perhaps renders the Prince of Cyparissa less acceptable unto me. Yet I esteem him very highly, and had I a brother, I should not be displeas'd if he were perfectly such a person as he; but in the mean time should I be one day constrained to marry him out of gratitude; I should be all my life unhappy, and should have so much greater cause to complain in that I should suffer an unhappiness of which I should never complain, not even to you, my dear Cleontine. For in short, should my destiny bring this to pass, I forbid you from thence-forth to mention it to me as long as you live Thus you see, Madam, in what temper Elismonda's mind was, whilst Melanthus was entertaining Hortensius with several matters. He constrained him, notwithstanding his modesty to relate to him the particular passages of his encounter with Attalus, so hereby, as Eumenes knew full well, that which he foretold Hortensius, did not fail to come to pass, to wit, his infinitely pleasing the Prince of Messenia, who made him an hundred obliging caresses, and to begin the testification of his gratitude, for having hindred his sister from being carried away by a man he hated, he gave him a very rich Sword, which he hath to this day, entreating him to serve himself of it, in hope it would prove more happy in his hands than it had done in his own. After which, Melanthus mounted on horseback went from quarter to quarter, being followed with many Officers, and Hortensius and Eumenes, to give in person all orders necessary, to the end they might be better obeyed. But the morning following, Melanthus drew forth his forces out of their Entrenchments a little before day, and marching directly towards the Enemies, he set upon them a little before the Sun began to shew his first rayes. Were I to make this recital only to martial men, and had not a great number of things to tell you, in which Love has a greater share than War; I should describe to you all the particularities of a battel wherein victory many times changed sides, wherein death appeared in every rank, and valor was almost equally eminent in the overcome and the Conquerors, wherein the Prince of Cyparissa had Melanthus twice in his power, and wherein Hortensius with incredible valor gave him twice his liberty and once his life, and lastly wherein victory by the sole courage of Hortensius declared her self for Melanthus, and forced the Prince of Cyparissa (as courageous as he is) to quit the place and retreat in disorder. For had not the young Hortensius rallied those that fled the last time he rescued Melanthus out of the hands of those which had taken him, and cryed aloud from rank to rank that Melanthus was alive and free, the party of the Messenians had been destroyed, and this field alone had restored Elismonda to liberty, given her the Soveraign power, and brought her to hearken more favorably to the Prince of Cyparissa. But fortune disposed the event otherwise, and intended Hortensius, who two days before was unknown to the Prince of Messenia, should become his favorite, the next after this battel. For owing to him both the liberty of Andronice and his own, and moreover his life and victory, and the revenge of Attalus, he thought no measure ought to be observed in the favors which he designed him; so that he omitted no imaginable obligements towards him. He was pleased he should lodge in his Palace at Elis, and in one of his Tents in the Army. He gave him a magnificent train, made him one of his Council of War, and ordered there should be two Lieutenant Generals in his Army, to the end he might be one of them. So that from this day forward, Hortensius found he had a Court as well as the Prince, and he was become of high note in a place wherein he thought he should have been unknown. Eumenes, who saw Fortune, and the humor of the Prince had rendred his predictions true, was privately familiar with Hortensius, who being truly generous, was more solicitous of living happily with Eumenes in his rising favor than before. But when he remembred this generous friend had told him it was very difficult to keep in long with Melanthus, he looked upon the divers degrees of honor, to which he had rais'd him, as possible to lead him to a place from whence he might be cast down headlong, so that not knowing whether or no he ought to rejoyce for them, he received all the favors of the Prince of Messenia with so great moderation, that he was infinitely more esteemed for them and less envyed. In the mean while this happy success of Melanthus's Arms began to shake the fidelity of part of Elismonda's Subjects, both in Elis, Pisa, Olympia, and all the other Cities of that Territory. On the other side, the Prince of Cyparissa, who was advertised of it, conceived a strange sorrow for this deplorable case; for all the sentiments which are able to excite valor in the heart of a generous man, were in his. He had ambition and love for Elismonda, and hatred for Melanthus. Whereby being carried on by such violent passions, he forgat nothing of all that he believed conducive to the design he had to satisfie them, and continually contrived in his mind how to effect the same. At the same time Melanthus, by the Counsel of Hortensius and Eumenes, wholly changed his manner of acting with the Inhabitants of Elis, treating them now as gently as he had done before severely; he straightly commanded all his Troops to live orderly in Campagne, he caused reverence to be shewn to the Temples, and sharply punisht those of his Souldiers, who committed any insolent action, and lastly he put forth a Manifesto, wherein his Injustice was handsomly coloured over, and wherein he gave hopes of all sorts of felicity to those who would acknowledge his Power. All which things joyned together, made some impression upon the minds of the people. It hapned also that the Princess Elismonda fell extreamly sick at the same time, and Hortensius obliged Melanthus to have a great care of her. Who thereupon sent his Physitians to her, and yielded so exactly to whatsoever Hortensius counsell'd, that though this change was ascribed to the virtue of Hortensius, yet it also begat some favorable inclination for Melanthus. The Prince of Cyparissa understanding all these things, having first left his Army in a Pass where it was hard to be attaqued, went to Pisa to endeavor to confirm the minds of the Citizens, and sought continually how to oppose his Enemies as well by Prudence as by Valor; to which purpose he thought it requisite to endeavor to excite compassion in the breasts of the people, and even in those of the Souldiers towards the young Prince of Elis. But as an amorous man easily imagins that all others are taken with that which affects him, he bethought himself of a course of which never any other but a Lover could have had the apprehension. You may please to know, Madam, that the late Prince of Elis who bore an extream tenderness towards the young Elismonda, and was willing to gain the hearts of his Subjects to her, caused her Picture to be drawn by the skilful Agerontus of Corinth, whom he sent for on purpose, and had given her pourtraiture to almost all the persons of quality in his principali-

ty. He alſo cauſed the ſame to be placed in all the apartments of a very ſtately Caſtle which is at Piſa. Now the Prince of Cypariſſa having firſt publiſht a Manifeſto alſo in anſwer to that of the Prince of Meſſenia, cauſed to be made ſecretly in fifteen days, the greateſt number he could of Copies of this excellent Princeſs's Pourtrait, both in little, and in the full proportion After which, by ſome intelligence which he had in Elis, and even in the Army of Melanthus, by reaſon of being born his Subject, he contrived that ſeveral pourtraitures of Eliſmonda being hidden in great baskets of fruit, Soldiers in the diſguiſe of ſimple Gardiners, ſhould carry the ſame to Elis, and to the Camp of the Prince of Meſſenia, and deliver them to thoſe with whom he had intelligence, together with ſeveral Copies of the Manifeſto which he had ſet forth. He alſo ſent ſome to Olympia, and gave order the ſame thing ſhould be done at Piſa, which he cauſed to be done in the places I now mentioned. So that having been ſucceſsful in his deſign and ſerved with fidelity, one morning there was found both in Piſa and Olympia, and in Melanthus's Army, and in Elis, and even at the Gate of the Palace wherein the Prince of Meſſenia lodg'd, ſeveral Pictures of Eliſmonda. She was drawn in a Mourning habit, (for I forgot to tell you that the Prince of Cypariſſa amongſt all the pictures of Eliſmonda which he found at Piſa, had choſen one to be an Original for the Copies, which had been drawn upon the death of the Princeſs her Mother) and beſides ſhe being fair and bright hair'd, and mourning beſt becoming her, it was thought fitteſt to draw her in that dreſs. Which was alſo otherwiſe ſutable to her preſent condition, and conſequently the Prince of Cypariſſa believed this Picture would be more proper than any other to incite compaſſion in the hearts of thoſe that ſhould behold it. Beſides, ſhe having been ſad the day on which it was taken, the pourtrait had a kind of lovely dejectedneſs in it, which ſeemed to implore aſſiſtance from thoſe which beheld it, for her that was repreſented by it. So that they were extreamly ſurpriſed, both in the Army of Melanthus and at Elis, upon ſeeing this extraordinary adventure. For ſome of theſe pictures were laid at the Gate of the principal Temples, ſome in the publick Piazza's, and moſt noted ſtreets, and as I ſaid before, at the Gate of Melanthus's Palace. A thing yet more remarkable was, that the Prince of Cypariſſa had cauſed ſeveral things to be written at the bottom of theſe pictures, according to the divers places wherein they were to be layd. For under that which was found at the Palace Gate where Melanthus lodged, there were only theſe words;

Melanthus, behold her againſt whom you make War, and if you are wiſe, fear leſt the Gods avenge her cauſe, and you repent of your injuſtice.

Under thoſe which were taken up in the Piazza's of Elis, it ſeemed as if the Princeſs ſpoke to the people, in theſe words only;

Is it poſſible unjuſt Subjects, that you can endure an Uſurper in a City conſecrated to the Gods?

Thoſe which were at the Gates of the Temples were underwritten as follows (as if Eliſmonda had ſpoken to the Gods adored there.)

Since Men abandon me, I implore of you a Sanctuary againſt your own enemies.

Thoſe which were in the principal Streets, had theſe words;

Diſloyal Subjects, can you have the heart to forſake me?

And for them which were diſperſed in the Camp of Melanthus, they contained no more but this;

Valiant Soldiers, conſider whether it will be any great glory to you to overcome a Princeſs, who hath nothing but tears wherewith to reſiſt you.

But for them which were carried to Piſa and Olympia, I do not diſtinctly remember what was writ under them; but I know this invention which Love put into the mind of the Prince of Cypariſſa, had many extraordinary and different ſucceſſes, and that by a priviledge of beauty the Picture of Eliſmonda found reſpect in the minds of the leaſt faithful of her ſubjects, and in thoſe of the moſt inſolent Soldiers. But that which deſerves more Remarke was, that Melanthus, who roſe very early in the morning to go to the Camp, having been advertiſed there were ſeveral Pictures of Eliſmonda in divers places of the City, and one alſo at the Gate of his Palace, commanded it ſhould be brought to him. He had heard reports of Eliſmonda's beauty, but had never as yet ſeen her; and the furniture and ornaments of the Palace where he lodged, having been removed from thence when there was a neceſſity of ſurrendring up the City, there was not left as much as one of Eliſmonda's pictures in it. Beſides, his heart was ſo wholly taken up with ambition, that he never inquired much whether the Princeſs were fair or no. Hence it was that he became extreamly ſurpriſed, when he beheld the picture of Eliſmonda. Hortenſius and Eumenes were both preſent at that time, and were alſo charmed at the ſight; for there being but few Beauties of fair complexion in Greece, this of the young Princeſs cauſed in them the greater admiration. Melanthus without ſtaying firſt to peruſe the Manifeſto of the Prince of Cypariſſa, which was brought him at the ſame time, beheld this picture very attentively and ſilently. Till at length turning towards Hortenſius, I perceive (ſaid he) by this, I have a priſoner that is ſufficiently powerful to make Captives. 'Tis true, my Lord (anſwered Hortenſius) this picture is very handſome; but ſometimes painters are great Flatterers, and 'tis credible, the Princeſs of Eliſmonda has not been injured in the draught of the picture which you ſee. I aſſure you, my Lord (interpoſed an Elean Gentlemen, who ſided with this Prince) the Princeſs Eliſmonda is nothing beholding to the painters hand, for ſhe is fairer than he could make her Image. But preſently after this the Prince of Meſſenia obſerving the words I repeated to you at the bottom of the Portraiture, he read them with an indifferent loud voice.

Prince

Melanthus, behold her againſt whom you make War, and if you are wiſe, fear leaſt the Gods avenge her cauſe, and you repent of your injuſtice.

Whereupon with a penſil he took off the Table, and which he had newly made uſe of to trace out the platform of the Fortifications which he intended to make at Elis, he writ theſe words beneath the other, as anſwering to the Prince of Cypariſſa;

I have ſeen her againſt whom I make War; but if you had been wiſe, you would never have ſuffered me to ſee her, ſince ſhe is too handſome ever to be parted with to you.

After which, the Prince, out of an impetuous humor, would have the picture carried back, and laid in the ſame place whence it was taken up, imagining that they who had intelligence with the Prince of Cypariſſa, would take notice what he had writ under it, and ſend it away to that Lover. Hortenſius and Eumenes endeavored to divert him from ſo doing, but without effect. In the mean time they conſulted together what was requiſite to be done in order to prevent, leaſt thoſe pictures might occaſion any commotion. Melanthus firſt propoſed, that courſe ſhould be taken to diſcover who had diſperſed them, that they might be ſeverely puniſht, in the ſight of all the Inhabitants of Elis. But Hortenſius repreſented to him that this would rather provoke the people, whom it were better to win by gentleneſs. For methinks (added he) I have juſt now thought upon an infallible way of cauſing this artifice to fall upon your Enemies, and principally upon the Prince of Cypariſſa. My dear Hortenſius (cryed Melanthus) I beſeech you declare it preſently, and tell me what is fitting for me to do. It is requiſite (anſwered he) to get all the pictures of the Princeſs Eliſmonda you can poſſibly, and cauſe them to be brought to you; and then you muſt declare, that you will keep them carefully, very highly extolling the Princeſſe's beauty; afterwards give her a viſit in perſon, and ſend a Herald to the Prince of Cypariſſa, to Piſa, and to Olympia, to publiſh that you are ready to marry the Princeſs Eliſmonda, to reſtore peace in the Countrey of Elis, and render it more happy than ever it was before, provided they will lay down their Arms. By this means you will infallibly raiſe diviſion between the Prince of Cypariſſa, and the forces which he commands; as alſo between him and the Citizens of Piſa and Olympia. For you may well think, that being a paſſionate ſervant of hers, he will never conſent that you ſhould marry her. And on the other ſide, 'tis eaſie to imagine, that thoſe which ſhe commands, will never be all of his opinion, but the greater number being deſirous of peace, will force him to ſeek Sanctuary elſewhere, and quit his pretentions. Melanthus being very much ſatisfied with this project of Hortenſius, took no other care but to put it in execution. Not that he reſolved at that time to marry Eliſmonda, or believed ſhe would eaſily be brought to admit the match; but the conceit of ſpoiling the Prince of Cypariſſa's ſtratagem, affected him with ſuch joy, that without farther conſidering he betook himſelf to follow the Counſel of Hortenſius. To which purpoſe, himſelf went into all the Streets of the City, attended by the whole Court, to quiet and ſettle the people, telling them he was intended to put an end to their troubles, by reſtoring peace, that the Princeſs Eliſmonda ſhould ſhortly be ſet at liberty, and that the only hinderance would be in the Prince of Cypariſſa, if tranquillity were not eſtabliſht throughout the whole Territory of Elis. To confirm theſe favorable expreſſions he did as Hortenſius had counſelled him to; for he cauſed all the pictures of Eliſmonda to be brought into his Chamber, and the next morning ſent Hortenſius to the Princeſs, to obtain of her the permiſſion to ſee her, reſolving nevertheleſs, in caſe ſhe ſhould reject this propoſition, to make a great ſecret of it, and give out on the contrary, that ſhe inclined to ſuch conditions of peace. Hortenſius accordingly went in the name of the Prince of Meſſenia, to the Caſtle in which this fair Princeſs was guarded, whoſe health at that time was ſomewhat amended, though her indiſpoſition had left a teſtimony behind of it ſelf, by a little more then ordinary paleneſs. It being known by thoſe who guarded the young Princeſs, that ſhe attributed much to the Counſels of Cleontine, Hortenſius, who was very prudent, and lookt no farther than to ſerve the Prince of Meſſenia, carefully deſired firſt to ſpeak with her, and cauſed his name to be told her, and by whom he was ſent. Upon which, Cleontine coming to him in the Antechamber of the Princeſs, preſently perceived him to be the ſame perſon, whom ſhe had ſeen in diſcourſe with Melanthus, when Eliſmonda ſaid ſhe was reſolved to hate him; and receiving him very civilly (his aſpect and comportment ſpeaking him a man of quality) ſhe attended to hear what he had to ſpeak to her. You will perhaps think it ſtrange, Madam Cleontine, (ſaid he to her) for a man that has not the honor to be known to you, to deſire ſecreſie of you at the firſt time he ſees you. But when you ſhall know that 'tis to ſerve the Princeſs Eliſmonda, I have confidence you will pardon me. You have ſo much the ayr of a perſon of honor (anſwered Cleontine) that I am very inclinable to believe you can offer nothing but what is generous and honorable; and therefore you may pleaſe to tell me what your intent is of this addreſs, provided you alſo give me the liberty to anſwer you what I ſhall believe reaſonable. I ſhall tell you then, Madam, (ſaid he to her) that the Prince of Meſſenia having ſeen divers pictures of the Princeſs Eliſmonda, hath an extream deſire to give her a viſit, and to expreſs to her for the future, all the Teſtimonies of generoſity, which the intereſt of his own glory will permit him to do. But to the end this interview may have a favorable conſequence, and produce peace to the whole Countrey of Elis, it will be your part, diſcreet Cleontine, handſomly to diſpoſe the Princeſs Eliſmonda not to receive the Prince of Meſſenia as an Uſurper, but as a generous Enemy, whom ſhe may more eaſily overcome by favorable reſpects, than the Prince of Cypariſſa can can ever do by valour, notwithstanding he is a person of unquestionable magnanimity. And for the rest, I beseech you not to believe that the Prince's visit can be displeasing to the fair Elismonda, by any thing which he may say unto her; for he has no other design, but to honour her, and to testifie that he does so by all imaginable civility. When they who may command, request (answer'd Cleontine) and leave the liberty of a refusal, no question but they deserve to have their desire granted, if it may be done without injury to virtue; and therefore, if the Princess Elismonda does me the honor to believe me, she shall receive the visit of the Prince of Messena, according to your desire: but I fear much (added she) I shall have no small difficulty to perswade her to it. For, in brief, she is a prisoner, the Prince her Father is dead, ever since the beginning of the War. and she wears Mourning still for him, and sees not yet very well, how she shall ever be more happy. And to testifie to you (pursued she, with a half-smile) how much she is sensible of all this; I could almost constrain my self to tell you that she hates you, though she does not know you. Then I have sentiments very different from hers (answer'd Hortensius) for I honor her infinitely, although I never saw her. But if it please you (added he) I would know for what reason she hates me before she knows me.

Cleontine designing handsomely to gain upon the mind of Hortensius (whose quality and reputation she understood by him that inform'd her of his desire to speak with her) told him a part of the discourse between Elismonda and her self, whilst Eumenes was presenting him to Melanthus. For being this pretended hatred of Elismonda was only occasion d by her observing the noble and handsome aspect of Hortensius, she judg'd it would not be displeasing to him to know it. And indeed Hortensius resented some secret pleasure in this kind of hatred, and told Cleontine with much gallantry, he fear'd when Elismonda should see him nearer hand, she would no longer judge him worthy of her hatred. But at length Cleontine left him in the Anti-Chamber, and went to find Elismonda. And as soon as she saw her, would you think, Madam (said she to her) that the person whom you hate, because you observe him to be of a noble Air, desires to see you and comes from the Prince of Messena to demand permission to make a visit to you. How? my dear Cleontine (answer'd she) I will see neither the one nor the other; but if I must needs see one of the two, I had rather see him whom I hate without knowing him, than him whom I shall hate all my life. But Madam (replied Cleontine) you are a prisoner, and in prudence you ought not to incense your Conqueror; for the more he is unjust, the more is he to be fear'd, and therefore it is requisite, prudence suppress some part of your resentment. Elismonda blush'd at this discourse, and hiding the design she had from Cleontine, for fear lest if she should tell her what she intended to tell Hortensius, she would not approve it, only commanded her to cause the person she spoke of to enter into her Chamber. But Madam (said she to her) be very circumspect how you receive him; for a fair Princess prisoner, is oblig'd to act with much more prudence than a captive Prince. In truth (answer'd the young Princess) I cannot answer for my self in this occasion; but all I can do, is to assure you that I will as much as possible, endeavour to constrain my self. Upon which Cleontine caus'd Hortensius to enter. Elismonda hapned this day to be dress'd carelessly enough, so that her bright hair hanging down below a great vail of black Cypress which cover'd her shoulders, made her seem extreamly charming. Her attire though sad, had notwithstanding something of gallantry; her arms were half bare, with bracelets on them, and her hands so white, that she wanted no adorning though she were undrest. Hortensius also was much surpriz'd, beholding her infinitely more charming than her picture; he obsery'd the air of her countenance so gentle, and something so delicate in her beauty, that he commiserated her misfortune as soon as he saw her, and almost began to condemn in himself, the valour he had employ'd against those who fought for her interests. He saluted her very respectfully, and she receiv'd him with a civility which having not much of obligement, had also nothing at all of disdain. Though Hortensius had purposed to speak first, yet he felt a kind of reluctancy and restraint within him, when he came into Elismonda's presence. But at length overcoming that obstacle, of which he understood not the cause, I come to you Madam (said he to her) in the name of the Prince of Messena, to desire your permission he may make you a visit. The persuasion I have (answer'd she, with a cold and dejected aspect) that generous Princes should never go to see such as are miserable, unless it be to relieve them out of their unhappinesses, makes me believe the Prince of Messena ought not to make me a visit. For I humbly conceive, he has no purpose to restore me what he possesses of my State, and return peacably to his own. Besides, though he should do this act of justice, he cannot return me the Prince my Father, whose death he has caus'd by the unjust war he made upon him. You know not, Madam (interpos'd Cleontine, who would moderate this resentment) what the Prince of Messena's design may be. No, no, (answer'd Elismonda) he can have no reasonable design, and therefore it were best to save himself the trouble of coming to see me: for if it be only to perform a naked ceremony, I shall take his visit for an injury; if he have any good intention, he may please to let me first know it, that so he may be better receiv'd when he comes to visit me. Whilst Elismonda was speaking this, Hortensius beheld her attentively, and found such sweetness in hearing her speak, that he had not the power to answer her; till at length recovering from that pleasing amazement, he endeavour'd to serve the Prince faithfully that sent him, and address'd to her in these terms. When I enter'd into your Chamber, Madam, I had no other intention but that of obeying the Prince who sent me: but, within this short space I have had the honor to see you in, I have taken your interest into his; and therefore Madam, suffer me to conjure you not to refuse the Prince the favour which he desires of you, and which he may not intreat you to. Should he come to see me without my permission (reply'd she) I should perhaps be less discontented with it; for I should have the liberty of telling him whatever my just indignation suggested unto me. But if he comes hither with my consent, it will be necessary for me to disguise my my ſentiments, and hide the hatred I have of his injuſtice, and ſhew ſome kind of civility to a Uſurper who keeps me in priſon, ſheds the bloud of my Subjects, deſolates the faireſt Countrey in the world, and violates all ſorts of rights without the leaſt reſpect or reverence of the gods. You have ſo excellent a capacity (anſwer'd Hortenſius) that you cannot but know, Ambition is no ſhameful crime; and that a Prince who is call'd an Uſurper by thoſe whoſe Countrey he has conquer'd, is oftentimes ſtiled a Conqueror, by all thoſe who have no intereſts in his conqueſts. Therefore Madam, without blaming or excuſing the Prince that ſends me, or acquainting you with his deſign or his intereſts, I only tell you that yours require you not to incenſe a Prince to whom Fortune is favourable. You have without doubt, Madam, all that is needful to cauſe the Arms to fall out of the hands of the moſt ambitious; for which reaſon, conſtrain your ſelf, if poſſible, I beſeech you, and conſider no inconvenience can follow upon ſuch an enforcing of your ſelf. I told you my dear Cleontine (ſaid the Princeſs, looking upon that generous Lady) that this Stranger was a terrible enemy: for indeed I had reſolv'd without telling you ſo, to refuſe a viſit to the Prince of Meſſina: but now I ſee this dangerous enemy will make me alter my determination. But yet I am deſirous to know (proceeded ſhe, turning towards him) what oblig'd ſuch an honourable generous perſon as you, to take the unjuſt ſide; is it becauſe it is more happy? No, Madam (anſwer'd he) but I embrac'd it out of gratitude; and therefore you would be unjuſt to hate me, though I am of a party oppoſite to yours, ſince honor would not permit me not to be ſo. After which Hortenſius imagining it behov'd him to juſtifie himſelf in the opinion of the Princeſs, was not unwilling to declare to her by what ways fortune had conſtrain'd him to be her enemy; and Eliſmonda being not loth to have cauſe to ceaſe hating Hortenſius, preſs'd him to inform her, how it came about that he was engag'd to ſerve Melanthus. Hortenſius therefore recounted to her in few words, his adventure in Theſſaly; He acknowledg'd ſo ingeniouſly that he ow'd his life to the Princeſs Andronice, he related ſo modeſtly his encounter with Atalus, and deliver'd all this ſo well and handſomly, that Eliſmonda her ſelf told him, he had reaſon to be of her enemies ſide, and promis'd him for the future, to b'ame him no more for it. Yet ſhe remained ſtill in the ſame irreſolution concerning what ſhe ought to do, till Cleontine and Hortenſius effected their perſwaſions of her, to ſuffer a viſit from the Prince of Meſſena, on condition he would ſay nothing that might ſtir up and augment her grief. Which granted, Hortenſius took his leave, and Cleontine follow'd him into the Antichamber, to exhort him to bring the Prince of Meſſena to a peace. Thus this firſt day begat a very great friendſhip between Hortenſius and Cleontine. As for Eliſmonda, ſhe ſo ſtrongly touch'd his heart, that he had never felt the like from any fair perſon, as he did from her. For he found I know not what kind of ſecret agitation within himſelf, which did not permit him to go to Elis, without rendring it perceivable, that he had a great diſpoſition to love Eliſmonda. Whence comes this commotion which I feel (ſaid he in himſelf, as he was returning?) and why am I ſo affected in behalf of a perſon whom I never ſaw but one hour? and with whom in all probabilities I ought never to have any particular friendſhip? The Princeſs Andronice ſeem'd beautiful to me at the firſt inſtant that I ſaw her, ſhe alſo teſtifi'd much prudence, ſav'd my life, is the cauſe of my fortune, and hath much more kindneſs for me. And yet neither her beauty, nor her wit, nor her good offices, nor her kindneſs, cauſe any agitation in my ſoul. I love her with a calm affection, and I conſider her without having my heart diſquieted; my reaſon is an ingredient into the tenderneſs I have for her; in a word, I love her as a man loves a Siſter. Nevertheleſs I feel a commotion I know not what to make of, for Eliſmonda; it troubles and diſquiets me, and almoſt tranſports me over to her ſide againſt the Prince whom I ſerve. But I ought (ſaid he, after a little muſing) to ſurmount this imaginary weakneſs, I ought to be faithful to the Prince whom I ſerve, and I ought to believe that what I feel is nothing but what I am able eaſily to overcome. Hortenſius, after this wiſe reflection, found really ſome tranquillity in his mind; but when he came to Melanthus, and the Prince demanded of him, whether Eliſmonda were as fair as her Picture, he was upon the point of ſaying, No, and the next moment was ready to ſay, ſhe was a thouſand times more charming; but at length, taking a mean between both, he ſaid, 'twas true, her Portraicture perfectly reſembled her. After which, making a great violence upon his mind, and being willing equally to ſerve both Melanthus and Eliſmonda, he told him moreover, that the Princeſs deſerv'd he ſhould treat her well, that ſhe had beauty, wit, and virtue, and that if he could really poſſeſs the Countrey of Elis in peace, by marrying her, he ſhould believe him very happy. How? Ah Hortenſius (cry'd he!) as often as any marriage is propos'd to me for reaſon of State, I always remember what the wiſe Thales, whoſe memory is ſo famous throughout all Greece, and amongſt all the Aſiatick people, anſwer'd one day to his Mother upon the ſame occaſion; For when in the flouriſhing years of his youth, ſhe propos'd to him to marry, he told her, It was not yet time; and when ſhe made him the ſame propoſal ſome years after, he anſwer'd her, That the time was paſt. So that to imitate ſo wiſe a perſon in ſomething, I anſwer you, dear Hortenſius, that 'tis not yet time for me to marry, and that I had rather owe the poſſeſſion of the Principality of Elis to my ſword than to my marriage. Yet I am willing to let the people believe I have a deſign to match with Eliſmonda; becauſe this will create diviſions among my enemies, and infinitely deſpight the Prince of Cypariſſa. But in ſincere truth, I affirm, that though I ſhould become amorous of Eliſmonda, I would never marry her by a Treaty; and I could not reſolve to do it, but when I ſhould be maſter of her State. For according to the humour I am of, I ſhould not care to be Husband of the Princeſs of Elis; but on the contrary, it would be more ſutable for him that is the Prince of Elis, to eſpouſe Eliſmonda. But after all, Marriage is not a thing ſo neceſſarily requir'd by policy, as 'tis believ'd, eſpecially for a Prince, who has ſome peculiar ſentiments in his ambition; for I am not ſolicitous of having ſucceſſors which may poſſeſs my Conqueſts: On the contrary, ſhould Fortune make my deſtiny ſuch as I wiſh it, I ſhould not be ſorry if after having conquer'd many ſtates, there ſhould be no perſon found after my death who could only well govern the Nations that I had ſubdu'd. For which reaſon having a mind unaffected with that ſpecious Chimera which flatters the humour of thoſe Lovers of poſterity, who take pains for people that they can never know; and on the other ſide, equally fearing to have ſucceſſors which may prove unworthy of me or ſurpaſs me; unleſs I alter my preſent reſolutions, I ſhall paſs my whole life in ſaying, I will marry, without effectually doing ſo: and if my humour become not wholly oppoſite to that I now am in, I ſhall never be poſſeſs'd with any violent Love. For it becomes a Prince (added Melanthus) in order to being happy and gallant, to leave all the Ladies of his Court to hope they may conquer his heart, without affecting any one particularly; it becomes him alſo to make a meer pleaſure of Love, as men do of Muſick, Hunting, Dancing, and Converſation, and not to make himſelf ſlave of ſome fair coy piece, who, many times, without loving the Prince, loves only the greatneſs which ſhe hopes from him. Hortenſius hearing Melanthus ſpeak in this ſort, conceiv'd a ſecret joy in himſelf, of which he knew not the cauſe. And his heart was tender: he did not contradict him, though his thoughts were different from the Prince of Meſſena; he only thought fit to anſwer him, That it were not to be diſapprov'd, if a Prince quitted the courting Love only for the love of Glory. But, Madam, it was reſolv'd at the end of this converſation, that Melanthus ſhould go the day following to viſit the Princeſs Eliſmonda, and that two days after he ſhould ſend to propound to marry her, and to withdraw his forces, provided the Prince of Cypariſſa would lay down his Arms, and depart out of the territory of Elis. Eumenes was of this privy Council; and the next morning Melanthus (being accompanied by him, Hortenſius, and his ordinary Guards) went to ſee the fair Eliſmonda, who that ſhe might be oblig'd to leſs civility and conſtraint upon her ſelf, made ſemblance of ſome little indiſpoſition. She was therefore attired in white this day, and her fair hair appear'd careleſly diſhevel'd under a kind of ſmall veil of white Tiffeny, which hung down from her head; her attire was faſtned together in ſeveral places with black Ribbons, ſhe was laid down upon her bed, and careleſly leaned on ſome black Cuſhions adorn'd with Taſſels of ſilver; but after ſo lovely a manner, that if one were to paint Diana, when, having been at hunting with her Nymphs, ſhe repoſes her ſelf upon a Bed of verdant graſs at the foot of a Tree, ſhe ought to be repreſented. Eliſmonda had both modeſty and dejectedneſs in her countenance together; and that which added new luſter to the beauty of her complexion was, that her Bed was over-ſhadow'd with a great Canopy of black Cypreſs, the corners of which being tied up with twiſts of ſilver, hung diſorderly about her. Cleontine and the two young Ladies which attended on her, were with the Princeſs, when the Prince of Meſſena came to make the viſit; for I had forgot to tell you, that thoſe who remain'd with her were Virgins, and of high quality, which would not forſake her, and none of thoſe which were ordinarily deſign'd to ſerve her. I ſhall not tell you, Madam, the particulars of this converſation, having too many beſide to acquaint you with; it will be enough to aſſure you that the fair Eliſmonda ſpoke nothing but what was generous, though ſhe ſhew'd no incivility to Melanthus, for whom her averſion was ſo great, that it was ſomething unjuſt; for ſhe eſteem'd him a much leſs generous perſon than indeed he was. Yet ſhe inforc'd her ſelf wonderfully; but Melanthus was ſo charmed with her beauty, and obſerv'd ſo noble a ſpirit in her, that it ſeem'd he began to be then in love, though he did not ceaſe to be ambitious. He deſir'd her pardon, in that he was oblig'd by the Laws of War, to cauſe her to be guarded in the Caſtle wherein ſhe was; he aſſured her ſhe ſhould receive all reſpectful ſervice there, and that he would omit nothing that depended on him to mitigate her ſorrows, till Fortune gave him opportunity to teſtifie better to her the reſolution he had to honor her all his life. Eliſmonda anſwer'd this diſcourſe with words which were rather handſome upbraidings for her misfortunes, than real remerciaments. But ſhe choſe her language ſo diſcreetly which ſhe us'd, that as I ſaid, without doing ought againſt the greatneſs of her mind, ſhe did not incenſe her enemy. Hortenſius nevertheleſs well perceiv'd the forcedneſs of her behaviour; for this fair Princeſs ſighed now and than, and ſometimes lift up her eyes towards heaven in ſo pathetical a manner, that ſhe cauſ'd much commiſeration in him. Melanthus finding many potent charms in her eyes, endeavour'd to fix his own directly upon them; which Eliſmonda avoiding as much as ſhe could, ſhe was conſtrain'd more frequently to caſt her aſpect towards Hortenſius, who was diſcourſing ſoftly with Eumenes. Whereby this generous Veientine could not hinder himſelf from being infinitely affected with the ſweetneſs of the fair Eliſmonda's eyes, though ſhe look'd upon him only to avoid the wiſhly view of Melanthus. Eumenes taking notice, with what a gladſom attentiveneſs Hortenſius conſider'd the Princeſs, approach'd near him, and ſpeaking low in his ear, Have a care of your ſelf, Hortenſius (ſaid he to him) for if you be not cautious, you will ſoon become more a Captive to the Princeſs of Elis, than ſhe is to the Prince of Meſſena. You miſtake admiration and pity for Love, (anſwer'd Hortenſius a little ſmiling.) I know what admiration and pity are (replyed Eumenes) and to aſſure you ſo much, I declare to you, that they are very effective to beget Love in ſuch a heart as yours, Since 'tis ſo (anſwer'd Hortenſius) I thank you for the counſel you have given me, and ſhall endeavour to make uſe of it. After which, the Prince of Meſſena roſe up and return'd to Elis. But Madam, he return'd thither in a great muſing, which was perceiv'd by Hortenſius and Eumenes. As they were going along talking of his reſervedneſs, he ſuddenly turned about to them, and beginning to ſpeak fiercely, 'Tis true, (ſaid he, though without naming the Princeſs Eliſmonda) ſhe is handſomer than her Picture, and moreover, more lovely than handſome, though ſhe is fair in perfection. Than you may perhaps, My Lord, change your ſentiments (anſwer'd Hortenſius coldly) and believe hereafter, that Love is ſomething more attractive than Hunting. I confeſs (ſaid he to them (that I believe Hercules had ſometimes not so great pleasure in Conquering, and carrying on his shoulders that furious Bore of the Erymanthian Forrest, as I should have in overtoming the hatred of the Princess Elismonda towards me; for in my judgement this hatred of hers, is as raging as that savage beast was truculent and implacable. Methinks, my Lord, (answer'd Eumenes) the Princess receiv'd you well. Yes, (reply'd he) when she would not vouchsafe to look upon me: but however, I will so bring it to pass, that the Prince of Cyparissa shall have no reason to hope ever to possess her; and though it be only to make him despair, I will make shew of being enamour'd of her, and of intending really to marry her, though I be uncapable of such a resolution. If you become amorous, My Lord (answer'd Hortensius) you will indeed change your sentiments. Though I should come to love her (replyed he) as much as I hate Attalus and the Prince of Cyparissa, yet I would never marry her, for reasons which I have told you at another time; but, in brief, to follow your counsels (added he) it is fit I send to morrow to Pisa, to Olympia, and to the Prince of Cyparissa's Army, to make the Proposition we agreed upon; and to testifie further, that I intend to win the mind of Elismonda, it is requisite that the Princess my Sister come to Elis, and make frequent visits to her. Hortensius and Eumenes much respecting that Princess, approv'd what Melanthus intended, who the same evening dispatcht one of his attendants to Andronice, with such express order for her speedy coming to Elis, that she was oblig'd instantly to obey it, and begin her journey. In the mean time Melanthus, without losing time, sent to Pisa and Olympia, and to the Prince of Cyparissa, who was returned to his Army, to make the proposition I told you of. But, to perplex his enemy the more, he caus'd an offer to be made to him of returning to his Court, knowing well he would never accept it. He also publish'd a Manifesto, in answer to that of his Enemy, and declar'd his new Love which he pretended for Elismonda, so publickly, that the Prince of Cyparissa was soon advertis'd of it, and of what he had written underneath the picture of the Princess of Elis, and what he had said concerning her, and of the care he took of her since he had seen her. For after that first visit, he return'd thither very frequently, and sent every day; the Princess was permitted to walk in the Park of the Castle, all her Women were suffer'd to attend on her, and she was serv'd with the same magnificence, as if she had been absolute Mistriss of her own Principality. But withal, at the same time her guards were redoubled; which being known to the Prince of Cyparissa, put him into a strange despair, in seeing those Pictures of Elismonda, which he believ'd might occasion a commotion in Elis and in the Army, produce no other effect, than raising a curiosity in Melanthus, of seeing the Princess, and giving him occasion to become enamour'd on her. But that which compleated his despair was, that the proposition made by Melanthus, was wonderfully well received, both at Pisa and at Olympia, that he understood it was very well lik'd of at Elis, and himself perceiv'd the Officers of his Army did not disapprove it; and his Soldiers who serv'd in a war that could not enrich them, since it was only to defend their own Countrey, declar'd openly that if he were generous he would not oppose the peace. A further affliction to the Prince of Cyparissa, was a belief that Elismonda consented to the proposition made by Melanthus, and being weary of her prison, would have no great repugnancy to marry an enemy that would give her liberty. Alas! (said he to one of his friends, who was also one of mine, and named Artimedes) How unhappy am I in having been so discreet; for Elismonda was never inform'd by my own mouth, of the violent Love I have for her; and though I am confident she cannot be ignorant of it, yet she may make semblance, that I am her Servant, only because I would preserve the same Sanctuary for my self, which the Prince her Father afforded me. Perhaps she thinks, I fight rather by reason of the hatred I bear against Melanthus, than for the Love I have for her. But it is too true, I have no consideration but Elismonda, and without her I have no interest in any thing. Yet it shall never be said, that I will not do my utmost not to become miserable, to hinder mine enemy from becoming happy, and to effect also that that fair Princess commit not an action unworthy of her self. Hereupon the Prince of Cyparissa having consulted with Artimedes what was requisite to be done, assembled all the Officers of his Army, and spake to them with so much eloquence and courage, that he brought over a great part of them to be of his own sentiments. He laid before them the importance of the matter, the tender years of Elismonda, and the shame there would be in gratifying him that made an unjust War. For what more could be done (said he) in favour of a Prince that had hazarded his life a thousand times in opposing the enemies of this State, and gain'd many victories, than to give him the State that he had defended, and the Princess to whom it of right belongs? Think not but the gods will punish you severely, if you abandon the defence of a Countrey, consecrated unto them in so particular a manner. Withstand therefore such a dangerous design courageously, and know, that if the Prince of Messena believ'd he could take Pisa and Olympia very easily, he would never propound peace to you. 'Tis true (added he) he offers it on such shameful conditions that he seems desirous to be refus'd; and this proposition is only an Artifice to deceive the less intelligent people, who perhaps will presently murmure because the peace is refus'd. But in brief, important deliberations are not to be grounded on the murmurings of the people; for most usually a little constancy appeases them, and a little insinuation makes them change their opinions. In fine (added he) The honor of the gods, that of your Princess, and your own glory is concerned in the matter. Therefore consider well upon it, and believe not that I wil ever forsake you, as long as I see in you a purpose of making a generous resistance. But withal, think not that I will ever sign a Peace which cannot be accepted but with shame. For indeed I will rather choose to become a vagabond, and fugitive from City to City, to the end of the world, than to commit any thing unworthy of my self. This Oration made a great part of the Prince of Cyparissa's Officers who were present at it, become of his judgement; but the rest opposed it, and declar'd that peace was a Good which could not be bought at too high a rate, that the Prince of Messena was generous and fortunate, and they should be at last constrain'd to do that by force which they might now by Treaty, before the Countrey were totally destroy'd. Thus every one continuing in his sentiments, the Prince of Cypariſſa thought he had done very much, in having brought over part of them to his side. After which he went to Pisa and Olympia to endeavour the same thing. But as 'tis more difficult to induce the inhabitants of a great City to refuse peace, then Soldiers, it was not possible for him to effect his desires. The people were ready to make an insurrection in Pisa; and as he was going out of the City, news was brought him that half the Officers which he had won to his mind, were fallen off from him since his departure. It remained therefore only to seek how handsomely to gain time; in order to which, being very prudent, he told them which had the greatest power, both in Pisa and Olympia, that to testifie to them how much he attributed to their judgements, he consented that the proposition of Melanthus should not absolutely be rejected; but rather, to act with prudence, it were fit to demand a Truce for six months, during which time liberty might be had to speak with the Princess Eliſmonda, to the end her pleasure might be known. That which oblig'd the Prince of Cypariſſa to demand his Truce, was, that in the compass of these six months, the time of the Olympyck Games would be come: when the Prince hop'd that in that great Assembly which was to be at Olympus from all parts of Greece, he might engage the neighboring States in a League offensive and defensive, against the Usurper of Elis. But at last, there being much reason in what he requir'd, and the Truce seeming a good step to the Peace, he brought Pisa and Olympia, and his Army, to approve that which he propounded. But that which was rare, was, that Melanthus perceiving he could not obtain what he demanded, was not sorry that a Truce was insisted on; because he very much fear'd, left if the War should continue till the time in which the Olympick Games were to be celebrated, and they could not, by reason of it be celebrated, this great change might awaken the adjoyning States, and oblige them to ingage in a War, whose success might be not fortunate unto him, if others should intermeddle in it. Yet something troubled him to suffer any to speak with the Princess Eliſmonda, but not daring to refuse it, because it would have seem'd too great an injustice, he resolv'd to give way to it, and afterwards to draw out the business in length. It was therefore concluded, that the two Armies should remain in the same places which they possest, that all actions of hostility should cease, that four of the chief persons of Elis might have communication with the Princess Eliſmonda, that the Prince of Cypariſſa should have the same liberty during the Olympick Games, which were to be celebrated with all the accustomed magnificence, and that both parties should on either side, live as peaceably as if an absolute peace had been concluded. As soon as these things were agreed on, Melanthus, who was really so enamour'd on Eliſmonda, that none was more, except Hortenſius, commanded this generous Favourite to go to the fair Princess, and tell her, that she had caus'd his Arms to fall out of his hands, that he had accorded a Truce with the Prince of Cypariſſa, only to spare the bloud of her Subjects, to the end, she might be better dispos'd to hearken to something which he had resolv'd to tell her, as soon as he could have the happiness to kiss her hands. It may be, My Lord, (answered Hortenſius with some commotion, upon Melanthus's sending him) when you grant a Truce to the Prince of Cypariſſa, you begin a War with your self. I acknowledge it, my dear Hortenſius (said he to him (for I have an extream regret, that I find my self inclin'd to love Eliſmonda more than I would. But in brief, before any of her Subjects have the liberty of speaking to her, I would inform her that I am at her service: go therefore, my dear Hortenſius, and prepare the mind of that charming Princess, in such manner that I may find her a little favourable; not only because its pleasing not to be unkindly treated, but also because I perceive if she reject me at first with disdain, her resistance will increase my passion in such sort, that I shall be the most miserable of men: I was of opinion (answer'd Hortenſius coldly) that, Great difficulty had been more proper to extinguish love than to excite it. It is not so in such a heart as mine (answer'd Melanthus:) for facility almost takes from me the desire of pleasing things, and on the contrary difficulty makes me sometimes ardently desire such things as ought to be indifferent unto me. This discourse ended, Hortenſius went to Eliſmonda, but by the way, What did he not think, and what did he not endure? Alas! (said he in his Breast) I am miserable, and destiny is cruel, in making me love a person, by whom I cannot be belov'd again, and whose servant I cannot desire to be, without betraying the fidelity which I owe to a Prince, who hath made all my fortune. But were there any other place wherein I could find any sort of establishment, and could I with honor forsake a Prince who is at War, I would fly from this charming person, whose beauty will lead me to betray my Master. I know not who I am, I am unhappy in all respects, and fortune which seems to be favourable to me in Elis, is yet more rigorous than any other-where, since she confers favours on me which I cannot enjoy in peace. Oh gods, into what a strange extremity do I find my self reduc'd! if I promote the War, 'tis against the person which I love; if the Truce be made, 'tis only a time of leasure, to employ me in the winning of her heart for another; if by my address I perswade her to be favourable, I render my self the most unhappy of all Lovers; if I cannot prevail with her, but she resist, it will only increase the love of that dangerous Rival, whom I am oblig'd to serve, to the prejudice of my own felicity. If I would fight against my self, I find Eliſmonda's Beauty more powerful than my Reason; and if I yield to her charms, I am both a criminal and miserable. But besides, I am inconsiderate, and act without reason; for how dare I declare that I love Eliſmonda? what then must I do? infortunate as I am? My duty; (answer'd he suddenly, after sometime of silence.) But alas (added he sighing) how hard is this duty to be done? and how unreasonable a thing it is to betray my self, that I may not betray my Master? But it must be done however; honor is so great and powerful a reason in a generous heart, that perhaps I ought not to despair of

of the victory which I would gain over my self in so dangerous an occasion. Hortensius fixing himself in his generous sentiments, arriv'd at the Castle where Elismonda was, by whom he was well receiv'd: for as she lik'd his person and deportment, and knew he was no subject to Melanthus, she was much more contented to see him, than any other the Prince of Messena could have sent to her. But alas! the civility which the Princess shew'd towards him, augmenting his love, he was ready to repent himself of the resolution which he had taken. Nevertheless he persisted in his generous design, and us'd such address in his speech to the Princess Elismonda, for the interest of the Prince of Messena, as if he had not acted against himself, whatsoever he endeavor'd in his favour. He told her an hundred circumstances of the admiration which Melanthus had for her; and at length inform'd her that he had granted a Truce for six months, that he had sent for the Princess his Sister, to bear her company, that he intended the Victors in the Olympick Games should receive their Crowns from her hand; and lastly, that he was resolv'd to make her Reign more gloriously than ever she could have done, if the Prince her Father had liv'd. But Hortensius (answer'd Elismonda) if the Prince of Messena repents himself of his injustice, it is not needful to make a Truce, he may conclude the Peace forthwith. He hath nothing to do but to withdraw his Forces, return into his Countrey, and leave me my own. Alas! Madam (reply'd Hortensius to her sighing) you little know the power of your charm, if you think it possible to leave you after having seen you. But at present, Madam (proceeded he) suffer me to conjure you to receive favourably, what the Prince is purpos'd to tell you the next time he sees you, though it should happen that he tell you something which may cro's your inclination; for indeed, during the six months of Truce, in which you shall enjoy almost an absolute liberty, many things may come to pass which may be advantageous to your fortune. I know not what advantage may betide me (reply'd she;) but I know well it will never come to pass, that the Prince of Messena can please me. And therefore, generous Hortensius (added this fair Princess, with the most charming sweetness in the World, apparent in her eyes) I will conjure you, that if you discover in Melanthus's mind, I know not what sentiments, which I perceive you would intimate to me, that you remove them from him, if you love his quiet; for were I to be eternally his slave, I should never have any thing for him but aversion and hatred. Hortensius knowing the Princesses resistance would more inflame Melanthus's love, imploy'd all his wit to make her change her opinion, and even perswaded Cleontine, that he had reason on his side. I beseech you, Madam (said he to her) consider well the condition in which you are, and you will find it concerns you extreamly, not to incense the Prince of Messena. I do not urge, Madam, that you should love him more than you did ever any other; for it does not belong to me to give you such counsel; but I conjure you, Madam, not to reject disdainfully the tokens of affection which the Prince will express to you. For my part (answer'd she) I believe it a very great secret not to have any hope at first to those, to whom we have firmly resolved to refuse eternally what they desire. 'Tis a good course, Madam (reply'd Hortensius) for them who have a kind of spirit which is easily repell'd; I mean, for such people, from whom difficulties take away the desire of the most agreeable things, who have only calm pleasures, and who would not be possess'd of the greatest felicity of the earth, at the purchase of one hours sighing. But 'tis not effectual to an ambitious Soul, to whom difficult enterprises seem always more excellent than others, and who never have violent desires, but for such things as cannot be obtain'd without pains. And because, Madam, (added Cleontine) it behoveth not to act with a Prince, whose prisoner you are, in the same manner as if you were free; (for a greater restraint is to be us'd) and since Hortensius seems to me compleatly generous, I shall not fear to tell you in his presence, that I believe in the like occasion you ought to give neither hope nor despair: and there is a certain kind of serious civility, which neither causes to hope nor yet dejects into despair, which is proper enough to gain time, and to hinder many troublesome consequences which disdain might produce. Therefore, Madam, rather use that natural gentleness which the gods have given you; you may lay it aside when you please; and since Hortensius assures you, that four considerable persons shall have the liberty of communication with you during six months, and the Prince of Cypariſſa also during the Olympick Games; comply with the mind of a Prince, who is able to use more rude ways with you if he pleases. I promise you (answer'd Elismonda) I will do what I am able, to follow your counsels, though I dare not answer absolutely for my self. Hortensius hearing her speak thus, almost repented himself of having been so urgent to perswade her to gentleness: but at length, considering he could do nothing in his own behalf with innocence, but only to hinder Melanthus's love from increasing to a greater ardor, he thought he had some ground of satisfaction in leaving Elismonda in the resolution of constraining her self, and more in being commended and intreated by her, and observing she had some esteem for him. All which caus'd him to think, he should return less discontented than he came. But as soon as he was upon the way, and beheld Elismonda no longer, he found himself as unhappy as before, and rather more. For he found his passion was augmented, and it came into his mind, that perhaps Elismonda lov'd the Prince of Cypariſſa. So that he perceiv'd himself possess'd, as well with jealousie as with love, if at least any separation can be made between these two passions. Alas! (said he to himself) does it belong to a miserable person that loves without hope, to be jealous? to an unhappy man, who is his Rivals confident, and serves him faithfully? 'Tis true, said he, but the Rival whom I serve is hated, and he that troubles my imagination, is perhaps belov'd. But what concerns it me, (answer'd he suddainly) whether Elismonda love or not, since Fate will never suffer me to make her know I love her. After which, Hortensius spoke no more to himself, but fell into such a profound musing, that he arriv'd at Elis, when he thought himself yet far from it. At his arrival he understood, it was not above an hour before, that the Princess Andronice entred into the City.

City. For whom having a very particular kindness, the news gave him much satisfaction. He went therefore with speed to give the Prince an account of his journey, and found him coming from the Apartment of Andronice. Whereby it was necessary for him to discharge his intelligence before he could see her; for this Prince was really extream amorous of Elismonda. Hortensius was now inconceiveably perplex'd: for though Melanthus had perswaded him, that difficulty was capable to encrease his love, he was so fearful of giving him too much hope, that he was troubled to choose words wherewith to express himself, and chang'd his order and manner of speaking many times involuntarily. For when he told Melanthus he did not find Elismonda had so great hatred against him, as he imagin'd, he beheld so much joy arising in his eyes, that he fear'd hope would augment his passion. But then again, to weaken the obliging sense of what he had said, he told him, he knew not whether Policy had not a great share in the civility of the Princess. With which Melanthus was so dejected, that Hortensius was forc'd to return to his first smooth language, for fear lest this passion should become too violent, both for the quiet of Melanthus, Elismonda, and himself: But at length, when the Prince had fully understood his success, he gave him liberty to go see the Princess Andronice, who receiv'd him with so great a goodness, that had not he been pre-possess'd with love, the testimonies of so tender a friendship would have given him almost as much pleasure as the favours of a Mistriss; but in the condition his Soul was, he only half gusted whatever was advantageous to him. Andronice being of a lively apprehension, immediately perceiv'd Hortensius had something in his Breast troubled him. And being there was none present saving Eumenes, their common friend, she demanded the cause of it with such obliging urgency, as the sadness of a friend induces a true friend to use. What is it Hortensius (said she to him) which hinders you from having as much joy in seeing me, as I have in finding you? But beware you tell me not, there is nothing troubles you; rather pretend some kind of sorrow or other; and tell me rather that you are fallen in love at Elis, than assign no cause of a kind of sadness which I observe in your eyes, for fear least I may suspect you of dissimulation. I am altogether oblig'd, Madam, (answer'd he) with the manner of your speech; but I beseech you, do not constrain me, to search my heart for every troublesome thing that is there, for this would but augment my melancholly. Be satisfy'd therefore, Madam, in that I assure you my eyes are deceivers, if they do not tell you I am uncapable of having a greater satisfaction than that which I find in the honor I have to see you. But, I beseech you, Madam, demand of me no further; for I cannot really tell you, what present oppression I have upon my mind, but tis true, I feel something which qualifies the pleasure I have really in the enjoyment of your presence. After which Andronice made him a thousand acknowledgements for the generous counsels which he had given the Prince her brother, since he came to him, desiring him to continue them; and being Melanthus had already discover'd to her part of his intentions, and told her in few words the state of affairs, she told him she should be perfectly oblig'd to him, if he could bring it to pass that the War might end in the marriage of Melanthus and Elismonda, and that there might be after the Olympick Games, a second Festival for their Nuptials, whereby their States might be united, and tranquility establish'd in the most delectable part of Peloponnesus. Fortune hath so great an influence in what you desire, Madam, (answer'd he, sighing) that you ought to expect so great an event from her rather than from me; And moreover, Madam, (proceeded he) since you are here, 'tis your address must effect what I am unable to do, and you need only have recourse to your self for that, for which you seem to await from another. Hortensius spoke this with so melancholly an air, that Andronice believ'd it was because he conceiv'd, what she desir'd was very difficult to be brought to pass. But she could not discover to him her conjecture, because the Prince her Brother came back into her Chamber, to desired her she would make a visit to the Princess Elismonda, as speedily as she could. But in the mean time, himself the day following went to give her one, and told her, he had caus'd the Princess Andronice to come to Elis, on purpose that she might entertain and divert her. But though he had resolv'd before to mention his love openly to her, yet he forbore to do it, and contented himself with giving her occasion to gues what he had in his mind, without positively declaring it to her. Whence it became more easie for the Princess Elismonda, to follow the counsel which was given her. And though she appear'd not very disdainful to Melanthus, yet she departed her self with such coldness, that according to the genius of his humor, he return'd much more amorous than before. Two days after, Andronice being accompanied by Hortensius and Eumenes, made her a visit, which she receiv'd much better than that of Melanthus; for having heard this Princess much commended by Hortensius, when he related to her how she had sav'd his life, she was readily inclinable to esteem her. Besides that, foreseeing the love of Melanthus might occasion trouble to her, she was not sorry of gaining such a protection as this. So that this interview pass'd very agreeably on both sides. You know, Madam, (said Andronice to the Princess of Elis) that I am no partaker in the War, which the Prince my brother makes, and so you would be unjust to hate me, because I am his Sister. Tis true, Madam (answer'd Elismonda with a little smile) that you have made no War against me, but yet you are not without bearing a part in the victories of Melanthus, since as you know you have been as far as the famous Valley of Tempe, to offer Sacrifices for his conquest; so that I conclude, your prayers have done me as much mischief, as the valour of the Prince of Messena. When I was in Thessaly, (reply'd Andronice) I had no other design but to beseech the gods for peace: but, Madam, it appears my prayers were not well receiv'd, if I ask'd for victory; for during my journey, the Prince my Brother was not over successful. But in brief, Madam (proceeded she) since a Truce has been concluded, let us enjoy this image of peace, till we can obtain a real peace, which I hope you may easily effect if you please. If it depended on me, it had been already made (reply'd Elismonda) but in my judgement, 'tis in the power of the gods gods only to give it. But in the mean to teſtifie to you that I am not unjuſt, I promiſe you not to look upon you as an enemy. After which, Cleontine, Hortenſius and Eumenes all ingaged in this converſation; and as the Princeſs of Meſſenia, is very grateful, ſhe exaggerated to Eliſmonda the obligation which ſhe had to Hortenſius, for hindring her from being taken away by Attalus; and Hortenſius in his turn did the like for her, extolling the generoſity ſhe ſhewed in ſaving his life without knowing him. To ſave your life (anſwered Andronice) I did not hazard my own, but you contrarily to reſcue me from being taken away, expoſed yours courageouſly to a danger which appeared inevitable by the in-equality of number. But Madam, (replyed he) not to do what I did, would have been ungrateful and diſhonorable; but as for you, you might have contented your ſelf, with having ſome ſlight compaſſion of a miſerable ſtranger, without being lyable to any reproach if you had done no more. Alaſs! Hortenſius (ſaid Andronice) I am not of your opinion; for I am perſwaded they who think they do enough in pitying the unfortunate without relieving them when they may deſerve no thanks for their commiſeration: and for my own part, if I beheld worthy perſons unhappy without intending to ſeek to ſuccor them I would make ſhew of not perceiving, either their merit, or their unhappineſs; for there is nothing more abſurd, than to behold ſuch unprofitable compaſſion in the breaſts of thoſe, who are able to give remedy to the misfortunes which cauſe it. In the mean time, the world is full of thoſe people, who bemoan others and do not help them. But to tell you my own humor freely, I ſhould rather chooſe to be ſome Illuſtrious unhappy One, that were able to ſupport the rigor of infelicity with conſtancy, and were known to be worthy of a better fortune; than to be one of thoſe tender hearted perſons without virtue which I ſpoke of, who at the ſame time, that themſelves do nothing for the miſerable whom they compaſſionate, yet count it ſtrange that others do as little; and who paſs their whole lives in bewailling the evils which they are ſometimes able to remedy, and blame people who do but imitate their very example. Nevertheleſs, thoſe people who make ſuch a noiſe with their compaſſion, and the blame they lay upon others like themſelves, think they have right to be eſteemed generous, and that this unprofitable pitty ought to be ranked amongſt the heroical virtues. But for my part, who am not of that mind, but believe my ſelf acceſſary to all the miſeries which I may, and do not hinder; I ſhould have condemned my ſelf a thouſand times of your death, if after having ſeen you in the hands of thoſe Theſſalians, ſo zealous for the laws of their Countrey. I had not done my utmoſt to ſave your life. What you ſay is very generous and juſt, Madam (anſwered Eliſmonda) and I am extreamly glad to ſee you have ſo excellent ſentiments; for as I am unhappy, I hope you will do all you can to hinder me from being ſo for the future. Doubt it not, Madam, (replyed Andronice) for I never blame that in another which I am conſcious may be reproached to my ſelf. All that you ſay is ſo nobly ſpoken, and ſo generous (ſaid Cleotine) that I think nothing can be ever be reproached unto you. All that ſhe does is ſo heroical (added Eumenes) that what ſhe ſpeaks is nothing comparable to it. I beſeech you (ſaid Andronice,) praiſe me not ſo ſuperlatively, leaſt I come ſhort of making good what you ſay; but rather acknowledge with me that I owe more to Hortenſius than he does to me. True (ſaid Eliſmonda,) for that matter I am of your judgment; for I had rather be left to dye, than left in the hands of a Prince, whom I ſhould hate if he offered to carry me away. For my part (ſaid Hortenſius) I cannot declare my own opinion in this caſe; all I can do is to aſſure you, I believe it impoſſible to be more obliged to any perſon than I am to the Princeſs of Meſſenia, for ſhe hath ratified the firſt good office ſhe did me by ſo many others, that I cannot believe ſhe repents of it. I owe to her (proceeded he) the honor I have in being known to you, which I put in the number of my moſt happy adventures. Unqueſtionably (ſaid Eumenes) you owe very much to the Princeſs Andronice, but alſo owe very much to your ſelf; for if ſhe had not known you to be a perſon worthy of her friendſhip, ſhe would never have given it you. Hortenſius, unwilling to ſuffer himſelf to be commended more, ſought to divert the converſation, by giving open notice that Cleontine was in a deep meditation, and it ſeemed on ſomething not unpleaſing. Upon which, the Princeſs of Elis turning towards her, demanded what it was that ſo deeply took up her thoughts. So ſmall a matter (anſwered ſhe) that if I could diſobey you, I would not tell it you. But as I am very preciſe not to refuſe you any thing, I confeſs the Princeſs of Meſſenia let fall ſomething in her diſcourſe, which makes me reflect upon the proceedings of very many women, which I know; and gives me cauſe of muſing, upon what ſhe well expreſſed, That ſhe would never blame any perſon for a thing for which ſhe might be blamed her ſelf. For indeed Madam, if you remember, you have ſeen at Piſa a woman handſome enough, who becauſe her hands are very ill ſhapen, hath brought her ſelf into a perſuaſion, that 'tis no great commendetion to have them otherwiſe. So that when ſhe commends any fair one, ſhe never takes notice of her hands, and only praiſes that in others, which ſhe believes moſt handſome in her ſelf, to the end the application may be returned to her own advantage. Thus there is found in a bad ſenſe a practice oppoſite to that of the Princeſs Andronice; for whereas ſhe blames not that in another, which ſhe believes may be faulted in her ſelf, this Lady praiſes only what ſhe believes commendable in her ſelf. I aſſure you (anſwered the Princeſs of Meſſenia) there are ſuch women every where, and I know ſome at Meſſene, who becauſe themſelves have very good hair, believe ſprightly eyes, a clear complexion, a handſome mouth, good teeth, and a graceful neck, not ſufficient to make a fair perſon, if her hair be of a very common brown, and who in the commendations of others, mention no other perfections but that of comely hair. On the contrary; when occaſion requires them to ſpeak of a handſome neck, and they have not ſuch themſelves, they only ſay in general, ſuch a one is of a good ſhape. But I am of opinion, 'tis a very reaſonable thing do render juſtice without taking in one's own intereſt. Not but that it's ſometimes allowable in prudence to omit mentioning a defect we are conſcious of in our ſelves: But notwithſtanding

ing, 'tis not modesty to commend that excessively, though in another, wherein our selves have a title to the application. At least, for my own part, did I know my self conscious of procuring, or insinuating my own condemnations, I should extreamly reproach my self for it. But Madam (answered Elismonda) you do not observe in the mean time, that you are guilty of what you decry by speaking so well, which turns much to your own commendations; Which, 'tis true, you may receive without blushing, since you deserve more than can be given you. The Princess of Messenia answered to this civility with a greater; and these two illustrious Ladies were so highly satisfied with one another, that this first days converse made a friendship between them. After which they both retired severally. As for Hortensius, the more he beheld Elismonda, the more ardent became his love; his reason opposed his passion in vain, which he found too strong to be surmounted; so that his only purpose was to use his best prudence to govern and conceal it, and to continue firm the resolution of serving Melanthus, with as much fidelity in relation to the Princess, as if he had been wholly indifferent for her. His virtue was indeed much supported by the little possibility he conceived there was to be so much as indured, in his pretensions, though the Prince his Master had not been his Rival. Upon the way towards Elis, Andronice's discourse to Hortensius and Eumenes, was altogether concerning the fair Elismonda, and when she came to the Prince of Messenia, she fell into superlative expressions in favor of that Princess, which served to inflame Melanthus more in his affection. For 'tis usual for such as are naturally ambitious to dote, in a manner rather upon the opinion of others than their own, and they are more guided by the commendations which are given to the persons which they love, than by the knowledge which themselves have of their merit. But in fine, to contract my relation as much as I may, it was resolved the Princess of Elis should be accommodated with betteer Lodgings during the Truce, than she was at present. Yet it was not thought convenient to carry her to Elis, and therefore choice was made of a very fair house for her reception, situated on the bank of the River Alpheus, and belonging to a Lady of great Quality and Worth, with whom Hortensius had contracted a great friendship, because he had protected her goods and estate from the disorders of the War. This place was so much the more commodious, for that the Quarters wherein Melanthus's Army lay, secured it; and it was also near the place where the Olympick Games were wont to be celebrated. So that all the conveniences of the safety and delight being found in it, it was determined, the Princess Elismonda should be conducted thither; that the Princess Andronice should be there with her, that a small number of Women of Quality of Elis, should attend on the Princess Elismonda, if she pleas'd, and that Hortensius should choose whom he pleased, to be responsible to him for the Government of the Castle, to the end he might be obliged to have a particular care of it; who knowing not whom to confide in, so well as Eumenes, he gave him order to undertake the Guard of the Castle, whither the Princess was to be removed. Eight days after the Truce concluded (all securities necessary in the like occasions, given and taken on both sides) Melanthus went to visit Elismonda, attended with the whole Court, to whom the Princess Andronice, and several Ladies of Quality, were repaired early in the morning. The Prince of Messenia, made all protestations to Elismonda, which could be suggested by love and generosity to an ingenious person; and gave her the hand, to lead her to a magnificent Chariot, which he had caused to be provided for her. Into which the Princess Andronice accompanyed her; and Clemine with the other Ladies followed in other Chariots. Melanthus, Hortensius, Eumenes, and all the other persons of Quality mounted on Horse-back, and conveyed these Princesses to Melisaris, the place whither the Princess Elismonda was designed to go. At her arrival, the Mistress of it called Elisenie, received this Illustrious and Noble Company, with all imaginable State. Also the Ladies were lodged in this fair house: but the Prince of Messenia, Hortensius, and all the other men, saving Eumenes, return'd to the Camp, till the next morning. Such as by the Treaty ought to have permission to see the Princess Elismonda, were admitted to her in private; but she was seen by none else but in the presence of Andronice and Eumenes; the Prince of Cyparissa, having the liberty granted of seeing her only during the time of the Olympick Games, suffer'd more than can be imagin'd. And that which was something remarkable, was, that Hortensius, who believed that Prince was not hated, had nevertheless a great desire to know him, to the end he might the better judge what he ought to believe, and what not. Yet there were some moments, in which he was not displeased in imagining, that perhaps he loved the Prince of Cyparissa in some little measure, since that might be a means to hinder her from Melanthus. But the next moment after, repenting of this sentiment, he was jealous and inquieted, and had a curiosity of seeing his Rival, though full of regret, of which he understood not the true reason; for he believed he had so little interest in the affection of the fair Elismonda, that he passed his own doom, and condemned himself. In the mean time this Princess being young, naturally affecting conversation, company, and divertisement, injoyed this agreeable interval with great contentment. Not, but that in her inward thoughts, she resented very great discontent, in seeing that the Prince of Messenia pretended Love to her; because she was resolved never to make peace on condition of marrying him. But when the persons admitted to her, counselled her not to declare her self so openly while the Truce lasted, but to draw our matters in length, and to endeavor to take the benefit of the Olympick Games, to ingage the neighbouring States to side with her interests, she resum'd all her former pleasantness, and seem'd incomparably more charming than ordinary; which added new flames to Melanthus and Hortensius. Mean while, the time of the Olympick Games approaching, the Truce became generally known in other Countries, and that they should be celebrated, as was formerly accustom'd. So that an infinite number of considerable persons, came to Elis from all parts of Greece, either to bear a part themselves in the Games or at least, to be spectators of them. My curiosity hapning that time to lead me to Sparta, I took a resolution to go see this great Festival: but by the way thither, I fell into company with a man of

of Corinth, who told me he was not going to Elis, out of mear curiosity, but to know whether it were true, that the Favorite of the Prince of Messenia, were a person called Hortensius. For if it be so, (said he) I shall be glad to inform him of his own quality. What you say (answer'd I to this Corinthian) seems to me sufficiently strange; for, how can he be ignorant of his own descent, and you know it? since you are a Greek, and the name which you give him, is not of your own Countrey. This man who was naturally a lover of talk, began to tell me all that I have told you, concerning the birth of Hortensius; of the Predictions which were made, that he should be a Prince; of the resolution his Father had taken to banish him for ever; and in brief, all that I related of Hortensius, till the death of this person, to whose trust his Father had committed him. But how come you to know all these things, (said I to him, after he had given me the relation which I have repeated to you) and how comes Hortensius not to know them? I came to know them (answered he) by being an intimate Friend of his that was entrusted with him, who ingag'd not me to acquaint him with his Fortune, unless himself should happen to dye, without first having discovered it to him. Now this man being dead whilst I was absent upon a very long Voyage, at my return to Corinth, I understood that Hortensius was gone into Thessaly, and I have been since told that he is a Favorite of the Prince of Messenia. Wherefore desiring to satisfie the will of him that brought him up, who was determined to reveal his quality to him, as soon as he saw him in some setled condition, which might in probability, take away all desire of returning into his Countrey; I thought my self oblig'd to go, and deliver him from that discontent, I presume he suffers, by being totally ignorant of his Birth and Fortune. And I resolve upon this the rather, for that I have a Kinswoman with the Princess of Elis, whose name is Cleontine, and is in great favor with her. This discourse of Agenor, seeming to me very surprising, I had a curiosity to know Hortensius, and being I was going to that place, only to see whatever deserved to be seen, I intreated him to oblige me so far by the interest of his Kinswoman, that I might see the Princess Elismonda, who was reported for a great beauty. He promised me, he would endeavor to serve me, and accordingly performed his word. I shall not trouble you with relating the circumstances, how he brought it about, since 'tis not my own History, I am recounting to you. But in brief, I was so happy, that he made me known to Cleontine, and Cleontine presented me to the Princess Elismonda, and the Princess Andronice, by whom I was civilly received; that afterwards I became a friend of Hortensius and Eumenes, who presented me to Melanthus, and going to Pisa, was civilly regarded by the Prince of Cyparissa. This Madam, I have told you, to the end you might give more credit to the things which remain for me to relate, and which are of greater importance. This man of Corinth, having discharged his intention, of discovering to Hortensius who he was, this generous Venetine was extreamly joyful to understand, that his Birth was very Illustrious, and not much troubled, to know that it was foretold, he was destinated to Rule. For as a Lover takes all occasions he can, to give himself hope, he imagin'd that perhaps he was destinated to rule one day in the heart of the fair Elismonda. But he condemned this thought in himself, the next moment, as unjust and void of reason; and continued firm in the resolution he had taken, to serve his Master with fidelity. 'Tis true, the rigor of Elismonda against Melanthus, afforded great support to his Virtue; for had he observed any inclination in her towards him, it would have been more troublesome to him, to have continued faithful. In the mean time, a great dearness grew between Andronice and Elismonda, notwithstanding their different interests. Hortensius also became particularly gracious with both of them, though he was a lover of the latter, and only a friend to the first. Eumenes also had a great share in the confidence of all these persons; and though none of them plainly spoke their true sentiments, yet there was a very great friendship between them. But I had forgot to tell you, that Hortensius being very glad it was known his Birth was illustrious, gave Agenor liberty to tell whence, and what he was; but intreated him to be secret in reference to those predictions, which designed him to Reign in some place, for fear left being Favorite to the Prince, it might render him suspected. Agenor assured Hortensius he would be obsequious to his desires, but did not tell him that he had already discovered the truth to Cleontine and to me, intending to intreat silence from us both. But when he went to find Cleontine, to make this request to her, it was already too late; for she acknowledged she had communicated it to Elismonda. Yet she promised to request that fair Princess not to take any notice of knowing it, and accordingly made good her word. So that Elismonda congratulating with him that he had learnt his descent to be very illustrious, gave him no occasion to think that she understood any thing farther of him; and Hortensius was secure in this regard. Not that he believed these predictions would ever have any accomplishment, but he knew Melanthus was inclinable to inconstancy, and being extreamly ambitious, matters of this nature might raise suspitions in him to his prejudice; though in his heart he only projected how to rule over his own passions, if he were able. But to tell you the truth, his love was too strong to be subdued; it grew more vigorous by the knowledge he had of his birth, and he lookt upon himself as in some sort more unfortunate. But though he lov'd infinitely, yet he continued firm in the resolution he had taken to be faithful to Melanthus, who for his part loved Elismonda as ardently as he was capable, though his passion was inferiour, both to that of Hortensius, and to that of the Prince of Cyparissa. Elismonda, who understood the affection of two of her Lovers, bore a hatred against Melanthus, and an averseness towards the Prince of Cyparissa, but had a great inclination for Hortentius, whose passion she was absolutely ignorant of. For though he testified all imaginable care and respect for her, yet she interpreted all, but as his civility and generosity, and proceeding from the desire he had to please Melanthus, and perhaps from some kindness he might have for her, but not at all from love. As for Hortensius, he was jealous of the Prince of Cyparissa without knowing him, because he knew not that he was not loved; and he was his Masters Rival without a Crime, and without jealousie too, because he knew well that he was hated. The Princess Andronice was always possest with a violent hatred against Attalus, of whom no tidings could be heard, and had a great dearness for Hortensius. Behold therefore, Madam, the inclinations of all the persons I have mentioned, at such time as I had the happiness to be known, and not to be hated by them. But for that, whilst this interval of the Truce lasted, and especially during the Olympick Games, this Court which was composed of Friends and Enemies, Strangers, and Inhabitants of the Countrey, and whither were repaired the gallantest persons of Greece, was magnificent and splendid; I shall with your permission describe to you the delectableness of the House in which the Princess resided, and the merit of her to whom it belonged; Moreover, I shall pourtray to you some of the Ladies which added ornament to it, and in what manner they lived there, to the end you may afterwards receive more delight in understanding what passed at the Olympick Games, and in the strange events which followed them. Melisaris, therefore is situated upon the Bank of the River Alpheus, so much fam'd, both for the manner by which he makes his course, his wonderful passage under the Sea, and irruption again near Syracuse in Sicily. This place is extreamly delightful, and hath peculiar excellencies, not to be found in any other. Melisaris as I told you stands upon the Bank of the River Alpheus, and there being only the great Road which leads to Olympia between the River and the house; which hath three great Courts, in each of which is a Gate looking towards the River; that in the middle, is the chief, directly facing the body of the House, at each end whereof come forth two other sides, or wings of building which form the greater Court, and reach down to the Bank of the River. The two other, which are on each side of these two wings are more commodious than magnificent. But as this House is on the one side seated on the Bank of a River, on the other it is at the foot of a Hill of great steepness which bounds the Gardens behind the House. It is situated in such sort, that being arrived at the first story of stairs, the way is thenceforth even and direct into the Garden, in the middle of which is a handsome Fountain. But though it seems this high Hill may cause some inconvenient effect, yet the irregularity of the place hath some kind of rustick beauty which is not unpleasing. For though this Hill be sufficiently steep, yet it is all covered with Trees, which orderly rising some higher than others make a prospect, whose wildness and rudeness does not hinder it from being handsome and pleasant. Then passing from this first Garden, which is all beset with rare Fruit-Trees, into another on the left hand, which is raised higher like a Terrasse, and so out of several Orchards advanced still higher than others in manner of Terras-work, at length there is an entrance into a large Park, which is as high as the Mountain, and full of very stately Trees. I omit to tell you that there are also many Fountains in these several Gardens, that there is a Grotto in a Mount, and several Mounts about the Park; for these make not the principal gracefulness of Melisaris. I forbear also to tell you, that the apartments of this House are handsom and convenient, and only intimate to you that from a Balcony which is in the middle of the building, and two others at the end of each side, there is the most delectable prospect that can be imagined. For the River Alpheus is just before the House, and passes with a strait and even stream in this place. But that which renders this sight more agreeable, is, that there are several Islands in it, which contain handsome Meadows and Fields. They are incompassed round about the shores with Willows and Lote-Trees, which yet do not hinder a Great Plain from being visible beyond them; on the further side whereof, there arises a Mountain, on which is seated a very stately Palace, which is a wonderful ornament to the Country about: for besides that it is magnificent, there is a long Train of Woods, which reaching towards Olympia, Crowns all the highest Mountains which arise on this side, and inclose the Plain I speak of. On the right hand of Melisaris are several Villages and Temples, making the prospect yet more graceful and delectable. There is also another fair House not very remote, which appears beyond the Willows, and seems to be built only on purpose to be seen from Melisaris. On the side towards the right hand, the sight of the River is so much the more pleasant; for that looking upon it from the second Tarrassed Garden, there appears a little Islet lying in the middle, which is joyned to a little Village by a small rustick bridge, and makes a pretty show amongst so many various and handsome objects. There is also seen from this admirable House, another place, which though extreamly imbellisht by the number of rivulets that nature with the assistance of art hath scattered here and there, is much more remarkable in that it was sometimes the delight of an Hero, and Heroesse, who deserved the praises of all Nations and Ages, having heretofore belonged to the wise Nestor, who by his prudence, magnanimity, eloquence and virtue, surpassed all the Heroes that lived before him. It was afterwards possessed by a Lady, one of his descendants, the miracle of her Sex, and whose beauty was not to be surpassed by any other, whose wit transcended the capacity of all imagination, and whose virtue was yet above her beauty and wit. But to represent to you what was yet more remarkable at Melisaris, be pleased to permit me to describe a place to you, wherewith I was charmed: and let me oblige you to enter into a little painted and gilded Boat, and make a short voyage upon the River. Imagine therefore, that were you to take Boat before the house of Melisaris, you must go first towards the left hand, having on one side one of the Islands I spoke of, and on the other a Meadow bordered about with Willows, a little Temple, several rustick Houses, and a Mountain covered with Myrtles and Laurels. After having gone some time this way, you must turn towards the right hand between two great Islands, and enter into a distinct stream of the River, which may be resembled to a covered Alley, the Banks of which have a most lovely verdure, interspersed with several sorts of flowers, and are beset with great Willows, which advancing themselves one above another, and touching with their tops, make a kind of continued Arch or Cradle, the most graceful that can be imagined. The water of this little arm ſtream of the River is clear and calm, and the Sand and Pebbles viſible at the bottom, the River being in this place not very deep. At the end of this Channel is a ſquare place between the Iſlands, which is as it were the Center, into which terminate four other Alleys of Water, ſuch as I now deſcribed to you, that is, their Banks are all covered with ſeveral ſorts of flowers, and beſet along with Trees, which make a very agreeable ſhade, and which being repreſented in the Water, amuſe and delight the eyes, even when they are no longer lookt upon. Having paſſed this rare place where the four watry Alleys meet, there are ſeen others alſo as pleaſant; for you would think you were in a Labyrinth, or Maze of waters, more admirable in its kind than thoſe which are ſo famed in Ægypt and Crete. For beſides, that the Banks of theſe ſeveral ſtreams are green, flowry, and ſhady, as I ſaid; they are alſo bordered about with young bull-ruſhes, amongſt which are ſeen ſeveral water-flowers, which grow in the water as they do. There are alſo ſeen ſeveral innocent animals, who enjoying the tranquillity of ſo pleaſant a place, ſcarce hide themſelves at all; the ſollitude is ſo ſtill and quiet. For ſuch a profound ſilence reigns there, that the noiſe of leaves ſcarce ever diſturbs it; the wind not being able to blow there by reaſon of the Hills, which incompaſs it on every ſide. And that which renders this handſome Deſart yet more lovely, is, that there is on one ſide a place to land in one of the Iſlands, which is the moſt pleaſant Meadow in the World, and another on the other, in a place belonging to the Prince of Elis, which preſents you with a great Wood, whoſe Trees ſeem to touch the Clouds, and which by the darkneſs of their ſhadow, and the great ſtore of thickets and coverts round about them, ſeem to be in a Countrey uninhabited. But to conclude, how excellent a place ſo ever this Deſart ſeems, ſhe that inhabits it renders it more illuſtrious by her virtue, than it is agreeable by its own handſomneſs. The wiſe Eliſante, whoſe ſollitude is ſo admirable, is a perſon of rare and extraordinary qualifications. She is of a diſcreet wit, a noble and firm Soul, a pleaſant humor, high ſpirit, and endued with all virtuous inclinations. None of thoſe weakneſſes are to be ſeen in her, which are ordinarily attributed to women. She is above all gawdy and trifling gallantry, her morality is ſolid without rudeneſs, ſhe retains the love of excellent things in her Deſart; and has a kind of generoſity in her deportment, which has not left her in her ſollitude, though ſhe be paſt the period of youth. She bears an ardent kindneſs to all virtuous perſons, and a natural averſion from all that are not ſuch; her friendſhip is ſo firm and ſo tender withall, that there is a mixture in her heart of love and amity, which hath produced a third kind of affection, accompanyed with the good qualities of the other two, without having their defects. But amongſt her friends of both Sexes, the admirable Amalthea, and the wiſe Timanthus, whoſe names I preſume are not unknown to you, hold the chief rank in her heart; for though ſhe inhabite in the Countrey of Elis, yet ſhe is originally of Sicily. Eliſante is in my judgment highly to be admired in one reſpect, which is, that loving ſociety naturally, ſhe has notwithſtanding attained the art to diſpenſe with the want of it. And conceiving that of all pleaſures thoſe which ariſe from agriculture are the moſt innocent, ſhe is become ſo perfect in this art, which is the moſt antient and neceſſary of all others, that the wiſe Timanthus who is her maſter in this kind of knowledge, is not her ſuperior in that wonderful skill, which conſiſts in well ordering of Land, and improving the advantages of ſeaſons, and which affords the moſt conſiderable delights of the Countrey to thoſe who underſtand how to uſe the ſame as well as Eliſante. Moreover, in the prudent management wherewith ſhe accompanies her induſtrious cares about her Gardens, Meadows, Woods, and Flocks, ſhe finds all the pleaſures of profit, imployment, and glory, this prudent retirement having ſuch a lovelineſs in all reſpects, that the virtuous Eliſante cannot be too much commended for it. She hath many Illuſtrious friends, writes handſomly, and ſpeaks with a certain vivacity, declaring both the accuteneſs and firmneſs of her mind. Then in reference to her Children, the deſire of ſeeing them virtuous ha ever been the moſt ardent of all ſuch as ſhe is capable of. In a word, Eliſante is the Soul of her Deſart, which as pleaſant as it is, is indebted to her for a great part of its luſtre and lovelineſs. But the better to give you the deſcription of the little Court of the two Princeſſes I was ſpeaking of, it is neceſſary for me to pourtray forth to you two Perſons, which made the principal ornament of it, one of which is named Chryſilia, and the other Claricia. The firſt is unqueſtionably one of the moſt lovely women, and the other one of the moſt charming Virgins in the world. Chryſilia is a perſon ſo amiable, that ſhould ſhe deſign to have her ſelf loved by all the World, nothing could reſiſt her. But ſince your ſilence ſeems to command me to draw you a picture of her without colours, and ſuch in which words alone give the ayr that makes reſemblance, and a little imagination animates; you may pleaſe to know, that Chryſilia is not tall of ſtature, nor yet of their ſize, who are accounted little; for if ſhe ſees ſome taller than her ſelf, ſhe alſo ſees others not ſo tall, and her ſtature is beyond exception well proportioned to the ayr of her whole perſon. Her hair is the fairſt black in the world, that is, the moſt bright and reſplendent; ſo that as her head is very gracefully tired, the neglected Rings which fall careleſly upon her cheeks or necks make the moſt pleaſing ſhow poſſible, with her mixt complexion of Lilly and Carnation, which is beyond all ſuſpition of artifice, and makes her ſeem both ſprightly and pleaſing. As for the form of her countenance, 'tis neither round nor Oval, but being between both, cannot well be defined but by ſaying, It has the perfections of each. Chryſilia's eyes are not large, but ſo ſweet, ſo black, lively, and full of ſpirit, and glittering, that their beams are almoſt inevitable. She ſometimes moves them in a certain negligent manner that pleaſes infinitely, and on the contrary, ſometimes expreſſes ſuch a pretty haughtineſs in them, that makes her rather to be lov'd than feared. Moreover, Chryſilia's mouth is extreamly graceful, and not like theirs whoſe lips ſeem ſhaped after ſo cloſe a manner, that one would think they had never ſmil'd in their lives. She hath little ſprightly glances, which ſpeak livelineſs, love, and cheerfulneſs, and her beauty has ſeveral charms, which are not ſud-deatly, discovered at once, but appear more or less according to the temper of her mind, and the people with whom she converses. Yet Chrysilis's aspect is extreamly graceful at the first view, though she has the happiness to deserve more than she promises. She has also white and small teeth, a neck admirably well shap'd, handsome arms, and fair hands. But to pass from the charms of her beauty, to those of her wit, I am to tell you she is infinitely ingenious; that she usually less discovers her self to be so, than she really is, though she always speaks very exactly, and never any thing but what is absolutely pertinent; and likewise agreeable. But having no ambition to be universally praised, she is not sollicitous to lay open the whole beauty of her mind to all sorts of people. So that sometimes she gives her self up to such a reservedness, when she happens in places where the persons do not please her, that if she be constrained to speak, the words fall from her mouth so carelessly, that you would think she were desirous not to be understood, for fear any should return her an answer, so faintly does she pronounce the last syllables of all her words. But on the other side, when Chrysilis is with persons whose conversation pleases her, her serious air is cleared up, and a cheerful grace appears in all that she does: She speaks alike handsomly upon all subjects, and there is elegancy, judgment, and all things which she expresses. She has a subtle way of raillery, and reasons exquisitely upon all occasions; in a word, she hath wit sufficient, that were her beauty less, she would notwithstanding be infinitely charming. Moreover, her heart is capable of great tenderness: but having a delicate spirit, which is not too hasty in making a choice, and being naturally slow to abandon her self to friendship and intimacy, she is sometimes reproacht for not being sufficiently endearing to her friends. But her Soul is noble, and which makes her yet more amiable, not haughty or ambitious of any thing. She writes also extream handsomly, though she does not make semblance of understanding so much as what handsome-writing is; to conclude, she is unquestionably so amiable, as I said before, that she may justly assure her self of being loved by whomsoever she pleases.

As for my part (interposed Plotina) I love her already, and I would not have you tell me, there was yet another more lovely than she with the Princess of Elis, and the Princess of Messenia, for I shall not accord with your opinion. Fear not, Madam, (answered Merigenes) that I will ever make my self a Judge between two amiable persons; 'tis enough for me that I make you their pictures, and leave you the liberty to follow your own inclinations. For indeed never any decision ought to be made between two beautiful and accomplisht Ladies. That which pleases one does not another; and there is a certain humerousness (of which I am to learn the reason) which sometimes apprehends defects with approbation, and finds pleasingness in things which are not taking. However it be in that respect (said Amilcar) I have great impatience to know Clariclis. I beseech you (interrupted Plotina agreeably, speaking to Merigenes) if Clariclis be a gallant Lady, forbear to draw her pourtrait, for if she happen to please Amilcar, the first time we chance to quarrel, he will fall to love her, and go to Elis to find her; therefore if you apprehend Clariclis may make some impression upon his heart, draw a curtain in this part of your Story, least by representing her picture I may have occasion to be jealous. Since you are a person (replyed Amilcar) to whom of all the world jealousie would be least troublesome, and who could best bear it, I should not be very unwilling to excite that passion in you, after having been constant half my life; and therefore I intreat Merigenes to begin forthwith the draught of Clariclis's picture. And I also (added Valeria) joyn my requests to those of Amilcar's; to which the rest of the company assenting, Merigenes pursued his Story in these words.

The lovely Clariclis is unquestionably one of the most charming persons in the world, and whose wit and humor have a particular genius; but before I engage my self in describing the same to you, I am obliged to speak something concerning her beauty. Clariclis therefore is of an extream handsome stature, and of an agreeable proportion, capable of pleasing all the world by a certain fine and natural air, which renders her infinitely graceful. Her hair is of the fairest Chest-nut-colour that ever was seen, her visage round, complexion lively, mouth handsome, lips very ruddy, with a little dimple in her chin, extreamly becoming, her eyes are black, sparkling, full of life, and the ayr of her countenance cheerful, pretty and spritely. Together with all these advantages Clariclis has also that of a very graceful presence, which is not always found in those that are debonair. Clariclis's wit is undoubtedly excellent, and that in a peculiar way, of which few persons are capable; for it is pleasant, divertising, and compliable to all sorts of people, and chiefly to those of the vulgar rank. She speaks freely, and is much inclinable to laughter; she makes great mirth of a trifle, and loves to raise innocent quarrels amongst her friends; yet her raillery hath never any thing disgustful in it, she loves all kind of delights, writes very gallantly, never is discontented without cause, but is constantly sweet and complacent. She loves walking, conversation, handsom novels, jollities and divertisements of all sorts whatsoever. But in this temper of debonairity, it must be confest that this sprightly Lady hath all the good qualifications of those which are melancholick and ingenious too; for she has a tender and sensible heart, she is ready to weep with her afflicted friends, she knows how to renounce pleasures when friendship requires it, she is faithful to her friends, and capable of secrecie and confidence, she never makes a fewd with any person whoever; she is generous and constant in her sentiments; and in a word, is so amiable, that she is loved by the most honorable persons of the Court of both sexes; yea, even such as do not agree with her in reference to condition, humor, genius, interests, all acknowledg, that Clariclis is infinitely charming, that she is indued with wit, real goodness, and a thousand qualities worthy of the highest esteem.

I beseech you, generous Merigenes (interrupted Plotina) proceed no farther, for I find jealousie begin to seise me; Envy I know it cannot be having never been possessed with any, and I had rather a hundred times be jealous than envious, though neither of these two qualities be very sup-

…ve one of honorable sentiments, as also not very pleasing, or commodious. But however it be, proceed forthwith to tell us how they lived there during the Truce, which was concluded only to give the Gallants leisure to attend their love.

I shall obey you, fair Plotina (answered Merigene, without giving Amilcar leisure to speak) and in the first place you may please to know that within a few days Melantbus being accompanyed by all his Court went to Meliſaris, that the two Princesses were there also, and that Chryſilia, Claricia, and three other Ladies of eminent beauty were with them, besides several others which went thither too, so that the conversation was every day very agreeable at the Princess of Elis's Lodgings; that in fair weather they walked abroad sometimes in the tetrasted Gardens I told you of, other times they went in Coaches by the River-side on the way leading to Olympia; and that all this fair company frequently were in little painted and gilded Boats, amongst those Islets and close Alleys of water I described to you sometimes when the Sun was down walk'd in the Meadows of the greater Islands; sometimes landed to walk under those great and shady Trees, which are on the borders of the Forrests beyond those Islands, being for the most part diverted with Musick upon the water. So that during the Truce they may seem to have enjoyed all the pleasures of peace, especially after it had been publisht that the Olympick Games were to be celebrated within fifteen days. For this news caused a continual arrival of Illustrious Strangers from all parts of Greece. There were some of Athens, Corinth, Thebes, Delphos, Sparta, Argos, Megalopolis, and Meſſene; others came from all parts of Macedonia, and especially from Theſſaly. I saw there some of those people that inhabit at the foot of the famous Mountain Pindus, others that dwell on Mount Parnaſſus, and others near Mount Helicon, and that of Hymettus. There were some also that came from the streights of Thermopyli, and others from Countreys so remote, that their Language was not understood. So that of all sorts of people that resorted thither, there being none but had a curiosity to see the Princess of Elis, every day brought some new strangers, who were worthy persons, and contributed to the pleasures of the society. For though Eliſmonda was unhappy, yet she was young and fair, and feared least melancholly might be injurious to her beauty. Wherefore it ought not to be wondered if she gave her self to divertisement, notwithstanding the condition she was in; nor was any thing omitted that might afford her contentement, Melantbus, Andronice, Hortenſius, Cleontine, Chryſilia, Claricia, Timeres, and generally all that came to her, employing all their care thereunto. At other times, those four persons of high quality, who had the liberty to speak to her concerning her affairs, entertained her agreeably with the design they had of making some League during the Olympick Games. The Prince of Cypariſſa also, who had found out means to write to her, gave her great hopes of success; whence, though she had no affection for that Prince; yet she was well enough pleased with his Letters, because he presumed not to make the least mention of his love to her; and all these considerations rendered her more capable to receive with pleasure the divertisements which were intended to her. She came even insensibly to have a very tender kindness for Hortenſius, and was highly glad to understand that he was of an illustrious descent, and that so many predictions designed him for Empire, because she imagined they might perhaps be accomplisht in the principality of Meſſenia. But as she was one day discovering her thoughts to Cleontine, this Lady, who was not so well satisfied as Eliſmonda of the Infallibility of Predictions, recited several Oracles to her which had not been well understood: And believe me Madam (said this discreet person to her) I conceive 'tis a very great temerity in men to endeavor to penetrate into the secret counsel of the gods, who give us to understand by the obscurity of their answers, that they are unwilling to have them understood. For these Governors of the World might speak clearly, if they pleased we should be benefited by their Oracles. But there is so great a darkness in futurity (added she) that I will never undertake to pry into it. And besides, what advantage is it to anticipate the misfortunes which must befal us, by the knowledge we desire to have of them, or at least by the fear which such unprofitable curiosity produces to us, which can never render men either more wise, or more happy. The gods have given us prudence to conduct our selves, and also that of our friends to counsel us, when our own is dubious concerning any resolution we desire to take: let us not therefore be industrious to torment our selves by seeking to know things which we shall know soon enough if they be designed to befall us. But Cleontine (answered Eliſmonda) I have no curiosity in reference to what concerns my self, but I cannot refrain from musing on the fate of Hortenſius, finding some probability that he may come to rule. For without taking notice of the Predictions concerning him, Fortune has placed him in so great credit with the Prince of Meſſenia, that there seems scarce above one step more to advance him to absolute dominion. Alas! Madam (replyed Cleontine) that step is greater than you apprehend; and there is always a vast difference between a Prince and his Favorite. And besides, Hortenſius is so generous, that it cannot be feared he should ever commit an action contrary to virtue. But may it not fall out (said Eliſmonda blushing without knowing why) that the Prince of Meſſenia may die in the War, and the Princess Andronice, who knows how greatly he is beloved by the people, may marry him? She has both a great esteem, and dearness for him, and moreover is obliged to him; so that I cannot but think Hortenſius may possibly one day come to be a Prince. Well Madam, (answered Cleontine) I am of opinion if Hortenſius reign not one day in the heart of some fair person, and perhaps in yours, he will never reign in any place; for as for what you say may come to pass there is not much appearance that it should ever happen. Melantbus, as you see, is enamoured on you, and therefore I conceive he will use all means to end the War by your Mariage; and if during the Olympick Games, the League you are told of, which is your last hope, cannot be effected; I am perswaded your subjects will constrain you to procure their peace by yielding up your self to him that makes War against you. Ah! Cleontine ontine (reply'd Eliſmonda paſſionately) I had rather continue my whole life in priſon, than ever marry the Prince of Meſſena. Time perhaps will make you change your reſolution (anſwer'd Cleontine:) but as far as I perceive (added ſhe ſmiling) you do not think it impoſſible, but that Hortenſius may reign in your heart, ſince you anſwer me nothing concerning that. I aſſure you (ſaid ſhe) I really believe it would be more eaſie for me to begin to love Hortenſius, than to ceaſe hating Melanthus, though he be very well accompliſh'd. But in brief, he has been the cauſe of my Fathers death, has made War againſt me, is violent and capricious; and there is ſomething in my heart which makes me ſo averſe from him, that though he had never done me any of theſe miſchiefs, I could never affect him. You ſee, Madam, what ſentiments the fair Eliſmonda had a little before the Olympick Games, which were this year celebrated with all the magnificence, that two amorous Princes could add to them; but though Hortenſius were not a declared Lover, yet he did not omit to contribute as much thereunto, as his Rivals. 'Tis true, he was ſo diſcontented in the bottom of his heart, that he was much troubled to conſtrain himſelf; for he lov'd Eliſmonda with the greateſt ardency poſſible, and yet was reſolv'd to continue faithful to his Maſter. An augmentation to his grief was, his perceiving the moſt obliging deportment of Eliſmonda towards him; and when he was not in his hours of jealouſie of the Prince of Cypariſſa, he believ'd it perhaps not impoſſible for him to be countenanc'd, did not fortune and his virtue place obſtacles to his Love. That which tormented him moſt was, that he wiſh'd Eliſmonda could have underſtood his paſſion for her, without his doing any thing contrary to the fidelity which he ought to Melanthus. Nevertheleſs he reproacht this thought to himſelf as a Crime, though he were unable to be free from it; and this conſideration tormented him more than the other. Things being at this paſs, preparations were made for the offering of a ſolemn ſacrifice in the famous Temple of Jupiter, which is at Olympia, before the commencement of the Olympick Games. At firſt there was ſome conteſtation about it; for Melanthus pretended it belong'd to him to offer it as Conqueror; and the Prince of Cypariſſa had the ſame pretenſion, as Commander of the Forces of the Princeſs of Elis: but at length an expedient was found to ſatisfie both, which was, that Eliſmonda ſhould offer it. Yet Hortenſius was the perſon to whom Melanthus committed the care of the magnificence of the ſacrifice; which I ſhall forbear to deſcribe particularly to you, as alſo that proud Temple of Jupiter, in which is ſeen a great Statue of Gold, which Cypſellus Prince of Corinth gave to it, together with divers other rich offerings. I ſhall tell you therefore, that this day being the firſt, in which the Prince of Cypariſſa had the liberty of ſeeing the Princeſs Eliſmonda, he came very early to the Temple that he might ſee her when ſhe arriv'd there: for ſo was it concluded by the Treaty, though Melanthus affected not that Prince upon ſeveral accounts. Now was the curioſity of Hortenſius ſatisfy'd, who deſir'd to ſee this Rival that was unknown to him; but it was to his further torment: for the Prince of Cypariſſa appear'd ſo comely a perſon to Hortenſius, he found him ſo generous when he diſcours'd with him, he was ſo magnificent, and moreover, ſeem'd ſo amorous of Eliſmonda, that he could not hinder himſelf from hating him, and looking upon him with as great hatred as if he had been aſſur'd he was happy. But making uſe of the ſame reaſon, which aſſiſted him to conceal his paſſion for Eliſmonda, he overcame himſelf ſo much, as to diſſemble the hatred which he bore to the Prince of Cypariſſa. I wiſh, Madam, I were here able only to deſcribe to you the great number of honourable perſons which were preſent at this ſacrifice, and the multitude of people I beheld there; that ſo I might the better make you comprehend the infinite number of applauſes that were made of the beauty of the Princeſſes, and particularly of that of Eliſmonda, whoſe luſtre partly blemiſht the glory of the other fair ones In brief, I can aſſure you, that though there be three other ſorts of famous Games in Greece, yet never was there ſeen ſo much of the world together, either at thoſe which are celebrated in the Forreſt of Nemea, or at thoſe of Apollo Pythius, near Delphos, or at thoſe which are called the Iſthmick Games, near Corinth, as were ſeen about the Temple of Olympia: I ſay, about the Temple, Madam; becauſe, though that be very large and ſpacious, yet it could not contain the hundredth part of thoſe who came to be preſent at this ſacrifice. But this multitude ought not to be wondred at, for the Olympick Games are ſo antient, that they deſerve ſome particular reſpect, only for their Antiquity. Their original is ſo remote, that it is dubious; ſome attributing their inſtitution to Hercules, who, they ſay, firſt celebrated them in honor of Jupiter, to which others not agreeing, maintain the ſame to be more antient than his times. However, they are of great antiquity, and were this year moſt magnificent. After the ſacrifice, the Princeſſes and the Ladies who follow'd them, enter'd all into ſtately open Chariots, accompanied by the Princes, and all the men of quality on horſeback, to take one turn along the courſe where the Olympick Games are celebrated: for 'tis the cuſtom for thoſe who offer the ſacrifice, to go thither to ſee whether it be in a fit condition for the ſeveral ſorts of Combats and Races, which are to be perform'd upon it. And as this place is the faireſt in the world, ſo it may be ſaid, that this promenade was the goodlieſt appearance that could be ſeen. For, Madam before the proud Temple of Jupiter is a great Grove of wild Olive-trees, which, by reaſon of their great age, make a greater ſhade than the ordinary Trees of that ſort, which ſerves to refreſh thoſe that have run in the Carrier of the Olympick Games. This Carrier is ſo much the more goodly, in that it lies between four great rows of Trees along the River Alpheus, that at one end of it there is a large place like a ſemi-circle, in which ſtands an Altar with Statues, and at the other a Pyramid of white Marble, ſupported on four great Globes of red Marble, upon the point of which Pyramid (which ſerves for a Limit or Goal to thoſe who run) is a Statue of Jupiter unarm'd, whoſe Eagle holds a Crown of Olive in his beak. So that the proſpect of the City of Olympia from this place, the Mount Pilacens which is behind it, the Temple of Jupiter, of which the Dome is very magnificent, the grove of

of Olive-trees, a large place, in the middle of which is a ſtately Fountain, and that fair long Carrier beſet on each ſide with trees along the River Alpheus, makes it the goodlieſt ſight in the world; eſpecially when all theſe places are fill'd with as great number of fair Ladies and handſome perſons as I ſaw there on the day I am ſpeaking of. After this, they return'd to the houſe of the virtuous Eliſante, whither the Prince of Cypariſſa, according to the liberty permitted him went alſo, after having ſaluted Melanthus, who return'd him only four or five words, which he had determin'd of before. But the Princeſs of Elis ſhew'd him greater kindneſs; for being oblig'd to him, it behov'd her, though unwilling to give him thanks for having hazarded his life for her ſervice, and for his readineſs to hazard it again, in caſe the War ſhould re-commence. On the other ſide, the Prince obſerv'd her ſo tranſcendently beautiful this day, that his paſſion aſſum'd new force, which he was unable abſolutely to hide; and it was ſo eaſie to underſtand by his aſpect, his joy, his admiration, and by all his words and actions, that he was amorous of Eliſmonda, that there was none whoſe notice it eſcap'd. Melanthus in the mean while had become deſperate ſeeing him deſperate, ſeeing him ſo amorous, if the Princeſs Andronice had not aſſur'd him that Eliſmonda did not love him. And I beſeech, you my dear Siſter (ſaid he to her with a low voice) to calm my inquietudes, make an unfaithful Lover of the Prince of Cypariſſa. He is already a rebellious Vaſſal (added he:) and I have a great confidence, that if you pleaſe you may bring it to paſs, to deliver me from this dangerous Rival. You ſeem, my Lord, anſwer'd ſhe, to have too mean an opinion of Eliſmonda's beauty, as you have too high of mine, if you believe it poſſible for me to withdraw a Lover from her: and beſides, what would you have me do (continued ſhe agreeably) after I have ſollicited him from her? You ſhould love him (reply'd he) to do Attalus a great ſpight and me a great ſervice. But, would you that I ſhould love a Prince whom you hate, (demanded ſhe.) Since I hate him (anſwer'd Melanthus) and fear leaſt Eliſmonda love him, he muſt needs be a perſon of merit; and moreover, according to the ſentiments I have at preſent, if the Prince of Cypariſſa lov'd Eliſmonda no longer, I ſhould alſo have no longer hatred againſt him, and I engage to love him, provided he love you. Hortenſius at this time came to them to tell Melanthus ſomething requiſite for him to be inform'd of; ſo that Andronice conceiving ſome pleaſantneſs in the propoſition that Love induc'd the Prince of Meſſena to make to her, ſhe told it ſimilingly to Hortenſius, who at firſt guſting ſome pleaſure to himſelf in this thought was very urgent with her to attempt to effect what the Prince Melanthus propounded to her, yet ſpeaking in ſuch manner as if he had had no other regard, than to the ſatisfaction of that Prince. But the next moment conſidering that if the Prince of Cypariſſa ſhould change his love, Eliſmonda might become more inclinable to liſten to Melanthus, he repented in his mind of the requeſt he had made: till at length the ſenſe of honor overpow'ring all other conſiderations, he continued his inſtance agreeably to Andronice, that ſhe would make the Prince of Cypariſſa her lover. I aſſure you (anſwer'd ſhe) that I ſhould find my ſelf much troubled to excite love in a new breaſt; judge then how I ſhall be able to do it in one prepoſſeſs'd with a great paſſion for one of the faireſt perſons of the world. At leaſt (ſaid Melanthus) treat him the moſt handſomely and obligingly you can, to the end he may not have the leiſure to ſpeak to Eliſmonda, and I the better opportunity of addreſſing to her. I ſhall obey you then (anſwer'd ſhe) and in order thereunto I ſhall return to the Princeſs of Elis. And accordingly, Madam, ſhe went to propoſe to the fair Eliſmonda to go and walk in that great Grove I told you was beyond thoſe Iſlands, which make thoſe fair watry cloſe Alleys I deſcrib'd to you. To which Eliſmonda conſenting all this noble company enter'd into twelve little Boats. Where Andronice in deſign to ſerve the Prince her Brother, acted with ſuch addreſs that the Prince of Cypariſſa was conſtrain'd to enter with her into a Boat, which ſhe took for her ſelf; for Melanthus giving the hand to the Princeſs of Elis, the Prince of Cypariſſa was engag'd to wait upon the Princeſs Andronice. So that in the Boat of Eliſmonda, there were with her only Cleontine, the charming Claricia, two other Ladies, Melanthus, Hortenſius, and my ſelf; and in that of Andronice, the virtuous Eliſante, the amiable Chryſilia, three other eminent Ladies, the Prince of Cypariſſa, and Exmenes: the ten other Boats were fill'd with all the other Ladies, and men of quality that were there. All theſe little Boats were adorn'd with little Canopies tuck'd up, which did not hinder the Ladies that fill'd them from being ſeen, who were ſeated upon rich and magnificent Cuſhions. But at length this little Fleet wafting gently along, arriv'd beyond the Iſlands where the Ladies deſign'd to walk on foot under thoſe great Trees, the thickneſs of whoſe umbrage makes a ſolitary, but the moſt delightful place in the world. For no houſes being within view, it ſeem'd a kind of pleaſant Deſart, no other living creatures being ſeen there but Birds and wild beaſts. When all this fair company was landed, and had walk'd awhile, they were very much ſurpris'd with a magnificent Collation, preſented there upon ſeveral Tables in the midſt of ſo great a ſolitude. All that were preſent began to extoll the Prince of Meſſena, for his unexpected gallantry; but he modeſtly diverted the commendation from himſelf to Hortenſius, whoſe contrivance it was, and to whom he had given the care of making it a ſecret. Eliſmonda, to whom it ſeem'd a ſurpriſing piece of generoſity, was glad ſhe had occaſion to aſcribe the acknowledgement of it to another than Melanthus. The Prince of Cypariſſa was of the ſame ſentiment, jealouſie effecting that in his mind, which hatred did in that of Eliſmonda: ſo that they both were forward in civil expreſſions to Hortenſius: the Princeſs of Elis not imagining that ſhe commended a Lover; nor the Prince of Cypariſſa a Rival. But it hapned at the end of the Collation, when they began to walk again, that the Princeſs Eliſmonda unadvertingly let fall a little Caſe, in which was her own Picture, which ſhe intended to give the next morning to the Princeſs Andronice, who requeſted it of her. My ſelf being ſufficiently near her, took it up, with a purpoſe to render it to her immediately; but Eliſmonda having gone a little diſtance from me, and the Caſe being opened with the fall, I had the leaſure to behold her Picture, which I found perfectly resembling her. Viewing of it thus attentively, the lovely Claricia, who observ'd what I was doing, came to me, and began highly to extoll the portrait. The fair Chrysilia likewise approaching us, did the same; and our forwardness in commending it was so loud, that Elismonda, who was led by the Prince Melanthus, looking back, perceiv'd the little Case we were viewing was hers. But for that she would avoid giving occasion to Melanthus, to fall upon the subject of her praises, if he should have seen the Picture, instead of commanding it to be restor'd to her, she only desir'd Cleontine to take care of it, to the end, it might be retur'nd to her when the company had seen it sufficiently. Upon which, proceeding in her walk, all that were present came to behold it, till it pass'd through the hands of the whole company, excepting the Prince of Cyparissa, whom Andronice entertain'd very diligently to please the Prince her Brother. For, being extreamly desirous of peace, and not discerning any more compendious and sure way to effect it, than by the marriage of Melanthus and Elismonda, she conceiv'd a great obligation upon her self to promote their love with her utmost endeavors. Melanthus, whose mind was taken up how to discourse of his passion to Elismonda, was not at liberty for any other matter; besides that, the Prince of Cyparissa having not long since occasion'd him the possession of so many Pictures of Elismonda, the sight of one in her presence could not take off his mind. But as for Hortensius, whose passion was no less ardent, and who wanted the satisfaction of hoping it would ever be known he was a Lover, when he beheld Chrysilia, Claricia, and my self, attentively viewing this portrait, he approach'd to us, and joyn'd his praises with ours. And Elisante also with Agenor, who were discoursing together, coming to see this Picture which I had already sufficiently beheld, I desir'd Cleontine she would please to remember the charge the Princess of Elis had laid upon her concerning it. After which I betook my self to walk with Chrysilia and Claricia, without further thoughts of the Picture. But soon after Elismonda desiring to be freed of the particular conversation of Melanthus, and calling Cleontine, Chrysilia, and Claricia to her, the first of them desir'd those in whose hands the Picture was, that when they had sufficiently lookt upon it, they would deliver it to Eumenes, that he might render it to her self. But it happened that the Picture being left in the hands of Hortensius, Eumenes, who was not very solicitous about it, went to speak to some Ladies that call'd him; for the liberty in such conversations as these, being very arbitrarious, every one follow'd his own inclination. Whilst this fair company was thus dispers'd into several little parties, Hortensius, whose mind was possest with a thousand different thoughts, walk'd for some time alone, and that so carelessly, that he was gone a good distance from the rest before he took notice of his own solitude, when opening the little Picture Case, he felt such a violent desire in himself to keep it, and so to serve himself of it, that it might be an occasion of making the Princess Elismonda understand, there was one in the world enamour'd on her, that had never discover'd so much, that a thought coming into his mind he might make this advantage of it; he was not able to resist the temptation, but began forthwith to bethink himself how he might bring it about. He instantly perceiv'd all the consequences that could ensue upon his project, and in a moment seeking all the remedies to the inconveniencies which he foresaw, believ'd he had found them; and so only consider'd how he might effect his design. But in order to make it more intelligible to you, you must know that Hortensius writ two hands so different, that it could never be imagin'd they could both proceed from the same person. The cause of which was this, for that he to whose trust his Father had committed him at his departure from Veii, having learnt Greek in Sicily from one of Pythagoras's Disciples, had at first himself taught him to write Greek; and afterwards going to live at Corinth, put him to a Master, who had perfectly made him change his Character. Now Hortensius conceiving he might both keep the Picture, inform Elismonda that he had a conceal'd Lover, and raise a jealousie in his Rivals if they understood the matter, and satisfie himself, took the picture handsomely out of the Case in which it was, and with a pastil which he always caried with him, writ four Verses in it, which he compos'd immediately, and I shall repeat to you by and by, and that in the Character which he had almost wholly dis-us'd; after which he return'd, and rejoyn'd himself with the company. He undertook this discourse the more confidently, for that night was drawing on, and therefore he believ'd that the picture would not be much enquir'd after, before he deliver'd it to Eumenes, and he to Cleontine, and Cleontine to Elismonda; whereby perhaps the Princess might not perceive the artifice that was put upon her before the next morning. However Hortensius, who had a great confidence in Eumenes, sought him out, and requested him to cause the picture Case, which he deliver'd him, to be render'd into the hands of Cleontine, without her knowing that it had been any time in his: which was very easie for him to do, by reason of the great number of persons which had taken the picture from one another to view it. Hortensius gave this charge to Eumenes with such earnestness, that he perceiv'd well it was not seasonable to enquire the reason which induc'd him to desire this of him; for he clos'd his hand in delivering the Case to him, and presently left him, to go and mingle with the rest of the company, who began now to draw towards the Boats, Eumenes was nevertheless resolv'd not to deliver this Case, without at least endeavouring to conjecture what had oblig'd Hortensius to speak to him in that manner; but Elismonda at the same time remembring her self of her Picture, call'd for it to Cleontine; upon which, Cleontine went to Eumenes to require the same from him. I assure you (said he, perceiving she saw it in his hands) that I much repent me of having accepted the Commission you gave me of taking charge of it; for since you went from me, I knew not what was become of it for an hour together, and 'tis but a moment ago that I believ'd it was lost; but at length a man whom I knew not, deliver'd it to me to restore it to you. Elismonda over-hearing these words of Eumenes to Cleontine, was in fear lest her picture might have been spoil'd, and taking the Case hastily, she told the Princess of Andronice, that it was for her interest that she was so anxious about it. For I have had had a design (continued she) to give you this surprise, which is retriv'd after an hours loss. While Elismonda was speaking this, Melanthus, the Prince of Cyparissa, and Hortensius stood about her, and beheld how she opened the Case with precipitation: But though there was not much day light left, yet she soon spied that her picture was gone, and read these four Verses in the vacant place.

My theft no Crime, but Justice is,
First injur'd on your part:
I'll then return your Picture back,
When you restore my heart.

As Elismonda is uncapable to repress the first motions which she resents upon any surprising occasion, she could not conceal her astonishment, but declar'd the loss of her Picture to all the company. You may easily judge what a strange adventure this seem'd, and how much Melanthus and the Prince of Cyparissa were amaz'd at it. The Prince of Messena was also very much discontented at the loss, and Elismonda seem'd to be in such trouble for it, that it was sufficiently apparent she did not conjecture who had bereav'd her of her picture, and made the Verses which she found written in the place of it, the Character being wholly unknown to her. As for Hortensius, he carried himself so cautiously, that he was not suspected in the least. In the mean while the day being at an end, it was requisite for them to think of taking Boat. But Melanthus being excited by a jealous apprehension, to find out who it was had taken away Elismonda's picture, and written the four Verses, commanded that all the persons of quality that were in that place, should not depart from him when they were landed, but follow him into Elisante's house. For, (said he with a low voice to Hortensius) the presumptuous person that took away the picture, also made and writ the Verses we see here at the same time, and therefore it must of necessity be some one amongst us; so that when the Princess is return'd back, it will be a good way for her to command all that were of our company to write something in her presence, to the end, every ones hand may be compar'd with the Character of the Verses. By this means, we shall come to discover who 'tis has been so rash to commit such a bold extravagance: for if he write, he will be infallibly convicted; and if he refuse to write, his detractation will be an evidence against him; if he follow us not to Elisante's house, his absence will speak him guilty; and if he go about to counterfeit another hand, the fraud will be apparent. I could if I were so pleas'd, cause a search to be made for this lost picture, but there are so many persons of quality present, that it cannot be done without disgust to the innocent; and moreover, it is so little, that it may easily escape the search, and the course would so prove ineffectual. Hortensius approving the intention of Melanthus, the Prince communicated the same secretly to the fair Elismonda and Andronice, who liking the expedient made haste to return to their Boats in the same order that they came. But by the prudent care of Hortensius, who nevertheless ascrib'd all the honor to Melanthus, they return'd in the most magnificent manner imaginable: for while this fair company were walking in the great Grove beyond the Island, Lamps were plac'd upon all the Willows which grew upon the banks; so that all these cover'd Alleys being illuminated by two rows of Lamps, the light multiplying it self in the water, irradiated the stream with Golden beams, which in some places resembling fluctuating flames, by reason of the agitation of the Water, made a shew, than which nothing could be imagin'd more resplendent and delightful, especially at such places where those Channels cross'd one another. For on what side soever they cast their eyes, these natural Canopies being enlightned by the Lamps, which reflected from either Bank upon the Water, caus'd a kind of admiration accompanied with pleasure, surpassing all expression. Which was further encreas'd by the hearing of a rare concent of voices on the right hand, as this little Fleet was passing between the two great Islands, and on the other side a concent of Instruments answering them. I cannot suddenly call to mind the verses which were sung there in praise of the Princess Elismonda, but I remember the invention was extream handsome; for it was feign'd that the River Alpheus boasted of being more glorious, by carrying Elismonda on its stream, than the Sea ought to be for the birth of the Mother of Love; all that I am able to tell you of it is, that there was a Song, of which all the Couplets ended with this Verse,

If it be not Venus, 'tis Arethusa.

And another, which equally suted to Melanthus and Hortensius, and ended thus,

Go my hearts Envoys, tender sighs make haste,
And mix your breath with gentle Zephyr's blast.
Then near that fair one, if you chance to fly,
Whisper unto her, 'tis for her I dye.

But having at length ended so agreeable a voyage, the fair company landed before Elisantes's house, into which, according to the order of the Prince of Messena all the persons of quality that had been of this Promenade, accompanied the Princesses. As soon as they came into a great Hall, Melanthus caus'd all the men to stand round a Jasper Table, near which were the two Princesses, and behind them Elisante, Cleontine, Chrysilia, and Claricia. The Prince of Messena having caus'd writing Tables to be brought, expected the commands of Elismonda; who to execute what was resolv'd on, told the whole company, and the Prince also, that it was requir'd every one should write something in those Tablets: Whereupon Melanthus beginning first, only to shew example to the rest, writ these words, which signify'd the impetuosity of his humor;

Whosoever my Rival be, I shall hate him.

And next the Prince of Cyparissa writ that which follows, in spight of the Menace of Melanthus;

The crime in question is so singular, that I wish I were the Author of it.

After whom, Hortensius making use of the Character he generally serv'd himself with, which was not the same with that in which he had writ the four Verses, subscrib'd these words;

He must be very amorous and confident that has committed such a prank.

Eumenes next taking up the style, writ these words;

Whoever the Criminal be, he deserves to be pardon'd, provided he do not discover himself.

After him, I was call'd to the Tablet, and writ only these words;

Being incapable to love without hope, I care not for being the Criminal that is sought after.

I should be too tedious, if I should tell you all that was written afterwards, by the several honorable persons that were present; besides that, there were many of them who only writ their own names, or that of Elismonda. But, in conclusion, it was found, that none of all these hands resembled that in which the four Verses were written; and which was strange, the character which Hortensius writ at this time, was less like that of the Verses, than any of all the rest, though he was the person that had written them; for that in the Picture Case was a very small hand, and the other which was his ordinary way of writing, sufficiently great. So that all the company, excepting Hortensius and Eumenes, were in a strange perplexity. But perhaps (said Andronice) 'tis a trick of some of the Ladies, or possibly some of these noble Personages may have caus'd one of them to write the Verses; for there are some Women whose hand is not distinguishable from that of men. To omit no inquiry then, (said the Prince of Cyprissa) it is requisite that all the Ladies present write too, as well as the men. Elismonda approving what Andronice said, all the Ladies writ also, together with the Princess Andronice; but when it came to the fair Claricia, she thought to amuse the company, and being of a debonair and pleasant humor, she look'd upon the four Verses as they lay upon the Table, and subtily endeavour'd to imitate the hand. Upon which, Elismonda immediately perceiving some imperfect resemblance between the two Characters, believ'd it was she that had plaid this prank, and conceiv'd the difference there seem'd between them, proceeded only from her endeavouring to disguise her own. And this caus'd a very pleasant contest for about a quarter of an hour: till at length upon viewing the writing more curiously, and Claricia's sincere protestation, and writing without counterfeiting, none could imagine the least conjecture of the truth. Thus being wholly at a loss, there was such a pleasant confusion among them, that they all beheld one another with amazement. If Eumenes had been suspected by the Prince of Messena, he might have question'd him whether he knew not something more concerning this accident than he had declar'd; but he had no suspicion at all of him; and moreover, none of the persons of quality that had been at the walk in the Grove, were found missing from the company. Whence Melanthus and the Prince of Cyprissa concluded they had a Rival in the same place they were in, whom yet they could not discover. Elismonda, for her particular, had so great a curiosity to know who had taken her Picture, that she could not conceal it; but though this curiosity of hers was reasonable, Melanthus and the Prince of Cyprissa were something dissatisfy'd, because it seem'd to them, she appear'd not sufficiently in choler for the loss. As for Hortensius, he was very glad to perceive how desirous she was of knowing who this hidden Lover should be: but his generosity coming to the assistance of his reason, he would rather have dy'd than that Melanthus should have known he had Elismonda's Picture, and it may be he would not that the Princess of Elis should have understood it with certainty. But he ardently wisht, she would at least have suspected him a little in the secrecy of her thoughts, without discovering it to any person. There were also some moments in which he accus'd himself of folly; for having taken such an odd course for consolation to his infelicity. But at last the excess of his passion made him apprehend some kind of pleasure in thinking Elismonda understood she had another Lover beside the Prince of Messena and the Prince of Cyprissa; and he was not very sorry for the perplexity and inquietude he occasion'd to those two Princes, though he was resolv'd always to serve the first of them faithfully. In the mean time, this adventure was so cruelly tormenting to Melanthus, and rais'd in him a curiosity so full of jealousie, that he made it his chief business afterwards to observe diligently the deportment of all the honourable personages that had been in that days entertainment. For though he believ'd none of them could pretend to the possession of Elismonda, yet he bore no small hatred to this unknown Rival, and discover'd as much to Hortensius, not imagining that the object of his hatred and his friendship, were united in one and the same person. For being Hortensius serv'd his interests faithfully in his Courtship of Elismonda, he found no cause to suspect him. That which caus'd Hortensius to act in this manner, with the less scruple, was, that he apprehended reasons of State might require Elismonda to marry Melanthus. But though he acquitted himself with fidelity of whatsoever trust that Prince reposed in him, in order to the success of his design; yet he was glad to see that according to all appearances, the Princess would never be brought to comply with his desires; and he accounted himself happy in knowing she had both esteem and friendship for him, and seeing himself equally endear'd to two Princesses so accomplish'd as Elismonda & Andronice. But when Eumenes, after they were retir'd in private, spoke to him of the adventure of the Picture, he reprov'd him friendly; And, What intended you to your self (said he to him seriously) in exposing your self and me also to danger? Had I believ'd I should have brought you into danger (answer'd Hortensius) I would never have committed this odd prank. And since, my dear Eumenes (continued he) you know the secret of my heart, and have understood I lov'd Elismonda before my self, having discover'd it before I knew I did so, you may easily conjecture how unhappy I am, who have taken so strange a course for my consolation.

But,

But I beſeech you do not ſuſpect me of intending ever to betray my Maſter. No, Eumenes, I will betray my own love for his intereſt, and rather loſe my life than commit an unworthineſs. If the War did not detain me here, and I could with honor forſake my Prince ſo long as he has his ſword in his hand, I ſhould undoubtedly do it, rather than be engag'd in ſuch a difficulty as doing ſervice to a Rival with his Miſtreſs. But for that this cannot be, I ſhall ſerve him faithfully in the pretenſions he hath to Eliſmonda, in ſpight of all the paſſion I have for her. If this Princeſſes rigor towards Melanthus ceaſes, I confeſs ingenuouſly, I find not my ſoul firm enough to be a witneſs of his felicity; but as ſoon as I ſhould ſee him in a condition of being happy, I ſhould betake my ſelf to wander about the world, as the moſt unfortunate of men. I ſhould together forſake my Maſter and my Miſtreſs, and my Fortune; and giving over all care of my Love, go ſeek my death, without diſcovering the cauſe of it to any other but your ſelf. But if Eliſmonda continue firm in her reſolution of not marrying Melanthus, I ſhall then endeavour to do the Princeſs ſervice with him, to the utmoſt of my power, leſt he changing his Love into hatred, treat her rigorouſly; and I ſhall adore her all my life in ſecret, without knowing what courſe to take with my paſſion. Thus, my dear Eumenes (continued he) you ſee the naked ſentiments of my Soul, which I intreat you not to endeavour to alter; for I well know your reaſon will not be able to do that, to which my own has been ineffectual. Whilſt Hortenſius was reaſoning in this manner with Eumenes, Eliſmonda being retir'd at night, call'd Cleontine into her Cloſet, and began to ſpeak to her about the adventure of her Picture, ſeeking to conjecture who might have had ſuch boldneſs to detain it. For my part (ſaid Cleontine to her) I love not to ſeek that which I cannot find; but I would only know, Who you would be contented were the thief. But, Cleontine (anſwer'd ſhe ſmiling) if I were to wiſh any thing, I would wiſh this accident had never fallen out. I have told you, Madam, already (replyed Cleontine) that I care not to have ſuch an unprofitable curioſity; and ſo you may judge, I as little affect a wiſh or deſire, that ſerves to no purpoſe. Therefore take matters in the ſtate they are in, and do me the favour to tell me, whether you would have this prank committed by Melanthus, or by the Prince of Cypariſſa, or by Hortenſius, or by ſome other. I hate the firſt too much (anſwer'd Eliſmonda) and I have too great an averſion from the ſecond, to wiſh him guilty of this fooliſh deceit; and perhaps I love the third too well to deſire he were my Lover. For indeed I would not that Hortenſius were unhappy; and he muſt aſſuredly be ſo, in caſe he loves me. If he could know what you ſay concerning him, Madam (reply'd Cleontine) he were not much to be pitied. I aſſure you (ſaid the Princeſs bluſhing) that though I am not over well skill'd in love, I believe that friendſhip is no great conſolation to a Lover. You ſpeak ſo well what you are minded (anſwer'd Cleontine, ſmiling) that I believe you underſtand more in Love than you imagine. Alas Cleontine! (reply'd ſhe, ſmiling alſo) who do you think ſhould have taught me? He that teaches Nightingals to ſing ſo well in the Spring (anſwer'd ſhe) may perhaps have taught you to ſpeak after the manner you do. However it be (reply'd Eliſmonda) I find it ſufficient that I am Melanthus's priſoner, without engaging my heart to be no longer free at all; but I have a confidence 'tis ſtill my own, and will be ſo for ever. This, Madam, was the converſation of Eliſmonda and Cleontine. But the next morning when the Prince of Meſſina, and the Prince of Cypariſſa were buſied in the choice of Judges, which were to preſide at the Olympick Games, Hortenſius being deſirous to gain a glory abſolutely unintereſſed, would not concern himſelf in the affair. And therefore he went to ſpend part of the afternoon with the Princeſs Eliſmonda, who had then no other company but Cleontine, the other Ladies being gone to the apartment of the Princeſs Andronice, or that of the virtuous Eliſante, with intention to come back ſoon after to the Princeſs of Elis. Now the adventure of the preceding day being yet too freſh to be ſilenc'd, Eliſmonda, after the firſt civilities, ask'd Hortenſius, Who he ſuſpected to have taken away her picture, and made thoſe four Verſes, For, in brief, (ſaid ſhe pleaſantly, retorting them upon the inſtant)

Knew I what Criminal hand it was Did this injurious part;
If he'd reſtore my Picture back,
I'd render him his heart.

Ah! Madam (anſwer'd Hortenſius) did I know that unhappy perſon who loves you, without daring to diſcover himſelf, I think I ſhould conceal him from you, after what you have ſaid; for I look upon him as ſufficiently puniſht for the boldneſs he has to love you, and to love you aſſuredly with very little hope, without beſides endangering him to be conſtrain'd to take back his heart, and reſtore you your picture. And moreover, Madam (continued he) becauſe there is no appearance this Lover can do any prejudice to the Prince whom I ſerve, I conceive the compaſſion I have of him is not criminal. I aſſure you (anſwer'd ſhe haſtily) Whoever that Unknown be, he is more in favor with me, than the Prince Melanthus can ever be, in quality of a Lover. But, Madam, ſaid he, would you be contented that Unknown knew what you ſay concerning him? What I have ſaid, (anſwer'd ſhe) being rather an effect of my hatred againſt Melanthus, than kindneſs towards him, I ſhould not much care if he did. But, truly if I knew who he were, it would be another caſe, and I ſhould keep my ſelf to the four Verſes, which I retorted but now almoſt, without thinking what I was ſaying. Hortenſius fearing to ſpeak more of the matter than ſhe was willing, handſomly chang'd the diſcourſe, and demanded of the Princeſs, why ſhe hated a Prince ſo reſolvedly, who had ceas'd being her enemy, and was become her Lover, who treated her ſo reſpectfully, and with whom alſo ſhe liv'd in terms of great civility. As for the civility I have for him, anſwer'd ſhe, he owes it to my prudence, to the counſel of Cleontine, and to yours: but for my hatred, it proceeds from his injuſtice. For if he repent of what he has done, why does he not return into Meſſena? why does he not reſtore me to my liberty, and put Elis into my power, and leave me in peace? But Madam, (reply'd Hortenſius, who in the bottom of his heart, gave her thanks for this her rigor) if you ſpeak at this rate while you are in the power of the Prince of Meſſena, how would you ſpeak if you were free? And you ſeem not to conſider, that the intereſt of his Love is a more powerful inducement to make War upon you, retain his conqueſts, and keep you under guard, than his ambition it ſelf. Ah Hortenſius (ſaid Eliſmonda, without anſwering to what he had ſpoken) as often as I think how inſenſibly you have engag'd me to bear a friendſhip towards you, and conſider, that at the end of the truce you will become my enemy, and draw your ſword againſt thoſe that defend my intereſt, I am even ready to die, under the neceſſary deſire of hating you, as well as Melanthus. But Madam (anſwer'd Hortenſius) I ſhall never be your enemy. 'Tis Fortune apparently, that hath caſt me into the intereſts contrary to yours; but nevertheleſs, I ſhall not forbear to aſſure you, that I make a vow to honor you all my life, and to reſpect you in a manner ſo full of zeal, that even when I ſhall be in the Army of your enemies, I ſhall have more thoughts of veneration for you, than all your Subjects and Friends too, can ever be capable of. Hortenſius ſpoke theſe words with ſo paſſionate an air, without deſigning to do ſo, that Eliſmonda bluſht at them; and Cleontine, who had all this while been ſilent, ſeeing the Princeſs a little perplex'd what to anſwer, interpos'd, and without diſſembling, Madam, ſaid he, you may be ſaid to be happy in your enemies; for Melanthus treats you, as if you were not ſuch, and Hortenſius expreſſes as much dearneſs to you, as if he had been born your Subject, and always your Friend. Hortenſius was going to anſwer Cleontine, when Andronice, accompanied with the fair Chryſilia, the lovely Claricia, Eumenes, and my ſelf, enter'd into the Princeſs of Elis's chamber, and interrupted that converſation to begin another more general, yet very agreeable: for you muſt know there had been born a conteſt between the Princeſs Andronice, Chryſilia, Claricia, and me, which could not be determin'd: So that it was agreed to refer the ſame to the judgement of the Princeſs of Elis, Cleontine, and Hortenſius, who we knew were with her. Andronice was no ſooner in the chamber of the fair Eliſmonda, but ſhe told her, there was a great diſpute between Claricia and me. I conceive (anſwer'd the Princeſs) thoſe two perſons minds are ſufficiently concordant; but becauſe I cannot doubt of what you ſay, be pleas'd to tell me the ſubject of their conteſtation. Though the Princeſs of Meſſena (ſaid Claricia) be an impartial perſon, and ſpeaks very equitably without prejudice againſt me, yet I ſhould be deſirous to tell you the cauſe of their diſpute my ſelf. For indeed (proceeded ſhe ſaying) ſhe may perhaps make ſome ſmall diſtinction between a very accompliſht man, and one of the contrary Sex, not wholly uningenious, which would not be to my advantage. It would be requiſite to have more merit than I dare own (anſwer'd I) to induce the Princeſs of Meſſena to do you an injuſtice. However it be (ſaid Andronice) I am willing that Claricia tell the Princeſs Eliſmonda the ſubject of her diſpute. Be pleas'd then to know, Madam (ſaid Claricia pleaſantly) that the Olympick Games being now as univerſal a matter of diſcourſe, as great cold in winter, or great heat in ſummer, I began to ſpeak concerning them as others do; for ſince 'tis the cuſtom, it ought to be follow'd. But for that I conceiv'd a little pleaſantneſs alwaies enlivens converſation, I ſaid, upon occaſion of the Olympick Games, that not doubting but there were very many Lovers, amongſt thoſe who aſpire to win the prize, I pitty them for the inquietude they would be poſſeſs'd with, by their anxious incertainty of victory. This leading me to ſpeak concerning hope and fear, it was contented that of theſe two paſſions, hope afforded more joy than fear does ſadneſs. Upon which, the difference was examin'd between a hope proceeding from Ambition, and a hope proceeding from Love, to know which was the moſt ſweet and pleaſing. But after ſome debate it was concluded, that theſe two ſorts of hope were more or leſs ſweet, according to the inclination of the perſons poſſeſs'd by them, and that an ambitious man, was more delighted with the hope of making a great Fortune, than with that of being lov'd by his Miſtriſs; but that one without ambition, and very amorous, was more pleas'd with hoping to be lov'd, than with hoping to be rich. It was alſo agreed, that a Lover without ambition, who hopes to be lov'd again, reſents a ſweeter delectation: and an ambitious perſon without Love, a pleaſure more unquiet and leſs charming. But paſſing eaſily from one thing to another, we came at length to enquire which gives the greateſt pleaſure, either the remembrance of favours paſt, or the hope of favours to come; and this was the point, upon which Merigenes and I could not agree. For I confeſs, the remembrance of any thing that has been offenſive, is troubleſome to me, and that of a paſt delight gives me nothing but regret, becauſe I no longer taſte the pleaſure of it. As for hope, it flatters and charms me; and to ſuch as know how to uſe it aright, it gives a ſatisfaction in hoping pleaſures which never come to effect; judge therefore what a lover muſt do in compariſon with me, who have no other object of my hope, but ſome delightful entertainment of walking, a converſation that pleaſes me, Muſick, a Collation, or ſome other like divertiſement. For my part, (ſaid the Princeſs Eliſmonda) I declare my ſelf for Hope. You give your judgement too ſoon for an equitable perſon (anſwer'd I) for you have not yet heard my reaſons. If after I have heard them (reply'd Eliſmonda) you make me change my opinion, you will have the greater glory: therefore I deſire you to declare all you have to ſay in defence of your ſentiment, and I alſo requeſt the whole company to pronounce their judgements upon the queſtion. I deſire your excuſe, Madam, (ſaid Hortenſius) I never had any delightful paſſage in my whole life to remember; at preſent alſo I have no hope, nor ever ſhall, and therefore I am unfit to ſpeak in this caſe. How can you know (demanded Claricia) that you ſhall never hope for any thing while you live? If it be ſo (added the Princeſs Andronice) Hortenſius believes he ſhall never love during his life; or elſe he muſt place his affections ſo high, that he cannot think Love will ever render juſtice to his merit. Hortenſius bluſht at the diſcourſe of the Princeſs of Meſſena, which Eliſmonda obſerving, bluſht likewiſe, without knowing what reaſon caus'd her to do ſo. However it be, (anſwer'd Hortenſius recollecting himſelf a little) I ſhall not decline telling you what I imagine, though I have experienced neither of theſe two ſentiments, and love has never given me but deſires without hope, fear, and ſadneſs. I thought (ſaid the charming Chryſilia, with a modeſt but admirable graceful ſmile) it was not poſſible to have deſires without hope. For my part, (anſwered I immediately) I am of opinion, we may deſire things we hope not for, though ordinarily deſires and hopes are inſeparable. But that which I undertake to defend, is, that nothing is ſo ſweet as the remembrance of a favor received from a perſon whom we love; for to diſtinguiſh things aright, when I ſpeak in this manner, I am not to be underſtood of a limited and finite love, ſince indeed, though the memory of all pleaſures has ever ſomething of ſweetneſs in it, yet this kind of delectation has nothing in it of life and picquantneſs, nothing that moves the Soul, and nothing that tranſports the heart. But when the mind is poſſeſſed with the remembrance of a favor received, and that may ſtill be received, I hold that if a Lover does not reſent more joy in remembring it, than when he did but barely hope it, he loves not with a ſufficient ardency. But do not you obſerve (anſwered Claricia,) that according to your own words, 'tis the hope of the future that makes you reſent the pleaſure of what is paſt, ſince you ſay your ſelf, that when you can no longer enjoy the ſame favor which you call to mind, you have not the ſame tranſport of joy as when you have in your memory a thing which is arrived to you, and which may ſtill be continued hereafter? But that which cauſes this to be ſo, (replyed I) is, that as Life capacitates the body with ſenſe, ſo Love animates the Soul and the mind, and gives it as it were another life, which cauſes us to apprehend all things with a quicker ſenſe, ſo that we may affirm a man to have a paralytical Soul (as I may ſo ſpeak) when he is abſolutely devoid of Love; ſince 'tis moſt true, he has but a half ſenſe of things which a Lover perfectly apprehends. For my part (ſaid Hortenſius) as ignorant as I am, by my own experience both of the pleaſures arriving from hope of the future, and of theſe which are guſted in the remembrance of what is paſt, I accord with the opinion of Merigenes, that a Lover who finds more pleaſure in hoping a good, than he does afterwards in remembring the good which he has already poſſeſſed, is abſolutely deficient in Love. For otherwiſe, 'tis as much poſitively to affirm, that he has found leſs than he expected, than he fancied a ſatisfaction to himſelf which he has not met with, that the poſſeſſion of what he deſired has leſſened the paſſion which lead him to deſire it; and that he loves that better which he has not, than that which he enjoys. But in my opinion, in a perfect affection a favor obtained by a Lover, ought to be more dear and agreeable to him, than while he only deſired it, and the remembrance more ſweet, than the hope. Nor is it neceſſary, that he have a poſſibility of obtaining the ſame favor a ſecond time, 'tis ſufficient that he has a perpetual intereſt in the heart of her that granted it to him, to make the memory of it agreeable. For I believe that a man who has the happineſs to be loved where he loves, and to have received ſome dear teſtimonies of that affection, may boldly defie Fortune, ſince he is ſecured of a Megazin of pleaſures, which he may enjoy when he pleaſes, upon which ſhe has no power. Hope, as ſweet as it is, promiſes nothing but doubtfully; pleaſures to come, are uncertain; preſent fruitions, may be diſturbed by a thouſand accidents; but pleaſures paſt, are truly our own. We enjoy them in all places; the priſon it ſelf cannot hinder a Lover, from recalling ſome of thoſe happy moments, which making a powerful impreſſion in the memory, are eternally indelible. Theſe innocent delights are taſted even in the preſence of Rivals; and to ſpeak the verity of the thing, the remembrance of pleaſures multiplies them, and in multiplying them cheriſhes the Love that produces them, and augments the felicity of him that loves, ſince the greateſt pleaſure of this paſſion, conſiſts principally in loving. I grant you, (ſaid Claricia) that the remembrance of pleaſures multiplyes them, but you muſt alſo acknowledge with me, that hope encreaſes them; that the Idea of a favor is a thing that appears ſomewhat greater than the favor it ſelf, and that a Lover who hopes, and has a little of imagination, fancies ſome great pleaſure in entertaining his Miſtreſs ſolely to himſelf, than ſhe can bleſs him with when he comes to entertain her.

I once knew a man who after having loved an amiable perſon for a long time, took up a conceit of obtaining the favor of her, to give him a private audience. He was a ſufficient long time before he could oblige her to it, till at length when ſhe had promiſed it him, and there needed no more, but to find out means for a converſs with freedom, he began to enjoy all the ſweetneſs of hope; for you may well judge that a Lady who condeſcends to an aſſignation of this nature, does not hate him to whom ſhe grants it. But at laſt, it was reſolved this Lover ſhould meet his Miſtreſs in a Garden, in a cloſe walk, and by the ſide of a Fountain, where there were ſeats of green moſs; he was two days entertaining himſelf with this ſweet hope, during which he enjoyed a thouſand pleaſures. He imagined a hundred things to tell this fair perſon whom he loved, and made himſelf the pleaſing'ſt anſwers in the world; he believed the two hours this audience was to laſt, would be infinitely too narrow a time for him to expreſs all his thoughts. And yet afterwards I brought him to confeſs, that when he was with his Miſtreſs, he ſcarce knew what to ſay to her, and their diſcourſe was very ſparing and barren. But lovely Claricia (anſwered Eumenes, who had not yet ſpoken) if this Lover was truly ſuch, his ſilence was far better than his words, and the confuſion of his mind abundantly more ſweet than all the order of his diſcourſes could have been. I ſhall not ſcruple to affirm, in preferrence of that ſweetneſs which the remembrance of favors affords, that not only this kind of pleaſure is a more perfect one than that of hope, which is oftentimes diminiſhed by fear; but that ſometimes the remembrance of a favor that is ſomething particular, gives a more real contentment than the favor it ſelf, at the very time it is received. For a Lover, who after a long ſevere treatment, comes of a ſudden to underſtand from the mouth of his Miſtreſs that he is loved by her, and to receive receive some kind testimony of that affection, will resent a joy so surprising, that his Soul not being able to support it, he cannot but imperfectly embrace it. Transport in Love, is a thing that so confounds the sentiments of the heart, and so disorders the imagination and reason, that we sometimes apprehend things which we see not; and indeed we may think an amorous Transport has something of distemper or madness in it, which through the excess of Love that causes it, takes away a part of the sweetness that fills the heart of a Lover. And to tell you all I think, I am of opinion, that as there are sorrows which we feel more sensibly sometime after we have began to endure them, than when they afflict us first; so there are also pleasures, of which we are more sensible by the remembrance we have of them than in the first perception. For great sorrows, and great joys, oftentimes intercept and suspend the use of reason, and even the use of sense too. As for hope, (added he,) I look upon it as some young giddy headed girl, that believes all that is said to her, provided it sooth her up, that has only imagination and no judgment, which is diverted with chimera's, which takes true for false, and false for true, which upon slight probabilities, foresees a multitude of pleasures that are impossible; and lastly, to a passion which though it be bold to promise it self all in the future, does not cease to be timerous, and abandons the heart of a Lover to fear, and a misdoubting of the least concernments. A Lover thus qualified knows not whether he ought to smile or weep, and incertainty, which is the faithful companion of hope, oftentimes disturbs the joy which that gives him. You have well made this Picture, Eumenes (cryed the fair Elismonda) like a person that understood the nature of hope experimentally. 'Tis true, (replyed Chrysilia) 'tis very agreeable, and I think this pourtrait well resembles hope. Alass! (said Claricia) I fear it resembles it but too well, and that the company believes Merigenes has the advantage in our dispute. Yet I conceive, were I minded to speak all I think, I could make him acknowledge, that hope may be considered as the Spring time of Love: and that as the season is more delightful than Autumn, although it have nothing but Flowers and the latter fruits; so it will be no error to maintain, that the hope of a favor is more sweet than the remembrance of one past can possibly be. For if fear sometimes diminishes its pleasure; desire redoubles and enlivens it, and I am so perswaded of what I say, that though I should want reasons to make good my opinion, yet I should not change my judgment, because I should conceive the disadvantage would be in the greatness of their wit, against whom I contend, and the meanness of my own, not in the justness of their cause. As Claricia was speaking this, the prudent Elisante came to tell the Princess, that the Judges were at length chosen which were to preside at the Olympick Games, and that it was concluded the Princess Elismonda should be the person, by whose hands the Victors heads should be crowned with the Olive wreaths. For 'tis remarkable in all the several Games of Greece, that the desire only of glory animates all that go thither. The reward of those that carry the prize at the Olympick Games, is, as I told you, only a Crown of Olive; that in the Isthmick Games, of Pine, in those of Nemea, one of Smallage, and in those that are celebrated near Delphos, Fruits consecrated to Apollo. 'Tis true, there are signal priviledges for them that carry the prise at the Olympick Games three years together: for he that gains this glory, has a Statue erected to him, and at Sparta, a man that has overcome but once, has the honor to fight in the first rank, in the head of the Battallion, and in sight of the King. So that glory being that which excites all those to encounter who go to the Olympick Games, it may be undoubtedly affirmed, there are seen the bravest persons of the World. I forgot to tell you Madam, another remarkable thing; which is, that while the Olympick Games are celebrated, all the several Nations of Greece have liberty to resort thither, Friends and Enemies are equally admitted; no person during that time can be arrested for any crime passed, none may revenge himself of an injury, or disturb the ceremony by committing any violence, unless upon such as do disturb it; for in this case, such persons are punisht as offend irrespectfully during a ceremony that relates to Religion. As for the exercises of these Games, they are of several sorts, and in every one the Victor is crowned, but I shall omit to tell you of the Racing, Wrastling, and some others, and contest my self only to inform you of the Races of Horses and Chariots; the description of which, is more proper to be made to Ladies than all the other exercises, which are extreamly violent. But I must acquaint you, Madam, in the first place, with a ceremony which is observed after the Combattants are chosen, and to that end, you must know, that the next morning after this conversation concerning Hope, the Princesses came again before the Temple of Jupiter, where this ceremony is performed. I conceive you remember I told you, there is there a Grove of wild Olive trees, and a large vacant place in the middle of it, where there stands a magnificent Fountain. On the day designed to match the Combattants, scaffolds are erected, where the Judges sit on one side, and the Ladies on the right hand of them; and in the middle is a half circle, where all the Combattants stand, having their faces towards the Temple, and being attired with all possible magnificence. About this plate are Lists or rails erected to hinder the confusion of the people; at the foot of the Scaffold of the Judges, are the Heralds, who order the ceremony. Now, imagine, Madam, all things in this posture, and conceive Elismonda, Andronice, Cleontine, Chrysilis, Claricia, and all the other Ladies richly dress, upon a stately Scaffold, covered with a great Pavilion, fastned to great Trees, and tucked up on the sides, Represent to your self also, that you saw the goodliest Men in the World, most magnificently cloathed, and standing in that half-circle without any order of condition. For Melanthus, who after the example of Hercules, would be one of the number of the Combattants, stood near a Laconian, who only of all the company was meanly habited; The Prince of Cyparissa, who was another, stood near a man of Athens, who was of no great quality; and Hortensius above Melanthus, on the other side of the Laconian I spoke of. For my part, being not born in a Countrey where these Games are in use, I was of the number of spectators.

spectators. All the Combattants being thus ranged, they made a prayer to Jupiter, but though it be the custom to look towards the Temple of that god, yet Melanthus, the Prince of Cyparissa and Hortensius, did not observe the ceremony exactly, for in making the Prayer, they all three turned a little towards the fair Elismonda, as if to demand victory from her. It seemed as if Melanthus prayed to be chosen by lot, to combat against the prince of Cyparissa, for he beheld him with sufficient fierceness, after the ending of the Prayer, which is but of little length. As for Hortensius, he desired of the gods he might not encounter with Melanthus, lest being his servant, he might be obliged to restrain part of his dexterity, or lest being amorous he might be constrained to overcome his Master in presence of his Mistress: for this ceremony hath this hardness in it, that friends are necessitated to dispute the Prize one against another, whether they be willing or not. But observe how Fortune decided it, They now no longer make use of leaves of Laurel to draw lots with, as they did in the time of Hercules. One of the Heralds therefore took an Urn, into which he put as many little Balls as there were Combattants, each of which was masked with a Greek letter, every pair with the same letter, saving one, which was markt with a particular letter, for the number of the Combattants being odd, it could not be fellowed. After all these little Balls were put into an Urn, the Herald presented it to all the Combatants, one after another, who every one took out a Ball without looking into the Urn or upon the Ball, till every one had chosen. After which they advanc'd in order towards the Judges, and each of them delivered their Balls. And as they who hapned to have the same letters, advanc'd, the Judges put them one by another, and separated them from their Companions. It fell out so, that the Prince of Cyparissa and Hortensius had the same letter, and were destinated to dispute the prize of the Victory. Hortensius was highly joyed he had such an illustrious Enemy, and that he was not matcht with Melanthus. But when he saw that Prince had hapned on the single letter, he was as much perplexed; for you must know, that according to the Laws of the Olympick Games, he that has that letter, which is not fellow'd, because the number of the Combattants is odd, must wait to combate against the Victor of all the rest; which is no small advantage to him. Thus Hortensius saw himself endangered to be overcome by the Prince of Cyparissa, or in case he were not, to dispute the Victory against his Master and his Rival together. But the order of Combat could not be changed and it behoved him to dissemble what he thought, and to make a complyment to his enemy, according to the custom. Which being done, a warlike harmony was heard, which made the ayr ecchо from all parts. After which, all the Combatants being conducted by the Heralds, and marching two and two, passed before the Scaffold of the Princesses, whom they saluted very respectfully. Melanthus marcht alone after the rest, without being able to conjecture who might hap to be the person, against whom he should be to dispute the Victory, not knowing which of them might prove the most dextrous and happy. When the Combattants had passed before that Scaffold, being preceded by the Heralds; the Judges followed them to the Temple, whither the Princesses also went, to be present at the Sacrifice that was offered in the name of all those that were to combat. This ceremony ended, every one retired, to the end to prepare themselves to celebrate the Games three days after. During which space, they who had Mistresses there, did all they could to obtain some favor from them, believing it would conduce to make them carry the victory. In order to which, during this little interval, Melanthus and the Prince of Cyparissa, spoke more of their passion to Elismonda, than they had ever done before. But Hortensius, who durst not mention his, did notwithstanding all he could to obtain favors of friendship, since he presumed not to desire any of another nature; and accordingly pleading for Melanthus, he obtained for himself what he could not for that Prince. For as he was urging Elismonda that she ought in reason to give the Prince of Messenia something, which he might wear the day of that great Festival; As for Melanthus (said she to him) I give him the chains which he made me wear, provided he take them off me; but for you (said the Princess) I will give you a Scarfe, to the end to let you see, I grant that to a generous Friend, which I refuse to unacceptable Lovers. Hortensius was unquestionably ravish'd with this success: but for that Melanthus probably would be offended at it, he employed all his intreaties to oblige her to do the like for him, but without effect. Nevertheless, Hortensius to mollifie the mind of the Prince of Messenia, told him that the Princess of Elis had without doubt refused to do it out of policy, and that he had more share in the favor which he had received than himself; and to comfort him yet more, he assured him that Elismonda would not grant the Prince of Cyparissa what she had refused to him. In brief, Madam, Hortensius acted with such address, that he repressed part of Melanthus's resentment. Indeed this Prince had another inquietude this day, that greatly discontented him. Which the better to declare the occasion of, I must inform you, that during those three days which were allotted the Combattants to prepare themselves, it was lawful for them to substitute another in their place if they pleased, in case they found themselves indisposed, or some urgent affair befell them, or that they changed their minds. And for these reasons, the Olympick Games are seldom celebrated without some change or other. According to this custom, it was known, that a Stranger was come thither, who offered great civilities to that Laconian I told you was so meanly clad, if he would yield his room to him; and it was reported the Laconian absolutely refused to resign it, although he was very poor. But it seemed this must be some man of quality, since he offered the Laconian so advantageous a bargain. The Lovers surmis'd this adventure to concern them; and Melanthus and the Prince of Cyparissa imagined, that he who made this Proposal, was that unknown who had taken away Elismonda's picture. But my Lord, (said Andronice to Melanthus) he who took away that Picture, was infallibly at the walk where you were, and 'tis probable he who makes such offers to the Laconian, is some Stranger that happens to arrive here, and will not make himself known, unless he be one of the Combattants. As there were some persons whom I knew not at that walk, (answered Melanthus) how is it possible for me to know, but there may be persons of greater quality than they appear? And therefore I have a conceit, he that makes this proposal is that Unknown, who will not discover himself till the prize is to be contended for; and I will endeavor my self to persuade the Laconian, to the end I may know this reserv'd Rival. And accordingly he sent to enquire him out, and out of a capricious jealousie, which Hortensius did not withstand, he added to the offers made him by the Stranger all that he thought capable to mollifie the most ambitious mind, without being able to make him change his resolution. But what great advantage (said Melanthus to him) do you apprehend from getting a Crown of Olive, in the condition you are in? The glory of fighting in the first rank, (answered he) and in the sight of the King whom I am to serve in the War; and being a Native of a City where glory is preferred above Riches, I affect such a Crown of Olive more than all your Gold. But perhaps (replyed Melanthus) you will not win it, and by resigning your place you will become rich. The pusillanimity I should be guilty of in yielding my place (answered he) would make me die with shame; and therefore I had much rather die poor, than commit any thing unworthy of my self. Then at least, tell us (said Melanthus) what you know concerning him that is so importunate with you to resign your place. I know no more of him (answered he) but that he is a person of quality, who newly arrived on the other side of the River Alpheus, upon the Frontier of Arcadia, and will not discover himself unless he make one in the Combat. This discourse of the Laconian augmented Melanthus's curiosity, and he was pleased with his constancy, though he was sorry he could not move him from it; so that Hortensius minding Melanthus to make him a Present, he readily consented to it. But when he told the Laconian his intention; The gods forbid, (answered he with a very noble air) that I should accept a thing which would be unprofitable to me, from the hand of a Prince, to whom I refuse one that would be well pleasing to him; and indeed it was impossible to make him change his resolution. This generosity of the Laconian, and the urgency of the unknown person that desired to Combat, made the discourse of the rest of the day. But the next morning it was known that one of the Combatants, whose Mistress was sick at Pisa, had received a Letter from her, which absolutely commanded him to quit his place to the Master of him that delivered it, which was the unknown person; and Love accordingly effected that upon the mind of this Lover, which all the offers of Fortune could not work upon that of the generous Laconian. 'Tis true, he quitted it only for the race with horses; for being one of great activity, he aspired to all the Crowns of the Olympick Games. But Hortensius, who had continually greater love to Elismonda, and fidelity to Melanthus, after having deliberated of the matter in his mind, resolved if he were Victor of all the rest, to suffer himself to be overcome by his Master, believing a man that had been Victor of many others, might without shame suffer himself to be overcome by a great Prince, and by a Prince to whom he owed all his fortune. A sentiment of Love a while encountered with his generosity; but at length he continued firm to his determination. As for Elismonda, when she was alone with Clearius, she wished Hortensius might carry the glory of all the Olympick Games, that so (said she) Melanthus and the Prince of Cyparissa may not have the joy to be Crowned by my hand. Andronice, on the contrary, what ever friendship she had for Hortensius, wisht Melanthus might become victorious, and all the Ladies who had Lovers among those that aspired to the victory, made vows in secret contrary to those of the Princesses. But at length, Madam, not to weary you unprofitably in recounting to you the particularities of the Olympick Games which last for some days, I shall tell you nothing of what past the four first, because the Ladies use not to be there; and 'tis only on the day of the Chariot-races, which is the last, that all the Victors are Crowned: besides that, Melanthus and the Prince of Cyparissa, to preserve some State, were only in this last days exercises, which are the noblest of all. Hortensius also could not be in those of the preceding days, because he was matcht with the Prince of Cyparissa, who was not. This last famous day being come, each of the pretenders offered a sacrifice in the morning upon the Bank of the River Alpheus, along the Course. But that which surpris'd them was, that, seeing preparations for a sacrifice, they knew not who was to offer; for there stood a magnificent and admirably contrived Chariot, near the place where the sacrifice was prepared, but there was no person in it. Upon inquiry from those that belonged to it, it was known that this Chariot was the Strangers, to whom a Lover had quitted his place out of obedience to his Mistress. In fine, Madam, this day so famous throughout all Greece, was more remarkable than ordinary, by that which hapned afterwards, as you shall presently understand. To tell you in order all that passed in it, you may please to know, that all the several sacrifices being made, except that of the Unknown, all the Scaffolds erected under the umbrage of the Trees, growing on each side the Course, which is upon the Bank of the River, were filled with an incredible multitude of Spectators of all sorts and conditions. Those of the Judges and Princesses being prepared to receive them, and all the rails beset with people, and the adjacent places thronged with multitudes that came to see and could not; all those of the pretenders that had offered their sacrifices, came and ranked themselves at the end of the Carriere with their Chariots, in a large place designed for that purpose, expecting the hour for the race to begin; to the end the great number of spectators who were assembled in this place, might have the satisfaction of beholding those the longer that were to run. And indeed, nothing can be imagined more delectable than to see the great number of goodly persons magnificently attired, every one according to the mode of his Countrey, with stately Chariots painted and gilded, and adorned with several Impresses according to the different interests of the masters of them. But that which rendered this object more pleasant, was, that all these Chariots were drawn by the handsomest horses in the World. Those of Melanthus were of the goodliest last black that ever were seen; those of the Prince of Cyparissa were bright bay with black Manes, those of Hortensius were griesley; and those of the generous Laconian, white; so that this variety of handsome horses contributed still more to the splendor and gallantry of the day. Those of the rest of the Chariots, if you please, I shall omit; because it is not important, and my memory has not retained them very exactly. But at length, when the Musick which is us'd to animate those which are to run, began to be heard, and all the spectators were raised to a sudden expectation of the races, there was seen a Boat coming from the other side of the River Alpheus, and in it a man very magnificently attired. At the same time the Judges being ascended upon their Scaffold, and the Princesses accompanied by all the Ladies upon theirs, they all took notice of this Boat; and seeing it coming towards the place where the empty Chariot stood, it was not doubted but the person in it was he that was to possess the room of the departed Lover. This raised an universal curiosity in the minds of all the Spectators, and consequently they waited for him, though it was before intended to begin the Games forthwith. When he was in the middle of the River, those who had prepared a sacrifice for him, offered it, to the end to lose no time; and as soon as he came ashoar, he mounted into his Chariot. All this time, Melanthus, the Prince of Cyparissa and Hortensius had an extream curiosity to know who this Stranger was, though Hortensius less than the two others. Elismonda and Andronice were also very desirous to see this Unknown; and all the other Ladies no less: and generally the whole multitude had no other object in their thoughts but this Stranger. This universal curiosity was yet more augmented when they beheld him nearer, because they saw they could not discover him by reason of a kind of Vizard he had disguised himself with, such as the famous Thespis used in his Comedies at that time; but all the rest had their countenances uncovered. This unknown was of a very handsome stature, and fierce action, and he had something in his gesture which spoke him to want no boldness; his Chariot was rich; his Horses were grey, dapled with white specks, and his attire very magnificent. But that which made him be more wondered at was, that when his Chariot was according to custom to pass between the Pyramide, which serves for a Bound or Goal to the Racers in the Olympick Games, and the Scaffolds of the Judges and Princesses, and so to go along the Course; and range himself at the other end, among these that were to run, this Unknown stopt before that of the Princesses to salute them respectfully, and suffered a Banrol that was fastned to a Javelin, which he held, to wave in the wind, in which were written these two Verses in a great Character.

Since that your Beauty once has Conquer'd me;
If Conquer'd now, unknown I'll ever be.

You may judge Madam, how much these two Verses which were seen in the Banrol, confirmed the opinion of those who believed him the contriver of Elismonda's picture; and you may also imagine how incensed the jealousie of Melanthus, and the Prince of Cyparissa was. Hortensius himself was not free from suspition; and as Lovers are very forward to believe others affect their Mistresses, he believed the person he beheld was a Lover of Elismonda, although he knew him not to be that Unknown, whom Melanthus took him for. But Melanthus and the Prince of Cyparissa, (who in this conjuncture had no more power in what concerned the Olympick Games than the meanest of the pretenders) could not repress their desires of knowing him, but sent to desire the Judges they would constrain this Unknown to to discover himself, or otherwise to exclude him from pretending to the victory. But after the Judges had debated the matter, they answered, that since the Unknown had ingaged to discover himself, by the two Verses in his Banroll, in case he were Victor, it would be unreasonable to force him to declare himself if he were overcome; and it was to be believed he had some particular reason to conceal himself, which concerned not them to examine; and moreover, that the liberty of the Olympick Games ought not to be infringed, during which it is not lawful to commit the least violence upon any pretence whatsoever. Whence it behoved Melanthus, the Prince of Cyparissa and Hortensius, of necessity to repress their curiosity, and only to take care they might not be overcome by the Stranger. I shall forbear to tell you all the thoughts of these Lovers, and the discourse of the Princesses and the other Ladies with them; it being easie to imagine what they were. Nor shall I describe to you in particular all the several Races that were performed, having more important matters to acquaint you with. You may please to know then, that by the order of Lot which matches all the Combattants (except him that happens to have the single Letter, who runs always the last with the Victor of all the rest) the Unknown ran first against a man of quality of Thessaly, and the Judges gave him the honor of the first course; for he ran swiftly, and with a good grace out-stript his Enemy, and handsomly declined the Pyramide, making his turn with much dexterity; after which he began a second Course with him that was to follow the vanquisht Thessalian, in which he had more advantage than in the first. I need not tell you how his address and good fortune discontented those, who lookt upon him as their Rival; but I shall proceed to his third Course, which he managed with more applause than the two former, and all the people made acclamations in his praise. But at length, Hortensius his turn being come, he prepared himself to overcome this victor of others. The Stranger beheld him more fiercely, than he had done the others whom he had vanquisht, and seemed to prepare himself to make a greater attempt to overcome him. This caused the Spectators to redouble their attention; for Hortensius being very much esteemed, and likewise beloved by both parties, because he was the cause that Melanthus changed his manner of treating the Elaans, which was something Tyrannical, the whole multitude was in fear least he should be overcome by the Stranger. Elismonda became pale with fear, and Melanthus and the Prince of Cyparissa beheld him not as a Rival, but made vows for his success, as well as the Princess Andronice. But in brief Madam, Hortensius being at the end of the Carriere, with the Unknown, they made their Courses with very unequal success, for Hortensius performed his with such vigor, grace, exactness, and swiftness, that he far surpassed him that had surpassed those which preceded him. But that which enraged the Unknown, was, that apprehending in the middle of his Course Hortensius would overcome him, he endeavored to speed his horses with an impetuosity which was natural to him, who feeling themselves urged on too suddenly, reared up, and had overturned his Chariot, if he had not been dextrous and strong, but himself confest he was overcome at the end of his Course. But as Hortensius, having finisht his, was returning gently, very glorious with his Victory; the Stranger, who stopt in the middle of the Carriere, to redress some discomposure in the reins of his horses, could not repress his regret, but told him with a low voice, 'Tis too much to be overcome twice. At which words Hortensius stopt also to consider this disguised person, who observing his intent, fell into such a fury, that on a sudden changing his purpose, he bowed down on one side, as if he desired to speak to him. Hortensius judging he did so, advanced towards him, and heard these words from him distinctly. Since you desire to know me (said he to him) meet me to morrow morning at Sun rise behind the Temple of Diana, which stands upon the way to Pisa, where you shall find me with an unmaskt countenance, and my sword in my hand: you will there learn, that he whom you have surpassed rather by good fortune than address, deserved perhaps to overcome. If you are truly courageous, you will not fail at this assignation; and come thither with one slave only. I shall be there infallibly (answered Hortensius without being moved) and whether soever it be by good fortune or courage, I hope my second victory will cost you dearer than the first. After this, these two Enemies separated themselves asunder. Hortensius went to prepare himself at the end of the Carriere, to begin a Course with the Prince of Cyparissa, and the Stranger went out at a Bar which is opened for those that are overcome, to the end they might not disorder the Lists. But instead of going to rank himself behind the rest, which were to run, according to the custom, he returned towards his Boat, into which he cast himself with precipitation, like a man in despair. He left his Chariot also abandoned upon the Bank of the River, and caused those that had guarded it, to enter into his Boat, least they should be compelled to discover who he was. In the mean time, there was no person in all this great Assembly, but believed Hortensius knew who this Stranger was, and hoped he would declare it at the end of all the Courses. But being it was then no time to speak to him, every one suspended his patience. The Prince of Cyparissa, who himself had made vows for Hortensius against the Unknown, resolved now to Conquer him if he could; and accordingly made so handsome a Course, that Melanthus blusht at it with despight, Elismonda was not very glad of it, Andronice for the interest of the Prince her Brother, could have wisht it less handsome; and as well for this reason as the affection she bore Hortensius, feared least the Prince of Cyparissa, might have the better. But her fear did not last long; for Hortensius notwithstanding the perplexity his adventure with the Unknwon might have raised in his mind, appeared with so noble a boldness, and took up so strong a resolution to outdo so considerable a Rival as the Prince of Cyparissa, that he performed this last Course with much greater honor than all the rest which he had made. Yet the Prince of Cyparissa, came not off without glory; because excepting Hortensius, none had run so well as he. At least he had the satisfaction of being rather overcome by a person whom he believed not his Rival, than if he had been so by Melanthus. He had also the consolation of seeing all those that ran after him, worsted by Hortensius, without excepting the generous Laconian, who had got the victory in all the exercises of the preceding days. Now Hortensius finding himself in a strait, either to overcome his Master, or to be overcome in the presence of his Mistress, Ambition prompted him to suffer himself to be overcome, Love urged him to aspire to the Victory, and his reason which should have decided the matter, was sufficiently perplexed. Not but that Hortensius before he began to run, resolved to yield to the Prince, but coming to the point to execute his purpose, he became very unsatisfied. At length, not knowing whether Course to prefer, he prepared himself to undertake the Course with Melanthus, who in the bottom of his heart much feared to be overcome by Hortensius. Nevertheless, being generous, and unwilling to have a victory given him, he turned toward Hortensius, and speaking to him like one that would be obeyed, Remember Hortensius, (said he to him) that I will not owe a Victory to your respect; and if you do not your utmost endeavors to overcome me, I shall think my self more dishonored than if I were fairly overcome. Hortensius was going to answer Melanthus, but the Prince as soon as he had spoken these words, went to range himself in the place where he ought to begin his Course. Now was the time that Elismonda and Andronice made contrary vows, for though the Princess of Messenia had a great dearness for Hortensius, yet not thinking him amorous of Elismonda, and the interest of her brother prevailing upon her mind, she wished Melanthus might be Victor, conceiving moreover, Hortensius might be surpassed without disgrace, after having overcome so many others. But Elismonda made secret vows for Hortensius, both because he was the man she esteemed most in the World, and Melanthus him whom she hated. At length both these Rivals made their course, but with so equal a justness, that it was impossible for the Judges to determine the advantage to the one, in prejudice of the other. Hortensius was willing to yield the prise to Melanthus, but this Prince would not admit it to be so, and after the matter had been debated a while, the Judges ordered they should make a second course, in which (to dispatch my narration of the Olympick Games) Hortensius was declared Victor. He had an intention to have restrained part of his dexterity, and suffer Melanthus to get the better; but the Prince endeavoring too much to set off his own,, could not make any advantage of his enemies generosity, and run much worse the second time than the first. So that Hortensius was presently declared Victor, by the acclamations of all the multitude, notwithstanding the

the greatneſs of Melanthus, and afterwards by the Judges of the Olympick Games. The Victor being deſcended from his Chariot, was preſented by them to the Princeſs Eliſmonda, who gave him the Crown that he had ſo well merited. But he receiv'd it with ſuch reſpect and ſubmiſſion, that if his action had been taken notice of, it would have been eaſily perceiv'd, that he preferr'd the fair hand that crown'd him, before the Crown which he receiv'd from it. I aſſure you (ſaid the Princeſs of Elis to him, ſmiling obligingly, as ſhe put her hand upon his head) that if I had in my power, all the Crowns that are in the diſpoſal of Fortune, I would give you one more durable than that which you receive this day. And I proteſt to you Madam, anſwer'd he, that as I can never receive one more glorious than this, ſo my ambition will be fully ſatisfi'd, provided you believe the admiration I have for you, ſurpaſſes much more that of all others that admire you, than my dexterity has ſurpaſs'd that of all thoſe that I have overcome. Hortenſius could not ſo conceal the paſſionateneſs of the air, wherewith he ſpake this, but that it was obſerv'd by Eliſmonda and Cleontine. But at length after he was riſen up (for he bended one knee to the ground to receive the Crown) he mounted into his Chariot; and all thoſe which he had overcome, marching two and two, follow'd him, and the Prince Melanthus among the reſt; and in this order, with the noiſe of Muſick which ſounded at the beginning of every act, Hortenſius went to the Temple of Jupiter, to aſcribe thanks to that god, for the advantage which he had gotten. The Princeſs Eliſmonda at the ſame time, diſtributed al the other Crowns, to thoſe which had overcome in the other exerciſes of the preceding daies, although ſhe was not preſent at them; after which ſhe went to a ſolemn ſacrifice, which was offer'd in the ſame place where the combatants had been matcht.

I ſhall forbear to deſcribe to you the Feaſt that follow'd this ſolemnity, and only tell you, that to end the day as it began, there was a conteſt between thoſe that had made the Muſick in the Olympick Games, who ſhould carry the prize: but for that, this did not hinder converſation, and all the company was in a large vaulted Hall, not far off from the place where the Feſtival was ſolemniz'd, whither the Princeſſes alſo went to hear the conteſt; Some made compliments to the Victory, others encourag'd thoſe that were overcome, and all preſs'd Hortenſius to tell them who the Unknown Gallant was, that he had overcome; but he alwaies anſwered, that he knew him not, without giving the leaſt ground to ſuſpect the truth. So that it was thought by the cheerfulneſs of Hortenſius's deportment, that what they had ſpoken together, was nothing but generous civilities. There were ſeveral agreeable converſations, in which he was always preſent, and diſcours'd to Melanthus, with all imaginable ſubmiſſion; who as vex'd as he was with his being overcome, did nevertheleſs receive all civilly from him, that he ſaid to him; though in the bottom of his heart, he reſented much perplexity that he had not won the prize. But at length night ſeparated the whole company; for the Princeſs of Elis would not admit there ſhould be a Ball, both becauſe ſhe did not affect dancing, and for that ſhe conceiv'd it leſs ſutable to the condition ſhe was in. Wherefore ſhe return'd to the houſe of the virtuous Eliſante whither Melanthus, the Prince of Cypariſſa, and Hortenſius, conducted her with the Princeſs Andronice, and the Ladies that were uſually with her; but all the reſt continued at Olympia. When the Princeſſes were arriv'd there, the converſation laſted ſome time; and Hortenſius had the happineſs to entertain Eliſmonda a ſhort ſpace alone, while Andronice was ſpeaking apart with her brother Melanthus. But he was much perplex'd what he ſhould ſay to her; for being reſolv'd to continue firmly faithful to his Maſter, he was loth to diſcover any ſigns of his affection: though on the other ſide, he knew not how to ſpeak to her with the wonted coldneſs of one that is indifferent. This perplexity continued not long, Melanthus having ſoon diſpatcht his diſcourſe with the Princeſs his Siſter. At length, Madam, the Princeſs betook he ſelf to her chamber in this fair houſe, where it is reported the wiſe Neſtor once liv'd; the Prince of Cypariſſa went to another not far diſtant; and Hortenſius having taken leave of Melanthus, took no other care, but how he might quit himſelf from the obſervation of his attendants a little before day, and meet at the aſſignation which the Unknown had appointed him. And accordingly, as a brave perſon eaſily ſurmounts all obſtacles that hinder him from doing a courageous action, Hortenſius got forth very early in the morning, attended only with one ſlave, and having no other arms but his ſword. The goodneſs of his Horſe, and his deſire not to give his enemy the advantage of ſtaying for him, brought him thither before him. Beſides that, this Unknown being to croſs the River, he needed more time than Hortenſius, to reach the place appointed. But he had not ſtayed there long, before his enemy arriv'd. The Temple of Diana, near which the Unknown oblig'd Hortenſius to meet him, ſtands in a very ſolitary place, and it was yet very early; ſo that there was no fear of being diſturb'd in their fatal deſign, not ſo much as by thoſe that were at the Temple, becauſe there's a little Wood on the backſide of it, in the middle of which is a lage vacant place, whither none ever reſort, but upon the daies of open Sacrifice; and here it was Hortenſius attended the coming of his enemy, according to appointment. When he ſaw him arrive with an unmasked countenance, at firſt he thought he knew him not; but a moment after, he remembred 'twas the ſame Attalus he had wounded, as he came from Theſſale with the Princeſs Andronice, whom he attempted to carry away. You may imagine, Madam, how greatly Hortenſius was ſurpriz'd: but he had not much time to muſe upon the adventure; for the fierce Attalus (who, beſides the impetuoſity of his nature, had the regret of having been overcome, and the apprehenſion that Hortenſius was amorous of Andronice, and mutually lov'd by her) no ſooner beheld him, but he commanded the ſlave that follow'd him, to go aſide with him that attended Hortenſius, and drawing his ſword, and advancing towards him that had overcome in the Olympick Games. Let us ſee (ſaid he to him with a fierce and piquant raillery) whether Mars will be as favourable to you as Jupiter, and whether you know as well how to manage a Sword, as to drive a Chariot. You ought not to make any doubt of that (answer'd Hortensius, drawing also his Sword) for I have overcome you elsewhere than at the Olympick Games: but you shall soon be resolv'd of a thing, your curiosity of which, if I am not mistaken, will cost you something dear. Upon which, these two valiant men engag'd, and fought together with such courage and dexterity, that their combat lasted longer than they with'd it. Hortensius was first slightly wounded in the shoulder, but soon after wounded his enemy in the right side. I will not amuse my self, Madam, to tell you the particular circumstances of this encounter for (besides that Ladies love not very well these kind of relations, when they are too long) it is also true, that having been inform'd of the particulars only, from the mouth of the two slaves that beheld it, and that of Hortensius, who is too modest to exagerate any thing that is glorious to himself, I am not able well to describe it. 'Tis enough to let you know, that having fought with heroical resolution, and wounded one another in several places, Hortensius pass'd his sword through the body of his enemy, who fell down dead between his Horses feet. But at the same time Hortensius, who had receiv'd four great wounds, and by the great onset he made to dispatch his enemy, lost much blood, fell down in a swound, near him that he had slain. Upon which, the two slaves ran forthwith to their Masters, without taking care of their Horses, being loose, which galloped away about the fields. But Madam, as chance has a share in every thing, Melanthus having had a desire to go a hunting this day, was surpris'd when he was inform'd (by those he sent to enquire) Hortensius could not be heard of, only that he went forth before day. Nevertheless he held his purpose; and the Prince of Cyparissa, and all the persons of quality that were with these two Princes, accompanied him. I was one amongst others, of this hunting-match: but it fell out strangely, that we went to begin our chase on one side of the Temple of Diana: So that the Horses of Hortensius and Attalus being got loose, that of Hortensius, which was very remarkable, and had been given him by Melanthus, hapned to pass by him, to approach to one that belong'd to the Horse of that Prince, who was wont to dress him, and at such times us'd to make him follow without the bridle. This Horse was presently known to belong to Hortensius; so that Melanthus, who lov'd him very dearly, though he resented his having been overcome by him, beheld him with so much the more inquietude, for that he perceiv'd many sprinklings of bloud upon him, though he were not wounded. In which perplexity he commanded the company to divide themselves, and seek out tidings of Hortensius. The Prince of Cyparissa went one way with five or six of his Friends, and Eumenes another; Agenor who seem'd in despairing affliction, went wandring about the fields, and Melanthus being follow'd by a great number, went directly to the backside of the Temple, as if the gods had guided him by the hand: I was at that time with him, and thereby came to be well inform'd of what had pass'd in that place. When we arrived there, we found that these two slaves I told you of, instead of rendring their Masters what succor they were able, believing them both dead, had quarrel'd and were fighting together with their swords. The appearance of the Prince parted them; he that belong'd to Attalus would have escap'd away, but he of Hortensius came before Melanthus who commanded they should stop the others flight; which was soon done. Melanthus advancing further, was very much surpris'd, to behold Hortensius all cover'd with blood, and to see Attalus lye dead by him. Which spectacle melting his heart more towards Hortensius, who he perceiv'd had kill'd a man he hated, he alighted from his Horse, and went himself to see whether Hortensius had yet any life left in him, uttering the most passionate expressions in the World. At the noise which was made about him, Hortensius began to come to himself a little from his swound, sending forth a faint sigh, and half opening his eyes, which he shut again the next moment. Melanthus perceiving he was not dead, sent to a Priest who dwelt near the Temple, to prepare a bed for him: and then caus'd him to be carried by his servants to it. After which, calling for Attalus's slave, he understood from him, that 'twas he that run against Hortensius at the Olympick Games, and would not discover his countenance. Wherefore no longer doubting, but that he engag'd Hortensius to meet him in that place, when he spoke softly to him in the middle of the Carrier after his victory, his principal care was of succoring Hortensius. Yet he generously commanded the Priest, to whose house he had caus'd this illustrious wounded person to be carried, to take care of the Sepulture of Attalus, but his mind was more solicitous to get Hortensius cur'd. To which purpose, he gave order for some to go and fetch Chirurgeons, while himself in the mean time, assisted those that endeavour'd to stop the blood, which began to flow afresh, as soon as Hortensius was recover'd from his swound, by some remedies given him. But when Agenor with strange regret beheld Hortensius in this condition; violent grief being a thing, which when it surprises of a sudden, makes those that resent it to utter something many times contrary to their judgement and intention; he cry'd out two or three times, Is this the manner, O ye gods! that ye cause the unfortunate Hortensius to reign? These words were twice noted by Melanthus; but for that he was very much afflicted, he made no reflection upon them at that time. At length the Chirurgeons arriv'd, and betook themselves to search Hortensius's wounds. But whilst they were resoning among themselves, and the Prince was walking about the chamber, with a strange impatience, to know what he might hope concerning life of his Favorite, the slave of this illustrious wounded person, taking away the cloaths of his Master, which the Chirurgeons deliver'd to him, pass'd hastily, out of respect, by Melanthus, to carry them from thence. But as he pass'd by, Melanthus beheld Elismonda's picture fall down, which was miss'd at their memorable Walk. For you must know, Madam, that Hortensius ever after carried it about him. You may easily judge, how strangely Melanthus, who knew it, was surpris'd at it, and what trouble this accident excited in his mind. He took up the Picture without the slaves taking notice of it; and I, who had seen the picture before, was very much amaz'd. But now the same Prince, Madam, who a moment before desir'd Hortensius's life as his own, and consider'd ſidered him as a man to whom he o w'd his conſtitution, and who had newly ſlain the perſon he had moſt in the world, did no ſooner ſuſpect that he was his Rival, but he believ'd alſo that he had betray'd him with Eliſmonda; that he not only lov'd her, and was lov'd by her, but that he had likewiſe ſome ſecret Intrigue of Ambition beſides: for at the ſame moment he call'd to mind the exclamations he heard utter'd by Agenor. Wherefore without inquiring of the Chirurgeons what they thought concerning Hortenſius's wounds, he went into another chamber, where he walk'd without ſpeaking a word, teſtifying ſufficiently by the trouble of his countenance, he had ſomething in his breaſt which extreamly tormented him. But at length, making great violence againſt his reſentments, he ſuffer'd the Chirurgeons to come and tell him, that though Hortenſius was very dangerouſly wounded, yet he was not abſolutely to be deſpair'd of. After which he made them a ſign to retire; and the Prince of Cyparissa, Eumenes, and all the reſt being come, Melanthus ſeem'd to them, to be more poſſeſs'd with choler than grief; but at length, having determin'd in his mind what to do, he went away without approaching to the bed where Hortenſius was. But at his departure, he left half of his Guards with him, with order to hinder Hortenſius from being remov'd to any other place without his commiſſion. Agenor being ignorant what reaſons obliged Melanthus to this, was deſirous to abide with his friend; but the Prince commanded him to follow him, without giving him any reaſon for it. Eumenes alſo was deny'd to ſtay behind, though he requeſted it; and it was in vain, that I offer'd my ſelf to take care of this Illuſtrious perſon, during the danger of his wounds: ſo that there remain'd with him only a ſlave, the Chirurgeons, the Prieſt, the Prince's guards, and he that commanded them. At this time alſo the Prince of Cyparissa having purpos'd to return to Piſa, after the hunting, took leave of Melanthus, and departed with his own followers: The Prince of Meſſena being left now in greater liberty, appear'd more tormented than before; by the way, he gave order to ſome of his Attendants to look well to Agenor, and without more diſcourſe went ſilently to the place where he lay the preceding night. As ſoon as he was arrived there, he commanded Agenor to follow him, having ſomething to ſpeak to him; after which, he order'd Eumenes to redouble his care in the guard of Eliſmonda, and ſent to ſeize upon the Cabinet of Hortenſius, which he caus'd to be brought to him, imagining he ſhould find ſome Letters in it from the Princeſs of Elis. As ſoon as he had broke it open, inſtead of finding what he ſought for, he unhappily found a memorial written in the ſame character, with that of the four Verſes in Eliſmonda's Picture-Caſe. For Love and Jealouſie had ſo deeply engrav'd that hand in his imagination, that he ſcarce knew his own writing better than he did that. And now no longer doubting, that Hortenſius had taken the Picture, that Hortenſius had made the Verſes, and that Hortenſius was in love with Eliſmonda; he alſo queſtion'd not but that he was lov'd by her, that he had betray'd him, that he was ingrateful, and that he had ſome hidden deſigns, wherein ambition bare a part. He therefore cauſ'd Agenor to enter into his Cloſet; but, inſtead of receiving him well, as he was wont, for Hortenſius's ſake, he beheld him very fiercely, and demanded of him what he meant when perceiving Hortenſius wounded, he cry'd out, asking the gods if this were the manner, in which they would cauſe Hortenſius to Reign. Agenor at firſt was a little amaz'd, and anſwer'd not directly. So that Melanthus confirming himſelf in his opinion, and letting looſe the impetuoſity of his humour, No, no, Agenor, (ſaid he to him) ſeek not to diſguiſe the truth, I muſt reſolve this obſcure Riddle, and know thoroughly, all that the perfidious Hortenſius has complotted againſt me. Alas, my Lord (anſwer'd Agenor!) Hortenſius is the moſt faithful ſervant you have. Hortenſius (replyed Melanthus) is ungrateful and unworthy; and I ſhall know how to puniſh his ingratitude and unworthineſs, if he die not of his wounds. Agenor found himſelf ſtrangely perplex'd at this; for Hortenſius had forbidden him to diſcover any of the Predictions which had occaſion'd his baniſhment out of his own Countrey, for fear he ſhould Reign there. But after having a while defended himſelf, he fear'd he might injure his friend inſtead of ſerving him, by being obſtinate not to diſcover the cauſe of his exclamation; for there was no other means to put a good conſtruction upon what he had ſaid, but by laying open the truth of it. Agenor therefore declar'd it ingenuouſly, thinking to juſtifie Hortenſius; and ſo in few words recounted what had been the occaſion of that which Melanthus heard him ſpeak. But jealouſie poſſeſſing his mind with a great diſpoſition to interpret all things to the diſadvantage of Hortenſius, this information of Agenor perfectly incens'd him, there ariſing a mixture of divers ſentiments in his mind, which put him into extream confuſion. He felt in himſelf the violences of jealouſie, choler, deſpight to have been oblig'd by Hortenſius, regret for having lov'd him, and ſome ſlight reluctance againſt ill treating him: a great deſire to ſee him die, and ſome fear of ſeeing what was foretold concerning him, come to paſs, though he was not accuſtom'd eaſily to give credit to Predictions. Thus love, hatred, friendſhip, glory, and jealouſie dividing his mind, he continued ſome time in a great incertainty; but at length not being able to contain his grief in his breaſt, after he had commanded Agenor to be taken into cuſtody, he went to find the Princeſs Andronice. When he came to the Apartment of this Princeſs, it was told him ſhe was at that of Eliſmonda; but inſtead of going thither according to his cuſtom, he ſent to tell her he expected her at her own. This proceeding amaz'd the Princeſs ſo much the more, in that they were newly told, ſome great accident was fallen out, though they could not learn what it was. Yet Andronice, as ſhe was going from Eliſmonda's Lodgings to her own, underſtood Hortenſius had ſlain Attalus, and was himſelf very dangerouſly wounded. So that ſhe believ'd Melanthus deſir'd to ſee her only to communicate to her the grief he reſented for the danger Hortenſius was in. I come, my Lord, (ſaid ſhe to him) to help you to commiſerate the generous Hortenſius; for though I have reaſon to be glad of the death of Attalus, yet the ſorrow I have for his wounds that overcame him, renders me uncapable to taſte the ſweetneſs of revenge. Alas! my Siſter (cry'd the Prince) you ill underſtand my thoughts, if you commiſe-

rate the most unworthy, perfidious, and ingrateful of men. But, my Lord, (reply'd Andronice all amaz'd) 'tis not Attalus, but Hortensius that I commiserate. I mean him also (answer'd he) 'tis Hortensius that has betray'd me, 'tis Hortensius that is my Rival, 'tis Hortensius that projects to Reign in Elismonda's heart, and in my dominions, and in a word, Hortensius is he that I hate, as much as I have lov'd him, and whom I will punish so severely, that he shall serve for an example of Ingratitude to posterity. But my Lord (said Andronice) I confess I know not Hortensius according to the description you make of him. Have you forgot, Hortensius was he that hindred me from being carried away by Attalus, and that you owe part of your Conquests to his valour and counsels, that he had the good fortune to save your life in the last battel, that he has done his utmost for you with Elismonda, that he was unwilling to dispute the victory with you at the Olympick Games, and has newly slain Attalus whom you hated? 'Tis true, (answer'd the Prince fiercely) he has done all that you speak of; but since he loves Elismonda, I ought to hate him more than I hated Attalus. After which, he told her all he had discover'd; and then declar'd to her all he thought, and at last intimated that he doubted not but that Hortensius lov'd Elismonda, and she him; that he had betray'd him, and complotted to Reign in some place or other, either in the Countrey of Elis, or that of Messena. This discourse of Melanthus seeming grounded upon very strong presumptions, Andronice knew not what to answer. She had great kindness and gratitude for her Deliverer, but yet was at a loss what to conjecture concerning the adventure of the Picture. She call'd to mind, she had upon divers occasions observ'd Hortensius had a very tender affection towards Elismonda. Nevertheless, she had so great an opinion of his virtue, that she could not believe him capable of perfidiousness. But though she desir'd to excuse him, she could find nothing to say in his defence, in reference to his love of Elismonda, of which the Picture was a convincing testimony; but as for the design of Reigning, she told the Prince there was no appearance Hortensius ever had a thought of it. But on the contrary (answer'd Melanthus) I believe he is in love, only because he is ambitious; and to speak without prejudice, it must be confess'd, Fortune has in a manner forc'd him to be so; for that which he did in acknowledgement of the obligation he had to you, was the cause I receiv'd him at first with an extraordinary goodness. After which, his valour proving Fortunate, he saw himself in a short time become more powerful than my self, by the credit I gave him in my heart. In the mean time, this unworthy person, as he is, betraies me in the most cruel manner in the world. Of all that I have conquer'd, and of all that I can ever conquer, (added he) I desire only the heart of Elismonda, which he deprives me of, under pretence of gaining it for me; and by a most horrid perfidiousness, uses the permission I give him to see Elismonda, to draw her to love himself, to make her hate me, and to contrive with her without doubt, how to possess himself of the principality of Elis, and perhaps to poniard me. But, my Lord (reply'd Andronice) if there had been any intimacy between Hortensius and the Princess Elismonda, he would not have committed the prank of the picture. Not, if he had had discretion (answer'd Melanthus) but love and ambition blinded him; and believing it impossible I should discover it was he, he made himself pleasant at my cost. In short, (added he) to understand more clearly, whether he be as much lov'd as he loves, I will go my self and inform Elismonda of the danger Hortensius is in, and dissemble my choler at first, if I can, to the end it may not hinder her from manifesting her sorrow, and I may the better sound the secret of her soul. But, my Lord (answer'd Andronice) do not seek to torment your self; give me commission to discover the sentiments of the Princess of Elis, and go not about to judge of her by deceitful conjectures. For is it possible, she should be otherwise than afflicted with the danger Hortensius is in, though she had seen him only twice? No, no, (reply'd the incens'd Prince) I will be the spy my self, and if I discover that Elismonda loves Hortensius, as I scarce doubt it, I will then redouble all the revenge I am preparing for that ungrateful person, who has so horridly betray'd me. Having spoken this, he went immediately to the apartment of the Princess of Elis. Andronice would have been glad he had not gone thither without her, but he would not permit her to accompany him. When he enter'd into Elismonda's chamber, she was speaking to Cleontine, and wondring she had not seen Hortensius all the day; and speaking this something aloud, Melanthus overheard the name of Hortensius. At which he blusht with indignation, and changing his resolution of dissembling his sentiments, approach'd towards the Princess of Elis, and looking upon her attentively, He that you mention Madam, (said he to her) is not in a condition to make you a visit; for he is wounded very dangerously in several places. Oh gods! (cry'd Elismonda hastily, turning pale with fear) into what mischievous adventure is the generous Hortensius fall'n? You give him a title that so ill befits him, Madam, (said Melanthus) that to prevent your over-much commiserating him, I must declare to you that he is the most temerarious and perfidious person in the world. I have alwaies found him so respectful (replyed she) and I know he serves you so faithfully, that I can scarce believe he merits to be styl'd perfidious and temerarious. When I shall tell you (answer'd he) that he is amorous of you, that it was he that stole your picture, and made the four Verses, which gave you such curiosity, you must necessarily agree with me concerning his audaciousness: and when I shall moreover add, that I know, that instead of endeavouring to promote my interests with you, he has only contriv'd to serve himself, notwithstanding whatever hatred you bear against me, you will be oblig'd to confess, that in reference to me, he is a perfidious person, which deserves a thousand punishments; and in relation to your self, an audacious one, that is unworthy of the goodness you have for him. I know not, my Lord (replyed she) who has mis-inform'd you, that Hortensius is my Lover; but I can swear to you with truth, that if he be so, he has made a great secret of it to me, and has spoken a thousand and a thousand things to me in your favour, which a Lover uses not to speak in behalf of his Rival. And as for the Picture you mention, if Hortensius took it away, could could he be ſufficiently imprudent to ſhew it, or tell it to any. No, Madam (anſwer'd he) but he has been unhappy enough to loſe it, after he was wounded in killing Attalus, with whom he fought. Yes, Madam, with my own eyes I ſaw the Picture fall, and I was he that took it up without his knowing it; and to compleat the conviction of his perfidiouſneſs, I have caus'd his Cabinet to be opened, and have there found divers things of the ſame hand he made uſe of to write the four verſes. So that, Madam, 'tis beyond all doubt, that Hortenſius is an unworthy, and an ungrateful Traitor; and the queſtion is only to know, whether you be a complice of his Crimes. If I believe him concerning the rigor you have againſt me, (added the Prince) you not only know that Hortenſius loves you, but you love him: and I know not, whether after he inform'd you of the pretended predictions which ſay, He muſt reign one day in ſome place, you have not complotted ſomething againſt me, in hope he might reſtore Elis to you, and hinder me from taking Piſa. My Lord (anſwer'd Eliſmonda, with extream prudence) I ſhall not ſtand to deny that Hortenſius is amorous of me, for I confeſs to you ſincerely, I know nothing of it; though I ſhall withal tell you, that it ſeems to me not impoſſible, becauſe he has appear'd really to intereſs himſelf obligingly in all my concernments: but that which I am able to ſwear to you with ſincerity, is this, If Hortenſius be a Lover of mine, you are a thouſand times more oblig'd to him, than if he were not; ſince 'tis the greateſt truth in the world, that he has omitted to do nothing that might induce me to receive your affection in the way you deſire. And therefore, my Lord, if Hortenſius be amorous of me, it concerns me to take it ill, and not you. Leave me then the care of puniſhing him for this crime, and if you have no other to charge him with, be cautious how you diſmiſs him of your friendſhip. For, my Lord, I ſwear it to you once more, There is nothing which Hortenſius has not done to oblige me to treat you better: and to ſpeak with the greateſt ſincerity I can poſſible, 'tis neither to your affection, nor to my prudence, that you owe the ſmall complacency I have ſhewn towards you, but to the perſwaſions of Hortenſius. Ah Madam, (reply'd he roughly!) I will owe nothing to Hortenſius. That perhaps, would be ſufficiently difficult (anſwer'd ſhe;) for being what is paſs'd cannot be alter'd, you will always owe too many things to him. I underſtand you well, Madam, (ſaid he to her) you would intimate that I owe part of my victories to him; but, to let you ſee, I am able to overcome without him, if he die not of the wounds he has receiv'd, I will return him into the ſame condition he was in when he came to my Court, that is, I will ſend him to wander again about the world, without fortune and ſubſiſtence, provided you perſuade me effectually that you do not love him. For if you treat me ſo (added this violent Prince) that I have cauſe to believe you do, nothing ſhall be able to reſtrain me from putting him to death. I have already told you (anſwer'd Eliſmonda in great amazement) that I know nothing of Hortenſius's love, and that he alone induc'd me to treat you more reſpectfully than I ſhould have done, if I had follow'd my true ſentiments; but that which I ſhall tell you at preſent is, that had you put Hortenſius, to death, I ſhould never look upon you but with horror. Ah! Cruel perſon that you are (cry'd Melanthus) what is this that you make me hear? For if you have known the Love of Hortenſius, which I ſcarce doubt of, I am the moſt unfortunate of men, and he the moſt criminal; and if you knew it not before, why does not the diſcovery I now make to you of it, incenſe you againſt him: Is it a uſual thing (added he) for a great Princeſs to take it well to be lov'd by ſuch a man as Hortenſius, who dares not return into his own Countrey, becauſe 'tis fear'd leſt he one day become the Tyrant of it? If Hortenſius be not amorous of me (anſwer'd ſhe) I ſhould be very unjuſt in taking away any friendſhip from him; and if he be, as you ſay, I ought to redouble my eſteem towards him, ſince he does the moſt generous, heroical, and difficult act in the world, which is to ſerve his Rival, and to have ſo much reſpect, as to be in love and not declare it. But, though it were true, Madam (reply'd Melanthus) that Hortenſius has conceal'd his paſſion from you, is it not enough to make him Criminal againſt me, that he is enamour'd on you? Why did he not oppoſe that paſſion when it firſt ſprung up in his heart; and if he could not do that, why did he not betake himſelf to ſome place where he might never ſee you during his life? But, my Lord (anſwer'd Eliſmonda coldly) if Love be voluntary, Why do not you ceaſe to love a perſon that cannot love you? or, if you be unable to do ſo, Why do you not remove her far from your ſight for ever? Ah! Madam (cry'd he) you love Hortenſius, and you would not ſpeak as you do, if he were indifferent to you. I have without doubt (anſwer'd ſhe) all the eſteem for him imaginable, and the moſt tender friendſhip that any heart is capable of; therefore, my Lord, preſerve his life, if you love me. Eliſmonda ſpake this after ſo paſſionate a manner, though ſhe did not deſign to do ſo, that Melanthus well perceiv'd ſhe had at leaſt a very ſtrong inclination to love Hortenſius; and being infinitely ingenious, drew a conſequence that gave him very great torment. For after having ſpoken of the Predictions which occaſion'd Hortenſius to be baniſh'd from his Countrey, and Eliſmonda not requiring of him the clearing up of a thing ſo extraordinary, ſhe thence conjectur'd that ſhe had underſtood it from Hortenſius. So that his jealouſie redoubling, he became ſtrangely tranſported againſt that generous Veientine. Nevertheleſs, there were ſome moments, in which he ſpoke to Eliſmonda with an extream tenderneſs; I beſeech you, Madam (ſaid he to her) excuſe my tranſport: it is ſo difficult to have very much love, and very much moderation at the ſame time, that if you would conſider the fury that poſſeſſes me as an effect of the greatneſs of my affection, you would not condemn me for it, but pity me. But alas! it is eaſie for you to oblige me to pardon Hortenſius. Yes Madam (added he) I have ſo high an opinion of your virtue, that if you render me happy, I will not baniſh Hortenſius. I will even do what I am able, to reſtore him to my friendſhip; at leaſt I will change nothing in his fortune, nor attempt any thing upon his life. The deſtiny of Hortenſius therefore is in your hands; and if he has not diſcover'd to you his love, and you have none for him, reſolve, Madam, to end the War and my miſeries, We are ſoon at the end of the the Truce; conſider therefore ſeriouſly upon what I propound to you. Your quiet is concern'd, Hortenſius's life and all my felicity. Do not incenſe a Prince, who is not maſter of his reſentment when he is affronted, who requires nothing of you, but what is advantageous to you, and who, notwithſtanding your being a priſoner, is more ſubject to your pleaſure than any other Lover ever was. If it were ſo (anſwer'd ſhe) you would not act as you do. But, in brief, my Lord, (added the Princeſs) I have long ſince given you to underſtand, that ſo long as I continue a priſoner, I would never think of marrying; that it's requiſite firſt to make a peace, and after that I ſhall conſider what reſolution I ought to take. Perſiſt, if you pleaſe, in theſe terms; and in the mean time forget not what I told you, that if you ſhould put Hortenſius to death, I ſhould never ſee you but with horror. I ſhall remember it, Madam, I ſhall remember it (reply'd Melanthus, as he was riſing up) and ſince all I have now ſaid to you, does not oblige you to change your ſentiments, we ſhall ſee whether Melanthus incens'd, will be more pleaſing than Melanthus ſubmiſs and reſpectful. You love Hortenſius (ſaid he to her) but before long you ſhall repent your having lov'd him. Eliſmonda was going to anſwer him, but he went forth roughly and would not hear her. Being violent in all his reſolutions, and having at that time no perſon near him, to repreſs part of the impetuoſity of his humour, he immediately, without conſidering Hortenſius's condition, ſent order to have him carried to Elis. He alſo commanded Eumenes to convey the Princeſs Eliſmonda thither about evening, and prepar'd himſelf to follow them. Eliſmonda as yet ignorant of this order, was entertaining her ſelf with her dear Cleontine, to whom ſhe related in few words all that Melanthus had ſpoken; for Cleontine retir'd out of reſpect, when Melanthus came to the Princeſs. But after having repeated to her this long converſation; Well, Cleontine (ſaid ſhe) What ſay you of this hard adventure, and what do you think of Hortenſius's virtue? For he never made the leaſt mention to me of his paſſion, but contrarily, did all he could for Melanthus. I confeſs I have oftentimes ſeen in his eyes ſome tokens of his love, but it was againſt his will. And perhaps alſo Madam (anſwer'd Cleontine) he has perceiv'd in yours, againſt your Will too, that you have a very great inclination for him; for I have obſerv'd it upon a hundred ſeveral occaſions. I confeſs, Cleontine, (anſwer'd Eliſmonda) I have for Hortenſius not only eſteem, but admiration, not only friendſhip, but dearneſs, gratitude, and inclination; and I doubt not but if his fortune and mind had ſo much reſemblance as our affections, we ſhould love eternally. But Hortenſius ſhall never know what I have now told you, and, as he never declar'd to me he lov'd me, both out of a ſentiment of reſpect, and fidelity, he reſolv'd to preſerve for Melanthus, though I ſhould ſee him again, he ſhould never know how advantageous my thoughts are of him; for I would never betray my ſelf; and virtue is not leſs powerful in my heart than in his. But, alas! (added ſhe, ſighing) I ſhall never ſee him perhaps while I live; for Melanthus will baniſh, or put him to death, if he eſcape the danger of his wounds: Thus I ſee my ſelf expos'd to the violent humor of a Prince, whoſe jealouſie may prompt him to ſtrange enormities. As Eliſmonda was ſpeaking thus, the Princeſs Andronice enter'd, who told her with very much ſorrow, that ſhe came to give her notice that ſhe muſt return to Elis at that very hour. This news ſurpriz'd and afflicted Eliſmonda; but it was neceſſary to obey, and Andronice and Cleontine comforted her the beſt they could. But to the end, the departure of Eliſmonda might not be ſo ſoon known to the Prince of Cypariſſa, who was return'd to Piſa, Melanthus thought fit Andronice ſhould continue ſtill all the next day at the houſe of the vertuous Eliſante, who beheld Eliſmonda depart with very much ſorrow. On the other ſide, Melanthus caus'd Hortenſius likewiſe to be remov'd, though the Chirurgeons told him it could not be done without danger. So he was by order to be put into a Chariot, without being acquainted with the cauſe of this change; for they which were about him knew nothing of it. But having a very ready reaſon, he judg'd that being he was remov'd in the night, and in ſuch a condition, there muſt needs be ſome extraordinary matter, eſpecially not ſeeing the Prince, and receiving no meſſage from him. Yet he imagin'd at firſt, Melanthus, perhaps, had diſcover'd that the Prince of Cypariſſa plotted ſomething towards the end of the Truce, which was almoſt expir'd, and therefore thought fit to remove him further from Piſa. But when it behov'd him to dreſs himſelf, that he might be put into the Chariot that was provided for him, he call'd the Slave which was left to ſerve him, and demanded his Cloaths. His firſt thought was to ſee whether Eliſmonda's picture were in the place where he had hid it. He was much aſtoniſh'd when he did not find it there, ask'd the Slave whether he had not ſeen it, who anſwering No, he caus'd him to ſearch all about, without telling the Guards what he ſought for: but at length it behov'd him to depart, without knowing any thing of the picture. Hortenſius then demanded where Agenor was, but 'twas told him the Prince had commanded him to follow him; he then began to wonder that none of his attendants had been with him ſince they knew he was wounded. But at laſt, the Prieſt believing it reaſonable to let him know the truth, acquainted him, that the Prince of Meſſena appear'd at firſt very much afflicted for his wounds, and had himſelf aſſiſted to carry him; but while he was dreſſing, he chang'd his ſentiments, went away very ſad, put guards upon him, prohibited any of his ſervants to come to him, commanded Agenor to follow him, and that he lately heard he had caus'd his Cabinet to be ſeiz'd. O gods! (cry'd the unhappy Hortenſius) is it poſſible I ſhould be ſo innocent, and ſo miſerable? after which he was ſilent, and ſuffer'd himſelf to be liſted into the Chariot which attended him. One of the Chirurgeons who had dreſs'd him, being unwilling to forſake him, took horſe with the Guards to follow him; and this Illuſtrious wounded perſon, notwithſtanding his late victory in the Olympick Games, and the glory he had gotten in ſeveral Combats, particularly in that freſh one with Attalus, found himſelf the moſt unfortunate of men: Great griefs of mind, oftentimes cauſing forgetfulneſs of thoſe of the body, Hortenſius felt little pain in his wounds, by reaſon of his perplexity, in imagining Melanthus might perhaps believe he had betrai'd him, and Eliſmonda be offended with him, if ſhe came to

to understand this adventure. Yet there were some moments in which he trusted in his own innocence towards his Master, and the respect he had had to his Mistriss, hoping he might appease Melanthus, as soon as he could speak with him: but he always believ'd he should be forc'd to quit his former commerce with Elismonda, and be at least depriv'd of the contentment of seeing her, if he desir'd to cure Melanthus of his jealousie. Hortensius entertain'd himself after this sad manner in the Chariot he was put into; the diversity of objects did not divert him from such melancholly musing, it being night when he set forth to depart. But as it is not possible to travel with much speed at such hours, day began to appear, when he was yet sixty furlongs from Elis; besides, his being wounded, occasion'd him to go very gently. The first rayes of the Sun beginning now to break forth, and all objects becoming easily discernable, Hortensius perceiv'd he was in a Valley, at the end of which, where he was to pass by, he beheld a Chariot broken, two Women standing at the foot of a tree, and several men on horseback about them; but drawing nearer, he discerned that those two women were Elismonda and Cleontine. This sight amaz'd him, and made him almost forget that he was wounded. He put forth his head, and respectfully saluted the Princess of Elis; who was not less astonish'd than he: and turning pale, and casting a languishing look upon Cleontine, Alas! (said she to her, sighing) behold the unfortunate Hortensius! As she spoke these words, he that commanded the Guards, seeing this Chariot, and understanding it was going to Elis, thought he might conveniently leave Hortensius in a cottage of Shepherds that was hard by, and make use of his to carry the Princess of Elis; for the axel-tree of hers was broken, and her Ladies by the Prince's order were left behind with Andronice, as well as the fair Chrysilia, and the charming Claricia. He whose design this was, intended to send the same Chariot back to Hortensius, as soon as the Princess should be arriv'd. But for that the Commander of Hortensius's Convoy, had express order to carry him to Elis, he oppos'd the proposal of the other, to leave him in that Shepherds cottage, alledging, it behov'd him to do what was commanded him, and the most he dare do, was to give way for the Princess and Cleontine to go into Hortensius's Chariot, though usually decency does never allow men to be in the same Chariot with a Princess of that rank. During this contest, Hortensius's Chariot stay'd right against Elismonda: But though this unhappy Lover was not ignorant, all she said would be related to Melanthus, yet he could not contain himself from speaking to the Princess. I desire your pardon, Madam (said he to her) If I do not pay you all the respect I owe you: but the condition I am in, ought to oblige you not to hate me. I wish to the gods (answer'd Elimonda) you were in the same condition you were in the first day I knew you; you would be less miserable, and I more happy. For I fear all things (added she) from the Prince of Messena, since you are no longer with him. Upon these words, the two Commanders, who had contested civilly together, told the Princess what they had concluded on, which when Hortensius heard, he endeavoured, as wounded as he was, to get out of the Chariot, but his weakness hinder'd his purpose, the Princess also commanding him not to stir from his place, adding with very great prudence, that prisoners having more caution to use than others, she had rather expect till another Chariot were fetcht from Elis, than to enter into that where he was. As she was speaking this, the generous Lover beheld her in such a manner, that Cleontine well perceiv'd, he passionately lov'd Elismonda. Who on her part, look'd upon him with so obliging a compassion, that it rather deserv'd the name of tenderness than pitty; but neither of them dar'd to express all their sentiments. At length Hortensius speaking, I beseech you Madam, (said he) command me to be left in that Cottage I see there, and serve your self of the Chariot I am in, since 'tis perhaps the last time of my life, I shall have the honor to do you a small service. Hortensius had scarce spoke this, but Melanthus appear'd and broke off their discourse: his presence equally surpriz'd Elismonda and Horensius, and himself was not a little amaz'd to find them together. He that was incharg'd to conduct Elismonda, went to him forthwith, to inform him of the accident of the broken Chariot, and the meeting that of Hortensius's: but as he was going to tell him the proposal he had made, to oblige Elismonda to use Hortensius's Chariot, he seem'd very much incens'd, and before he approach'd near the Princess of Elis, he commanded they should carry that illustrious wounded person to Elis, adding, that he would give convenient orders for conducting the Princess thither too. And hapning to have met two Chariots of Ladies passing by, who after they had seen the Olympick Games, staid at Olympia, and were then returning to Elis, he caus'd one of his followers to go to the place where he had overtaken them, and desire them to come and take up the Princess of Elis; which in a little time accordingly they did. In the mean time Hortensius was very desirous to speak to Melanthus, notwithstanding he much fear'd it, but he had not opportunity: for they speeded his Chariot away so fast, that all he could do, was only to say to one of the Princesses guards: I beseech you, (said he to him) do me the favor to tell the Prince, I am not more unworthy of the honor of his friendship, than I was the next day after the last battel, wherein I had the good fortune to fight near him After which he put forth his head to salute Melanthus, though he was far behind, and then turning towards the Princess, with more strength than he seemed capable of; I wish to the gods, Madam, I may at least understand you are happy, before I dye. And I wish to the gods (answer'd she, beholding him passionately) you be not yet more unhappy than now I see you, though at the present, you are worthy of all my compassion. Hortensius being after these words hurried away, Melanthus alighting from his Horse came towards her, expecting the Chariots which were now in sight, to come and take her up; I perceive you are very sad, Madam (said he to her) and the miseries of Hortensius affect you very sensibly. If you find me very sad (answer'd she) I find you very unjust and inhumane, in accusing an innocent person, and being so little sensible in the miseries of a man, who was not wounded but in overcoming your most mortal enemy. He has offended me more replyed he with a tone sufficiently fierce) in loving the Princess of Elis, than he has served me in killing Attalus. For, in brief, he fought only to ſave his own Honor and Life; but in loving you, Madam, he has done all he could to cauſe my death, ſince I doubt not, but his affection induced you to contemn mine. I have already told you (anſwered ſhe) that if Hortenſius loves me, you ought to redouble your affection towards him, ſince he has ever imployed all poſſibilities, to induce me to love you, and you alone by your injuſtice have forced me to hate you. Ah! Madam (cryed he) do not undertake to deceive a jealous and unhappy Lover, who is more quick-ſighted than others. Eliſmonda was about to anſwer Melanthus, but the arrival of thoſe two Chariots of Ladies hindred her, for being deſirous to be free from him, ſhe took the occaſion, and entered into one of theſe Chariots (the Ladies of both which alighted to leave her the choice) Cleontine following her, and the Ladies crowding into the other, becauſe Melanthus would not permit any to be in that of Eliſmonda. They who had order to conduct the Princeſs, went forward, and Melanthus taking his Horſe, rid more ſlowly than he had done before, regulating his Horſes pace ſo, as always to have Eliſmonda's Chariot in his eye: In the mean time, they who conducted Hortenſius, carried him into a Tower, where the Princeſs of Elis, uſed to put Priſoners of State. Eliſmonda as ſoon as ſhe arrived, was very diligently guarded in the Palace, where no perſon had liberty to ſee her beſides Cleontine, and ſome women to attend on her.

But although Melanthus had left Andronice, at the houſe of the virtuous Eliſante, on purpoſe to deceive the Prince of Cypariſſa, and Enmenes had done all he could by his Maſters orders to keep the Princeſs of Elis's departure from coming to his knowledge; yet he was advertiſed of it by a ſlave belonging to Andronice, whom he cauſed to be corrupted by one of his followers. Underſtanding therefore that Eliſmonda was carried away to Elis, and the Princeſs of Meſſenia was to ſtay a day longer at the houſe of Eliſante, he believed he could not better ſerve Eliſmonda, as affairs ſtood, than by taking away the Princeſs Andronice, for whom Melanthus had as great a friendſhip as he was capable of. He communicated his deſign to two or three of the moſt conſiderable Officers of his Army, who were with him, and to two men of principal quality in Piſa. At firſt they told him, that the truce being to laſt ſome days longer, this action would be a publick breach of it. But the Prince of Cypariſſa repreſented to them, that the ſecret conveying away of the Princeſs of Elis, and the diſgrace of Hortenſius, ſignified Melanthus not very ſollicitous about a peace, that he had ſome great diſcontentment upon his mind, and therefore it would be beſt to provide for the Princeſs of Elis's ſafety. Yet they with whom he was thus urgent, would not have yielded to his propoſal, had it not fallen out, that preciſely at the ſame time, news came that there had been a Skirmiſh between ſome horſemen of Melanthus's Army, and ſome Troops of that of the Prince of Cypariſſa, with aſſurance alſo that it was began by the forces of Melanthus. So that this firſt act of hoſtility ſerving for a pretext, they no longer diſallowed the Prince of Cypariſſa's deſign, which he betook himſelf immediately to execute: To which purpoſe he put himſelf in the head of three hundred horſe, and went to take away Andronice, at the Caſtle of Meliſaris. At his firſt coming, Enmenes endeavored to make reſiſtance, but being preſently wounded, he became a priſoner. The fair Chryſilia, and the charming Claricia, had the ſame deſtiny with the Princeſs of Meſſenia: but as for the virtuous Eliſante, ſhe remained free in the middle of two Enemy-Armies, and was alike favoured by both parties; ſo greatly is Virtue reſpected by all the World. But the Princeſs of Cypariſſa, who only fought Eliſmonda's ſafety, and infinitely honored the Princeſs Andronice, treated her with all imaginable reſpect, and all the Ladies of her Train with extream civility. He deſired pardon of the Princeſs of Meſſenia, for the violence he did to her, he aſſured her, it was only to ſerve a Princeſs whom ſhe loved, and who loved her, and to reſtrain part of the impetuoſity of the Prince her Brother. Andronice being very diſcreet, and eſteeming the Prince of Cypariſſa, pardoned the violence he did her upon the account of his exceſſive paſſion, and told him that he was without doubt in a wrong courſe, for that ſhe could have done the Princeſs Eliſmonda better ſervice, if ſhe were with the Prince her Brother, than he could do by keeping her at Piſa. But the thing being already done, there was no remedy left. Enmenes alſo ſaid the ſame to the Prince of Cypariſſa, at his going to viſit him, when he was at Piſa, which occaſioned this Lover the regret of thinking that perhaps what he had done, might rather prejudice than advantage the Princeſs of Elis. But that which compleated his affliction, was, that the day following he was advertiſed of that which till then he had been ignorant of, namely Hortenſius's love to Eliſmonda, and Melanthus's jealouſie and belief that Eliſmonda loved Hortenſius; for his Maxims having always been, to ceaſe to love, as ſoon as he believed his Miſtreſs favored another, this incertainty into which this news brought him, gave him greater torment than can be imagined. But if the Prince of Cypariſſa ſuffered very much, Melanthus alſo ſuffered all the inquietudes that Love, Jealouſie, and Ambition could afflict him with; eſpecially, when he underſtood the Prince of Cypariſſa had carried away the Princeſs Andronice, with all the Ladies that were with her, and that Enmenes was a Priſoner. That which perplexed him beſides infinitely, was that he perceived the Inhabitants of Elis, murmured very much at the impriſonment of Hortenſius; for having ſeen, that 'twas he that hindered Melanthus from continuing to treat them Tyrannically, as he had done before his coming, they vehemently feared leaſt he ſhould quit the moderation he had uſed ever ſince that time, and treat them worſe than ever. And indeed their fear was not without grounds, for this Prince reſumed his former violence. At length War broke out again between both parties; yet the Prince of Cypariſſa ſent Propoſitions of Peace to Melanthus, offering to deliver the Princeſs Andronice, provided he would reſtore Eliſmonda: but he derided the propoſition when it was made him, and contented himſelf to anſwer fiercely, that he would go to Piſa, to fetch the Princeſs his Siſter, as ſoon as he had marryed Eliſmonda, and put Hortenſius to death. In the mean time the wounds of this Illuſtrious Valentine, notwithſtanding his unwillingneſs, did not grow worſe in Priſon, though he was the moſt unhappy of all men, chiefly becauſe he was the moſt

gerous; for having always loved without hope, he was throughly accustomed to be miserable in reference to his Love. But his virtue having never been immaculate, he could not suffer his Master should believe he had betrayed him. Besides that, fearing also, least he should be transported to some violence against Elismonda, his perplexities were beyond all conception. He found some consolation in thinking he perceived a very tender pitty towards him in the eyes of his dear Princess; but this comfort was overwhelmed, with so many different sorrows, and these moments of sweetness followed with so many tormenting hours, that he moved compassion in those that guarded him. Upon which, he prevailed with him that commanded his Guards, to desire urgently the favor of the Prince, that he might speak to him once more during his life. Melanthus refus'd it at first very roughly; but the next day a jealous sentiment induced him to desire what he refused. So when the unfortunate Hortensius least expected him, he beheld this violent Prince enter into his chamber, but with so much fury in his eyes, that he had cause to think the Prince came himself to denounce to him the sentence of his death. Yet he seemed not moved at it, but on the contrary, being very glad of the opportunity to speak to him, he half rose up to salute him, the most respectfully the condition he was in permitted him. And beholding him with submission, I give you thanks my Lord (said he to him) for granting me what I desired of you; for I should have dyed with despair, if I had left you in the opinion that I had betrayed you. I doubted not, (answered this violent Prince) but you desired to speak with me, only to tell me things contrary to truth; and being ignorant that I had discovered your crimes, would dare to deny, you are in love with the Princess of Elis. No, my Lord, (replyed Hortensius generously) I will not owe my justification to a lye, but only to my own Virtue. I confess to you therefore, that in spight of all my reluctancy, I became enamoured on the Princess Elismonda, and that whether I will or no, I shall love her, perhaps, eternally. Ha! unworthyness! (cry'd Melanthus, transported with fury) call you it being innocent, to become Rival to your Master? Is it possible to love, without desiring to be loved again? and can you desire to be Elismonda's, without being willing to render me unhappy, and without being the most criminal of all men? If Love were a thing voluntary (answered Hortensius) I should be ungrateful, and unworthy in becoming amorous of a Princess whom you love; but it not being so, my passion ought not to be ranked with my crimes, but only the effects of it considered. Thus my Lord, (added he) I can confidently say, that I am not only innocent, but that I have merited something in relation to your interests. For in brief, I have encountred with my passion, as much as I could, and when I found I could not overcome it, I imployed the utmost powers of my reason, not to do any thing that might injure you. I have not only loved without hope, but I have given bounds to my thoughts, and my most secret desires never prejudiced the fidelity that I owe you. No, my Lord, I have not desired to be loved again, I have done all I could to promote the interests of your affection, and never attempted to make the least discovery of my own. Why then (demanded Melanthus roughly) did you write those four amorous Verses, in the place of Elismonda's picture? I know no reason for it my self, my Lord, (answered Hortensius) and that action, as criminal as it seems to you, is but an extravagance, and no such crime as you imagine it. For sincerely, I believed I should never be discovered, and concealed my self so well, in disguising my hand, that unless you have acquainted the Princess of Elis of it, she is still ignorant that 'twas I who took away her Picture; so great a truth is it, that I have been faithfull to you. But what design had you then, in doing this rash piece of gallantry? (said Melanthus) I have already told you, my Lord, (answered Hortensius) that I know not my self; and all that I am able to say is, that I could not hinder my self from doing it, but that at that instant, an excess of love made me imagine, some light consolation, in thinking the Princess of Elis would understand, there was a person loved her, who she did not know. I believed also, that she would not open the Picture-case, till she were returned home, and that as she is very reserved, she would not tell the adventure to any person, and so without endangering any, I should procure my self a delectation, that would not prejudice you, and indeed never could; for the Princess could not prefer an Unknown Lover, and whom she was never to know, before a great Prince, accomplisht with a thousand excellent qualities. But in fine, My Lord, (added he) to justifie to you, what's past by what's to come, if I dye not by your indignation, and you will please to give me my liberty, I declare to you, that I will depart from you, never to return; and though I have no hope to be able to extinguish my love to the Princess Elismonda, yet that violent passion shall torment only my self, and never cause me to do any thing, either against her or you. Perhaps the same courage, which made me find a Sanctuary in your Court, may make me find another in some place whither I shall go, but as I shall seek nothing but death, when I have forsaken my Master and my Mistress, let Fortune work her pleasure upon me, I shall never repine. To conclude, my Lord, as I am not inconsiderable, so I shall not accuse you of injustice, though you are in some sort unjust towards me, for I know how extreamly difficult it is, to be equitable when we love ardently. Therefore all the favor I desire of you, is, never to use any course but gentleness, to oblige the Princess Elismonda to render you happy. If you do otherwise, you will cause her to hate you; and if you take the sweeter course, 'tis possibly you may at length induce her to love you. Ah! Hortensius, (cryed Melanthus) the counsel you give me, has more regard to Elismonda than to me. However it be (answered he sighing) the counsel I give you is faithful, and I have no interest in it. After this, there was a sufficiently long silence between these two Lovers, Melanthus betook himself to walk in Hortensius's chamber, Hortensius leaving himself to be transported by his musings, fell into such a profound cogitation, that he took no longer notice that Melanthus was in his Chamber. But though Melanthus came to see Hortensius with all the indignation that a jealous and incensed Rival is capable of, part of his choler was now appeased.

It seemed to him, that Hortensius spoke with sincerity, and was not so culpable as he had believed him. Nevertheless, though it were so, and he was not ignorant, what great need he had of his valor and counsel, and the credit he had gained among the Souldiers, and the People, he could not resolve to keep Hortensius with him. For he had informed Elismonda himself, that Hortensius was amorous of her, and observed that she had very favorable inclinations towards him; and then he imagined, that if Hortensius had believed himself as much as in her favor as he was, he could not have contained himself in the terms he now found him in. So that considering he could not put Hortensius to death, and indeed now not desiring it, he looked upon his banishment as a necessary course to his own quiet, though very prejudicial to the good of his State. But as an amorous Prince is most sensible of the torment of his own mind, and desires rather the peace of his thoughts, than that of his people, he immediately resolved to give Hortensius liberty, on condition that he would retire himself out of that Country forthwith. As soon as he had made this resolution, returning to Hortensius with a different air, from that he came first with, I will believe (said he to him) all that you tell me, but in believing it, (I confess to you Hortensius) I can no longer confide in your Virtue; and I think I may also add, that you would be to blame, if you confided in it your self. I have without doubt, more obligation to you, than you have to me, since I have not so much as recompensed your services; but after all, I can never consent that you see Elismonda. Your worth and your love joyned together, give me much fear; and though you were even capable to speak to her always in my favor, and never for your self, yet you would not cease to prejudice me by that very virtue. But on the contrary, the good offices you would do me, would ruine me in her mind, and establish you there. Therefore necessity enforces me to deprive my self of all the services I might receive from you, to prevent my self from becoming perfectly miserable, and perfectly criminal. For in truth I declare to you, 'twas injustice in me to desire your death, and I know not what I shall think of, the next quarter of an hour, so much has jealousie disordered my reason. After this Hortensius spoke many affecting things to the Prince, insisting always to oblige him to take no other course with Elismonda, than that of sweetness. Melanthus having heard Hortensius with sufficient calmness, departed, after having resolv'd Hortensius, should be dismissed, as soon as his wounds would suffer him to travel. In the mean while, Melanthus to appease the people, who repined much at the imprisonment of Hortensius, conceded permission to several persons to see him; so that, during this interval, which was between liberty and imprisonment, many propositions were made to him, that he would take part against Melanthus, which he rejected with a generosity worthy of his great heart. But what satisfaction soever there be in doing what we ought, and being contented with one's self, Hortensius was notwithstanding very miserable; for he was deeply in love, and every instant that his health mended, hasted on his exile, and reduced into his mind, that he should never see Elismonda, whom he loved a thousand times more than his life. On the other side the Princess of Elis, who every day more hated Melanthus and compassionated Hortensius, understanding it was reported, the Prince of Messina would banish him, as soon as he was cured, was very much afflicted at it, thinking she lamented him only as her Protector, though without doubt her heart considered him as her Lover. In this condition she imagined, that if Hortensius could go over to her side, Melanthus would soon be overcome; she considered also, that Hortensius not being born a Subject to Melanthus, and Melanthus having ill treated him, he might go and put himself into Pisa, and turn the balance of Victory, and she was so much the more pleased with this thought for that she hoped the valor of Hortensius, would diminish the luster of the Prince of Cyparissa's actions, whom she did not affect. This being firm in her mind, her only care was, what course she might take to come to speak with Hortensius, before his departure. She communicated therefore her thoughts to Cleontine, who at first did not approve her design; but at length remembring that Hortensius drew victory with him, when he came to Melanthus, she believed that in the desperate estate wherein the affairs of the Princess were, it behoved to neglect nothing. For though during the Olympick Games the Prince of Cyparissa had endeavored to engage several people of Greece, in the interests of this Princess, yet his Negotiations were unprofitable, and ended only in propositions full of difficulties. But at length (to shorten my relation as much as I can) Cleontine consented to what Elismonda desired, and by means of one of the Officers who commanded those that guarded the Princess, they brought it about that a Letter was delivered to Hortensius when he was cured; for being to depart within two days, Melanthus kept him no longer in guard, but he went whither he pleased. This Prince was then so affected with a sense of Hortensius's generosity, that in spight of his love and his jealousie, he felt the friendship which he had for him, to revive in his breast. In the mean time you must know that the Princess having absolutely gained him to her that had procured Cleontine's Letter to be delivered to Hortensius, (for Elismonda would not write it) that he promised to bring him to her, if he would come. You may judge, Madam, in what condition Hortensius was when he was offered to be brought to the sight of the sole person of the World, whom he loved and could love. Cleontine's Ticket was almost in these terms.

THere is a person that desires to bid you Adieu, having a service to request of you, and esteeming you sufficiently, to be willing to be obliged to you.

You may easily imagine what agitation Hortensius felt in his breast. He had resolved never to see Elismonda, and resented an incredible grief for it; and he was preparing himself for his departure to go and seek his death. For in this condition a Lover always believes he cannot live. And now this afflicted Lover finds beyond his expectation the person he loves desires to see him, and requests a service from him; his heart was moved and troubled at it; and though he changed not his Sentiments, and resolved to be always faithful to his Master, yet he had not the power to refuse what which his Mistress, yea and himself too desired. He knew well that he could not go see the Princess without exposing himself to a great danger, and that if Melanthus should discover it, he were utterly lost: but after all, he had too much love to be afraid to die in obeying Elismonda. He engaged himself therefore, to come one night to one of the Gates of the Garden, where this Officer promised to let him in, and to lead him into Cleontin's Chamber by a back staits. And accordingly, the evening before the intended departure of Hortensius, this generous Lover went to the place where he was expected, and without being perceived, was conducted into *Cleontine*s Chamber, whither Elismonda came also. Never did Hortensius feel so great trouble in his Soul as at that time. Elismonda on her part appeared fearful, and trembling, and though she had no Criminal intention, there was nevertheless some confusion in her eyes. Cleontine her self also was extreamly apprehensive, least this interview should be discovered, and therefore not to loose such precious moments, seeing the Princess of Elis answered not to the first Complement Hortensius made to her, he urged her to tell him what she desired of him. Is it possible, Madam (said Hortensius then) that an unfortunate exile should be able to render any service to the person in the World he honors most? Yes Hortensius (answered Elismonda) you are able to do me a great service, since you need but go and put your self into Pisa, to cause me to reconquer my State, and regain my liberty, and crown your self with glory; for I conceive after the ingratitude Melanthus has shewn you, you are not restrained by honor from bearing Arms against him. Ah! Madam, (cryed Hortensius) what do you demand of me, and how rigorous a trial do you put my virtue upon? But, in brief, Madam, (said he) before I answer directly to what you command me, I must acquaint you with the true condition of my Soul, though I had resolved never to discover it to you. But I beseech you, Madam, what presumption soever you apprehend in my words, be pleased to permit me the liberty of speaking. You shall afterwards punish me for my boldness as you please; and to oblige you to grant me this request, consider Madam, that this is the last time of my life I shall ever have the honor to speak to you, that I am departing to morrow morning never to see you more, and so I shall tell you but once that I love you more ardently then ever any person loved; and that 'tis only for that reason that I am forsaking you never to see you more. How! Hortensius: (interrupted Elismonda) I did not desire you to come hither to lose the respect you owe me; and if you continue to speak to me in the strain you have begun, you will force me to repent of the favor I do you. In the name of the gods, Madam (answered Hortensius) do not repent of it, consider once more that you will never see me again, and since I must of necessity refuse what you desire of me, it is very just that you hear my reasons. But if what you say were true, (replyed Elismonda blushing) you would not refuse it, since a perfect Lover never refused any thing to the person he loves. Yet once more, Madam (said Hortensius) permit me to speak what displeases you, to the end I may afterwards tell you that which justifies me. Speak it then (answered Elismonda) but if it be possible, do not force me to hate you as much as I esteem you. If you should hate me, Madam (replyed Hortensius) it would be with very great injustice; for I am really worthy of all your compassion. If you will call to mind how zealous I have been with you in behalf of the Prince of Messenia, you will easily conceive what I have suffered, since 'tis certain, I never spoke a word to you for his advantage, which cost me not a thousand sighs. 'Tis true, the impossibility of ever becoming happy assisted my virtue in this difficulty, and to tell you yet something more considerable, 'tis also true that seeing nothing more advantageous to your interests than to marry Melanthus, I pressed it still rather for your own sake than his, and at present though I love you even to adoration, I still exhort you to resolve to marry him. But what do I say? (recollected this transported Lover.) No, no, Madam, I counsel you nothing; and I conjure you only to consider that what you desire of me, would dishonor me unprofitably both to your self and me, if I should obey you. For you are in Melanthus's power; perhaps I could make a shift to defend Pisa, without delivering you out of his hands; and on the contrary, I am perswaded, there is nothing more effectual to induce that Prince to the extreamest violence, than to render him more unhappy than he is. And besides, Madam, suppose I should deliver you, I should do it only for the Prince of Cyparissa, whom I am informed you love; and the unfortunate Hortensius after having done an action unworthy of a man truly generous, should not render you happy, and withall see himself still an exile. For in truth, I love you enough, to be able to love you all my life without being happy; but I love you too much ever to be Spectator of the felicity of one of my Rivals. Withall, Madam, since the condition of your Fortune requires you to marry a Prince whom you love not, it would be better to marry Melanthus, in order to setling peace in the whole Countrey of Elis, (if you must marry one of the two) than by continuing the War to be obliged to marry the Prince of Cyparissa. Thus Madam it is necessary that the miserable Hortensius depart from you with the consolation of having done nothing that renders him unworthy your esteem. Melanthus received me generously into his Court, and as unknown as I was to all, and my self too, placed me above all the persons of quality in his Dominions. He confided in me, and has not treated me ill, but only because he loves you, and I adore you. Ha! Hortensius (answered Elismonda, blushing) Melanthus is greatly mistaken in believing you amorous of me; for if you loved me, you would consider, that not being born a subject to him, you might with no injury to your honor, change your side, and do what I desire. Alas! Madam, (replyed Hortensius) you little know what a contest rends my Soul, and what torment I suffer in denying you. Yes Madam, (added he) whatever passion I have for glory, I would not answer for my virtue, if I saw any thing in your eyes that would allow me to hope, and If I could forget that the condition of your Fortune and mine is an invincible obstacle to my

my happiness. Therefore, Madam, if you would put my generosity to the utmost tryal, you must let me understand that my respectful passion does not displease you, and that it would not be impossible but I may be loved. Ha! Hortensius (answered she) you desire too much, and that which you request of me is much more against my glory, than what I request of you is against yours. Go therefore, go where your destiny calls you, and leave me to dye in restraint. While Elismonda was speaking this, there was heard a great noise upon the stairs, and a moment after, Melanthus was seen enter into Cleontine's Chamber; but with such fury in his eyes that never any man seemed so incensed. He immediately gave Hortensius the most sharp language that choler could inspire the most furious with: he also spoke with great indignation to Elismonda, and without hearing the excuses of either, commanded Hortensius should be remitted into prison, and the Princess of Elis confined so close, as not to go out of her chamber. She offered more than once to tell him, that Hortensius was not culpable, that it was her desire to speak with him, and that he had refused all she had requested of him, but he would understand nothing but his own fury. So his orders were obeyed, and Hortensius and Elismonda, saw themselves now more unhappy than ever. At their separation they beheld one another in so tender a manner, that they both understood at the same instant their love was attained to the highest pitch of ardor possible. This last misfortune of theirs was caused by that Officer, who introduced Hortensius into the Palace, which he did only out of an intention to destroy him; for that having been sometimes bred up under Attalus, whom Hortensius had slain, he was glad of an opportunity to revenge his death by such a treachery, and accordingly went and advertised Melanthus, that Hortensius was entred into Cleontine's Chamber. But in brief, Madam, I must pass over in few words this turn of the Fortune of these Illustrious persons, to tell you, that Melanthus heeding neither policy, nor humanity, nor gratitude, thought no other but to put Hortensius to death; whom he then lookt upon as the most unworthy and perfidious of men. And that which caused him to regard him with the greater hatred, was, that this generous Lover, out of an excess of affection to Elismonda, would not go about to justifie himself in the manner he might have done, by producing Cleontine's Letter; because he feared, least if he did so, the Princes fury should be turned against the Princess of Elis. Thus, though he were perfectly innocent in reference to Melanthus, yet he was apprehended by him as most Criminal. Hereupon he kept no measure in his revenge, and without observing any form of solemnly condemning Hortensius, only commanded he should be put to death. But this generous prisoner being extreamly well beloved, there was no haste made to execute that order; but some rumor of this bloody design being spread abroad among the people, they made an insurrection. There were also some persons of quality that put themselves in the head of the people, and endeavored to break open the prison. Melanthus was soon advertised of this; but instead of minding to appease this tumult by changing his orders, he rather resolved to hasten the death of Hortensius, believing when things was done, the people would be appeased of themselves. But as the gods protected the innocence of this generous prisoner, he was rescued so opportunely, that had they who endeavored to force the Gates of the Tower, been but one quarter of an hour longer in becoming Masters of it, he had been lost. For they who were designed to put him to death, being entred by a back door, were already at that of his Chamber, when the incensed people seized on that of the Tower. So that he was delivered very happily which being done, the most considerable of his deliverers told him this was not enough, but it was necessary to go and deliver Elismonda too. Yet Hortensius's generosity being always the same, he thanked them for having saved his life, and conjured them not to oblige him to draw his sword against a Prince who was his Master, exhorting them only to send to him, and require Elismonda's liberty; for in the disorder things then were in, he feared if he should appear amongst Melanthus's Enemies, that violent Prince might be so enraged as to put Elismonda to death. This answer did not wholly content his liberators, though his virtue occasioned their admiration. Therefore they left him under the Guard of a small number of people, and were carried with an ardor, of which they were no longer Masters, to set upon the Princes Palace. Then it was, that fury wholly ingrossed Melanthus's mind, and understanding Hortensius was saved, he apprehended being destroyed himself. Yet being courageous, he put himself in a readiness for defence, but as he was marching in the head of his followers, he commanded aloud two or three of his attendants, that in case himself were slain, they should the same hour kill Elismonda, to the end Hortensius might be deprived of the seeing of her after his death; and after this fatal order, he went to the place where the fight was sharpest. In the mean while this hideous news being brought to Hortensius, this generous Lover no sooner heard it, but out of fear least Melanthus's death might cause that of Elismonda, he took up a resolution to defend his life, who so lately endeavored to put him to death; in order to which, he quitted himself from those that guarded him, and went to the place where the fight was. Melanthus having at first repelled the people, was then in a large place before his Palace, when Hortensius arriving with his Sword in his hand, broke through the multitude, and getting near the Prince of Messenia, I come (said he to him) to defend the life of Elismonda by defending yours, and to force you to repent of your cruelty. This courageous action so astonisht all that beheld it, that it suspended the hatred and fury of both parties; after which, Hortensius addressing to those that had delivered him, my dear Liberators (said he to them) save Melanthus's life, to save that of Elismonda. Melanthus instead of being mollified by these words, was yet more enraged, and beholding Hortensius fiercely, Ha! Caitiffe (said he to him) I will not owe my life a second time to you; and since you have taught me to be ungrateful, receive the death I give you. In saying which he made a great blow at Hortensius, who avoided it by drawing back, not willing to return it, as he might have done. 'Tis true, he had nothing now to do, but to mind his his own revenge; for Hortenſius being beloved by both parties, and the action he did, being extreamly noble and generous, they which were on Melanthus's ſide defended him more faintly, and they of the other environed him with ſuch precipitation, that he was taken and carried to the Tower, where Hortenſius had been priſoner, who was not able to hinder it from being otherwiſe. Yet telling thoſe that guarded the Prince, that it behoved them to preſerve his life, for the ſafety of Eliſmonda's, who was in the hands of people that depended on him, he went in the head of the party of the ſeditious to the place where Eliſmonda was priſoner, whither alſo the Miniſters of Melanthus's cruelty already were come. But as they beheld the party coming againſt them, and Hortenſius, in the head of thoſe that were going to beat down the gates, they were ſtruck with amazement, and believing Melanthus dead, inſtead of betaking themſelves to obey the orders he had given them, ſought to eſcape away, and ſaved themſelves by a poſtern gate. But the Officer who had betrayed Hortenſius and Eliſmonda, coming to this place, made all the reſiſtance he could with ſome of his Souldiers; but Hortenſius having ſlain him, the reſt fled, and this Illuſtrious Veientine preſently ſaw the fair Eliſmonda in his power. Yet his Virtue continued firm in this conjuncture, between what he owed to Melanthus, and what he owed to Eliſmonda; for without attributing any thing to himſelf in this action, you ſee, Madam, (ſaid he addreſſing to her) your Subjects are faithful to you; but I beſeech you remember, if they reſtore you to liberty, the Prince of Meſſenia has well treated you, and that owing my life to the Princeſs Andronice, I ought to take care for the preſervation of that of the Prince her Brother. Send therefore your orders, Madam, (continued this Illuſtrious Veientine) to thoſe who have carried him to the Tower, where I was priſoner, to the end they do him no violence. You ſhew me ſo great an example of generoſity (anſwered ſhe) that I am unwilling to contradict you; but Hortenſius (added the Princeſs) ſince I may believe I am free——As ſhe was ſpeaking this, they heard the noiſe of a thouſand confuſed voices after which, one of the principal Inhabitants of Elis, came to inform Eliſmonda, that the Prince of Meſſenia was reſcued, as he was leading to the Tower, where they intended to put him; that he had routed thoſe that guarded him, and maugre the valor of thoſe that had taken him, one of his attendants having given him a Horſe, he had ſaved himſelf, and took the way towards the Camp, followed with a ſmall party of his own, the Inhabitants of Elis having, in this ſedition cut the reſt to pieces. So that (continued this Citizen) there are no more enemies at leaſt left in the City; and provided the valiant Hortenſius will not forſake us, we hope notwithſtanding our City being deſtitute of Walls, to defend our ſelves courageouſly againſt ſo furious an enemy. Eliſmonda, who knew what Hortenſius's ſentiments were, beheld him as a perſon that dared not anſwer. But this generous Lover, after having made a great violence upon himſelf, If you ſhould be defended, Madam, (ſaid he ſighing) only by a Traytor, the gods would abandon you, and therefore 'tis better I ſhould abandon you, and betake my ſelf to my duty. For Melanthus has had grounds to believe me culpable, and his cruelty is innocent towards me: ſo that if you pleaſe, I muſt follow my reſolution, and go find that Prince I leave you at liberty, in a City that is yours, and if the action I am going to do, reſtore me to any favor with Melanthus, I will employ it only to oblige him to make peace with you, and leave you in tranquillity. Hortenſius ſpoke this with ſo ſad an aſpect; that all that beheld him, had their hearts much affected with it; Eliſmonda her ſelf, admired the generoſity which excited indignation in her, and was ſo aſtoniſhed at it, that ſhe was not able to ſpeak half her thoughts. But at length, Hortenſius, notwithſtanding all Eliſmonda's importunities to divert him, went to find Melanthus; but as he was going, he found him ingaged in a very unequal fight, againſt a party of the Prince of Cyparisſa, who was there in perſon, and by his exemplary valor redoubled the courage of his Soldiers. The arrival of Hortenſius cauſed an alteration in the face of things; Melanthus was already wounded when he arriv'd, and his forces put to the rout. But Hortenſius joyning with the Prince of Meſſenia, who was infinitely amazed at this grand action, diſ-ingaged him from five or ſix that environed him, encountered with the Prince of Cyparisſa, wounded and took him priſoner, and turned the Victory to the party of a Prince, who had intended to take away his life the ſame day. 'Tis true, Melanthus was not in a condition to enjoy his own, for through the extraordinary agitation and heat of his ſpirits, and rage of his mind, his wound though not very great of it ſelf, became mortal by reaſon of the bad temper of his body at that time, ſo that the next morning his life was deſpaired of. But for that his reaſon was ſtill free, this action of Hortenſius inclined him to believe what he alleadged for his innocence; and this Prince, as violent as he was, expreſſed a thouſand obligations to him, and deſiring to underſtand the truth of his condition, he no ſooner was told the approaching of his fate, but he cauſed Hortenſius to be call'd, who being come, jealouſie remaining in his heart, even to death, he conſtrained him to promiſe him, never to deliver the Prince of Cyparisſa, but on condition; that he ſhould not marry Eliſmonda, and then told him, that he would declare him his Succeſſor, provided he would marry Andronice. Hortenſius whoſe great ſoul was never at a loſs, told him, He would undoubtedly do his utmoſt, to hinder the Prince of Cyparisſa from marrying Eliſmonda, but as for what related to the Princeſs Andronice, he conjured him to leave the Soveraignty to her; as for himſelf, he was reſolved to dye a thouſand times for her ſervice, and content himſelf with the glory he ſhould have in ſerving her. Melanthus then knowing, that Hortenſius's love to Eliſmonda, was that, that hindred him from accepting his offer, was deſpighted at it; ſo that he turned away rudely to the other ſide, and continued ſome time without ſpeaking. The approaches of death changing nothing in the ſentiments of this exaſperated Lover, he cauſed the Commanders of his Forces to be aſſembled (for they had carried him to the Camp) and told them, that he commanded them to obey Hortenſius, and acknowledge him for their Prince, in caſe he would Marry Andronice, hoping Ambition at length would tempt his Rivals mind, and call him off from his love to Eliſmonda. After which, his reaſon failing him, he dyed the night following. You may judge Madam, what a change his death cauſed in affairs; the Princeſs of Elis ſaw now, that her ſafety depended on Hortenſius; for the Prince of Cyparisſa was a Priſoner, and ſhe had none to defend her intereſts, if the Meſſenians would carry on their Conqueſts. But when ſhe was informed of the declaration Melanthus had made to Hortenſius, ſhe reſented extream trouble at it, becauſe, knowing of all the predictions, which aſſured he was to reign in ſome place; ſhe doubted leaſt he would accept what was offered him, and to be a Soveraign, marry Andronice, and renounce his love to her ſelf. So that the ſecret inclination ſhe had for him, excited a perplexity in her heart, that ſufficiently reſembled a violent love, though ſhe concealed her ſentiments. After Hortenſius, to whom all Melanthus's Army ſubmitted without ſcruple, had performed the laſt duties to the Prince of Meſſenia, he aſſembled the Officers of the Army, and declared to them, that he would be the firſt to obey the Princeſs Andronice, and ſo would accept the glory of commanding them only, till ſhe were at liberty. After which, he ſent to the Princeſs Eliſmonda, to requeſt her permiſſion to ſpeak with the Princeſs Andronice, conjuring her, not to refuſe him a thing which might poſſibly produce peace. This propoſition augmented the jealouſie of Eliſmonda; but the generoſity of her heart not ſuffering her to diſcover it, ſhe granted what Hortenſius deſired. Accordingly this interview was made in a Temple dedicated to the Nymph Genniades, which ſtands between Piſa and the place where Hortenſius was incamped. I ſhall omit to tell you, Madam, all that was ſpoken in this interview, becauſe it would be too tedious. At firſt Hortenſius comforted Andronice, for the death of Melanthus, he related matters to her as they had paſſed, and acknowledged to her the love he had to Eliſmonda; and then coming to the declaration Melanthus had made in his favor, I proteſt to you, Madam, (ſaid he) though I were not poſſeſſed with an affection to the Princeſs Eliſmonda, and had a whole heart to give you, the reſpect alone I have for you, would cauſe me to ſerve my ſelf no farther with this declaration, than to ſettle the Soveraign power in your hands, without ever deſiring to oblige you to do for me, more than your own inclination ſhould induce you to. But ſince I am unfortunate, and born only to be ſo, it is fit Madam, you would pleaſe to appoint me what I ought to do, in relation to your liberty; I know I owe my life to you, and conſequently ought to do all for you; but Madam, if you continue the War, I ſhall be the moſt miſerable perſon in the World; for I have as great a love for Eliſmonda, as I have friendſhip for you, if the reſpect I bear you may permit me to ſpeak ſo. Judge therefore Madam, in what a condition I am. Withall, as you are good, equitable, and generous, give your ſelf the trouble of conſidering the State of my Soul and my Fortune, and then command ſoveraignly, what you would have me do; and be aſſured if it prove ſuch as my heart cannot obey, I ſhall have recourſe to death, for I ſhould hold my ſelf unworthy to live if I were able, not to do a thing you deſired of me. Andronice heard this diſcourſe of Hortenſius calmly, and having only a friendſhip for him, and that very tender and generous, ſhe judged of his proceeding without prejudice, and found it perfectly noble and gallant. So that ſhe gave great teſtimonies to his merit, and conjured him to deliver her without making War, and negotiate an Interview for her with Eliſmonda. Accordingly, Hortenſius being returned to the Camp, and deſiring the ſame of the Princeſs Eliſmonda, ſhe went to Piſa, where ſhe was received with many ſignifications of joy. Aſſoon as ſhe was there, ſhe went with all ſpeed to viſite Andronice, out of a deſire to know Hortenſius's reſolution. But when Andronice, who was deſirous to ſerve Hortenſius, told her, the love he had for her, reſtrained him from accepting what the late Prince of Meſſenia had offered, and that her ſelf well approved the action, ſhe reſumed her former dearneſs to the Princeſs of Meſſenia. Thus peace was ſoon concluded between theſe two fair Princeſſes, excluding the Prince of Cyparisſa, whoſe friends they judged would croſs their deſign. Yet Andronice told Eliſmonda, it depended on her to alter the Prince of Cyparisſa's ſentiments; for (continued ſhe) when he viſited me very civilly, after my coming to Piſa, I have heard him ſay a hundred times, that if he firmly believed you loved ſome other, he ſhould not love you more, being perſwaded 'tis poſſible to love eternally, even without being loved again, provided the Lady who is loved, loves none at all, but that love ought to be given over, when 'tis known ſhe does. So that it needs only to make him believe you love Hortenſius, in order to curing him of his paſſion. The remedy is ſomething difficult (anſwered Eliſmonda, bluſhing,) and 'tis requiſite to endeavor the finding out ſome other. But not to amuſe you longer, Madam, they began to propoſe a peace; the Prince of Cyparisſa's friends at firſt oppoſed it, deſiring Eliſmonda would promiſe to marry him when he ſhould be free. But to finiſh this adventure gloriouſly for Hortenſius, the Inhabitants of Elis, Piſa, and Olympia, remembring the obligation they had to Hortenſius, having underſtood his high deſcent, and the advantageous predictions made of him, believed they could do nothing more advantageous for their Country, than to oblige Eliſmonda to marry him; wherefore they ſent Delegates to her, to importune her to give them Hortenſius for their Soveraign; but though what they required was very acceptable to her, yet ſhe would not grant it to thoſe Delegates, becauſe ſhe would leave her ſelf to be perſwaded only by Hortenſius. So there was a ſufficiently long negotiation, at the end of which Andronice went to reign in Meſſenia, the Prince of Cyparisſa had liberty to return into his own Country, whither he went cured of his paſſion, when he underſtood Hortenſius was loved, and as for Eliſmonda, by the conſent of the people of Elis, ſhe married Hortenſius in the Temple of Olympia, in which, ſome days before the peace had been ſworn. Since that, the Prince of Cyparisſa, who had high esteem of Andronice, and was also much esteemed by him, has marryed her, and contracted Alliance with Hortensius, though he was his Rival. Thus the Son of the wise Manilius, came to reign in Elis, and reigns there still with very great satisfaction and glory; and the fair Elismenia, who at present is at the age in which beauty is at perfection, accounts her self absolutely happy in having marryed a person whose affection is alike ardent and durable.

Mevigenes held his peace after this, and it being late, the company told him they would thank him the next day for the pleasure he had given them by his Relation, and that in the mean time, Herminius should be encharged to uniform Valerius, of as much as was necessary for him to know, of the adventures of Hortensius.

Herminius, who was the moſt exact of all men, did not fail to go and give Valerius an account of what he had learnt, concerning Hortenſius. At which time he found him imployd in attending to a Spie, who had been ſent to Veii, and reported that the Veientines, being naturally ſuperſtitious, and credulous to the dictates of their Augurs, had conceiv'd great hopes their City ſhould one day become Miſtreſs of Rome, if they could but preſerve a Figure of Earth, of admirable workmanſhip, which Tarquin had heretofore caus'd a famous Sculptor of Veii to make, with deſign to place the ſame on the top of Jupiter's Temple, when it ſhould be finiſh'd. This Superſtitious opinion was occaſion'd by a pretenſion of the Artiſt that made that excellent Figure, who affirm'd, that it was become greater than he had form'd it, ſince it was out of the Mould wherein he caſt it; of which increas'd extenſion he was able to comprehend no reaſon. He proteſted alſo, that it was become as hard as Marble, without the aſſiſtance of fire: upon which event the Augurs reaſoning according to their manner, aſſur'd that they who had this Figure in their power, ſhould become Maſters of their neighbors. This information being given Valerius, who had caus'd the Temple of Jupiter to be finiſh'd, ſince the ejection of Tarquin, he determin'd to ſend a Herald to Veii, upon pretext of demanding that Figure, and offering to pay the price of it, for which Tarquin had agreed with the Sculptor that made it. Not, that he believ'd the happineſs of Rome, depended on an Earthen piece of work, but he was glad of the occaſion to ſend to Veii, to procure the deliverance of Horatius, who was capable of doing Rome conſiderable ſervice; which likewiſe having been recommended to him by Clelius, he was unwilling to neglect any thing in order to it: for though he were friend to Aronces, yet he judg'd he ſhould not diſoblige him by delivering his Rival, ſince himſelf had been generous enough not to diſcover him to Tarquin. Nevertheleſs, he firſt conſulted with the other Conſul, touching his deſign, by whoſe approbation it was ratifi'd. So a Herald was diſpach'd to Veii. with inſtructions how to effect the buſineſs; but whatever offer he made to purchaſe the Figure he deſir'd, he was abſolutely refus'd. On the contrary, the City payd the Artiſt that made it, his full reward, and declar'd that that Figure having been made by Tarquin's order, ſhould be deliver'd to none but that Prince, and that when he ſhould have conquer'd his Kingdom. After which the Herald, according to his inſtructions, gave them to underſtand, that he whom they had ſent to Rome, and order'd to go from thence to Elis, was taken priſoner; which very much ſurpris'd them, and they were ſo vehemently deſirous to deliver him, that they offer'd to exchange ſeveral priſoners for him. The Herald taking advantage of this occaſion, and the friendſhip Mamilius profeſs'd to the father of Clelia, acted with ſuch dexterity, that he procur'd the ſlave of Mamilius, and three others to be deliver'd for that Veientine, who had been ſeiz'd at Rome. And this too with ſuch diſpatch, that in three daies the exchange was made, and Horatius return'd to Rome, with more joy than he durſt have hop'd for; for upon his arrival there, he underſtood that Clelius was perſwaded, Octavius receiv'd his wound from the hand of Aronces, that this generous Rival was priſoner in the Iſle of Sanles, that the affection of Clelius towards himſelf reſum'd new ſtrength, and that the ſecond Conſul was his Relation. Indeed his joy abated upon his firſt interview with Clelia, for he found her deportment ſo cold towards him, that it was eaſie for him to underſtand his return afflicted her. For after he had been to wait upon the Conſuls, and render them thanks for the care they had to deliver him, he went to the house of Clelius, who expressing his satisfaction to see him by affectionate embraces, conducted him to the chamber of Sulpicia, and there left him, not judging it meet to lead him to that of Octavius, who, he knew well did not affect him, for fear of augmenting his distemper, which then began to decline. But Sulpicia likewise having no great kindness for Horatius, testifi'd no excessive gratulation to him for his liberty; though out of her respect to Clelius, she receiv'd him very civilly; but as for Clelia, her discontent appear'd in her eyes, as soon as she beheld him. Within a few moments after, some Ladies being arriv'd there, who diverted Sulpicia, he approach'd this fair Lady, and addressing to her, I perceive, Madam, (said he to her) my liberty is not very acceptable to you, and that if your vows had been heard, Aronces should now have been here, and I still at Veii: But however when you shall know that I owe my life a second time to my Rival, you will perhaps, be generous enough not to desire my death. To teach me generosity (answer'd Clelia coldly) it would be requisite you were generous your self, and having so many obligations to Aronces, would courageously resolve to pretend no longer to my affection; since I have already given it him for my whole life. If it were possible to love without desiring to be belov'd Madam, (reply'd Horatius) I protest I would not detract the doing of any thing whatsoever, to follow your counsels; but being the affection of a person belov'd, is desir'd with indispensable necessity, it is not possible for me to renounce yours, and testifie such a kind of gratitude to a Rival, who can never attain to be happy; all I am able to do, is to continue in the bounds I have prescrib'd my self, to endeavour to surpass him only in virtue: and to manifest that I act not like a fierce enemy, but as a generous Lover obliged to his Rival; I declare to you, that he is worthy of the glory which he possesses, that he loves you with as high an ardor as he is capable of, though in a degree inferior to mine, and that if Fortune were favourable to his Love, you ought to prefer him above all the rest of the world. But in the present State of affairs, it is obvious for you to judge, that though you should have absolutely resolv'd to suffer me to die miserable, he is never likely to live happy. No question, but I am ignorant of what Aronces destiny will prove (answer'd Clelia) but this I know, that if I cannot be his, I will never be any other persons in the world. Ah! Madam (said he to her with extream resentment) leave the future in the secret of the gods, content your self with telling me that you love me not, and adding moreover cruelly, that you love Aronces; but pronounce not so severe a sentence against me in favour of a Rival, who, as I have already said, can never be happy, though I should be perpetually miserable. For, in brief, Madam, you are too intelligent not to know that Clelius will never give his Daughter to the Son of a Protector of Tarquin, though Porsenna himself should consent to the love of Aronces, of which nevertheless there is no appearance. Wherefore then will you bereave of hope an unhappy person that adores you, that repents himself of his first violences, and who persists in a resolution he has taken, never to injure his Rival, but in aspiring to be, if possible for him, more virtuous than he. If you are really intended to approve your Love to me by the greatness of your virtue (reply'd Clelia) promise me you will draw no advantage from the kindness my Father has for you, and that if he should become so minded, as to be willing to enforce me to marry you you will never consent to it. Ah! Madam (cry'd Horatius) you improve your cruelty too high; and though I believe not I can ever be capable to suffer that you should be constrain'd to render me happy, yet I cannot obtain of my self to promise you to resist Clelius, if he desire I should be so. Then never speak to me henceforth (answer'd Clelia) but in the presence of Clelius, and prepare your self to be as hated by me, as you were formerly upon the Lake of Thrasymene. Well, Madam (said he to her) I promise you, I will never be happy against your pleasure; but promise me likewise that you will permit me to endeavour to perswade you, that 'tis an extream injustice to repell me from the injoyment of a happiness, he that is most worthy of it can never possess. I have already at another time told you (answer'd Clelia) that 'tis impossible any thing should ever arrive to render you happy, as long as my affection is necessary to your felicity. But I will again repeat it to you, with all the sincerity of a generous person. Be confident therefore, that should Aronces dye, or prove unfaithful, or should ambition dispossess me out of his heart, I could never be capable of a second affection. Perhaps I might hate him if he had betray'd me, or at least have some sentiments of hatred against him, (for those are two different things) but to love any other besides him, is to be reckon'd amongst impossibilities. I am of opinion, that without prejudice to innocence, Love may be once in our Lives entertain'd of that nature, wherewith I affect Aronces, but as for second affections, I confess to you Horatius, I look upon all those with contempt that are capable of them. Prepare your self therefore courageously never to be lov'd by me, if so be you are not contented with my esteem and friendship, which are things I can dispense amongst all persons worthy of them. Ah! Madam (said he to her) wherefore must you give me so great cause of admiration at the same time you wound me with so deep a sorrow? but 'tis in vain, (added he) that you require me to promise you any thing, since I am not Master of my own sentiments, and I cannot perform to my self the promises that I make. I change my resolution a hundred times in an hour, I will love, I will hate, I will forget; and after all these agitations, I find that all I resent is nothing but love, which disguises it self to aggravate my torment. Let us therefore leave the care of the future to those that are Masters of it: for your self know, Madam, what you have formerly wish'd, and what you now desire, but yet you cannot warrant what you may desire one day. There somtimes happen Revolutions, which in spight of our selves carry us whither we never thought of going; and to speak according to universal experience, we can never foresee any passion with certainty. Hatred, love, jealousie, anger, and ambition, arise in our breasts when they are not expected; they always surprize all those of whom they become absolute Mistresses; and 'tis principally for this reason, that it is a matter of so great difficulty to defend our selves from them. Do not therefore so firmly assure assure your self, Madam, of your own sentiments, and give me leave at least to believe that it is not absolutely impossible, but that I may one day be happy; for should I not believe so, perhaps virtue would abandon me at the same time with hope: Clelia was going to answer, when a great noise was heard in the street that led towards the Sublician bridge, which was within the prospect of Clelius's house. Whereupon, as in time of War, every kind of noise excites curiosity, the Ladies who were with Sulpicia, desiring to see what the cause of it was, interrupted Horatius, and forc'd him to look out with the rest, to discover the occasion of so great a stir among the people. The windows were no sooner open, but they beheld a magnificent Chariot upon the Sublician bridge, (in which was a man of a very graceful aspect, richly cloath'd with a wreath of Myrtle upon his head) which in spight of all the resistance of him that manag'd it, came with such violence that it overthrew every thing that obstructed its passage. For hurrying impetuosly before the Guards which stood at the end of the Bridge, it pass'd rapidly till before the Gate of Clelius's house, where it overturn'd; but by good fortune, he that was the Master of it, receiv'd no hurt, and got clear from the fall of the Chariot, the Axel-tree of which broke in that place. As soon as Horatius beheld him, he knew him to be a Nephew of Mamilius, at whose house he had been captive at Veii, and who was an especial friend to Clelius: So that not being able to divine what this adventure meant, nor to behold the relation of a person, by whom he had been favourably treated, in that condition, without offering to do him some good office, he inform'd Sulpicia what he was, and went to embrace him very obligingly; for, during the few days he had been at Veii, he was very familiar with him. When Horatius had made himself known to this young Veientine, whose name was Telanus, he led him to Sulpicia, who receiv'd him very civilly. Being a person of much gallantry, he desir'd pardon of the Ladies, for appearing before them with a Crown upon his head; and to satisfie the curiosity of the company, who requested it of him, he told them that the people of Veii, the better to testifie their averseness, to deliver to the Romans that rare Figure which Tarquin had caus'd to be made, with intention to place it upon the top of Jupiters Temple, had propos'd it for the principal Prize, at a magnificent race of Chariots, which they appointed without their City. The race being accordingly ended, and he having gain'd the prize, which was set up at the end of the Course, to excite those that were to run, as he was going to receive the guerdon of his Victory, after he had been crown'd, his Horses were terrifi'd in such sort, without any apparent cause of that affrightment, that they hurried him, maugre all his reluctance, to the place where his Chariot was overturn'd, nor could he tell, by what miracle it was not broken before he arriv'd at Rome. But in conclusion (added Telanus at the end of his relation) I do no longer complain of my adventure, since I am arriv'd in a place, where I find so many fair persons, with so great civility. As he was speaking thus Clelius enter'd, who understanding the person he beheld was Nephew to Mamilius, receiv'd him with great expressions of civility. He desir'd him that he would make his house his residence, and gave order to his domesticks, to take care of his Chariot. In the mean time, for that it was important the Consuls should be inform'd of what had happened, Horatius took that charge upon him; but the next morning there came a Herald in the name of the Veientines, to offer the Romans, to deliver the Figure demanded by them; for their Augurs being consulted, concerning all the accidents that befell them, the adventure which was arriv'd to Telanus, who could not enjoy the prize of his victory, caus'd them to think that the gods would be provok'd against them, if they did not deliver it. But it being resolv'd Telanus should not be deliver'd till the Figure were brought to Rome, he for some time encreas'd the noble company, which was every day at the house of Valeria, whither Horatius led him. Being young and gallant, the humour of Plotina pleas'd him infinitely, from the first hour he saw her, and as if there had been some project of Fate to bring it so to pass, that this amiable Virgin should see all her Lovers together, Persander, who went to Ardea some daies before, return'd back, and brought two of his friends, who were her passionate adorers. There arriv'd also at Rome, a man of Metapont, named Damon, who extreamly lov'd her, and who was become amorous of her, during a residence of six months, he had made at Ardea, But as for this last, though he was a person of ingenuity, probity, and honour, yet he was one of those well-meaning people, whose conversation affords not much divertisement. He was likewise one of those, who in matters of Religion affect all novelties, or extraordinary singularities; who rather believe that which seems impossible, than that which is profitable, and are very zealous in defending what they do not understand, only because they imagine they do. For this man had so ardently embrac'd the opinion of Pythagoras, that he accounted those extravagant, who did not believe, that souls continually transmigrate out of some bodies into other bodies. Amilcar now beholding four Rivals at once about his Mistris, was not remiss, but acquitted himself better than any other from this perplexity, which contributed to render the conversation, much more agreeable than usual; for one of Plotina's Lovers named Acrisius, was a person more loquacious than ever any other was; Sicinius spoke almost not at all, Telanus discours'd agreeably of every thing, and Damon extreamly affected to speak of his own Sect. Whereby, when Amilcar found all his Rivals with Plotina, there was none of them, whose conversation was not divertising, as Amilcar's pleasant humour order'd it: and when they were not there, he diverted himself yet more admirably, sometimes imitating the silence of the one, sometimes by speaking too much as the other, and sometimes pleasantly examining all the opinions of the new Sect of Pythagoras. By which means, he prejudic'd his Rivals, and pleasantly entertain'd his Mistris, without vexation to himself. One day amongst the rest, Acrisius talkt so much, and to so little purpose; and Sicinius spoke so little, that both of them were extreamly tedious, for they were with Plotina one after the other, who complain'd agreeably of them to Amilcar, who came to wait upon her after they were departed. I be-

ſeech you (ſaid ſhe to him) promiſe me two things I have to requeſt of you; one, that you will not ſpeak ſo much, but that I may have liberty to interpoſe a word if I deſire it; and the other, that I may not be oblig'd to ſpeak continually, but that you will ſometimes partake in my diſcourſe; for I have ſeen two men to day, of which, one would not permit me to ſpeak one word, and the other did not ſpeak four to me. I eaſily conjecture (anſwer'd Amilcar) that Acriſius and Sicinius came to wait upon you; but amiable Plotina, ſince you have experienc'd both thoſe imperfections, tell me, I beſeech you, which is the moſt inſupportable, to the end I may know which moſt to avoid, I aſſure you (reply'd ſhe) that both of them were very troubleſome to me; for 'tis a thing very diſguſtful, to ſee a converſation ſtifled every moment, As for my part (added ſhe ſmiling) I ſhould as ſoon chooſe to attend the ſacred fire of the Veſtals, as to be oblig'd to entertain ſuch people, who ſupply nothing to converſation, which always requires new arguments, and who are profeſt enemies to long ſentences, and ſcarce ever ſpeak any thing more than Yes or No, and ſometimes to ſpare the pains of pronouncing a ſyllable, make a little ſign with their head, to teſtifie that they underſtand you: In good earneſt (continued Plotina) I know nothing more tedious than that kind of profound ſilence, which happens every moment between two perſons, of which one is mute and reſerv'd. Silence in all other occaſions, is not without ſomething of pleaſingneſs. but in this it is faſtidious, and there is no noiſe ſo diſagreeable but ſatisfies me better. Seriouſly (anſwer'd Amilcar) the noiſe of thoſe inceſſant ſpeakers, is as troubleſome, as the ſilence of thoſe that ſpeak but little; and, if you will conſider it, you will find it as inconvenient. For is there any thing more irkſome, than to hear the great number of falſities and impertinences, uttered by thoſe perpetual diſcourſers; ſince 'tis not to be doubted, but they who ſpeak exceſſively, are not over-ſcrupulous of relating untruths, or at leaſt, ſuch matters as do not countervail attention. But the inconvenience is, that theſe people, at the ſame time they make their long Narratives, which might perhaps be diſpenc'd with, hinder others from ſpeaking ſuch things, as are deſir'd to be known. For Acriſius, Sicinius, Telanus, and my ſelf, were yeſterday together upon the banks of Tiber: and as the curioſity of Telanus induced him to enquire of me exactly, in what place the Founders of Rome had mark'd out the firſt Trench of their City, when I was going to anſwer him, and began to tell him, Romulus——Acriſius interrupted me; and ſeven times one after another, like the beſt ecchо in the world, I attempted again to ſpeak, and pronounc'd only Romulus, not being able to continue my anſwer to Telanus, who could not refrain from ſmiling at my obſtinacy and my patience. But at length it was neceſſary to yield to Acriſius, and reſolve to hear him, though his diſcourſe might well have been ſpar'd for all his life-time; for, beſides that, as I ſaid before, they who ſpeak too much, are ſubject to ſpeak untruths, or impertinencies: the ſubjects of their diſcourſe are frequently faſtidious and diſguſtful. The means to avoid theſe defects, by thoſe who have not ſufficient judgement, is, to permit them to ſpeak who are in preſence, to underſtand that ſociety ought to be free, that tyranny is inſupportable in converſation, that every one has his part and right to ſpeak in his turn; and laſtly, that this can never be, without the attention of thoſe that hear, and unleſs they who ſpeak well, may have the privilege to ſpeak more than others. As Amilcar was ſpeaking this Valeria and Ceſonia enter'd, and a little while after Herminius, Horatius, and Zenocrates, Plotina ſeeing preſent ſo many capable Judges of the ſubject of her diſcourſe with Amilcar, told them the diſguſt ſhe had in the entertainment of Acriſius, who was too full of words, and of Sicinius who was too reſerv'd; deſiring them to deliver their opinions upon theſe two defects, For my part, who am an un-active perſon, (ſaid Valeria) I think I ſhould rather chooſe to ſpeak too little than too much. You have reaſon (added Ceſonia) for though Women are generally charg'd with being exceſſively loquacious, yet I look upon a great talker of our Sex, as more troubleſome than one that is ſo of the other. For when women are given to affect much ſpeaking, their diſcourſe is uſually nothing but a maſs of trifles, and ſuperfluous words, which are very diſguſtful to ſuch as have any meaſure of judgement and underſtanding: For my part (ſaid Amilcar ſmiling) I am not of your opinion; for when ſuch a great talker is young and fair, and makes not uncomely faces in ſpeaking, but on the contrary, ſhews her white teeth, and ruddy Lips, I hear her with leſs pain than over-talkative men, whoſe audacious and inſolent aſpect as much offends the eyes, as their long-winded diſcourſe the ears. As for me (ſaid Herminius) who do not condemn ſilence at all times, I confeſs I would not be a great Speaker; but in others, I ſhould better comply with a man who was always ſpeaking, than one who muſt always be ſpoken to. I aſſure you (ſaid Horatius) that though all the world ſpeaks, few people know how they ought to do it. You have reaſon, without doubt (anſwer'd Herminius) and I dare maintain, there is ſcarce any thing, about which men univerſally agree, unleſs it be that Health is a Good; Beauty it ſelf is not exempt from conteſtation; Riches are lookt upon as noxious inſtruments; the Arts and Sciences are placed by ſome, in the rank of things uncertain and dubtous; Phyſick, whoſe object is the reſtitution of health, and prolongation of life, is yet accounted by ſome people a dangerous Art, that does more miſchief than benefit; ſo true, is it, that weakneſs and uncertainty reigns in the minds of mankind. Some approve the ſame that others condemn, and there is ſcarce any thing extoll'd and commended by one, but is as much decry'd and deprecated by another. For ſome believe, that ſpeaking little is a defect, others, that ſpeaking very much is a perfection; ſome, that to ſpeak eloquently, is to ſpeak bombaſtick words; others, that to ſpeak well, is to ſpeak naturally, and with facility; ſome affirm, only choice and ſelect words ought to be us'd, and others, that we ought to ſpeak negligently in avoidance of affectation; without conſidering that affected negligence is the worſt of all. There are ſome likewiſe who are of opinion, that to ſpeak well, it is requiſite to ſpeak with the ſame exactneſs that Books are written in; whilſt others on the contrary, to avoid this defect, ſpeak as impolitely as the the Vulgar; without obſerving, that all exceſs is equally condemnable; and that if it be dangerous to ſpeak too well, it is no leſs to ſpeak extreamly ill. But as I underſtand, there is a thing in Language generally and deſervedly blam'd by all the world, namely, a fuſtian dialect and obſcurity; ſince 'tis true, that whoſoever attends, deſires to comprehend what is ſpoken to him; and whoſoever ſpeaks, is oblig'd to make himſelf intelligible. No doubt, Herminius has reaſon (anſwer'd Zenocrates) when he ſaies, the Coyners of bombaſt words are condemn'd by all the world. Yet there are abundance of that profeſſion (ſaid Plotina) but, which I wonder at more, I know ſeveral ſorts of people addicted to it, and ſome amongſt them not abſolutely un-ingenuous. That is not to be doubted (anſwer'd Herminius) and hence it proceeds, that there are divers ſorts of gibbriſh. But can you give any reaſonable cauſe (ſaid Plotina) why people that have ſome meaſure of wit, do not expreſs themſelves purely and clearly without intricacy? Moſt certainly (anſwer'd Herminius) they are ſuch people whoſe thoughts ſometimes, come near to the underſtanding of matters, but their words ſo intricate their conceptions, that it cannot be conjectur'd, what they would have underſtood: There are others, (added Zenocrates) whoſe expreſſions are bad, only by reaſon they do not underſtand themſelves; and they are not only put to ſeek the words they would utter, but the things they would apprehend. You ſee then (reply'd Herminius) I am not deſtitute of reaſon, when I aſſert the multiplicity of bad language and gibbriſh. For the people I mentioned firſt, are obſcure in their diſcourſes, only becauſe they chooſe not out the words which might expreſs their thoughts; and the ſecond mentioned by Zenocrates, are ſo, only becauſe their thoughts being confus'd, there is no expreſſion that ſutes with them, and can make them intelligible. There are alſo ſome ſorts of innocent gibbriſh, (if I may ſo ſpeak) of which ſome are capable of being amended. For I know ſome perſons, who to ſhow the vividneſs and promptneſs of their fancies, give not leiſure to thoſe that ſpeak to them, to finiſh what they intended. Whereby endeavouring to make unſutable ſupplies by conjecture, they interrupt the courſe of them that were ſpeaking; and ſpeaking themſelves with precipitation, they ſeem to anſwer before any thing is perfectly propounded to them; ſince a perſon, who has not wholly ended what he was about to ſpeak, has as yet ſpoken nothing upon which to ground a pertinent anſwer, the laſt words of a diſcourſe not rarely overthrowing the beginning of it. Thus it almoſt always falls out, that theſe people who interrupt others ſo peremptorily, and interpoſe their unſeaſonable ſupplements, ſpeak things without ſenſe, and cauſe a ſtrange intricacy, though otherwiſe their apprehenſions be ſufficiently clear. For my particular (ſaid Valeria) I know ſome obſcure clouded ſpeakers, the occaſion of whoſe fault is, that their minds are diſtracted; for not attending well to what is ſpoken to them, and through cuſtom, not awaiting to anſwer, they uſually acquit themſelves after an ill manner. There are likewiſe certain gibbriſh ſpeakers, who become ſuch out of an affectation to ſeem ſubtle, and imagine, that not expreſſing themſelves clearly, is the way to be accounted owners of deep judgements and great abilities. For my part (ſaid Amilcar) I know there are perſons of both Sexes, from whom ſometimes diſcourſes proceed not warrantable in ſenſe, and that only becauſe they deſire to be the firſt that uſe thoſe new-coyned words which chance introduces, and the humor of the world makes currant for a while, and which ſometimes are authoriſ'd by time and cuſtom; for theſe people not knowing the true ſignification of the new modiſh words, place them impertinently, and oftentimes ſpeak the contrary to what they intend to expreſs. There are alſo others (anſwer'd Herminius) who underſtand not what they ſay, becauſe having reſolv'd to ſpeak confidently of every thing, they venture with a very mean wit, to ſpeak of certain things, which can never be rightly ſpoken of, unleſs they be well learnt before. In the mean time, 'tis much a greater ſhame to pretend a ſufficiency without reality, than to be judiciouſly ſilent, and to confeſs ignorance of the things that are debated of. I beſeech you (ſaid Plotina) let us leave theſe gibbriſh ſpeakers, who are unworthy the notice and minding of ſo many perſons, that ſpeak ſo handſomely and clearly; and let us only conſider thoſe who ſpeak either too much or too little; for as for my ſelf, I confeſs the latter ſeem ſo troubleſome themſelves, by occaſioning the trouble of others, that I ſhould chuſe rather to ſpeak too much than too little, ſince, at leaſt, by importuning my friends, I ſhould divert my ſelf. Though it ſeem not poſſible (anſwer'd Hortenſius) to be of an opinion contrary to yours, without undertaking a bad ſide, yet I ſhall not forbear to declare once more, that I like rather to ſpeak too little than too much, that nevertheleſs, I ſhould ſometimes fancy the converſation of a loquacious perſon, more than that of one that ſeem'd almoſt perpetually tongue-ty'd. For it may indeed happen oft-times, that a man who ſpeaks not much, may have a good capacity, but it can ſcarce ever happen that one who ſpeaks too much, is indu'd with a tolerable judgement. True (ſaid Amilcar) but withal it does not often happen that thoſe who almoſt wholly decline ſpeaking, are owners of much wit; and on the other ſide, it is frequently enough ſeen, that a great talker is ſufficiently ingenuous, for 'tis my opinion, that wit has a reſemblance with fire, and ſo cannot but diſcover it ſelf in ſome manner or other, where ever there is any of it. Yet great men have been ſeen (anſwer'd Horatius) that have not affected ſpeaking. 'Tis true (reply'd Herminius) but then they have manifeſted their wit in their writings or actions, if not by their words; for I concur with Amilcars ſentiment, that wit cannot abſolutely be conceal'd, but muſt of neceſſity make it ſelf apparent. Yet we may ſee great Princes, great Philoſophers, great Poets, great Painters, and excellent Artiſts, very ſparing of their ſpeech; but their actions, or their works will ſpeak for them, and convince all that know them, that their ſilence is not a ſilence proceeding from ſtupidity. The caſe is not the ſame in thoſe people whoſe wit reſides in their tongues, and whoſe utmoſt performance and imployment is only the multiplication of words, for I am confident their actions for the moſt part, are wholly dumb to their advantage. Nevertheleſs (anſwered Zenocrates) all perſons indu'd with judgement, judgement are not ſo reſolv'd friends to ſilence. I do not affirm (reply'd Herminius) that all thoſe who ſpeak very much are deſtitute of judgement, for I ſhould therein commit an injuſtice againſt many worthy perſons; but only that ſuch as ſpeak too much can have none. Believe me (ſaid Plotina) there is oft-times very little difference to be found between ſpeaking very much, and ſpeaking over much. Liberality and Prodigality have ſome kind of reſemblance together (anſwer'd Herminius) and yet 'tis very well diſtinguiſh'd that the latter is a vice, and the other a virtue; So 'tis eaſie enough to diſtinguiſh him that ſpeaks very much and well, from him that ſpeaks too much and ill, or at leaſt ill to the purpoſe. But I beſeech you (ſaid Valeria) are there not ſome who ſpeak too much, and nevertheleſs fail not to ſpeak well? No doubt there are (anſwer'd Amilcar) and I knew a Greek in Sicily, whoſe language, though eminent for the moſt exquiſite Attick purity, was notwithſtanding faſtidious, becauſe he ſpoke more than he ought. For the deſcription of a man too loquacious, is chiefly taken from the thin number of things, and prolix ſeries of words, wherewith he uſeth to comprehend the ſame; he is Characteris'd by the little neceſſity he has for endleſs ſpeaking, by his forwardneſs to deliver his judgement of every thing, to interrupt the ſpeech of every one, and ſnatch all occaſions to ſpeak, to talk perpetually, without taking notice ſometimes, whether he be liſtned to or no, and not to be able to hold his peace, though in the preſence of perſons of greater quality, or capacity than himſelf. Not but that I believe thoſe very great ſpeakers are not ſometimes obnoxious, (though they ſpeak well too) to be adjudg'd pragmatical by thoſe who love to ſpeak as themſelves; but, for that this do's not always happen, the pleaſure of a ſmall number of perſons ought not to authorize the condemnation of thoſe who ſpeake very much and well, and afford a thouſand delights by their converſation, becauſe they never ſpeak any thing that is not either neceſſary or agreeable. For when a man loves to ſpeak, only becauſe nature has given him a facility of expreſſion, a capacious mind, a quick fancy, a memory ſtor'd with choice and rational notions, when his judgement is maſter of his wit and fancy, and his converſation perfectly accommodated to the genius of the World, no doubt, 'tis poſſible for him to ſpeak much, without being chargeable for exceſs; for I am confident, that if this man be ſuch as I have deſcrib'd, he will be able to hold his peace as often as he pleaſes, he will yield a liberty of ſpeech to all that deſire it, and will not do like a grand talker I met with at my firſt arrival at Syracuſe, to whom I was, at his own requeſt, going to repreſent a great danger I encounter'd with at Sea, by reaſon of a ſtorm that ſurpris'd us; I had ſcarce begun to tell him that the Sea was agitated by a ſudden commotion, but cutting me off, This makes me remember (ſaid he) that the like caſe once befell me when I was making a voyage at Sea. For you muſt know (added he, without remembring what he had requeſted of me) that after I was embarqu'd at Tarentum in a very good ſhip, the Pilot of which was a Native of Cuma, and which was fraighted with ſeveral ſorts of merchandiſe (for Tarentum is a potent and rich City, and much frequented, by reaſon of the great Traffique of all kind of Commodities exercis'd in it) the wind changing of a ſudden, the ſhip was conſtrain'd to ſtay yet fifteen days longer in the Port of Tarentum, where there befell me a ſufficiently pleaſant adventure. For when embarqu'd, I took my leave of a woman of no contemptible beauty, with whom I had been gracious for ſome time, and who, for my ſake, had baniſht from her houſe a Lover which ſhe had, before I was hers. But for that ſhe believ'd I was departed over night, the next morning when I returned aſhore, and went to her to let her know I ſhould have the pleaſure of ſeeing her ſome days longer, I found her laughing heartily with my old Rival, though ſhe had bid me adieu with tears. Whereupon, choler incenſing me, I fell to quarrelling with my Rival and my Miſtriſs; which fit of indignation cur'd me of my love; and at my going from this viſit, I made another, at another houſe, where I became amorous of a brave Girl, to whom I addreſs'd Courtſhip, and was ſo paſſionate a ſervant of hers, that I ſuffer'd the Veſſel to ſail away without me, in which I had embarqu'd before with intention to depart. But, (ſaid I to him, taking occaſion to interrupt him) when you interrupted me, I thought it had been only to repreſent to me ſome tempeſt reſembling that which you deſir'd me deſcribe to you; yet it ſeems after you took ſhip, I find you again upon Land, and engag'd in a Love-deſign. Give your ſelf a little patience (ſaid he to me) we are not come to it yet. And indeed I ſtood in great need of it; for out of his prodigious eagerneſs of perpetual ſpeaking, and ſilencing all others, he recounted to me every particular circumſtance relating to his new affection; he caus'd me to read the Letters of his Miſtriſs, he repeated Songs to me, he took ſhip once again, and made a voyage without a Tempeſt, before he came to tell me of that, where indeed he was in danger of periſhing: Thus this man, who had a purpoſe to know the manner of my hazarding and eſcaping ſhipwrack, knew nothing at all of it, but inform'd me of a hundred matters wherewith I was wholly unconcern'd. In the mean time his language was commendable, and ſuppoſing it had been material for me to have known all that he told me, the man would have ſpoken admirably well: but being I had nothing to do with any of his ſtories, and had not related the danger I incurr'd above once or twice, (all the world naturally delighting to recount a Tempeſt, or ſuch like iminent dangers from which they are eſcap'd) 'tis beyond your imagination what I then ſuffer'd; and his eloquence was ſo offenſive to me, that had I not reſolv'd with my ſelf to deride him ſecretly, I ſhould have had but a very odious divertiſement. You have made this relation ſo pleaſantly (anſwer'd Plotina laughing) that it would have been ill, if there had never been people that affect much ſpeaking, and the beſt is, (added ſhe in raillery) that in imitating a man that ſpeaks very much, you ſeem not to enforce your ſelf as much as another. 'Tis true (reply'd Amilcar), beholding her with infinite affection) I ſpeak ſometimes freely enough; but to prove to all the company that I know how to reſtrain my ſelf from ſpeaking when I pleaſe, I need only inform them, that I have lov'd you more than eight days without declaring it to you, though

I had

I had a deſire to do it every moment. I beſeech you (ſaid Plotina) let us not ſo ſoon change the diſcourſe, and amuſe our ſelves with ſpeaking of follies, which are no more neceſſary to be known to the company, than the relation of the adventures of your Greek, were to you, But for that I am no very great hater of ſpeaking, and 'tis one of the things in the World we moſt frequently practice; I ſhould not be unwilling to be inform'd what are the requiſites to ſpeaking well. In the firſt place (ſaid Amilcar) it is requiſite to have a good wit, ſufficient memory, and excellent judgement. Next, it behoves to ſpeak the language of the better ſort of people of the Countrey where we reſide, and equally to avoid that of the low and courſer Plebeians, that of fantaſtical wits, and that which certain people uſe, which having a ſmack of the Court; a mixture of the vulgar, ſomewhat of the former age, a little of the preſent, and very much of the City, is the moſt confus'd and various of all. But yet (ſaid Plotina) I do not account this ſufficient; for you well diſtinguiſh how we ought not to ſpeak, but you do not not expreſs directly how we ought. I aſſure you (anſwer'd Hiratius) it is neceſſary only to ſpeak as you do, to ſpeak exactly and agreeably. Verily (added Herminius) the amiable Plotina ſpeaks as a brave Lady ſhould, to ſpeak agreeably; for all her expreſſions are both noble and natural together, what ſhe ſpeaks is not far fetcht and elaborate, there is no conſtraint in her words, her diſcourſe is clear and facile, there is gallant ſprightlineſs in her manner of ſpeaking, no affectation in the ſound of her voice, very much liberty in her actions, and a wonderful reſemblance between her eyes and her words, which is a grace that contributes to render ſpeech infinitely more agreeable. But how can all you ſpeak of (anſwer'd Plotina) be competent to me, who ſcarce ever premeditate of what I am to ſay. Should you ſtudy more attentively, Madam, (reply'd Zenocrates) you would not ſpeak ſo agreeably as you do; for when we are ſo ſolicitous and conſiderative, we never ſpeak any thing commendably. But I would deſire to know (interrupted Ceſonia) what muſt the difference be which is requir'd between a man that ſpeaks well, and a woman that does ſo too; for though I certainly know, there ought to be ſome diſtinction, yet I do not fully underſtand wherein it conſiſts. The ſame words are us'd, the ſame things ſometimes ſpoken of, and the minds of both are frequently poſſeſs'd with reſembling thoughts; yet, as I ſaid before, it does not always become an ingenious woman to ſpeak in the ſame manner as an ingenious man; and there are certain expreſſions, which either Sex may ſutably enough employ diſtinctly, but cannot be promiſcuouſly us'd by the other with decency. There are certain things indeed (ſaid Plotina) which ſeem extremly uncowth in the mouth of a Woman, and yet are not at all ſurpriſing in that of a man. As for example, if I ſhould go to ſwear by the holy Fire, or by Jupiter, I ſhould frighten thoſe that heard me; if I ſhould offer to judge deciſively of ſome difficult queſtion, I ſhould be accounted ridiculous; if I ſhould only affirm that which I ſpeak, with ſomething too ſtrong and fierce a tone of my voice, it might be doubted whether I deſerv'd the name of a Virgin; if I ſhould ſpeak of War like a Military Tribune, all my friends would deride me. Nevertheleſs it behoves us to ſpeak commendably, as alſo to take care from falling into another defect, namely that of ſpeaking with a certain affected ſimplicity, which reliſhes of Childhood, and is very unbecoming. In the next place we ought not to ſpeak heedleſly, but yet leſs ought we to attend to our own ſpeech, as ſome woman do, who really liſten to the ſound of the words, which they pronounce, as they would do to a Harp when they are tuning it; and who with a certain tone of ſatisfaction, oftentimes cloath very bad things in very gay expreſſions, That which the amiable Plotina ſpeaks (anſwer'd Amilcar) is admirably well ſpoken; but to mention a defect that agrees equally to men and women, it is requiſite to avoid diligently a certain vulgar pronunciation which renders the moſt excellent ſenſe diſagreeable. For I aſſert, that it would be incomparably better that I had ſomething of African-accent in ſpeaking the language of Rome, than if I ſhould uſe that odd accent which is peculiar to the meaneſt ſort of artiſans. I dare confidently maintain, there is ſcarce a place in the world, where there is not a difference between the pronunciation of the better rank, and that of the vulgar; and I add moreover, that a ſtranger is not blameble for preſerving that of his Countrey; but a man or woman of quality are, if they ſpeak like their ſlaves. For my part, having a nice and delicate guſt, in reference to all things whatſoever, I am ſenſibly affected with the ſound of the voice, with a pure and ſweet accent, and an unexpreſſible kind of nobleneſs, that I find in the pronunciation of certain perſons whom I know, and chiefly in that of the charming Plotina. But I beſeech you (ſaid Ceſonia) tell me what they muſt do, who ſpeak not like Plotina, to attain the gracefulneſs of her ſpeech, and loſe the ill-becommingneſs of their own. Love people of the better rank (anſwer'd Herminius) and converſe with few others; for it does not belong to Books to teach to ſpeak, and they who content themſelves with reading, to become fit for converſation, ſtrangely delude themſelves, and underſtand not the advantages of familarity with good Writers. Reading is, without doubt, neceſſary to adorn the mind, to regulate the manners, and to compoſe the judgement; it may likewiſe ſerve to learn a tongue, but as for the handſomeneſs of language, it is attainable only by converſation, which withal, muſt be a converſation of people of the World, whereof Women make the greateſt part otherwiſe it will be too ſublime and learned, dry, rude, or affected, by thoſe who endeavour to regulate their faſhions of ſpeaking according to what they read. For, as Books for the moſt part ſpeak not as men do in converſation; ſo it does not become men to ſpeak in converſation, after the ſame manner they read in Books. Verily (ſaid Plotina) I wonder all the world does not addict themſelves to learn to ſpeak well; ſince, methinks, nothing is more eaſie than to be always in the company of worthy perſons; for the caſe is infinitely otherwiſe in all other things that we deſire to learn. It is ſometimes tedious enough to attend the directions of thoſe that teach to ſing, to paint, or to dance; but ſince to ſpeak handſomely, there needs nothing more than to converſe with people of the World, and with those too that speak gracefully and agreeably, I make a vow to learn to speak during my whole life, and never willingly to converse with any others. Others ought rather to apply to you, Madam (said Zenocrates) than you to others. You have reason (answered Amilcar) but there is another kind of thing which the amiable Plotina has need to learn, which is to hear a little more favorably what I sometimes say to her. As for that (replyed she) 'tis learnt but too soon, but there is another which I would have all them taught who know it not, which is to consider what is spoken to them, and not to wander into unseasonable fancies from the purpose, in company. A little distraction (added she) I can pardon, but for that multiplication of continued extravagant fancies some people are addicted to, who never are present where they are seen, and are scarce ever in any place, I think it fit they were reformed of it. For he that has so many things to muse of, better than those he intends to speak, ought to abide in his Closet, and entertain only himself, since 'tis undoubtedly an incivility, not at all to attend to that which is spoken in the place where you are present, and to make no account of the company; and for my part, I am perswaded there is nothing but the murmur of a rivulet, or the prilling of a Fountain that can be civilly heard while we are meditating. What ever you are pleased to say (answered Amilcar) the liberty of musing is infinitely pleasing; and you are not ignorant that there are certain houses in all places which are accounted more agreeable than others, only because the Masters of them lay no constraint upon any person. There a man may be either pensive or sociable, he may either laugh or sing, entertain himself with whom he pleases, come in, and go forth without speaking any thing, and in a word enjoys a liberty in such houses, attended with so much sweetness, that they are deservedly preferred before all others. However it be (replyed Plotina) I consent to what Herminius affirmed; for without learning so many several things, it will be most convenient for me only to converse with persons of ingenious accomplishments, and therefore I am resolved to consort with no others hereafter, if it be possible. You had reason to add those last words (answered Amilcar) for according to the course of the World it is sufficiently difficult to converse only with such persons as you speak of. He had scarce ended these words but one came to advertise Herminius, that Valerius enquired for him concerning some urgent affair. Another also came at the same time to tell Horatius, that the second Consul, who was his Kinsman, had some occasion for him, so that this honorable company broke up; for Valeria having a curiosity to know what her fathers business was with Herminius, departed presently after him, and afterwards Amilcar and Zenocrates retired, and left Cesonia and Plotina alone together. Those two gallant persons were no sooner in the street, but they met Æmilius, who told them there was a man come from Clusium, that had brought some intelligence which obliged the Consuls to assemble the Senate extraordinarily. And indeed it was a Messenger sent by Artemidorus, who advertised Valerius, that they were already about raising forces in the States of the King of Hetruria, and preparing to advance the Troops of the Veientines and the Tarquins. It was also informed that the Queen Galeritia, accompanyed by the Princess of the Leontines, was gone to the Island of Saules, where Aronces was confined, with intent to perswade him to yield absolute obedience to Porsenna, and that it was not doubted but he would be won to it, there being no appearance that he could refuse to bear Arms against all those whom the King his father declared, and adjudged for enemies. Valerius receiving this intelligence, judged it important to seize upon a considerable Passage, and cause a Fort to be built there, before the enemies had time to perceive how necessary it would be for them to be masters of it.

But the second Consul being as much a favorer of the interests of Horatius as Valerius was of those of Aronces, though both of them sought the publick good, there became a kind of disposition to discord between them. Valerius knowing of how much concernment it was, there should happen no breach between them, desired to avoid a contest which might prove prejudicial to the publick affairs. To which purpose being to act two important matters at once, one of which was to know which of the two Consuls should go Commander of the forces designed to fortifie that difficult passage between Rome and Clusium, and the other to know whether the Consul Horatius or Valerius should be the person that should Dedicate the Temple of Jupiter, Valerius propounded to refer the decision of it to the event of Lot, perceiving the urgency of the matter; for the people imagined all would go ill if the Temple were not dedicated, and intelligent persons foresaw it was necessary to seise of a place that might hinder the enemies from coming so suddenly to besiege Rome, and consequently allow leisure to fortifie it. And it was to consult of this affair, that Valerius sent to seek Herminius, and the second Consul desired to speak with Horatius. Valerius would rather have stayed at Rome, where he believed his presence necessary, but the Dedication of the Temple of Jupiter being an honor desired with immence passion by his Collegue, he put the matter into the power of Lot, which decided it in favor of the second Consul. So that Valerius was obliged to go and command the Army for that secret expedition, which was judged so necessary. Horatius, as amorous as he was, resolved to accompany him, and would not remain behind a peaceful Spectator of the Dedication of a Temple, while there were Forces in the Campagne. Themistus, Herminius, Amilcar, Zenocrates, Æmilius, and all the other friends of Valeria would have done the same, but he judged it necessary for himself that his true friends should continue at Rome during his absence. And moreover his attempt requiring to be executed by surprise, he did not deem it needful to carry so many brave persons with him for such a purpose. Nevertheless, he consented that Mulius should go with him; for knowing his imperious honor, and what his passion was for Valeria, he was not unwilling to separate him from Herminius and Æmilius, whom he very highly affected. As for Spurius, he remained at Rome, to importune Valeria; and Themistus likewise continued there for fear, lest if the Prince of Messenia should come thither to seek him him, he might imagine he intended to flye away, Melanges ſtayed with his friend, Galianus follow'd Valerius, and Merigenes, ſtay'd behind for the ſame cauſe with Themiſtus. The ſecond Conſul, though he had but one only Son, ſent him to the Army, which in three days was ready to depart. When it was marcht away, the Conſul Horatius only prepared for the Honor to dedicate the Temple of Jupiter. In order to which it was purified, according to the cuſtom, with the moſt ancient ceremonies of Rome: all the people left their works this day, Sacrifices were offered in all the other Temples, that which was to be dedicated, was adorned with above a thouſand magnificent Lamps; all the perſons of quality of either Sex were preſent in it, the chief Veſtal, and the Salian Prieſts repaired thither, and it was not ſuſpected any obſtacle could happen, to obſtruct the accompliſhment of the Ceremony. When the time came, that the ſecond Conſul was holding the Gates of the Temple half open, and, according to the antient cuſtom, was ready to pronounce the ſolemn words, in which conſiſted the dedication of the Temple, a Brother of Valerius, who ſtood directly againſt the gates, lifting up his voice, Know (ſaid he to him) that your ſon is dead in the Army, and therefore being obliged to take care for his Funeral, it is not meet for you to do what you are going about; for it is a profanation to ſhed tears the ſame day a Temple is dedicated to Jupiter. If my ſon be dead, (anſwered Horatius without being moved) he is dead for the cauſe of his Countrey, and it being ſo, the gods preſerve me from lamenting his loſs. Let the Romans then take care for his Sepulture, (added he) for he was more Rome's than mine; and ſince he is dead in defence of his liberty, I ought to rejoice for it, and finiſh the ceremony. Herminius, who was on the other ſide of the gate, knew well, that what the Brother of Valerius ſaid, was but an artifice excogitated by him, to impede the ceremony, imagining the Conſul would be ſo troubled at the news of his only Sons death, that he could not proceed and finiſh it. He apprehended alſo that he had been inſtigated to this artifice by Spurius, who was his Friend: wherefore underſtanding how greatly it would diſpleaſe Valerius, who was a declared enemy to untruth, as well as himſelf, he could not contain from ſpeaking aloud, that this intelligence was not ſent by Valerius. However, the Conſul, whether that he knew what was ſpoken to him to be untrue, or had a reſolute and conſtant Soul, or that the deſire of glory rendred him inſenſible, teſtified no ſign of grief, and finiſhed the ceremony. But juſt as it was almoſt ended, Horatius and the Son of this Conſul arrived from Valerius, to advertiſe that the Paſſage of ſo conſiderable advantage was eaſily ſeiſed on, and that he would return as ſoon as he had cauſed it to be fortified. Whereupon, Herminius, beholding him to arrive, who was ſaid to be dead, and knowing from him the intelligence he brought, would himſelf conduct him to the Conſul Horatius, to the end he might clearly manifeſt, Valerius and he had no part in the artifice which was made uſe of, to diſturb him in the ceremony. And indeed it was eaſie to diſcover who were principals in the fraud; for the Brother of Valerius and Spurius, withdrew themſelves, but Herminius, Æmilius, Amilcar, Zenocrate, and all the other Friends of Valerius, remained to congratulate with the Conſul, for the return of his Son, and the news he had brought. In the mean time Clelius, who was ſufficiently joyful, becauſe he was aſſured of the recovery of Octavius, underſtanding it was believed Aronces would be obliged to bear Arms againſt Rome, called Clelia, and ſpeaking to her with the authority of a Father, and a Roman whoſe Virtue was ſevere, Daughter, (ſaid he to her) you are not ignorant, what hatred I ought to bear againſt Tarquin; and your ſelf have been ſufficiently perſecuted by him, to hate him in perfection, and not to ſcruple to forget a Prince, who has bathed his Sword in the Blood of your Brother, and who apparently is going to put himſelf into a condition to kill him and me too, if it be true, as 'ts reported, that he is obliged to make War againſt Rome. But my Lord (anſwered Clelia dejectedly,) if Aronces has wounded my Brother, it was by reaſon he knew him not; he ſerved Rome importantly againſt Tarquin, in the laſt Battel, and if it be true that he changes his party, no doubt 'tis only becauſe the King his Father, having embraced that of Tarquin, honor will no longer permit him to fight for Rome, ſince he cannot do it, without fighting againſt him, to whom he ows his life. Therefore I acknowledge to you, without violating the reſpect incumbent on me by duty, that I think, after your ſo frequent commands to me, to look upon Aronces as my deſigned Husband, and who had effectually been ſo, had not that dreadful Earthquake interrupted your intentions, I cannot ſo eaſily forget Aronces as you require, for it is not in my power, not to remember all thoſe obligations I have to him. I perceive well (interrupted Clelius roughly) you would intimate to me, that I ought alſo to remember thoſe you pretend I have to Aronces; but without amuſing my ſelf to anſwer all you have now ſpoken, I declare to you, that I revoke all the commands I layd upon you in favor of Aronces, and that I now lay more powerful ones upon you in favor of Horatius, whom I intend you ſhall marry at the end of the War. I would cauſe you to marry him to morrow, (added he) were it not that Valerius inſtructs me by his example, that it is unfit to be ſollicitous about accompliſhing Mariages, whilſt our Countrey is in War; ſince he has deferred that of Valeria, for this only reaſon. And withall, being unwilling to treat you ſeverely, I conſent that you take ſome time, to reſolve to obey me with a good will. But my Lord, (replyed Clelia modeſtly) what ſhall become of the promiſes which you have made to the unfortunate Aronces? I promiſed all things to the unknown Aronces (anſwered he) but I promiſed nothing to the Son of Porſenna, and the Protector of Tarquin, and moreover, (added Clelius fiercely) to tell you my ſentimens, you are not to imagine that Aronces is the ſame at Cluſium, that you ſaw him heretofore at Carthage, and more lately at Rome. His example will perhaps ſoon teach you to obey your Father, as he will do his own: and therefore it is better, that you endeavor to prevent him. Reſolve then upon it, for it will be unprofitable for you to reſiſt me, I am going to publiſh the reſolution I have taken in ſuch a manner, that it ſhall be ſufficiently difficult, but ſome of Aronces's Friends will diſcover it to him, as ſoon as he ſhall be at liberty. No queſti-

on my Lord, (anſwered Clelia,) you may publiſh your reſolution to all the World; but you can never alter that which I have made, never to be poſſeſſed by any perſon, if I cannot be by Aronces. Clelius was tranſported with very much violence at theſe words, and left Clelia in incredible ſorrow. 'Tis true, Sulpitia comforted her with extream goodneſs, for being ſhe loved Aronces and hated Horatius, ſhe intereſſed her ſelf in the affliction of Clelia, and omitted nothing conducive to her conſolation. Octavius likewiſe gave her all the occaſions in the World, to commend his generoſity, but in fine, Aronces was abſent and priſoner, and if he were ſet at liberty, ſhe judged it would be only to manage the War againſt Rome, and ſo ſhe ſhould become more miſerable. She likewiſe feared, leſt time might change the heart of Aronces, and Horatius return to be as violent as he had formerly been: whereby finding no advantage either in Peace or War, ſhe perpetually found her ſelf unhappy. But if ſhe were unfortunate, Aronces enjoyed no felicity: for it was true, the Queen his Mother, accompanyed with the Princeſs of the Leontines, went to him in the Iſland of Saules to propound to him in the name of the King, either to reſolve upon perpetual impriſonment, or to take Arms againſt Rome, in favor of Tarquin. The very firſt thought of changing his ſide excited horror in him, eſpecially when he reflected that he ſhould ſee himſelf with his Sword in his hand, againſt the Father of Clelia, and ſo many of his Illuſtrious friends; but when he proceeded to conſider that his Rival was at Rome, (for he had been informed of his deliverance) and imagined that during his impriſonment. Horatius might make advantage of his misfortune, he concluded nothing could be more prejudicial to him, than to continue in priſon: Knowing therefore that the Queen his Mother, and the Princeſs of the Leontines favored his intereſts, and were informed of his paſſion, he would not conceal his ſentiments from them. I beſeech you Madam, (ſaid he to Galerita) remember that I am in the ſame priſon, where Love heretofore occaſioned your confinement; recall all the dearneſs you have had for the King, and compaſſionate the condition of an unfortunate perſon, who loſt his liberty, before he knew he owed his life to you. Conſider the deplorable ſtrait I am at preſent in. If I obey the King, I ſhall ſee my ſelf with Sword in hand, againſt the Father of Clelia, and be obliged to ſerve Tarquin and Sextus, to the utmoſt of my power, who have been, and perhaps ſtill are, Lovers of the perſon that I love, and both her perſecutors and mine. If I ſeek to eſcape out of priſon, and put my ſelf into Rome, I commit an action horribly criminal againſt the King my Father, and I ſide with Horatius, who is a formidable Rival, and if I continue in priſon, I do nothing either for the King, or Clelia, or my ſelf, nothing againſt Horatius or Tarquin, and only ſuffer unprofitably. Thus I find my ſelf in an eſtate more miſerable than ever any Lover fell into. The Princeſs of the Leontines, deſirous at leaſt to give Aronces ſome conſolation, informed him, that the Prince of Numidia had ceaſed to be a Prince, and was Brother to Clelia, though concealing from him the report that he had wounded him, which ſhe underſtood from Artemidorus, and Zenocrates, for fear to afflict him. If it be ſo (anſwered Aronces,) I ſhall have loſt a Rival, and gained a Protector, for I have no reaſon to doubt, but that between Horatius and me, the generous Brother of Clelia will declare himſelf to my advantage. Alaſs! (ſaid Galerita then ſighing) what will it be the better for you by his declaring to your advantage, if Fortune be againſt you? For in brief, to tell you the ſtate of matters in reality, I have order from the King, to offer you liberty and his favor, on condition you will marry the Daughter of the Prince of Cere, who is propounded to him by Tarquin; no other aſſurance (he ſays) being to be had of you, after your once already eſcaping from his Court. Ah! Madam, (cryed Aronces) I will dye a thouſand times, rather than do what the King propounds to me; I prefer dying incomparably before injuring my Love, and my Honor. Yet in the condition wherein I am at preſent, it is ſo difficult to do any thing for the firſt, without violation of the latter, that death is the ſole remedy I am able to imagine. Ceaſe therefore, Madam, (added this afflicted Prince) ceaſe from having any longer kindneſs for me, ſince I can do nothing but occaſion ſorrow to thoſe that love me. Hope is ſo ſweet a good (anſwered the Princeſs of the Leontines) that it ought not to be caſt off ſo eaſily. Wherefore, I wiſh you would leave the Queen, the power to manage the intereſts of your Love, and your Honor, without being ſollicitous what ſhe intends to report to the King. Alaſs! Madam, (replyed Aronces ſadly) it is extreamly difficult, to retain hope in a condition reſembling mine, when reaſon is as yet not wholly loſt. However it be, (ſaid Galerita) leave your ſelf to be guided by me, unleſs you intend your own deſtruction. But Madam, (ſaid he) what can I, or what can you your ſelf do? I can tell the King (anſwered ſhe) that you are in deſpair not to find your Soul capable, to yield ſo ready obedience. But Madam, (interrupted Aronces) I will never obey him, if he always commands me not to love Clelia. Have patience (anſwered Galerita,) and ſuffer me to end what I was ſpeaking. I intend (added ſhe) to inform the King as I told you, and endeavor to perſwade him, to permit you the liberty of being guarded only in his Palace, and to ſuffer all that pleaſe to come to viſit you. But what will be the advantage of that (replyed Aronces) ſince I reſolve not to marry the Daughter of the Prince of Cere? While matters are at that paſs (anſwered Galerita) it ſhall be attempted to cauſe the King to alter his ſentiments; and in caſe he perſiſt in them, it will be expedient to have recourſe to an artifice which I have contrived, wherein the aſſiſtance of the Princeſs of the Leontines is abſolutely neceſſary. If it be, Madam, (ſaid this generous Princeſs) you need only to inform me what I ought to do, and I will obey you immediately. It is only deſired of you (anſwered Galerita) that you will come and ſee Aronces as often as I ſhall viſit him. And in the next place, it will be requiſite for him to act, as if he were become amorous of you; and being you are not in a condition to diſpoſe of your ſelf, ſo long as you are at difference with the Prince of Leontium, the matter will be protracted a long time. Porſenna, who ſeeks to cauſe Aronces to marry the Daughter of the Prince of Cere, only to extinguiſh his paſſion for Clelia, will be more ſollici-

rous about it; ſo that the obſtacle ariſing only on your part, he will let the buſineſs reſt till affairs change their preſent ſtate. Though there may ſeem ſomething in this contrivance, not conſiſtent with decency (replyed the Princeſs of the Leontines ſmiling) to admit an affection apparently, of ſo goodly a perſon as the Prince Aronces, yet I take ſo great intereſt in that which concerns him, that I ſhall conſent to this innocent fraud, which may otherwiſe be ſerviceable to me, in reference to the Prince my Brother. But Madam, (ſaid Aronces) would it not be a crime to counterfeit a love to a perſon ſo lovely as you are? 'Tis true, I have ſo great an eſteem and friendſhip for you, (if I may ſo ſpeak) that you have no cauſe to reproach me, ſince I had not the honor to ſee you, till after I had no longer a heart to loſe. But, in brief, ſhould this fiction ſucceed, it would be ſufficiently dangerous for me, unleſs Clelia be informed of it, and as I conceive, it will be no very ſecure courſe to truſt this ſecret in a Letter. Take you no care for that (ſaid the Princeſs of the Leontines) for I ſhall lay that charge upon my ſelf, when time requires, to write to her in my own name, to prevent her miſ-apprehenſion, and accompany it with a Letter of yours to that fair perſon This being granted (replyed Aronces) I conceive the fiction may break off my intended nuptials with the Princeſs of Cere, but I ſee not how I ſhall be able to avoid following the King to the War, nor how I can ſerve in the Siege of Rome, without incenſing Clelia, and being hated by her Father. If Clelia be equitable (anſwered Galerita) ſhe will pity inſtead of accuſing you; and if Clelius be generous, he will commend you for defending the life of your Father, and not love you leſs. Ah! Madam (replyed Aronces) you know not what a jealous Lover Clelius is of his Countrey, how immenſely he hates Tarquin, and what great cauſe he has to deteſt him in perfection. But without diverting to matters ſo wide from the purpoſe, (ſaid Galerita) let us only debate how to effect your deliverance from the Iſland of Saules, that you may come to Cluſium, that your friends may ſee you there, and the Mariage of the Prince of Cere's Daughter be no longer inſiſted on: for really (added ſhe) the conſtant affection you have for Clelia, makes me commiſerate you; and did the King remember ſo tenderly, as I do, the love that rendered him unhappy during ſo many years, he would be as ready to excuſe it as I am, ſince you love a perſon, eminent for beauty, virtue, and deſcent; for as I have underſtood by one of our ancient Augurs, who is a knowing perſon in all things and particularly in Genealogies, Clelius is lineally deſcended from the race of the Kings of Alba, though he dares not diſcover it at Rome, by reaſon of the ancient differences between the Sabines and the Romans, and at this day when thoſe two Nations are united into one, he ſeeks no greater glory than that of being a Roman. Aronces hearing this diſcourſe of Galerita, uſed all the ſweet and perſwaſive Language he could, to mollifie her heart, by which means he obtained permiſſion of this Princeſs to write to Clelia; for ſince ſhe believed, that after his having been ſo near the accompliſhment of his happineſs, to prejudice ſo innocent an affection, would be to provoke the gods ſhe was willing to give this conſolation to a Prince, whom ſhe loved with an infinite dearneſs. Accordingly, during Galerita and the Princeſs of the Leontines went to waſk upon a Terraſs, he writ to Clelia, and delivered his Letter to the Princeſs of Leontium, who promiſed to procure it ſafely rendered to her hands. In order whereunto, as ſoon as ſhe was returned to Cluſium, ſhe gave it to the Prince Artemidorus her Brother, who ſaw her every day privately; and forthwith diſpatcht a ſlave on purpoſe to Rome, to carry that Letter to Zenocrates, to the end he might deliver it to Clelia. To which end, he had no ſooner received it, but he went to the Houſe of Sulpicia, who was not at home, having not taken Clelia with her, he delivered her the Letter of Aronces, which ſhe received with the greateſt tranſport of joy in the World. Opening it haſtily, and finding another incloſed for Octavius, ſhe layd it aſide, and began to read that which was addreſſed to her ſelf, in theſe words.

ARONCES to CLELIA.

IF I love you not more ardently than ever, and be not reſolved to love you ſo eternally, I wiſh I may never go forth of this priſon wherein I am, though it be inſupportable unto me. After this ſincere proteſtation, permit me to conjure you, not to judge of me according to appearances, for perhaps the paſſion I have for you, will oblige me to do things that may ſeem to you criminall, though they be not ſo: but I proteſt once again, that I will be eternally and abſolutely Yours, and Yours alone.

Clelia having done reading this Letter, reſented ſome cauſe of inquietude, from the requeſt made to her by Aronces; but at length the aſſurance of his perpetual affection, inſpired a joy into her more ſweet and lively, than ſhe had a long time been poſſeſſed with. Nevertheleſs, ſhe diſſembled part of it before Zenocrates; for though the love of Aronces and Clelia were no ſecret, yet the modeſty of this virtuous Virgin ever obliged her, not to manifeſt more than part of the tenderneſs ſhe had in her Soul. Which the better to conceal in this occaſion, ſhe lead Zenocrates to the Chamber of Octavius, to whom ſhe delivered the Letter directed to him. At his receiving it, he could not contain from ſighing, imagining that Aronces deſired his friendſhip again, after his knowing that he could no longer be his Rival; breaking up the ſeals, he found both much generoſity and dearneſs expreſſed in theſe terms.

ARONCES to his dear OCTAVIUS.

I Do no longer wonder I could never hate you, ſo much as my other Rivals, ſince you are Brother to the admirable Clelia. My heart, no doubt, by ſome divine inſtinct diſcerned Octavius from the Prince of Numidia, for notwithſtanding all our feuds, it was ever poſſeſſed with reſpect for your Virtue. But I beſeech you, do not content your ſelf with freeing me from a Rival; reſtore me a Friend, and vouchſafe to be my interceſſor with Clelius and Sulpitia. I ſhall perhaps have the unhappineſs to be in a party oppoſite to that of Rome, but if Honor and Love force me thereunto, pitty me, and believe I ſhall not be leſs ſincerely Yours.

Octavius having read this Letter, ſhewed it to Clelia, who could not read it through without ſighing; for ſhe well apprehended Aronces would be forced to bear Arms againſt Rome. She likewiſe knew, Honor would not permit him to come and ſide with Rome, ſince the King his Father made War againſt it: and ſhe conceived too, that Clelius was ſo zealous for his Countrey, that he would hate Aronces more for being in the enemies Army, than he did already, out of the thought that 'twas he that wounded Octavius in the Battel. But at length, ſhe was not inſenſible of much ſweetneſs, in receiving teſtimonies of Aronces's conſtancy, beſides that, the Letter he writ to Octavius, made it ſo evident, that if he was the perſon that wounded him, it was through his not knowing him, that ſhe asked her Brother, whether it would not be fit to ſhew it to Clelius? The generous Octavius approved her requeſt, and accordingly delivered it to his Father. But Clelius being at that time very ill affected towards Aronces, and extreamly favorable to Horatius, he ſaid, he perceived nothing in this Letter, that might juſtifie Aronces, but that on the contrary, he ſaw it was written by a man, who was preparing to be the Protector of Tarquin, and the enemy of Rome. Octavius anſwered, that Nature and Honor not permiting Aronces to abandon the King his Father, he ought to be pityed, for being engaged among the enemies of Rome, and not to be lookt upon as an Enemy. But this fair anſwer nothing moved him, for in the ſentiments he then had, all that was favorable to Aronces diſpleaſed him, and all that was contrary to Horatius, put him into choler. In the mean time Valerius having diſpatcht ſo important an affair, and policy requiring the improvement of this advantage as much as poſſible, to the end to retain the people in a favorable diſpoſition for the continuation of the War, all the principal perſons affected to teſtifie their joy of it. Nevertheleſs, the houſe of Racilia was always melancholly; and Hermilia and Collatina were almoſt continually alone lamenting their misfortunes. At the ſame time they of Veii having demanded fifteen days to conſult with all their Augurs, whether they ſhould deliver that Figure which was to be placed upon the top of the Temple of Jupiter, Telanus remained free at Rome, upon the word of Clelius, to whom he had engaged his own. But indeed he was not very much unpleaſed with it; for he was ſo much taken with Plotina, and found ſo many worthy perſons, and amiable Ladies at Rome, that he could willingly have deſired to continue there, all his life. Nor was it ſtrange he ſhould delight in a place to which both his own inclination retained him, and where no care was neglected to divert him. For Horatius, out of an honorable gratitude for the civil uſage he had received from Mamilius, was very ſollicitous in his favor, and Clelius looking upon him as a Kinſman of his antient friend, commanded Sulpicia and Clelia to contribute their utmoſt to his contentment. For Octavius being then out of danger, his mind was ſufficiently ſerene and compoſed. And indeed Telanus himſelf was a perſon of ſo lovely and deſirable a converſe, that every one was forward to expreſs their endeavors in favor of his content. Whence Horatius, Herminius, Themiſtus, Meleagenes, Zenocrates, Spurius, Æmilius, Merigenes, and Amilcar too, how much ſoever his Rival, did all they could to cauſe him to paſs agreeably the time of his reſidence at Rome. Clelia, having then leſs affliction upon her mind, was alſo more Miſtreſs of her ſelf, and more eaſily concurred with the deſires of her father, and the endeavors of the reſt; Valeria, Ceſonia, Plotina, Flavia and Salonina, being of themſelves ſufficiently diſpoſed to divert him, the converſation was always extreamly pleaſant, in every place whatſoever. And beſides it being the cuſtom to celebrate three feſtival days upon the Dedication of a Temple, mirth, and rejoycing became at that time univerſal. Sulpicia in complyance with the cuſtom, and obedience to Clelius had an intention to go and ſup in one of the Gardens of Numa, which was at the foot of that little Hill beſet with Laurels, whither he was wont to reſort in ſecret to receive the inſpirations and documents of the Nymph Ægeria. To which the principal Ladies of Rome being invited, beſides Valeria, Ceſonia, Plotina, Flavia, and Salonina, they all went thither in Chariots. And as for the men of quality, they repaired thither by themſelves on horſeback. But as the Ladies arrived at this place, they beheld a broken Chariot before this Gate of the Garden into which they were to enter, and obſerved the perſons that were taking care for the reparation of it, were not Romans. Upon which, they enquired of the Gardener who ſtood at the Gate, whoſe Chariot that was, who anſwered that it belonged to ſome Ladies of Sicily, that were newly entered into the Garden, and who after their landing at Oſtia, had taken a Chariot to come to Rome, after which Sulpicia entered, being accompanyed by all the other Ladies, and Horatius, Amilcar, and Zenocrates, being arrived there before Æmilius, Spurius, Themiſtus, and Merigenes, they gave the hand to theſe Ladies, and conducted them into the Garden. Zenocrates, who waited upon Clelia, becauſe Horatius found himſelf obliged to give the hand to Sulpicia, had ſcarce walked twenty paces, but he beheld two fair perſons ſiting by the ſide of a

Fountain

Fountain upon seats of Turf, who without taking notice of the company, were very intent in their discourse together, whilst two young Virgins that belong'd to them, were gathering Flowers in the Garden: but as soon as he beheld them, he perceiv'd they were Clidamira and Bereliſa, Miſtreſſes to Artemidorus; which giving him a pleaſing aſtoniſhment, he could not contain from teſtifying his ſurpriſe and his joy: O gods (cry'd he) is it poſſible I ſhould find the two perſons together, whom of all the world I moſt affect, and who love one another leaſt! I beſeech you, Madam, (ſaid he to Clelia) oblige the generous Sulpicia to make a civility to them, ſince the perſons you behold, are of the higheſt quality of Agrigentum and Leontium, as you will acknowledge when I ſhall have told you, their names are Clidamira and Bereliſa; for I preſume Valeria has recounted to you the relation I ſometimes made to her of the adventures of Artemidorus.

Clelia hearing Zenocrates ſpeak in this manner, advertis'd Sulpitia of the quality of theſe Ladies, who at length turning their heads towards this fair and great company, let fall their veils, and roſe up with intention to go into a Walk by themſelves, to avoid the company which they beheld. But Zenocrates having demanded Clelia's permiſſion to leave her, went towards the two Ladies whom he no ſooner ſaluted, but they remembred they had ſeen him at Leontium and Agrigentum: Whereupon they lifted up their veils, and ſigh'd as they beheld him; for knowing he underſtood all their adventures, they could not repreſs this ſad emotion. Nevertheleſs they were well pleas'd in having met thus accidentally with him; though at the ſame time reflecting that Artemidorus might poſſibly be in the ſame Garden too, their hearts were ſenſibly moved with the apprehenſion: But Zenocrates ſoon undeceiv'd them; for after the firſt civility, he told them the Prince Artemidorus in the place he was in, little thought of the adventure now befallen him. After which, informing them who the Ladies were they beheld there, he conducted them to receive the civilities of Sulpitia, who undrſtanding their quality and merit, offered them the utmoſt of her abilities to ſerve them, and then inviting them to paſs the reſt of the day in the Garden, aſſured them ſhe would carry them back in her own Chariot, whilſt theirs was rectifying at leaſure; and moreover, ſhe generouſly offered them the entertainment of her houſe. I aſſure you (ſaid Telanus agreeably) ſtrangers are admirably well received at the houſe of Sulpitia, although they be enemies; ſo that there is reaſon to believe ſuch fair ſtrangers as you can find no other than noble reception. To ſpeak for my ſelf (anſwer'd Bereliſa) I ſo little merit the title of Fair, that I cannot think my ſelf concern'd in your obliging language; And as for my particular (added Clidamira pleaſantly) though I ſhould have been ſometimes accounted fair in Sicily, I ſhould eſteem my ſelf at preſent very deform'd in a place where I behold more fair perſons, than I have other-where ever ſeen. I conceive (ſaid Valeria, addreſſing to Clelia) it concerns you to anſwer, for you have more intereſt than all the reſt in the commendations of Clidamira. I am ſo little perſwaded of the truth of what you ſay (anſwer'd Clelia) that I was preparing to hear you, and thought not at all of anſwering. 'Tis beyond doubt (added Plotina) that you have not the power to oppoſe your ſelf againſt a truth that cannot be conteſted by any that own the faculty of ſight. But though my ſelf am not (added ſhe ſmiling) one of the number of thoſe grand Beauties that excite admiration, yet I am not timerous to claim ſome ſhare in Clidamira's praiſes; for I ſhould be very ſorry not to pleaſe a perſon, who pleaſes me infinitely already. Clidamira (ſaid Bereliſa, addreſſing to Zenocrates) is wont to pleaſe as ſoon as ſhe is firſt ſeen: but as for me, who make not ſo ſudden Conqueſts, nevertheleſs I have ſome hope, that if I continue at Rome, my commendations will be accounted ſomething, though at preſent, only thoſe of my fair Siſter, are taken notice of. You ſpeak in ſo ſubtle a ſtrain (anſwer'd Plotina) that I well perceive the more knowledge any perſons have of you, the more deſirous they will be to know you, and that you well underſtand how to preſerve what you have acquired, You know her ſo well already (reply'd Clidamira, with a cunning ſmile) that I believe you have formerly ſeen her; for ſhe not only preſerves what is given her, or ſhe acquires; but ſhe takes away from others what they have acquir'd, without ever making them reſtitution. When any perſon finds a thing another has loſt by his own fault (anſwer'd Bereliſa) and which ought to be poſſeſs'd by ſome other, it is as good to take and keep it, as to leave it, for thoſe, who perhaps will have no care of it; and therefore (added Bereliſa, beholding all the fair perſons that environ'd her) if it happen we make ſome ſtay at Rome, you muſt prepare your ſelves to love me more at the end, than at the beginning. At preſent, for that it is not meet to trouble your divertiſement, and be at a Feaſt, whereunto chance cauſes our invitation; if my Siſter conſents, we will accept the Chariot offer'd us, and leave you to that liberty, which is moſt neceſſary to render your Walk agreeable; ſince oftentimes one ſtrange or troubleſome perſon prejudices the pleaſure of many. As for being troubleſome (anſwer'd Sulpitia) you know you are not ſuch. And for ſtrangers (added Plotina) you are leſs ſo at Rome than you imagine, it not being poſſible to have convers'd ſo much there with the Prince Artemidorus and Zenocrates, and not to know you perfectly. Clelia accompanying the requeſts of Sulpitia with her own, and all the other Ladies teſtifying the ſame deſires, Clidamira and Bereliſa were perſwaded to ſtay with them: Though they made ſome further ſcruple by reaſon of the careleſneſs of their attire, unſutable for an appointed feaſt; but that being ſufficiently becoming, their excuſe was ineffectual, and they were conſtrain'd to make an addition to this fair company. Wherefore giving order to their attendants, to go and adverti ſe a friend of Spurius, at whoſe houſe they intended to lodge, that they would be there at night, they mingled themſelves in the converſation of all the Ladies, with as much liberty as if they had been of their moſt antient familiars. Clidamira and Bereliſa handſomly extoll'd the beauty of Clelia; for no queſtion there is an art to commend with a good grace of greater difficulty than is believ'd. But the modeſt Clelia averted the praiſes given her after ſo gentle and pleaſing a manner; that, without either refuſing or accepting the ſame; ſhe caus'd them to change their discourse. For beholding a man of a comely personage, and a noble and sprightly air enter into the Garden, I wish (said she) he that I see there were some stranger as agreeable as you. He is without doubt much more (answer'd Clidamira, who knew him) and I think Berelisa will not but acknowledge it. You know him then? (reply'd Clelia). We know him (answer'd Berelisa) only by occasion of passing from Sicily to Ostia in the same ship, but I assure you, there is not a more agreeable person than Anacreon, How? (said Herminius) is he that comes there, Anacreon, whose works charm'd me in Greece? and whose reputation is so famous? who has so gallant a fancy, delicate wit, and natural expressions? who generally loves all pleasures, and in particular, is no great hater of genial entertainments? 'Tis that very person (answer'd she) As for me (said Amilcar) who am charm'd with his writings as well as Herminius, I am ravished to see him. Berelisa hearing what was spoken of Anacreon, went to meet him, and addressing to him, Come, said she, come to a place where you have more friends than you believe, and where perhaps you may have occasion to break the oath you have made to love no beauty at Rome; for you will see some sufficiently charming in this Garden, it may be, to change your resolution. Since I have had only admiration, and esteem for you and Clidamira, ever since I had the honor to know you answer'd he, speaking the Roman language tolerably well) I conceive no fair ones in the world ought to be offended, when they excite not in my breast the tender passion of Love, Perhaps (said Plotina pleasantly) we should be culpable in being offended at it; but if you are such a person as description represents you, perhaps we shall have reason to be discontented, since there would be no want of pleasure, in detaining so worthy a person as you at Rome. I assure you, answer'd he, that good company may detain me any where, and being that where I am present, has a very agreeable appearance, it shall only depend on them, if I stay not here as long as they please. After this, all these Ladies made a thousand civilities to Anacreon, and effectually oblig'd him to sup in that Garden with all the company, To speak my thoughts, (said he, when the Ladies were beginning to walk) I apprehend a happy presage of my aboad at Rome, since at my first arrival, I find my self at a noble entertainment, I, who am the protector of joy, and who in defiance of all the Sages, who glory only in solitude and simplicity, am of opinion, that the society, and jovial Collations of honest persons are necessary to the felicity of life. As for society (answer'd Clelia) I believe, who ever is owner of a Reason, not perfectly Savage, consents with you; but as for great Festivals, I conceive 'tis possible to be absent from them during all our lives, without loss of any great pleasure; and consequently, that they may be dispens'd with for ever. When I speak as I do (answer'd Anacreon) I do not mean those Feastings that are made at nuptial Solemnities, where there are assembled a multitude of persons, for the most part strangers to one another, who know not what to speak of; where there are more impertinents than intelligent, where there is much talk but little discourse, where the conversation is rather a confus'd noise than a real society, where ceremony is supream regent, where molestation and tediousness always meet, where multitude excites longing desires of, and gives extraordinary endearments to solitude, and where oftentimes people dye for hunger in the midst of abundance, because freedom, property, order, and decency, are excluded from such entertainments. There arises at such times a disgust in us, that causes us to fancy nothing good; we are oftentimes plac'd directly against persons whom we do not affect, others on each hand who disturb us, and on what ever side we turn, there is nothing to be found but disorder, set off with tedious ceremony, and consequently occasioning much dissatisfaction. The description Anacreon has made of a troublesom feast, is perfectly handsom, (said Amilcar) and if he will represent a pleasant one, I believe it will be very acceptable to the company. As for my part (said that lover of Plotina, who was of the sect of Pythagoras) I never understood that the joy of virtuous people could depend on high fare, or that the delicacy of taste was necessary to the felicity of a rational man. On the contrary, I believe the owners of this inclination, are for the most part, enemies of all Becomingness and Virtue, and that there are few vices to which they are strangers. When Anacreon spok of an agreeable Feast (answer'd Amilcar) he does not mean one of those exorbitant Feasts, which admit not the presence of virtuous Ladies, from whence decencie is banisht, where licentiousness takes the place of liberty, where 'tis a glory to lose reason, where disorder causes the greatest pleasure that is found there, where the discourse is oftentimes without coherence, and without wit, where they that speak are not hearken'd too, where they who attend, understand nothing of what is spoken to them, where one while there is good singing, and another while prodigious roaring; where Virtue and good manners are made a mockery of, and where insolence and rudeness pass for agreeable deportment and good company: for, to speak determinately, I account men that spend all their whole lives in Feasts of this nature, much inferior to beasts. No doubt, you have reason (reply'd Anacreon) for these sorts of jollities have more correspondence with the extravagances of Bacchanals, than with true joy. But that which to me is most agreeable, is, to find five or six friends together, free from business and melancholly, and who looking upon good fare only as a tye that draws them together, and as that which affords liberty and contributes to joy, really find all the pleasure therein they are able to wish for. There the conversation is free, chearful, and pleasant; we speak what we please and what we think, we impart as much delectation as we receive; the fancy is rais'd, and the wit displaies it self more than at other times, without constraint or ostentation; we remember our absent friends, we talk of our loves, we premeditate new pleasures, by making an appointment for another entertainment; and intermixing the Feast with agreeable Sonnets, Musick, now and than a little walk, and a little discourse, it may be concluded, both the body and mind are highly refresh'd and satisfi'd, and there remains nothing to be desir'd, but the renovation of the same pleasure. But to cause this pleasure to be perfect, it is requisite the familiarity of the guests afford them more joy in being together, than the nearness ness and rare skill of the Officers of him that treats his friends, can give them. Not that I blame those who have a delicate palate; for 'tis an advantage of Nature, as well as to have a quick sight: but the principal part of pleasure ought not to be plac'd in it. Nor ought an agreeable entertainment to resemble a great Feast; there ought to be order, choice, neatness, property, and handsome abundance, nothing superfluous in it, with joy and freedom. Your discourse extreamly pleases me (answer'd Plotina) but that there is one thing I am unsatisfi'd with, which is, that you make no mention of Ladies in your Festivals, after the Greek mode, as if there were none present at them. 'Tis true, added she, before the War, the Ladies at Rome did not much frequent them; but we draw this advantage at least from our unhappiness, to have a little more liberty than we formerly enjoy'd. As Plotina was speaking thus, Clelius was seen to enter, and with him Artemidorus, who was newly arriv'd, and having first acquainted the Consul Horatius, with the occasion of his coming, suffer'd himself to be conducted by Clelius to this Garden, without knowing any thing of the arrival of Clidamira and Bereliſa. Which caus'd him to be strangely surpris'd, when he beheld those two fair persons amongst all those Roman Ladies. Bereliſa and Clidamira were as much surpris'd when they perceiv'd him, and could not contain from blushing. They lookt one upon another, as if to read what each thought, in their eyes; and they beheld Artemidorus likewise, to discover which of them he lookt upon most favourably. But he avoided the eyes of Clidamira, as if he had fear'd to meet them, and endeavour'd to encounter with those of Bereliſa. Clelia, on the other side, who knew he could give her some intelligence of her dear Aronces, approacht to him, with as much ardency as his Mistresses, who both made a complement to him, in which there appear'd some reservedness, because indeed they durst not speak according to their real sentiments. But when they observ'd Artemidorus in a place where there was so many fair persons present, they were possess'd with very different thoughts; Bereliſa fearing lest he should fall in love with some one of them, and Clidamira almost wishing it, only for the pleasure to see him no longer Bereliſa's Lover: but being in a great company, they constrain'd themselves, and check'd their sentiments. As for Artemidorus, the first agitation of his heart being past'd, he sought to approach Bereliſa; but this amiable Virgin having perceiv'd the company knew her adventures, after telling him in two words, she should gladly entertain him, when she could do it without being observ'd by so many eyes, entreated him not to oblige her at that time to a particular conversation. Now this day being design'd for the jollity of all the company in general, Clelius; to whom these fair strangers and Anaxus were presented, and by him civilly receiv'd, signifi'd that according to the order of great Feasts made at Rome, a Thaliarch, or King of the Feast, ought to be nominated, who might be a fit person, to choose the divertisements for the company. Amilcar propounded Anacreon, as being the best qualify'd to dispence joy at such an entertainment; but he desir'd to be excus'd, pretending his ignorance of the customs of Rome. But Clelius telling him Herminius should teach him them, and likewise cause his Orders to be executed, he took upon him the Office; and the first thing he commanded, was, that every one should walk and discourse with whomsoever he pleas'd, during the time, Herminius and Amilcar instructed him in what was requisite for him to know. Which the company obeying, divided themselves into several little ones. Sulpicia seated her self in a verdant Arbor, with two or three women of quality, which arriv'd at that time: Clelius betook himself to discourse, concerning the publick affairs with one of his friends: Artemidorus walk'd between Bereliſa and Cesonia: Horatius consorted himself with Clelia, who, to hinder him from speaking of his passion to her, retain'd Plotina, with whom were Sicinius, Telemus, and Acrisius; Zenocrates entertained Clidamira: and Valeria was involuntarily oblig'd to endure the company of Æmilius and Spurius, though she soon after desir'd Flavia to continue with her. This fair company being thus divided, several little knots of them were seen in almost all places of the garden: but Zenocrates being desirous Clidamira should not have leasure to observe Artemidorus, and having an extream longing to know what occasion'd her to be with Bereliſa, and for what reasons they were come into Italy, he ask'd her the question. And for that he had formerly been sometimes her Lover, and sometimes her Confident, she told him, the Father of Bereliſa being married again, out of love to a person, who was unwilling this charming Lady should dwell with her, her Father absolutely commanded her to enter into the order of Vail'd Virgins, where the Princess Philonice was, and to enter into it, never to come forth again; or else to go and dwell with her at Leontium, and that whatever jealousie Bereliſa was possest with, she lik'd rather to dwell with her, than for ever renounce the pretensions she had for Artemidorus. I see well (answer'd Zenocrates) Bereliſa has had cause rather to choose to live with you, than to enter into the Order of Vail'd Virgins, for her life time: but I do not so well understand, why you consented to have with you a Sister-in-law, whom you do not love. Ah! Zenocrates (reply'd Clidamira) I perceive you no better understand Love, than you did the time I saw you last; for if you were more knowing in true Love, you would apprehend, that notwithstanding my jealousie, it was a sufficient satisfaction to me to have my Rival in my power. When she was at Agrigentum, I always believ'd Artemidorus was there disguis'd, or writ to her every day, and I was then far more tormented, than since her being at Leontium, where no doubt, I have so much credit, that Artemidorus and the Princess his Sister, shall never return thither, unless I negotiate their accommodement with the Prince. But wherefore (said Zenocrates) do you not make that negotiation, and so oblige Artemidorus to forget your pretended inconstancy? Ah! Zenocrates (answer'd she) if he could forget Bereliſa, he would soon forget my pretended inconstancy. But to make an end of telling you what you desire to know, you must understand, my Sister-in-Law and I have had a thousand contests, for Artemidorus since we were together; for I have told her a hundred times, I would never procure that Prince's revocation, unless she would promise me to think no more of him, and she has told me, a thousand and a thousand times, that she knew with infallible certainty, that Prince would never love me, though he should desist from loving her, and so I should but render him unhappy, without being able to draw any advantage from the infelicity that I caus'd to him. Upon which, being desirous to be inform'd of the future, by all the ways that people endeavour to know it, and a friend of mine assuring me the Praenestine Lots give an absolute decision in all cases wherein they are consulted, we took a resolution to come into Italy for that purpose; for as for my part, I confess to you, being I excited the first passion in Artemidorus, I cannot think but that he will return again to me. Berelisa on the other side, believes Inconstancy can never be forgotten, nor a dead Love reviv'd; For which reasons we are desirous to be satisfi'd, whether of us two is mistaken, and to order our lives accordingly after the determination. In the mean time, I fear this casual meeting of Artemidorus, will decide the matter sooner: Nevertheless, since he flyes me (added she) 'tis a sign he fears me still, and I must not despair but the Lots of Praenestine may prove favourable to me. Whilst Clidamira was speaking this, and all the rest of the company entertaining themselves according to their own inclination, Herminius instructed Anacreon in the customs of Rome, to the end he might better acquit himself of the charge that Clelius had given him. But amongst the rest, he told him, that since the fair and potent City of Alba had been united with Rome, there was introduc'd a kind of a game of chance, of sufficient pleasure; for it having been necessary at that time, to lodge all the remaining Inhabitants of Alba, in a quarter of Rome, to take away all contest about places assigned them for their particular habitations, the business was referr'd to lot by little tickets, in some of which were written the names of the Inhabitants of Alba, and in others the houses design'd for them. And ever since (said Amilcar) it has been accounted a piece of delight to make use of chance in pleasant affairs; so that when the King of a feast is liberal, he bestows a great number of magnificent gifts, which are distributed according to chance, by putting all the names of the persons present into tickets, and expressing all the things intended to be given in others. But to discover the good luck and the bad, there are fewer Presents put in, than there are Persons at the Feast, that so there may be some unfortunate, to be either pitied, or derided in the way of raillery. This custom seems to me extream handsome (answer'd Anacreon) but being I am a stranger, and have nothing to give, some other invention must be devis'd to employ chance in a divertising manner. Accordingly Herminius and Amilcar being agreed with him concerning all things, Herminius took upon him the execution of them; and Anacreon and Amilcar re united with the company. But by the way they beheld together in a walk, the person who was wont to speak too much, and he who us'd to speak too little, who were constrain'd to be a part by themselves, by reason Plotina had rid her self of them, and every one avoided him that was over talkative, and no body car'd for him that was little better than a mute. Amilcar taking notice of them, told Anacreon the different humor of those two men, which were well match'd together, since the first was always speaking, and the other scarce ever spake at all. In the mean time, Clelius being sent for away by the Consul Horatius, the company became more free; for Sulpitia was one of those Ladies whose Virtue is not severe, and who never interrupt the divertisements of young persons, provided they exceed not decency; and besides, having liv'd so long a time in Africa, she was thereby become something less rigid. Now all these little Companies being again assembled in a large round place, beset about with seats, they all sate down, and made a very gallant appearance; for the Ladies having walk'd for some time, the colour of their complexions appear'd more fresh and vivid, when they came to lift up their veils; but though all the Ladies present were very fair, yet the beauty of Clelia much transcended that of all the rest, though she were not at that time possess'd with all the joy necessary to set off, and enliven a great Beauty. The men were sometimes sitting, sometimes standing, and sometimes upon their knees before the Ladies, according as they pleas'd: but being Clidamira and Berelisa were strangers, Clelia and Valeria were very careful to entertain them, as likewise to discourse with Anacreon; for though the language he us'd was something broken, because he learnt the Roman tongue in Sicily, yet he spoke so agreeably, that all the world took pleasure in hearing him; for he discours'd of a hundred different things, and always admirably well. I beseech you (said Clelia to Berelisa) be pleas'd to tell me, what Countrey Anacreon is of. He is of one of those Islands which are generally called the Cyclades (answer'd she) and was born in Teia, which was not far from Delos, but has spent a great part of his life at Samos, in the Court of Polycrates, by whom he was very much belov'd. Yet Love subverted his favour with him after a while. Was it because he was Rival to the Prince? (said Valeria) There's probability of it (answer'd Berelisa) but I know not exactly; for though Anacreon has testifi'd much kindness to Clidamira and me, yet we observ'd he car'd not to make us privy to his Love; and all I know concerning it, is, that he told us Polycrates one day causing several eminent Ladies of his Court to dance before him, attir'd like gods and goddesses, and Nymphs, and Muses, there was one person that represented Apollo, who so affected his heart, that he commended only her; by reason of which Polycrates afterwards conceiv'd so horrid a jealousie, that transported with indignation and fury against this fair person, whom he suspected to correspond with his passion, he caus'd her hair to be cut off, to the end she might appear less fair in the eyes of Anacreon; who became so afflicted at it, that to eternise the memory of that lovely hair, he made the handsomest Verses in the World, upon that subject. I have heard this adventure related after another way, (said Amilcar, who was present) but since you know it from Anacreon, you ought to be believ'd, For my part (interrupted Anacreon not knowing what Amilcar was speaking of) I conceive it good to doubt of every thing: Nevertheless (said Clelia) your aspect does not speak you of a distrustful mind: You have reason (answer'd he) but to shew you that I easily doubt of what is told me, I even doubt, whether what I spoke last be rational or not, and I cannot presently name above one thing that I do not doubt of, which is, that you are the faires person that ever ever I beheld: Anacreon ſpeaks this with ſuch an air (ſaid Clidamira) that I believe he will ſhortly love you as much as he loves Roſes, though he loves them ſufficiently, to give them immortality by his writings. And indeed (added Bereliſa) he has compos'd Verſes extreamly pleaſant; only upon the prerogatives and excellencies of Roſes. No queſtion (ſaid Anacreon) I preſer Roſes above all other Flowers; but 'tis not the Spring alone, that cauſes me to have ſuch a peculiar affection for them, but ſome other I cannot tell what thing (added he ſmiling) which has great reſemblance with the Spring. Namely (ſaid Amilcar) the love you have had, or have for ſome fair and young perſon, who lov'd Roſes, has caus'd you to affect them, more than otherwiſe you would have done. I confeſs it (anſwer'd Anacreon) and I acknowledge alſo, that her memory is ſtill ſo dear to me, that I can never ſee Roſes, nor Roſe-buſhes, without reſenting ſome kind of ſweet, though with all troubleſome, emotion in my heart. Yet you have a very joyful aſpect (ſaid Herminius) for one, ſubject to great paſſions; at leaſt, we are not wont to ſuſpect cheerful perſons at Rome, to be capable of any great invaſion by them. I love Joy, no doubt, extreamly (reply'd Anacreon) and if love were without pleaſure, I ſhould never be amorous. But as there are ſome melancholly perſons by conſtitution, who notwithſtanding are not uncapable of reſenting joy, ſo there are ſome naturally addicted to mirth, yet ſufficiently ſenſible of ſorrow. Thus, though I am ſufficiently jovial, and ſeek pleaſure in all places, oftentimes alſo carrying it whither I go, yet I do not ceaſe to be diſcontented, perplex'd and jealous, when I am poſſeſs'd with love; for there ought to be a difference made between melancholly and ſorrow, as likewiſe between cheerfulneſs and joy. Yet methinks (ſaid Plotina) there is a great reſemblance between chearfulneſs and joy, and with all the wit you have, you can never manifeſt to me any conſiderable difference between them. To perceive it d ſtinctly (anſwer'd Anacreon), you muſt know there is no perſon in the world, but may be capable of ſome kind of joy, and there are only a certain number of perſons in the world capable of chearfulneſs. For this latter is a quality peculiar to thoſe of a jovial conſtitution: but as for Joy, when ever it pleaſes Fortune, it may be found in the hearts of the moſt melancholick perſons. Yea, 'tis ſometimes more ſenſible there, than in thoſe of the moſt mirthful inclinations, (added Herminius) not only, becauſe contraries are advanc'd by proximity, but becauſe perſons of this temper having uſually more violent deſires, have alſo a greater joy when they can ſatisfie them, than they have, whoſe deſires are more moderate. We ſee it happens that joy ſometimes cauſes ſighing, when it is extreme, whereas laughter is the perpetual effect of cheerfulneſs. Joy can never ariſe of it ſelf alone, it muſt always have ſome extraneous cauſe. 'Tis not ſo with chearfulneſs, which ariſes of it ſelf, and there needs nothing but health to ſuch as are of a jolly and airy humour. Joy is an infallible conſequent of all paſſions when they are ſatisfi'd; cheerfulneſs ſubſiſts without aid, though it may be augmented by cauſes from without. Indeed we may obſerve at this preſent I am ſpeaking, that the preſence of theſe fair ſtrangers and Anacreon, redoubles the cheerfulneſs of the amiable Plotina, and Amilcar, as may at leaſt be gather'd from their eyes. But why do you not alſo add Zenocrates? (ſaid Clelia;) 'Tis certainly (anſwer'd Plotina, without giving Amilcar leaſure to ſpeak) becauſe Zenocrates is ſometimes ſad and ſometimes jovial: and giving himſelf frequently to muſing as he does, it cannot be eaſily determin'd, whether he be ſerious, though it may be aſſured that he is always agreeable. But in brief, if he take not ſome courſe to correct thoſe little diſtractions, his dear Friends reproach him with, I foreſee there will one day happen a War between the Pleaſant and the Melancholiſts; for being a perſon of Merit, one ſide will claim him for theirs, and the other challenge them wholly to themſelves. Yet I am not ſo much wander'd in my thoughts (anſwer'd Zenocrates, ſmiling) but that I perceive you employ a very ingenious raillery againſt me; and if I were as vindicative a perſon, as you are a derider, I would reproach your pleaſantneſs to you with as much mockery, as you do my Muſings to me. After which Sulpitia, who was entertaining her ſelf with ſeveral Ladies of her friends, led the Company to the place where the Feaſt was prepar'd, where there wanted nothing that could render it agreeable. The place was well furniſh'd with lights, the Tables magnificent and very decently ſerv'd, and the Men were the Ladies Attendents at this entertainment; there was an excellent conſent of Muſique, and after the repaſt there came ſome women to dance, and divert the Ladies, whilſt the Men went to their Collation in another place. But when this was done, the King of the Feaſt, being counſelled by Herminius and Amilcar, who better underſtood the Roman cuſtoms than he, propounded the abovemention'd Game of Chance to the company. Anacreon excus'd himſelf as a ſtranger, and for that he was not wealthy enough to render this paſtime as magnificent, as he underſtood it had ſometimes been in the reign of Ancus Martius, when an illuſtrious Roman, whoſe Family was deſcended from the antient King of Sicily, had the liberality to give three hundred magnificent preſents, and to chooſe three hundred perſons, to whom Fortune alone had given all the excellent things he parted with for his humor, without reſerving to himſelf any other right in them, than to manifeſt to all that were choſe, that he judg'd them worthy to poſſeſs the moſt valuable preſents, ſince he empower'd them to obtain the ſame by hazard. This magnificence (continu'd Anacreon) was, no doubt, worthy of a man who had all the qualities neceſſary to govern States glorioufly, and aggrandize them; but as for me, (added he) I find my ſelf enforc'd to ſupply my defects, by ſome ſhift of wit, and to render the game as diverting otherwiſe as I am able. To begin therefore (ſaid he) according to the power my dignity gives me, I require that all the hearts of the Men and the Ladies, be put into tickets, and that every one without diſtinction draw a ticket, to ſee if Fortune, who is blind as well as Love, will haply match the ſucceſs. It will be requiſite then, (ſaid Horatius) that the hearts of the Men be put apart by themſelves, and thoſe of the Ladies in another place. By no means (anſwer'd Anacreon) but obſerve how I intend the matter. If a Lady happen to have the heart of a Man, it signifies that she is lov'd by him; if a man have the heart of a Lady, it shall be free for him to hope, that he shall one day be not ill-treated by her: If the heart of a man falls to the lot of another man 'tis a sign he is more inclinable to friendship than to Love; and if it he returns to himself, it denotes that he loves himself more than all the rest of the World, and loves nothing else but for his own sake. For as for my self (added Anacreon slily, who understood the cause of Clidamira and Berelisa's voyage) I shall give as much credit to this Game, as to the Lots of Praneste. Though you are much in favor with a certain god, that empow'rs to divine of the most occult matters (answer's Clidamira smiling and blushing) yet I shall not be over-credulous to your pastime of Chance. But though it were only to try what hazard may do, I consent my Heart be put to the venture. Which all the Ladies and the Men likewise, doing, every one was constrain'd to write his own ticket. All the company therefore writ their names with what they pleas'd under them, sutable to the occasion. So that, excepting Sulpitia and two other Ladies her Friends, who were discourting together in a Closet near the Chamber, wherein the company then was, there was none but writ their names. Clelia, Plotina, Valeria, Clidamira, Berelisa, Flavia, Cesonia, Salonina, and some other Ladies writ their tickets; so also did Horatius, Artemidorus, Telanus, Herminius, Amilcar, Sicinius, Acrisius, Damon, Spurius, Anacreon, and some others; after which, all the tickets were put into an Urn, and Anacreon going round the company in order, began at Clelia, who trembled as she drew the ticket it behov'd her to take, because she fear'd lest the heart of Horatius should fall to her Lot. For though it was but a trifling pastime, yet she perceiv'd an unwillingness in her self to give him that false joy. Horatius on the contrary, wish'd the heart of Clelia might come to his hands after this manner; and though this sport was meerly frivolous without consequence, yet every person that had any conceal'd interest, could not contain from resenting some kind of light inquietude, the vehemence of affection being apprehensive of what ever events. But amongst the rest, Clidamira and Berelisa had a curiosity to see, to whose lot the heart of Artemidorus would happen. But to proceed, Clelia having drawn the first ticket, unhappily lighted upon the name of Horatius, with these words underneath;

I am ignorant what Fortune will do with my heart, but I well know how Love has dispos'd of it.

Clelia blush'd after she had open'd this Ticket, and refus'd to shew it; but the order of the pastime requiring it to be seen by all the company, Horatius had the joy to see Fortune had well guided his heart. At which, Artemidorus was not able to put off all fear, lest his should not be so happy as that of Horatius. But in the next place, Anacreon having oblig'd Leucrates to take a ticket, he found that his own heart return'd to himself, which occasion'd the company sufficiently to laugh, because he was accus'd by all the fair ones, to do no more than lend his heart, and suddenly withdrew it again, out of the hands of those whom he suffer'd to take it. They desir'd to see what he had written under his name, but it could not be, for being something mov'd at the raillery made against him, he tore his ticket into pieces; and so it behov'd Anacreon to proceed: Next therefore he presented the Urn to Plotina, who was some time in suspence without resolving, what ticket to choose, during which, Amilcar, Telanus, Acrisius, and Sicinius, were anxious in conjecturing whom she wish'd to light upon; for you would have thought she intended to choose the heart that should happen to her lot, though she was not able to distinguish amongst them: Whereupon Acrisius who lov'd to speak much, was not contented to be silent in this occasion, but began to request her with as much importunateness, as could be employ'd by an ardent desire, to leave the event to the hazard of the Game, and not to pick out whom to choose. And Plotina, only to silence him, hastned to draw a ticket, wherein she found the name of Sicinius, who having not follow'd his own humor of speaking little in writing, as well as in conversation, had written these words underneath his name;

'Tis only in the fair Plotina*'s power to dispose of my heart, and not in Fortune's.*

Plotina had no sooner open'd this Ticket, but Amilcar, Telanus, and Acrisius, were enrag'd against Chance, for having favour'd Sicinius rather than themselves; and Acrisius made his complaint with such abundance of words, that the continuation of the pastime was almost forgotten. As for Sicinius, there did not want much but that his joy was dumb, for he expreſt it only in three or four words. Then Valeria drew her ticket. If the Lot had been equitable, without doubt she had drawn the heart of Herminius, or that of Æmilius; but it hapned to be that of the revengeful Spurius, who had writ these words in his Ticket;

I desie Fortune to take me from her, to whom I have given my self, since hatred and jealousie have not been able to do it.

Valeria blush'd with extream vexation, for having hapned upon this ticket; which serv'd something to comfort Herminius and Valerius for their unhappiness: for though 'tis possible for one to blush obligingly, yet the eyes of a Lover are well able to discern a ruddiness proceeding from choler, from one that is favourable; whence Spurius also knew as well as Herminius and Æmilius, what interpretation to make of the blushing of Valeria. In the mean time Anacreon having caus'd Amilcar to draw a ticket, he made a hundred faces before he opened it. He beheld all the beauties one after another, though he stopt at Plotina, and told her, he passionately wish'd the ticket fall'n to him, were that which she had written. But at length having open'd it, he found chance had given him the heart of Anacreon, who had writ these words in his ticket;

I know

I know not to whom Lott will give me; but I know well, that joy is the true Miſtreſs of my heart.

Ha! my dear Anacreon (cry'd Amilcar with a tranſport he was unable to ſuppreſs) we are Rivals; but the Miſtreſs we ſerve is ſo gentle, that ſhe yields to whoſoever takes her, ſo that we ſhall never be jealous. I am very glad of the declaration you have now made (ſaid Plotina ſmiling) for being your Miſtreſs is one of my friends too, I may——Alas! I beſeech you (interrupted Amilcar) do not triumph over me for what I have ſpoken; for I ſwear I am no lover of joy, but becauſe I ſee it in your eyes, I find it in all your diſcourſes, and in loving and ſerving you, and for that I know it always reſides in your heart; and did I find it any other where, perhaps I ſhould not love it at all. As for my part (ſaid Anacreon) who ſpake ſincerely, I acknowledge I am a Lover of it, where ever I find it. After which, he oblig'd Artemidorus to take a ticket, who drew that wherein Clidamira had writ theſe words;

Did I diſpoſe of my heart, it ſhould never be but my own.

I aſſure you Madam, (ſaid Artemidorus to Clidamira with a low voice) it has always been yours more than mine, and ſhall ſtill be ſo, more than any others in the world. I wiſh to the gods it were ſo, (anſwer'd Clidamira) and I would ſtop my journey to Preneſte. Mean while Bereliſa, who heard not what theſe two perſons were ſpeaking, conceiv'd jealouſie at it, as well as regret; for that ſhe had given the heart of Clidamira to Artemidorus. Nevertheleſs, being oblig'd to chooſe a ticket, ſhe conſtrain'd her ſelf, and drew one; but inſtead of finding in it the heart of Artemidorus, as ſhe deſir'd, ſhe found her own, which Fortune had returned to her. And that which was remarkable, was, that ſhe was almoſt as much troubl'd, as if Artemidorus had refus'd it. Yet this Prince deſir'd to ſee what ſhe had written in the ticket, and found theſe words;

It belongs not to Fortune to diſpoſe of my heart.

You have reaſon, Madam, (ſaid Artemidorus to her) and the moſt precious thing in the world, ought not to depend on one that is capricious, and diſpences all her liberalities without choice. After this, Anacreon caus'd Æmilius to draw, who found the name of Plotina with theſe words;

Take my heart who pleaſes, but I intend it be reſtor'd to me as often as I will.

As for my part, Madam, (ſaid Æmilius to her) I have always thought, that could never be well poſſeſs'd, which was poſſible to be loſt, I conceive I ſhould do very prudently, not to accept that which Fortune has given me, againſt your will; beſides, I am not able to return you heart for, for I had no longer any to diſpoſe of the firſt time I had the honor to ſee you. Then I reſume mine very willingly (anſwer'd Plotina) for 'tis a thing we always have need of, and more convenient for it to be at home than elſewhere. But have you it there, (ſaid Acriſius) and may the word of a perſon be rely'd on, that ſcarce ever ſpeaks ſeriouſly, who makes mirth of every thing, and perhaps glories in deluding thoſe, who would by a thouſand ſervices, oblige her only to ſuffer them to be her ſervants? All that you ſay, is very well ſpoken (reply'd Plotina craftily) but 'tis good not to ſpeak ſo much at a time, while there are yet ſo many hearts to be match'd. Since it is no longer poſſible for me to obtain a heart, which is deſir'd by many others beſides my ſelf (ſaid Telanus) I do not much care for continuing the paſtime. That which I deſir'd being alſo already given, and return'd, (added Acriſius) I ſhall be well enough ſatisfi'd if it do not proceed, for when there's no longer hope left, nothing can be delectable. If I lov'd to ſpeak as much as you, (anſwer'd Sicinius coldly) I ſhould ſay the ſame that you do. For my part (ſaid Damon, the Diſciple of Pythagoras) ſince I believe not that hearts love as much to change place, as Souls do to change Bodies, I conſent to the change of the divertiſement. Flavia, Salonina, and the reſt of the company perceiving the pleaſure of it was paſt, Bereliſa, Clidamira, Artemidorus, Plotina, and Amilcar, having already drawn their tickets, told Anacreon they would diſpence with him, from proceeding in the diſtribution of the hearts which remain'd; for 'tis probable too (ſaid Themiſtus) they will not continue where lot diſpoſes them. Since 'tis ſo, ſaid Anacreon, we will leave all the hearts that are left, to go whither they pleaſe. But becauſe I love ſuch pleaſures as occaſion the production of others, I muſt make this paſtime after another manner, and inſtead of thoſe hearts, diſpos'd of by Fortune, we will write tickets, in which there ſhall be both pleaſures and puniſhments, and every one ſhall be engag'd to receive the firſt, and undergo the latter. Provided there be a Lady of your counſel, ſaid Clelia, I believe the company will obey you without repugnance. I find your caution equitable, anſwer'd Anacreon, and I engage to reſolve on nothing but with your conſent. The amiable Plotina, reply'd this fair Lady, is much more fit than I to be of your counſel, and therefore I adviſe you to make choice of her. Though I am not worthy to poſſeſs a place that was deſign'd to you, ſaid Plotina, yet I ſhall not refuſe to take it, if Anacreon pleaſes. And accordingly this illuſtrious Greek plac'd himſelf near her, and imparted to her his purpoſe. After which, having with the aſſiſtance of Amilcar, made new tickets, each of which contain'd either a pleaſure or a penalty, they were mingled and diſtributed; all the company promiſing they would punctually do what ever was appointed to them by their reſpective tickets. In the mean time Artemidorus being plac'd between Bereliſa and Clidamira, was ſufficiently perplex'd, and ſo much the more, that Themiſtus having engag'd Bereliſa in a diſcourſe, he became forc'd to anſwer to Clidamira, who us'd to him the moſt inſinuating and moving expreſſions in the world. So that as a virtuous man is much put to't to become cruel, he anſwer'd civilly enough, and contented himſelf handſomely to put off part of her blandiſh-blandiſhments and ſweetneſſes. Bereliſa, who had a delicate and tender mind; eaſily ſenſible of trouble, as a perſon who really loved, was poſſeſſed with vexation and jealouſie, even ſo as to change her colour, and not to anſwer very directly to that which Themiſtus ſaid to her. At length Anacreon, having diſtributed his Tickets, every one opened their own, and beheld the pleaſure they were to have, or the puniſhment to which they were condemned. Valeria being the moſt diligent in opening that which fell to her, found her ſelf impowred to cauſe a Sonnet to be ſung by whom ſhe pleaſed of the company. Clelia found that ſhe was obliged to entruſt a ſecret with Anacreon. Themiſtus to tell his opinion concerning a Love-queſtion that Anacreon ſhould propound to him, Bereliſa to recite ſome amorous Verſes, Acriſius, who always ſpoke ſo much, not to ſpeak at all, the reſt of that evening, Sicinius, (who as much hated to ſpeak,) to relate his own life, Clidamira, to declare what ſhe hated moſt, Plotina to command Amilcar whatſoever ſhe pleaſed, and he not to diſobey her, Artemidorus to give a Muſick-entertainment in the ſame Garden two days after, Telanus to give the Ladies a handſome Collation before the Muſick, Spurius to promiſe to hate no perſon, Æmilius to tell whither it were poſſible to love without deſires and without hope, Amilcar to relate a handſome amorous Hiſtory on the evening of the next Collation; Herminius to make a deſcription of all the divertiſement of this day. For Anacreon being counſelled by Amilcar, had ſo well ordered the matter, that that which ſeemed chance was really not ſo, in the moſt of tickets diſtributed, except in thoſe of the reſt of the Company, which contained nothing ſuiting to any perſon in particular. But when Valeria had opened the ticket which permitted her to command whom ſhe pleaſed to ſing a Sonnet, Clidimira gave her to underſtand, that Anacreon ſung well, whereupon addreſſing to him, as there is ſufficient glory, ſaid ſhe to him, to command thoſe who command others, do not take it ill that I chooſe you to obey me, and command you to ſing: And ſince there is no better example, anſwered he, than to ſee thoſe that make Laws obſerve them, I ſhall not ſcruple to obey you. And accordingly Anacreon ſung ſeveral couplets of one of his Odes, with ſo much grace and exactneſs, that it being a very handſome air, it pleaſed even thoſe who underſtood not the Greek, but it charmed thoſe who did; for he feigned that he deſired to tune his Lyre to ſing the high exploits of Heroes, and thinking he had tuned it right, when he went to uſe it, he found it would play of nothing but Love; and then endeavoring to ſing of divers Subjects one after another, he continually happened to ſay at the end of each Couplet;

I cannot ſing of ought but Love.

All this company deſired to oblige Anacreon, to ſing the ſame Sonnet again, but he alleadged the Ticket of Clelia, obliging that fair perſon to intruſt him with a ſecret. His deſire to know it would not allow him patience to ſing longer; and ſo approaching reſpectfully to her, ſhe began to whiſper to him and tell him a fictitious ſecret, not judging it fit to diſcover a true one to a perſon ſhe ſaw but the firſt time. But Anacreon delighting to ſpeak to her, pretended that what ſhe told him was no ſecret, and ſo endeavored to bring her into the neceſſity to prove to him it was. But if I ſhould ſpeak aloud what I have told you, (anſwered Clelia,) my ſecret would ceaſe to be ſuch; therefore it is requiſite, if you pleaſe, that you take it upon my word. This reaſon having ſeemed good to the Company, Anacreon propounded a Love queſtion to Themiſtus, to tell his opinion of. It was, whether he believed Love could ſubſiſt, during an abſence which was known would be perpetual, and if Love could remain conſtant in the heart of a Lover and a Miſtreſs, while they were certain of never enjoying one anothers ſight again. For eternal abſence (added he) is a kind of death in Love, and ſeems fatal enough to extinguiſh it. That which you propound to me (anſwered Themiſtus) cannot very eaſily come to paſs, for the mind is always ſoothed up with ſome relique of hope. But 'tis poſſible, two perſons that love one another, may find ſo little probability of meeting again, as to believe they never ſhall; whereby there may be no hope left in their minds of ever attaining any ſatisfaction of their Love. Nevertheleſs I conceive, if a mans heart be really touched, and the perſon he loves return him affection for affection, if it be only the croſneſs of Fortune that ſeparates ſuch two perſons, without their own contributing ought thereto on one ſide or other, if they behold a deep ſorrow in one anothers eyes at their ſeparation, and be abſolutely aſſured of their reciprocal dearneſs, I conceive (I ſay) their affection may ſubſiſt, notwithſtanding their eternal abſence. The grief ariſing from their ſeparation, may no doubt be diminiſhed, ſince it is not poſſible to live always in lamentation. But Love will not wear away, yet it will remain leſs ſenſible in proceſs of time, though always ſufficiently ſtrong to keep it ſelf from being deſtroyed by an other paſſion, and to cauſe us to love nothing but that we have fixed our affections upon, though without hope of ever receiving contentment from it. At leaſt I have found ſentiments in my own heart, which perſwade me I ſhould be capable of ſuch an unuſual fidelity (for we oftentimes ſee abſence of no great duration, proves deſtructive to very ardent paſſions.) There are ſome people (interrupted Plotina) who in the very places where their Miſtreſſes are preſent, are lyable to abſences of heart worſe than the other. But to make an end of my ſentiment, (continued Themiſtus) I am of opinion, a violent Love will not become abſolutely extinct during a long abſence, if a new paſſion do not deſtroy it; for there is ſomething ſo ſweet in Loving, that when we once love well, our minds are unable to reſolve to love nothing at all, after having taſted the ſweetneſs of this paſſion. You have ſo well ſatisfied what I enjoyned you (anſwered Anacreon) that if the lovely Bereliſa acquit her ſelf as well of what is commanded her, ſhe will repeat very amorous Verſes. Nevertheleſs (ſaid ſhe bluſhing) I ſhall not repeat many; for I have a memory as unfaithful, as others have their hearts. But ſince 'tis unlawful to diſobey you, I ſhall repeat ſome Verſes I learnt heretofore, made (as was ſaid) by a Woman, whilſt ſhe imagined a Lover whom whom she affected, returned to love a former Mistress, whom she accounted unworthy of his affection. And accordingly Berelisa being lead by a jealous passion, recited the following Verses which she had made at Agrigentum, in the height of her jealousie, and had never shewed to any person till then; so that Artemidorus was surprised to hear that which follows;

Tell me, poor slave, what meant those shows
Of tenderness, or all those vows;
If thou intendest not to prove
By them, thou truly wert in love?
But since thou'rt turn'd disloyall, goe
Condemned to disgrace and woe:
Mean while I'le bless my self and smile
Thy falsity did me beguile.

Berelisa repeating these Verses, turning a little towards Artemidorus, made the Company esteem them sufficiently amorous. Clidamira smiled deceitfully, and Artemidorus was troubled, knowing Berelisa too well to be ignorant of the sentiments of her heart. But the best was, Acrisius who was so addicted to loquacity, not remembring that his Ticket enjoyned him silence for all the remainder of the evening, could not contain himself from making a long acclamation in praise of these Verses. But Anacreon checking him for it, lengthened the time of his silence from the next morning to noon; after which Sicinius, who loved not long discourses, was obliged to relate his whole life in order to satisfying his ticket, which he did in this manner.

Whereas I am of opinion, a man cannot be said to have lived while he did not love, the relation of my life will not be long; for my love is but of six months date, and during that time I have had nothing else to do but to bemoan my self for the rigor of my Mistress, and uneffectually to endeavor to love her no more.

After this, Sicinius held his peace, and nevertheless made apparent by this short relation, that those who speak little, have sometimes as much wit, as those that speak excessively; for he handsomely enough quitted himself of the perplexity he was designed to be put into. In the next place Clidamira being to declare what she hated most, answered roughly, Not to be believed when she spoke truth. I conceive (said Berelisa craftily) it is more troublesome not to be believed when we speak an untruth, because it seems to be more cause of regret for a man to have invented a thing he is unable to make believed. Assuredly Berelisa has reason (answered the Prince Artemidorus,) but since it remains only for me to promise Musick, when the Ladies require it, I do it with pleasure. I do the like for the Collation injoyned me (added Telanire.) And as for me, (said Spurius) since I am obliged to promise not to hate any person, I do it with condition to break my word; for I foresee I shall not be freed from hatred so long as I am vowed to Love. Now it belongs to me, (said Æmilius, looking upon Valeria) to determine whether it is possible to love without desires, or without hope. But because it seems too late to make a long discourse, it will be more convenient for me to tell you the opinion of a Lover of my acquaintance, who one day made Verses upon this Subject, and in one place of that Work speaks thus;

Cold and fruitless is Loves fire,
Whence is banisht all desire.
